One does not necessarily become a non-resident by absconding or absenting himself from his place of abode; 52 Mo. App. 291; nor does a mere casual or temporary absence on business or pleasure render one a non-resident, even if he may not have a house of usual abode in the state; 4 Barb. 504; 15 Abb. Pr. 221; if there be no intent to change his residence; 54 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 225; 59 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 199. But where a man has a settled abode, for the time being, in another state for the purpose of business or pleasure, he is a non-resident; 82 Cal. 631; and it has been held that one who departs from the state with his family and remains absent for about a year is a non-resident, though he has not acquired a residence elsewhere, and though he intended to return in a few months; 69 Hun 308. See HOME; DOMICIL; RESIDENCE; PROCESS; SERVICE.

NON RESIDENTIA PRO CLERICIS REGIS. A writ addressed to a bishop charging him not to molest a clerk employed in the king's service, by reason of his non-residence. Cowel; Reg. Orig. 58.

NON SCRIPTUM. See JUS SCRIPTUM.

NON SOLVENDO PECUNIAM AD QUAM CLERICUS MULCTATUR PRO NON RESIDENTIA. A writ prohibiting an ordinary from taking a pecuniary mulct imposed upon a clerk of the king's for non-residence. Cowel.

NON SUBMISSIT (Lat.). The name of a plea to an action of debt on a bond to perform an award, by which the defendant pleads that he did not submit. Bacon, Abr. Arbitration, etc. (G).

NON SUM INFORMATUS (Lat.). In Pleading. I am not informed. See JUDGMENT.

NON TENENT INSIMUL (Lat.) they do not hold together). In Pleading. A plea to an action in partition, by which the defendant denies that he holds the property which is the subject of the suit, together with the complainant or plaintiff.

NON TENUIT (Lat. he did not hold). In Pleading. The name of a plea in bar in replevin, when the defendant has avowed for rent-arrear, by which the plaintiff avows that he did not hold in manner and form as the avowry alleges. Rosc. Real Act. 628.

NON-TENURE. In Pleading. A plea in a real action, by which the defendant asserted that he did not hold the land, or at least some part of it, as mentioned in the plaintiff's declaration; 1 Mod. 350; in which case the writ abates as to the part with reference to which the plea is sustained. 8 Cra. 242. It may be pleaded with or without a disclaimer. It was a dilatory plea, though not strictly in abatement; 2 Saund. 44, n. 4; Dy. 210; Booth, Real Act. 179; 3 Mass. 312; 11 id. 218; but might be pleaded as to part along with a plea in bar as to the rest; 1 Lutw. 716; Rast. Ent. 281 a, b; and was subsequently considered as a plea in bar; 14 Mass. 239; 1 Me. 54; 2 N. H. 10; Bac. Abr. Pleas (I 9).

NON-TERM. The vacation between two terms of a court.

NON-TERRITORIAL PROPERTY. See TERRITORIAL PROPERTY.

NON-TRADING PARTNERSHIP. A partnership organized for the purpose of carrying on the business of sawing lumber pickets and lath is non-trading in character; 145 U. S. 512, reversing 30 Fed. Rep. 413. See PARTNERSHIP.

A non-commercial firm, the members of which can not be held, as matter of law, and by reason of the nature of the partnership business, to have authority to execute negotiable instruments in the name of the firm. 145 U. S. 517.

The distinction between trading and non-trading partnerships is fully indicated, in a general way, by the names alone. The former is commercial, the object of which is buying and selling. The latter embraces those partnerships which are not embraced under the former. To this extent the distinction is simple; but when applied to individual cases it is often exceedingly hard to classify the relation. As a rule, the question is immaterial as to which class the partnership belongs; but one exception often makes it very important, this exception being, that in a trading partnership there is a presumption of mutual and general agency, while the rule does not apply in non-trading partnerships. "In a commercial partnership each acting partner is its general agent, with implied authority to act for the firm in all matters within the scope of its business; and the presumption of law is that all commercial paper which bears the signature of the firm, executed by one of the partners, is the paper of the partnership, for the reason that the giving of such notes would be within the usual course of mercantile transactions. But when we pass to non-trading partnerships the doctrine of general agency does not apply, and there is no presumption of authority to support the act of one partner. Hence, in order to subject the firm upon a bill or note executed by the partner in its name, a course of conduct, or usage, or other facts sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the acting partner had been invested by his copartners with the requisite authority, must appear, or that the firm has ratified the act by receiving the benefit of it." (53 Conn. 53.) 1 Rowley, Partnership, 150-152.

NON-USE. The neglect to make use of a thing.

A right which may be acquired by use may be lost by non-user; and an absolute discontinuance of the use for twenty years affords presumption of the extinguishment of the right in favor of some other adverse right; 5 Whart. 584; 28 Pick. 141; but non-user of the franchise of a corporation is held insufficient to constitute a dissolution of the same without a judicial adjudication thereof; 84 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 209. See DISSOLUTION; FORFEITURE. A right of way, whether acquired by grant or prescription, is not extinguished by the habitual use by its owner of another way, equally convenient, instead of it, unless there is an intentional abandonment of the former way; 121 Mass. 3. See ABANDONMENT; EASEMENT.

Every public officer is required to use his office for the public good: a non-user of a public office is, therefore, a sufficient cause of forfeiture; 2 Bla. Com. 153; 9 Co. 50. Non-user for a great length of time will have the effect of repealing an old law. But it must be a very strong case which will have that effect; 18 S. & R. 452.

NONENUMERATED DAY. See NONENUMERATED MOTIONS.

NONENUMERATED MOTIONS. In New York, motions are divided into two classes, enumerated and nonenumerated. In 1 Cai. (N. Y.) 22 it was held that on a non-enumerated motion for irregularity, the merits could not be entered into. The court said: "The application must be for irregularity only, to bring it on as a nonenumerated motion. If merits are united, it becomes enumerated." 21 A. & E. Encyc., 2nd ed., 545. A motion to set aside a verdict for irregular conduct by the jury has been held to be a nonenumerated motion. Id., 2 Cai. (N. Y.) 381. A motion for a peremptory mandamus, on the coming in of a return to an alternative mandamus, is a nonenumerated motion, if the relator has not formally demurred. Id., 6 Wend. (N. Y.) 559.

Notice of a nonenumerated motion, may be for an enumerated day, if accompanied with an excuse for not being given the first day. 2 Cai. (N. Y.) 259.

NONSENSE. That which in a written agreement or will is unintelligible.

It is a rule of law that an instrument shall be so construed that the whole, if possible, shall stand. When a matter is written grammatically right, but it is unintelligible and the whole makes nonsense, some words cannot be rejected to make sense of the rest; 1 Salk. 324; but when matter is nonsense by being contrary and repugnant to some precedent sensible matter, such repugnant matter is rejected; 14 Viner, Abr. 142; 15 id. 500. The maxim of the civil law on this subject agrees with this rule: Quæ in testamento ita sunt scripta, ut intelligi non possent, perinde sunt ac si scripta non essent. Dig. 50. 17. 73. 3. See AMBIGUITY; CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

In pleading, when matter is nonsense by being contradictory and repugnant to some thing precedent, the precedent matter, which is sense, shall not be defeated by the repugnancy which follows, but that which is contradictory shall be rejected; as in ejectment where the declaration is of a demise on the second day of January, and that the defendant postea scilicet, on the first of January, ejected him, here the scilicet may be rejected as being expressly contrary to the postea and the precedent matter; 6 East 255; 1 Salk. 324.

NONSUIT. The name of a judgment given against the plaintiff when he is unable to prove a case, or when he refuses or neglects to proceed to the trial of a cause after it has been put at issue, without determining such issue.

A voluntary nonsuit is an abandonment of his cause by plaintiff, who allows a judgment for costs to be entered against him by absenting himself or failing to answer when called upon to hear the verdict. 1 Dutch. 556. See 77 Me. 344.

An involuntary nonsuit takes place when the plaintiff, on being called, when his case is before the court for trial, neglects to appear, or when he has given no evidence on which a jury could find a verdict. 18 Johns. 334. See 78 Mich. 558.

At common law the plaintiff cannot be nonsuited against his will; for a party cannot be compelled to make default.

An involuntary nonsuit is not ordered against a plaintiff who has given evidence of his claim, in the federal courts; 108 U.

S. 364; 1 Pet. 469; 1 McCrary 436; 7 U. S. App. 359; nor in many of the state courts; 9 Ind. 551; 6 Ark. 44; 14 id. 708; 57 id. 468; 2 Dougl. (Mich.) 125; 13 Mo. 312; 19 id. 101; 2 Or. 57; 4 Yerg. 538; 4 Vt. 363; 1 Wash. Va. 87, 219; 28 Md. 312; 12 Sm. & M. 350; but in other states if the evidence is insufficient to support the action a nonsuit may be granted; 40 Pa. 384; 155 Mass. 96; 36 Minn. 122; 15 R. 1. 213; 30 N. J. L. 460; 15 Nev. 59; 13 Neb. 37; 45 Ia. 661; 13 Johns. 334; 24 N. Y. 430; 3 McCord 131; 42 Me. 259; 26 N. H. 351; 4 Ohio St. 628; 12 Or. 329; 17 Ill. 494; 126 id. 466; 1 Cal. 108; 103 id. 153; 16 Ga. 154.

In Pennsylvania, by statute, the plaintiff may be nonsuited compulsorily. This may be done in two cases: (1) under the act of March 11, 1836, when the defendant has offered no evidence, and the plaintiff's evidence is not sufficient in law to maintain his action; (2) under the act of April 14, 1846, confined to Philadelphia, when the cause is reached and the plaintiff or his counsel does not appear, or, if he appears, does not proceed to trial, and does not assign and prove a sufficient legal cause for continuance.

The granting of a nonsuit for want of sufficient evidence to warrant a verdict for the plaintiff is no infringement of the right of trial by jury; 164 U. S. 301.

The defendant cannot assign as error the denial of his motion for a nonsuit if thereafter he proceeds to examine witnesses and try the cause on the merits; 80 Fed. Rep. 633.

A nonsuit is no bar to another action for the same cause; Freeman, Judgt. § 261; 5 Allen 15; 9 N. J. L. 38; 77 Hun 30.

A judge has no power to nonsuit a plaintiff on the opening statement of his counsel without his consent; [1893] 1 Q. B. 122; nor is a nonsuit warranted unless it appears that plaintiff is not entitled to recover after giving him the most favorable view that a jury would be warranted in taking of the evidence; 137 N. Y. 389; 156 Pa. 34; but where the evidence is sufficient to sustain a verdict for plaintiff the court should not grant a nonsuit; 69 Hun 373.

A nonsuit may be asked for at any time before verdict; 38 S. C. 507; 103 Cal. 251; see 31 Fla. 56; and, if it is proper, to grant it prematurely is harmless error; 102 Cal. 450. Defendant waives his motion for a nonsuit and cannot base any claim of error upon it, where, after it is overruled, he proceeds with his defence and introduces testimony; 149 U. S. 17; 153 id. 216; 123 id. 710; 124 id. 405. Exception cannot be taken to the court's refusal to enter a compulsory nonsuit; 161 Pa. 87.

After the trial is begun, plaintiff's right to take a nonsuit is not absolute, but lies in the discretion of the court, and will be denied when plaintiff gets all his own evidence in and is not surprised by defendant's evidence; 59 Fed. Rep. 670.

After a voluntary nonsuit taken by the plaintiff, the court cannot reinstate the case without defendant's consent; 36 Pittsb. L. J. Pa. 356.

The formality of calling the plaintiff when he is to suffer a nonsuit is obsolete in most of the states.

NOON. In Insurance Policy. Twelve o'clock, standard time. 120 Ky. 752, 87 S. W. 1155.

NORMALLY. According to an established norm, rule, or principle; conformed to a type, standard, or regular form. Webster.

NORMAN FRENCH. See LANGUAGE.

NORBOY. See HERALD.

NORTH. In a description in a deed, unless qualified or controlled by other words, it means due north. Northerly in a grant, where there is no object to direct its inclination to the east or west, must be construed to mean north. 1 Johns. 156; 96 Col. 505. See 115 Mass. 678.

NORTH CAROLINA. The name of one of the original states of the United States of America.

The territory which now forms this state was included in the grant made in 1663 by Charles II. to Lord Clarendon and others, of a much more extensive country. The boundaries were enlarged by a new charter granted by the same prince to the same proprietaries in the year 1666. By this charter the proprietaries were authorized to make laws with the assent of the freemen of the province or their delegates, and they were invested with various other powers. Being dissatisfied with the form of government, the proprietaries procured the celebrated John Locke to draw up a plan of government for the colony, which was adopted, and proved to be impracticable: it was highly exceptionable on account of its disregard of the principles of religious toleration and national liberty, which are now universally admitted. After a few years of unsuccessful operation it was abandoned. The colony had been settled at two points, one called the Northern and the other the Southern settlement, which were governed by separate legislatures. In 1729 the proprietaries surrendered their charter, when it became a royal province, and was governed by a commission and a form of government in substance similar to that established in other royal provinces. In 1732 the territory was divided, and the divisions assumed the names of North Carolina and South Carolina.

A constitution of North Carolina was adopted December 18, 1776. To this constitution amendments were made in convention June 4, 1835, which were ratified by the people, and took effect on January 1, 1836. There was a second constitution of 1868, and the amended constitution of 1876.

NORTH DAKOTA. One of the states of the United States.

By the act of congress of February 22, 1889 (1 Supp. Rev. Stat. 645), the area comprising the territory of Dakota was divided on the line of the seventh standard parallel produced due west to the western boundary of said territory, and that portion north of said parallel forms the state of North Dakota. The proclamation announcing the admission of this state into the Union was made by the President on November 2, 1889.

NORTHAMPTON, ASSIZE OF.

This Assize enacts among other things that every robber on being taken is to be delivered to the custody of the sheriff, and in his absence to be taken to the nearest castellan to be kept by him till he is delivered to the custody of the sheriff.

The Assize also provides (Art. 2) that no one is to be allowed to entertain any guest in his house, either in a town or in the country (neque in burgo neque in villa), for more than a night unless the guest has some reasonable excuse which the host is to show to his neighbors, and when the guest leaves, he must do so in the presence of neighbors and by day. Stephen, cr. Proc. in 2 Essays in Anglo-Amer. L. H. 445.

NORTHAMPTON, STATUTE OF. The statute 2 Edw. 3, containing 17 chapters, most of which are now repealed. It was enacted at Northampton in 1328. Byrne.

NORTHAMPTON TABLES. Life tables prepared by a Dr. Price from bills of mortality (q. v.) kept in the parish of All Saints in the north of England, between 1735 and 1780. Anderson. See LIFE TABLES; CARLISLE TABLES; WIGGLESWORTH'S TABLES.

NOSCITUR A SOCIIS (It is known by its associates). The maxim noscitur a sociis is used only to solve ambiguity. Noscitur a sociis is a well established and useful rule of construction where words are of obscure or doubtful meaning; and then, but only then, its aid may be sought to remove the obscurity or doubt by reference to the associated words. 148 U. S. 503, 519; 75 Minn. 163. That a word may be known by the company it keeps is, however, not an invariable rule, for the word may have a character of its own not to be submerged by its association. Rules of statutory construction are to be invoked as aids to the ascertainment of the meaning or application of words otherwise obscure or doubtful. They have no place except in the domain of ambiguity. 175 U. S. 414, 421; 222 U. S. 513, 518-519. Verbs in an enumeration whose meaning, when they are separately applied to their common object, is plain, should be interpreted distributively. 261 U. S. 515, 520.

NOSOCOMI. In Civil Law. Persons who have the management and care of hospitals for paupers. Clef Lois Rom. mot Administrateurs.

NOT DOUBTING. In Will. The words "not doubting," as used in a will, are considered sufficient to raise a trust where the subject and object are sufficiently certain. 78 Ky. 128.

NOT FOUND. Words indorsed on a bill of indictment by a grand jury, when they have not sufficient evidence to find a true bill. See IGNORAMUS FOUND.

NOT GUILTY. In Pleading. The general issue in several sorts of actions.

In trespass, its form is as follows: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the force and injury, when, etc., and says that he is not guilty of the said trespasses above laid to his charge, or any part thereof, in the manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country."

Under this issue the defendant may give in evidence any matter which directly controverts the truth of any allegation, which the plaintiff on such general issue will be bound to prove; 1 B. & P. 213; and no person is bound to justify who is not prima facie a trespasser; 2 B. & P. 359; 2 Saund. 284 d. For example, the plea of not guilty is proper in trespass to persons, if the defendant have committed no assault, battery, or imprisonment, etc.; and in trespass to personal property, if the plaintiff had no property in the goods, or the defendant were not guilty of taking them, etc.; and in trespass to real property, this plea not only puts in issue the fact of trespass, etc., but also the title, which, whether freehold or possessory in the defendant or a person under whom he claims, may be given in evidence under it, which matters show prima facie that the right of possession, which is necessary in trespass, is not in the plaintiff, but in the defendant or the person under whom he justifies; 7 Term 354; 8 id. 403; Willes 222; Steph. Pl. 178; 1 Chitty, Pl. 491, 492.

In trespass on the case in general the formula is as follows: "And the said C D, by E F, his attorney, comes and defends the wrong and injury, when, etc., and says that he is not guilty of the premises above laid to his charge, in manner and form as the said A B hath above complained. And of this the said C D puts himself upon the country."

This, it will be observed, is a mere traverse, or denial, of the facts alleged in the declaration, and therefore, on principle, should be applied only to cases in which the defence rests on such a denial. But here a relaxation has taken place; for, under this plea, a defendant is permitted not only to contest the truth of the declaration, but, with some exceptions, to prove any matter of defence that tends to show that the plaintiff has no cause of action, though such matters be in confession and avoidance of the declaration; as, for example, a release given, or satisfaction made; Steph. Pl. 182, 183; 1 Chitty, Pl. 486; McKelv. Pl. 31.

In trover. It is not usual in this action to plead any other plea, except the statute of limitations; and a release, and the bankruptcy of the plaintiff, may be given in evidence under the general issue; 7 Term 391.

In debt on a judgment suggesting a devastavit, an executor may plead not guilty; 1 Term 462.

In criminal cases, when the defendant wishes to put himself on his trial, he pleads not guilty. This plea makes it incumbent upon the prosecutor to prove every fact and circumstance constituting the offence, as stated in the indictment, information, or complaint. On the other hand, the defendant may give in evidence under this plea not only everything which negatives the allegations in the indictment, but also all matter of excuse and justification.

In English practice, under the Jud. Act, 1875, it is not sufficient for a defendant to deny generally the facts alleged by the plaintiff's statement of claim, but he must deal specifically with each allegation of fact of which he does not admit the truth. But this does not affect defendant's right to plead "not guilty by statute," which is a plea of the general issue by a defendant in a civil action, when he intends to give special matter in evidence by virtue of some act or acts of parliament; in which case he must add the reference to such act or acts, and state whether they are public or otherwise. But if a defendant so plead, he will not be allowed to plead any other defence without the leave of the court or a judge. Jud. Act, 1875, 1st Sched. Ord. xix. r. 16. Moz. & W.

NOT IN HIS SELF-DEFENSE.

The words "not in his self-defense" should be taken as qualifying everything that follows them, including the words "carelessly and wantonly," and "careless or wantonly." 47 S. W. 770.

NOT LESS THAN. See AT LEAST.

NOT POSSESSED. In Pleading.

A plea sometimes used in actions of trover, when the defendant was not possessed of the goods at the commencement of the action. 3 M. & G. 101, 103. See McKelvin. Pl. 34. This plea would probably be held "evasive" within the meaning of Ord. xix. r. 22, Jud. Act, 1875. Moz. & W.

NOT PROVEN. In Scotch Criminal Law.

It is a peculiarity of the Scotch jury system in criminal trials that it admits a verdict of not proven, corresponding to the non liquet of the Roman law. The legal effect of this is equivalent to not guilty; for a prisoner in whose case it is pronounced cannot be tried again. According to the homely but expressive maxim of the law, no man can be made to thole an assize twice. But, although the verdict of not proven is so far tantamount to an acquittal that the party cannot be tried a second time, it falls very far short of it with regard to the effect upon his reputation. He goes away from the bar of the court with an indelible stigma upon his name. There stands recorded against him the opinion of a jury that the evidence respecting his guilt was so strong that they did not dare to pronounce a verdict of acquittal. When Sir Nicholas Throckmorton was tried and acquitted by an English jury in 1564, he said, "It is better to be tried than to live suspected." But in Scotland a man may be not only tried, but acquitted, and yet live suspected, owing to the sinister influence of a verdict of not proven. Forsyth, Hist. Trial by Jury 384.

NOTARIUS. In Civil Law.

One who took notes or draughts in shorthand of what was said by another, or of proceedings in the senate or in a court. One who draughted written instruments, wills, conveyances, etc. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

In English Law. A notary. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; Cowell.

NOTARY, NOTARY PUBLIC.

An officer appointed by the executive or other appointing power, under the laws of different states.

Notaries are of ancient origin; they existed in Rome during the republic, and were called tabelliones forenses, or personae publicae. Their employment consisted in the drawing up of legal documents. They exist in all the countries of Europe, and as early as A. D. 803 were appointed by the Frankish kings and the popes. Notaries in England are appointed by the archbishop of Canterbury. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, § 4. They are officers of the civil and canon law; Brooke, Office & Pr. of a Notary 9. In most of the states, notaries are appointed by the governor alone, in others by the governor, by and with the advice of his council, in others by and with the advice and consent of the senate; in the District of Columbia they are appointed by the President of the United States. As a general rule, throughout the United States, the official acts of a notary public must be authenticated by seal as well as signature; 10 Iowa 305; 49 Ala. 242; 12 Ill. 162.

Their duties differ somewhat in the different states, and are prescribed by statute. They are generally as follows: to protest bills of exchange and draw up acts of honor; to authenticate and certify copies of documents; to receive the affidavits of mariners and draw up protest relating to the same; to attest and take acknowledgments of deeds and other instruments, and to administer oaths. Ordinarily notaries have no jurisdiction outside the county or district for which they are appointed; but in several states they may act throughout the state.

By act of congress, Sept. 16, 1850, notaries are authorized to administer oaths and take acknowledgments in all cases where under the laws of the United States justices of the peace were formerly authorized to act.

By act of Aug. 15, 1878, c. 304, notaries are authorized to take depositions and do all other acts in relation to taking testimony to be used in the courts of the United States, and to take acknowledgments and affidavits with the same effect as commissioners of the United States circuit courts may do. R. S. § 1778. They may protest national bank circulating notes; R. S. § 5226; take acknowledgment of assignment of claims upon the United States; id. § 3477; and administer oaths of allegiance to persons prosecuting such claims; id. § 3479. By act of June 22, 1874, c. 390, notaries may take proof of debts against the estate of a bankrupt. By act of Feb. 26, 1881, c. 82, reports of national banks may be sworn to before notaries, but such notary must not be an officer of the bank; R. S. § 5211. By act of Aug. 18, 1856, c. 127, every secretary of legation and consular officer may, within the limits of his legation, perform any notarial act; R. S. § 1750. A statute which authorizes a notary public to commit for contempt a witness who has been duly subpoenaed to testify before him and who refuses to be sworn or give his deposition, is unconstitutional; 48 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 574.

The acts of notaries are respected by the custom of merchants and the law of nations. Their protest of a bill is received as evidence in the courts of all civilized countries. Except in cases of protest of bills, the signature of a notary to an instrument going to a foreign country ought to be authenticated by the consul or representative of that country.

The notaries of England have always considered themselves authorized to administer oaths; and the act of 5 & 6 Will. IV. has placed it beyond dispute. In this country they do not exercise the power unless authorized by statute, except in cases where the oath is to be used out of the state or in the courts of the United States.

Upon the general principle they cannot act in cases in which they are interested; 95 Am. Dec. 378, note; 37 Ga. 374; but where a notary public was intermediary between a borrower and lender on mortgage and took the acknowledgment of the mortgage, his act was held valid, there being nothing on the face of the papers to indicate to third parties that there was any incapacity to act; 84 Fed. Rep. 515; and the mere fact that he is an officer of a corporation does not make its acknowledgment before him invalid; 37 L. R. A. 434.

The books or registers of a deceased notary are admissible to prove his official acts as to presentment, demand, and notice of non-payment of negotiable paper; 8 Wheat. 326; 1 Gray 175; and so are entries of a notary's clerk; 51 N. Y. 84. When produced, the handwriting of the deceased person must be proved; 18 Wall. 516.

Where an action is brought against a notary for a false certificate of acknowledgment, the presumption is that the defendant, acting in his judicial capacity, did so on reasonable information, and discharged his full duty. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff to prove a clear and intentional dereliction of duty; 97 Pa. 228; Proff. Notaries, 2d ed. §§ 48, 175; Notary's Manual. It has been held an actionable libel for a notary falsely and maliciously to protest for non-payment the acceptance of a person, and then send the draft with such protest to the source from whence it came; 88 Ga. 308.

One who has lost his chattel mortgage lien by the negligence of the notary in making a defective acknowledgment, can recover no damages from such notary, where the property covered by the mortgage is absolutely worthless; 75 Cal. 182.

NOTATION. The act of making a memorandum of some special circumstance on a probate or letters of administration.

NOTCHELL. "Crying the wife's Notchell" seems to have been a means of preventing her running up debts against her husband. See 20 Law Mag. & Rev. 280.

NOTE. "Note" means negotiable promissory note. Miller's Ky. Negotiable Inst. Law, § 190. See ACTION ON AN INSTRUMENT TRANSFERABLE BY DELIVERY.

NOTE A BILL. When a foreign note has been dishonored it is usual for a notary public to present it again on the same day. If it is not then paid he makes a minute consisting of his initials, the day, month and year, and reason, if assigned, of non-payment, which proceeding is termed "noting the bill."

NOTE OF ALLOWANCE. A note delivered by a master to a party to a cause, who alleged that there was error in law in the record and proceedings, allowing him to bring error.

NOTE OF A FINE. The fourth step of the proceedings in acknowledging a fine, which is only an abstract of the writ of covenant and the concord, naming the parties, the parcel of land, and the agreement, and enrolled of record in the proper office. 2 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 351, App. n. iv. § 3; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 542.

NOTE OF HAND. A popular name for a promissory note.

NOTE OR MEMORANDUM. An informal note or abstract of a transaction required by the statute of frauds.

The form of it is immaterial; but it must contain the essential terms of the contract expressed with such a degree of certainty that it may be understood without reference to parol evidence to show intent of parties; Browne, Stat. of Fr. 353, 386; 43 Me. 158; 4 R. I. 14; 14 N. Y. 584; 31 Miss. 17; 11 Cush. 127; 9 Rich. 215; 23 Mo. 423; 17 Ill. 854; 8 Ia. 430. In some states, and in England, the consideration need not be stated in the note or memorandum; 4 B. & Ald. 595; 5 Cra. 142; 17 Mass. 122; 6 Conn. 81.

A memorandum of the terms of an agreement was signed by plaintiff but not by defendant; the latter subsequently wrote to plaintiff referring to "our agreement for the hire of your carriage," and "my monthly payment." There was no other arrangement between the parties, to which these expressions could refer. Held, that the letter and the document containing the terms of the arrangement together constituted a note and memorandum signed by defendant, within the fourth section of the statute of frauds; 45 L. T. Rep. n. s. 348; s. c. 25 Alb. L. J. 70. See 99 U. S. 100; 139 Id. 210; 149 Id. 481; 32 N. J. Eq. 828; 66 Ind. 474.

See Browne; Reed, Stat. of Frauds; MEMORANDUM.

NOTE OF PROTEST. A note or minute of the protest, made by the notary, at time of protest, on the bill, to be completed or filled out at his leisure. Byles, Bills, 15th ed. 214.

NOTES. See JUDGE'S NOTES.

NOTICE. The information given of some act done, or the interpellation by which some act is required to be done. Knowledge.

A statutory notice is not binding unless given as the law directs or allows; 100 N. C. 225; 45 Ill. App. 572.

Actual notice exists when knowledge is actually brought home to the party to be affected by it. This statement is criticised, as being too narrow, in Wade, Notice 4. This writer divides actual knowledge into two classes, express and implied; the former includes all knowledge of a degree above that which depends upon collateral inference, or which imposes upon the party the further duty of inquiry; the latter imputes knowledge to the party because he is shown to be conscious of having the means of knowledge, though he does not use them, choosing to remain ignorant of the fact, or is grossly negligent in not following up the inquiry which the known facts suggest; Wade, Notice 5. In 42 Conn. 146, there is a division into "particular or explicit" and "general or implied" notice. Information which a prudent man believes to be true, and which if followed by inquiry must lead to knowledge, is equivalent to knowledge; 6 Or. 407.

Any fact which is sufficient to put a purchaser of land on inquiry, is adequate notice; 83 Va. 397; 84 Id. 348; and of everything to which such inquiry may lead; 151 U. S. 607.

Constructive notice exists when the party, by any circumstance whatever, is put upon inquiry (which is the same as implied notice, supra), or when certain acts have been done which the party interested is presumed to have knowledge of on grounds of public policy; 2 Mas. 531; 14 Pick. 224; 4 N. H. 397; 14 S. & R. 333. The recording a deed; 23 Mo. 287; 35 Barb. 635; 28 Miss. 354; 4 Kent 182, n.; an advertisement in a newspaper, when authorized by statute as a part of the process, public acts of government, and his pendens (but see LIS PENDENS), furnish constructive notice. Judge Story defines the term as "knowledge" imputed by the court on presumption, too strong to be rebutted, that the information must have been communicated; Story, Eq. Jur. § 399; and see 2 Anstr. 432. "Constructive notice is a legal inference of notice, of so high a nature, as to be conclusive, unless disproved, and is in most cases insusceptible of explanation or rebuttal by evidence that the purchaser had no actual notice, and believed the vendor's title to be good;" 2 Lead. Cas. Eq. 77. Constructive notice is sometimes called notice in law; 1 Johns. Ch. 261. The constructive notice given by the record of a deed is sometimes called record notice. Where an instrument affecting the title to real estate is properly recorded, the record thereof is notice to subsequent purchasers, etc., from the same grantor; Wade, Notice, 2d ed. § 97; 38 Tex. 530; 30 Ark. 407; 28 N. J. Eq. 49.

The possession of land is notice to all the world of the possessor's rights thereunder; 24 Neb. 692; 74 Ia. 294; 125 Pa. 470; 29 S. C. 147; 142 U. S. 417.

Notice to an agent in the same transaction is, in general, notice to the principal; 25 Conn. 444; 10 Rich. 293; 3 Pa. 67; 39 N. Y. 70; 11 Colo. 223. See 25 Am. L. Reg. 1; 40 Minn. 390; 23 Neb. 334. A principal imposing confidence in an agent, and therefore neglecting some source of knowledge which he might have sought, is not chargeable with what he might have found out upon inquiry aroused by suspicion; 130 U. S. 505. Notice to the trustees is notice to the beneficiaries in a deed of trust; 133 U. S. 670; 32 W. Va. 244.

A principal is not bound by his agent's knowledge where it is not the duty of the agent to communicate it; 75 Ia. 669.

The giving notice in certain cases is in the nature of a condition precedent to the right to call on the other party for the performance of his engagement, whether his contract were express or implied. Thus, in the familiar instance of bills of exchange and promissory notes, the implied contract of an indorser is that he will pay the bill or note, provided it be not paid, on presentment at maturity, by the acceptor or maker (being the party primarily liable), and provided that he (the indorser) has due notice of the dishonor, and without which he is discharged from all liability; consequently, it is essential for the holder to be prepared to prove affirmatively that such notice was given, or some facts dispersing with such notice; 1 Chitty, Pr. 498; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 516.

Whenever the defendant's liability to perform an act depends on another occurrence which is best known to the plaintiff, and of which the defendant is not legally bound to take notice, the plaintiff must prove that due notice was in fact given. So, in cases of insurances on ships, a notice of abandonment is frequently necessary to enable the assured plaintiff to proceed as for a total loss when something remains to be saved, in relation to which, upon notice, the insurers might themselves take their own measures.

Notice may be written or oral, in many cases, at the option of the party required to give it; but written notice is generally preferable, both as avoiding doubt and ambiguity in its terms, and as admitting more easy and exact proof of delivery; 2 Dan. Neg. Inst. 972. See KNOWLEDGE. ACTUAL KNOWLEDGE; IMMEDIATE, Notice, LEGAL NOTICE.

NOTICE TO ADMIT. In the practice of the English high court either party may call upon the other to admit a document, and on refusal or neglect to admit he must bear the costs of proving the document, unless the judge certifies that the refusal was reasonable. Rules of Court XXXII; Whart.

NOTICE, AVERMENT OF. In Pleading. The statement in a pleading that notice has been given.

When the matter alleged in the pleading is to be considered as lying more properly in the knowledge of the plaintiff than of the defendant, then the declaration ought to state that the defendant had notice thereof; as, when the defendant promised to give the plaintiff as much for a commodity as another person had given or should give for the like.

But where the matter does not lie more properly in the knowledge of the plaintiff than of the defendant, notice need not be averred; 1 Saund. 117, n. 2; 2 Id. 62 a, n. 4; Freem. 285. Therefore, if the defendant contracted to do a thing on the performance of an act by a stranger, notice need not be averred; for it lies in the defendant's knowledge as much as the plaintiff's, and he ought to take notice of it at his peril; Com. Dig. Plead. (C 65). See Com. Dig. Plead. (C 73, 74, 75); Viner, Abr. Notice; Hardr. 42; 5 Term 621.

The omission of an averment of notice, when necessary, will be fatal on demurrer or judgment by default; Cro. Jac. 432; but may be aided by verdict; 1 Stra. 214; 1 Saund. 238 a; unless in an action against the drawer of a bill, when the omission of the averment of notice of non-payment by the acceptor is fatal, even after verdict; Dougl. 679.

NOTICE TO THE CITY. Knowledge of a policeman of the dangerous condition of a street was "notice to the city." 149 Ky. 537, 14 S. W. 932.

NOTICE OF DISHONOR. A notice given to a drawer or indorser of a bill, or an indorser of a negotiable note, by a subsequent party, that it had been dishonored either by non-acceptance in the case of a bill, or by non-payment in the case of an accepted bill or a note.

The notice must contain a description of the bill or note; Byles, Bills 220; 5 Cush. 549; 14 Conn. 362; 1 Fla. 801; 1 Wisc. 264; sufficient to leave no doubt in the mind of the indorser, as a reasonable man, what note was intended; 3 Metc. Mass. 495; 7 Ala. N. S. 205; 12 N. Y. 551; 26 Me. 45; 11 Wheat. 431; 56 N. J. L. 11. As to what is a misdescription, see 7 Exch. 578; 9 Q. B. 609; 9 Pet. 33; 11 Wheat. 431; 17 How. 606; 7 N. Y. 19; 2 Mich. 238; 12 Mass. 6; 14 Pa. 483; 2 Ohio St. 345.

It must also contain a clear statement of the dishonor of the bill; 1 Bingham, N. C. 194; 2 Cl. & F. 93; 2 M. & W. 799; 8 Metc. Mass. 495; 18 Conn. 361; and something more than the mere fact of non-acceptance or non-payment must be stated; 10 Ad. & E. 125; 2 Q. B. 388; 11 Wheat. 431; 3 Metc.

Mass. 595; 5 Barb. 190; 1 Spears 244; 9 Ohio St. 845; 8 Md. 202, 251; 2 Hawks 560; 5 How. La. 161; 14 Conn. 362; 5 Cush. 546; 1 Wisc. 264; 4 N. J. 71. See some cases where the notice was held sufficient; 2 M. & W. 109, 799; 6 Id. 400; 7 Id. 515; 14 Id. 7, 44; 6 Ad. & E. 499; 10 Id. 131; 2 Q. B. 421; 1 E. & B. 601; 5 C. B. 687; 1 H. & W. 3; and others where it was held insufficient; 2 Exch. 719; 1 E. & B. 601; 4 B. & C. 389; 10 Ad. & E. 125; 7 Bingham. 530; 3 Bingham. N. C. 688; 8 C. & P. 355; 2 Q. B. 388; 1 M. & G. 76; 53 Minn. 396; 91 Tenn. 301; 63 Hun 625.

As to whether there must be a statement that the party to whom the notice is sent is looked to for payment, see 11 M. & W. 372; 7 C. B. 400; 4 D. & L. 744.

The notice is generally in writing, but may be oral; 16 Barb. 146; 3 Metc. Mass. 495; 8 Mo. 336; 7 C. B. 400; 8 C. & P. 355. It need not be personally served, but may be sent by mail; 7 East 385; 6 Wheat. 102; 1 Pick. 401; 28 Vt. 316; 15 Md. 285; 5 Pa. 178; 1 Conn. 329; 2 R. I. 467; 23 Mo. 213; 13 N. Y. 549; otherwise, perhaps, if the parties live in the same town; see 5 Metc. Mass. 352; 10 Johns. 490; 3 McLean 96; 28 N. H. 302; 15 Me. 141; 15 Md. 285; 3 Rob. La. 261; 6 Blackf. 312; 3 Harr. Del. 419; 8 Ohio 507; 85 Va. 95; or left in the care of a suitable person, representing the party to be notified; 15 Me. 207; 2 Johns. 274; 20 Mass. 332; 16 Pick. 392; 14 La. 494; 19 Ill. 598; Holt 476; 93 Ala. 550; see 84 Va. 41.

It should be sent to the place where it will most probably find the party to be notified most promptly; 6 Metc. 1, 7; 1 Pet. 573; whether the place of business; 1 Pet. 578; 3 McLean 96; 5 Metc. 212, 352; 11 Johns. 231; 15 Me. 139; 5 Pa. 178; 3 Harr. Del. 419; 6 Blackf. 312; 1 La. Ann. 95; 1 Maule & S. 545; or place of residence; 4 Wash. C. C. 464; 28 Vt. 316; 1 Conn. 329. The word residence in the law of negotiable instruments may be satisfied by a temporary, partial, or even constructive residence; 148 Mass. 181. When sent by mail, it should be to the post-office to which the party usually resorts; 2 Pet. 543; 4 Wend. 328; 5 Pa. 160; 3 McLean 91; 15 La. 39; 4 Humphr. 86; 3 Ga. 496; 11 Md. 496; 8 Ohio 307; 8 Mo. 443; 6 Metc. 106; 6 H. & J. 172; 8 Misc. Rep. 503; see 159 Mass. 404. If properly addressed and mailed it will charge the indorser, whether he has received it or not; 8 Misc. Rep. 516.

Every person who, by and immediately upon the dishonor of the note or bill, and only upon such dishonor, becomes liable to an action either on the paper or on the consideration for which the paper was given, is entitled to immediate notice; 1 Pars. Notes & B. 499. The holder need give notice only to the parties and to the indorser whom he intends to hold liable; 25 Barb. 138; 19 Me. 62; 11 La. Ann. 137; 1 Ohio St. 206; 49 Ohio St. 351; 5 Miss. 272; 17 Ala. 258; 15 M. & W. 231; 61 Mich. 402. A second indorser duly notified cannot defend on the ground that the first was not so notified; 20 D. C. 26.

Notice may be given by any party to a note or bill not primarily liable thereon as regards third parties, and not discharged from liability on it at the time notice is given; 8 Mo. 336; 16 S. & R. 157; 3 Dana 126; 5 Miss. 272; 17 Ala. 258; 25 Barb. 138; 15 Md. 150; 15 La. 321; 14 Mass. 116; 5 Maule & S. 68; 15 M. & W. 231. The late English doctrine that any party to a note or bill may give the notice by which an antecedent party may be held liable to subsequent parties, is now quite firmly established; Wade, Notice § 709. Such notice may be by the holder's agent; 4 How. 336; 11 Rob. La. 454; 21 Tex. 680; 8 Mo. 704; 7 Ala. N. S. 205; 15 M. & W. 231; and in the agent's name; 99 Cal. 143; may be by an indorsee for collection; 3 N. Y. 243; a notary; 2 How. 66; 28 Mo. 389; the administrator or executor of a deceased person; Story, Pr. Notes § 804; the holder of the paper as collateral security; 14 C. B. n. s. 728. It has been held that notice by a stranger, pretending to be the holder, may be ratified by the real holder; 2 C. & K. 1016. Mere knowledge on the part of an indorser of a note, learned from the maker that it had been dishonored, is not a notice, since notice must come from a party who is entitled to look to the indorser for payment; 53 Minn. 386.

The notice must be forwarded as early as the day after the dishonor, by a mail which does not start at an unreasonably early hour; 9 N. H. 538; 24 Me. 458; 2 R. I. 437; 24 Pa. 148; 4 N. J. L. 71; 1 Ohio St. 206; 9 Miss. 261, 644; 13 Ark. 645; 7 Gill & J. 78; 4 Wash. C. C. 404; 2 Stor. 418; 4 Bingh. 715; Big. Notes & B. 293; see 155 Pa. 227.

An indorser is entitled to notice of demand and non-payment of a note, notwithstanding that he has collateral security; 15 R. I. 44; 4 W. & S. 328.

Notice of dishonor may be excused: where it is prevented by inevitable accident, or overwhelming calamity; by the prevalence of a malignant disease which suspends the operations of trade; by war, blockade, invasion, or occupation by the enemy; by the interdiction of commerce between the countries from which or to which the notice is to be sent; by the impracticability of giving notice, by reason of the party entitled thereto having absconded or having no fixed place of residence, or his place of business or residence being unknown, and incapable of being ascertained upon reasonable inquiries. These are the excuses of a general nature given by Story, on Pr. Notes and on Bills. Special excuses are: That the note was for the accommodation of the indorser only; an original agreement on the part of the indorser, made with the maker or other party at all events to pay the note at maturity; the receiving security or indemnity from the maker, or other party for whose benefit the note is made, by the indorser, or money to take it up with; receiving the note as collateral security for another debt where the debtor is no party to the note, or if a party has not indorsed it; an original agreement by the indorser to dispense with notice; an order or direction from the makee to the maker not to pay the note at maturity. See Story, Pr. Notes §§ 293, 357.

Consult Bayley; Byles; Chitty; Story, on Bills of Exchange; Story, Promissory Notes; Parsons, Notes and Bills; Daniel, Negotiable Instruments; Wade, Notice.

NOTICE OF EXECUTION. Under an exemption act which requires an execution, the debtor desiring to avail himself of its benefits should make a schedule of all his personal property within ten days after notice of execution. The sheriff should, whenever practical, give personal notice, and an ambiguously worded notice by mail from which the debtor may infer that personal demand will be made on him at some time in the future, is insufficient; 46 Ill. App. 150.

NOTICE OF INQUIRY. The plaintiff must give a written notice of executing a writ of inquiry to the defendant or his solicitor; 2 Chit. Arch. Prac.; Wharton.

NOTICE OF JUDGMENT. In several of the states it is provided by statute that a written notice shall be served by the party entering the judgment upon his adversary or his attorney, stating the time when the judgment is entered.

In England, in the Chancery Division, when an action is instituted for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, or for the execution of the trusts of an instrument, by or against one member of a class of persons, it is not necessary to join the other members of the class as plaintiffs or defendants in the action. (Ord. 16, rr. 33-38.) Whenever, in any action for the administration of the estate of a deceased person, or for the execution of the trusts of any instrument, or for the partition or sale of any hereditaments, a judgment or order has been pronounced or made which affects persons not parties to the action, then the court or a judge may order such persons to be served with notice of the judgment or order; this gives them the right with one month of service to apply to have the order varied or discharged; and it makes them parties. Byrne; Judicature Act, 1873, s. 100.

NOTICE OF LIS PENDENS. A notice filed for the purpose of warning all persons that the title to certain property is in litigation. See LIS PENDENS.

NOTICE OF MOTION. A notice in writing, entitled in a cause, stating that, on a certain day designated, a motion will be made to the court for the purpose stated. Burrill.

NOTICE TO PLEAD. Written notice to defendant, requiring him to plead within a certain time. It must always be given before plaintiff can sign judgment for want of a plea. 1 Chitty, Archb. Pr. 221. Notice to plead, indorsed on the declaration or delivered separately, is sufficient without demanding plea or rule to plead, in England, by statute.

NOTICE TO PRODUCE PAPERS. In Practice. When it is intended to give secondary evidence of a written instrument or paper which is in the possession of the opposite party, it is, in general, requisite to give him notice to produce the same on the trial of the cause, before such secondary evidence can be admitted. See 50 Kan. 436.

To this general rule there are some exceptions: first, in cases where, from the nature of the proceedings, the party in possession of the instrument has notice that he is charged with the possession of it, as in the case of trover for a bond. 14 East 274; 4 Taunt. 865; 6 S. & R. 154; 4 Wend. 626; 1 Campb. 143; 48 Me. 218; 30 Barb. 338; 58 N. H. 68; second, where the party in possession has obtained the instrument by fraud; 4 Esp. 256. See 1 Phill. Ev. 425; 1 Stark. Ev. 362; Rosc. Ev., 16th ed., 8.

In general, a notice to produce papers ought to be given in writing, and state the title of the cause in which it is proposed to use the papers or instruments required; 2 Stark. 19. It seems, however, that the notice may be by parol; 1 Campb. 440. It must describe with sufficient certainty the papers or instruments called for, and must not be too general and by that means be uncertain; Ry. & M. 341; M'Cle. & Y. 139. The notice may be given to the party himself, or to his attorney; 2 Term 203, n.; 3 id. 306; Ry. & M. 327.

The notice must be served a reasonable time before trial, so as to afford an opportunity to the party to search for and produce the instrument or paper in question; 1 Stark. 283; 92 Mich. 542; 66 Ia. 292.

When a notice to produce an instrument or paper in the cause has been proved, and it is also proved that such paper or instrument was, at the time of the notice, in the hands of the party or his privy, and upon request in court he refuses or neglects to produce it, the party having given such notice and made such proof will be entitled to give secondary evidence thereof. See 66 Hun 626; 155 Mass. 253.

Where a party is notified to produce certain writings, and the same are shown not to be within the state, copies may be introduced; 99 Ala. 331; 92 Tex. 368.

NOTICE OF PROTEST. A notice given by a notary to the drawer or indorser of a bill, or the indorser of a note, that the bill or note has been protested for non-acceptance or non-payment. The essential requisites of the notice are, a true description of the note; an assertion that it has been duly presented at maturity, and dishonored; and that the holder looks to the person to whom notice is given, for indemnity. See NOTICE OF DISHONOR.

NOTICE TO QUIT. A request from a landlord to his tenant to quit the premises leased, and to give possession of the same to him, the landlord, at a time therein mentioned. 3 Wend. 337, 857; 7 Halst. 99.

The form of the notice. The notice or demand of possession should contain a request from the landlord to the tenant or person in possession to quit the premises which he holds from the landlord (which premises ought to be particularly described, as being situate in the street and city or place, or township and county), and to deliver them to him on or before a day certain.—generally, when the lease is for a year, the same day of the year on which the lease commences. But where there is some doubt as to the time when the lease is to expire, it is proper to add, "or at the expiration of the current year of your tenancy." 2 Esp. 589. It should be dated, signed by the landlord himself, or by some person in his name, who has been authorized by him, and directed to the tenant. The notice must include all the premises under the same demise; for the landlord cannot determine the tenancy as to part of the premises demised and continue it as to the residue. For the purpose of bringing an ejectment, it is not necessary that the notice should be in writing, except when required to be so under an express agreement between the parties; Com. Dig. Estate by Grant (G 11, n. p.); 2 Campb. 96. But it is the general and safest practice to give written notices; and it is a precaution which should always, when possible, be observed, as it prevents mistakes and renders the evidence certain. Care should be taken that the words of a notice be clear and decisive, without ambiguity or giving an alternative to the tenant; for if it be really ambiguous or optional, it will be invalid; Ad. Ej. 204.

As to the person by whom the notice is to be given. It must be given by the person interested in the premises, or his agent properly appointed; Ad. Ej. 120. See 3 C. B. 215. As the tenant is to act upon the notice at the time it is given to him, it is necessary that it should be such as he may act upon with security, and should, therefore, be binding upon all the parties concerned at the time it is given. Where, therefore, several persons are jointly interested in the premises, they need not all join in the notice; but, if any of them be not a party at the time, no subsequent ratification by him will be sufficient by relation to render the notice valid. But see 2 Phill. Ev. 164; 1 B. & Ad. 135; 7 M. & W. 139. But if the notice be given by an agent, it is sufficient if his authority is afterwards recognized; 3 B. & Ald. 689. But see 10 B. & C. 621.

As to the person to whom the notice should be given. When the relation of landlord and tenant subsists, difficulties can seldom occur as to the party upon whom the notice should be served. It should invariably be given to the tenant of the party serving the notice, notwithstanding a part may have been underlet or the whole of the premises may have been assigned; Ad. Ej. 119; 5 B. & P. 330; 14 East 234; 6 B. & C. 41; unless, perhaps, the lessor has recognized the sub-tenant as his tenant; 10 Johns. 270. When the premises are in possession of two or more as joint tenants or tenants in common, the notice should be to all. A notice addressed to all and served upon one only will, however, be a good notice; Ad. Ej. 123. The delivery of a notice to quit to the wife of a tenant, she being in possession of the premises, is a good service upon the husband; 30 Ill. App. 300.

As to the mode of serving the notice. The person about serving the notice should make two copies of it, both signed by the proper person, then procure one or more respectable persons for witnesses, to whom he should show the copies, who, upon comparing them and finding them alike, are to go with the person who is to serve the notice. The person serving the notice then, in their presence, should deliver one of these copies to the tenant personally, or to one of his family, at his usual place of abode, although the same be not upon the demised premises: 2 Phill. Ev. 185; or serve it upon the person in possession; and where the tenant is not in possession, a copy may be served on him, if he can be found, and another on the person in possession. The witnesses should then, for the sake of security, sign their names on the back of the copy of the notice retained, or otherwise mark it so as to identify it; and they should also state the manner in which the notice was served. In the case of a joint demise to two defendants, of whom one alone resided upon the premises, proof of the service of the notice upon him has been held to be sufficient ground for the jury to presume that the notice so served upon the premises has reached the other who resided in another place: 7 East 553; 5 Esp. 196. In ejectment the defence of adverse possession is inconsistent with a tenancy, and exempts the plaintiff from the necessity of proving a notice to quit; 93 Mich. 136; 126 Ill. 238; 75 Cal. 342.

At what time it must be served. At common law it must be given six calendar months before the expiration of the lease; 1 Term 159; 8 Cow. 13; 1 Vt. 311; 5 Yerg. 431; 4 Ired. 291; 17 Mass. 287; see 8 S. & R. 458; 2 Rich. 346; and three months is the common time under statutory regulations; and where the letting is for a shorter period the length of notice is regulated by the time of letting; 6 Bing. 362; 5 Cush. 563; 23 Wend. 616. Where a tenant under a lease for a term assents to the termination of his lease and continues to hold from day to day under a new arrangement, he is not entitled to a month's notice to quit; 94 Mich. 474; a tenant or sub-tenant holding over is not entitled to notice to quit; 31 Ill. App. 592. Difficulties sometimes arise as to the period of the commencement of the tenancy; and when a regular notice to quit on any particular day is given, and the time when the term began is unknown, the effect of such notice, as to its being evidence or not of the commencement of the tenancy, will depend upon the particular circumstances of its delivery; if the tenant, having been applied to by his landlord respecting the time of the commencement of the tenancy, has informed him it began on a certain day, and in consequence of such information a notice to quit on that day is given at a subsequent period, the tenant is concluded by his act, and will not be permitted to prove that in point of fact the tenancy has a different commencement; nor is it material whether the information be the result of design or ignorance, as the landlord is in both instances equally led into error; Ad. Ej. 141; 2 Esp. 635; 2 Phill. Ev. 186. In like manner, if the tenant at the time of delivery of the notice assent to the terms of it, it will waive any irregularity as to the period of its expiration; but such assent must be strictly proved; 4 Term 361; 2 Phill. Ev. 183. When the landlord is ignorant of the time when the term commenced, a notice to quit may be given not specifying any particular day, but ordering the tenant in general terms to quit and deliver up the possession of the premises at the end of the current year of his tenancy thereof, which shall expire next after the end of three months from the date of the notice. See 2 Esp. 539. Where a notice to quit is necessary, the day named therein must be the day of, or corresponding to the day of, the conclusion of the tenancy; 55 N. J. L. 217.

What will amount to a waiver of the notice. The acceptance of rent accruing subsequently to the expiration of the notice is the most usual means by which a waiver of it may be produced; but the acceptance of such rent is open to explanation; and it is the province of the jury to decide with what views and under what circumstances the rent is paid and received; Ad. Ej. 189; 2 Campb. 387. If the money be taken with an express declaration that the notice is not thereby intended to be waived, or accompanied by other circumstances which may induce an opinion that the landlord did not intend to continue the tenancy, no waiver will be produced by the acceptance; the rent must be paid and received as rent, or the notice will remain in force; Cowp. 248. The notice may also be waived by other acts of the landlord; but they are generally open to explanation, and the particular act will or will not be a waiver of the notice, according to the circumstances which attend it; 2 East 236; 1 Term 58. It has been held that a notice to quit at the end of a certain year is not waived by the landlord's permitting the tenant to remain in possession an entire year after the expiration of the notice, notwithstanding the tenant held by an improving lease,—that is, to clear and fence the land and pay the taxes; 1 Binn. 393. In cases, however, where the act of the landlord cannot be qualified, but must of necessity be taken as a confirmation of the tenancy, as if he distrain for rent accruing after the expiration of the notice, or recover in an action for use and occupation, the notice of course will be waived; Ad. Ej. 144; 1 H. Bla. 311; 19 Wend. 391. See 13 C. B. 178.

A tenant becomes a trespasser at the expiration of the time specified in a due notice to quit; and the landlord has a right during the tenant's absence to re-enter and take possession, and eject the tenant's goods and to keep the possession so obtained; 16 R. I. 524. A tenant at will, after a notice to quit, has a reasonable time in which to vacate the premises; 60 Vt. 386.

See LANDLORD AND TENANT; LEASE.

NOTICE OF TRIAL. The plaintiff may give notice of trial at any time after the issues of fact are ready for trial; and if not given within a certain time the defendant may give notice of same or move to dismiss the action for want of prosecution.

NOTING. A term denoting the act of a notary in minuting on a bill of exchange, after it has been presented for acceptance or payment, the initials of his name, the date of the day, month, and year when such presentment was made, and the reason, if any has been assigned, for non-acceptance or non-payment, together with his charge. The noting is not indispensable, it being only a part of the protest; it will not supply the protest; 4 Term 175.

NOTIO. The power of hearing and trying a matter of fact. Calv. Lex.

(Lat. from noscere, to know.) The power or authority of a judez; the power of hearing causes and of pronouncing sentence, without any degree of jurisdiction. Id.

In a more general sense, notio included both cognitio (cognition), and jurisdictio (jurisdiction). Id.; Dig. 20. 16. 99, pr.

NOTORIOUS. As used in defining adverse possession, it means that the character of the holding must possess such elements of notoriety that the owner may be presumed to have notice of it and of its extent. 33 Fla. 261. See 94 Mo. 187.

Manuist to all persons; generally known; open; as, a notorious act of ownership, etc. Known to discredit or disadvantage; of bad or questionable repute. Anderson. In the law of evidence, matters deemed notorious do not require to be proved. There does not seem to be any recognized rule as to what matters are deemed notorious; cases have occurred in which the state of society or public feeling has been treated as notorious, e.g., during times of sedition. R. & L. Dict.; Best Ev. 354. See TRUE, PUBLIC, AND NOTORIOUS.

NOTORIOUSLY. Well and generally understood. 46 Fed. Rep. 724.

NOTOUR. In Scotch Law. Open; notorious. A notour bankrupt is a debtor who, being under diligence by horning and caption of his creditor, retires to sanctuary, or absconds, or defends by force, and is afterwards found insolvent by court of sessions. Bell, Dict.

NOVA CUSTOMA. An imposition or duty. See ANTICUA CUSTOMA.

NOVA CUSTOMA, STATUTUM DE. See CARTA MERCATORIA.

NOVA STATUTA. New statutes. A term including all statutes passed in the reign of Edw. III. and subsequently. See VETERA STATUTA.

NOVE NARRATIONES. New counts or talys. A book of such pleadings as were then in use, published in the reign of Edw. III. 3 Bla. Com. 297; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 439.

NOVATION (from Lat. novare, novus, new). The substitution of a new obligation for an old one, which is thereby extinguished.

A transaction whereby a debtor is discharged from his liability to his original creditor by contracting a new obligation in favor of a new creditor by the order of the original creditor. 1 Pars. Cont. 217; 136 N. Y. 152; 137 id. 542.

It is a mode of extinguishing one obligation by another—the substitution, not of new paper or note, but of a new obligation in lieu of an old one—the effect of which is to pay, dissolve, or otherwise discharge it. 85 Ala. 401.

In Civil Law. There are three kinds of novation.

First, where the debtor and creditor remain the same, but a new debt takes the place of the old one. Here, either the subject-matter of the debt may be changed, or the conditions of time, place, etc., of payment.

Second, where the debt remains the same, but a new debtor is substituted for the old. This novation may be made without the intervention or privity of the old debtor (in this case the new agreement is called expromissio, and the new debtor expromissor), or by the debtor's transmission of his debt to another, who accepts the obligation and is himself accepted by the creditor. This transaction is called delegatio. Domat lays down the essential distinction between a delegation and any other novation, thus: that the former demands the consent of all three parties, but the latter that only of the two parties to the new debt. See DELEGATION.

Third, where the debt remains the same, but a new creditor is substituted for the old. This also is called delegatio, for the reason adduced above, to wit: that all three parties must assent to the new bargain. It differs from the cessio nominis of the civil law by completely cancelling the old debt, while the cessio nominis leaves the creditor a claim for any balance due after assignment.

In every novation the old debt is wholly extinguished by the new. To effect such a transformation, several things are requisite.

First, there must be an anterior obligation of some sort, to serve as a basis for the new contract. If the old debt be void, as being, e.g., contra bonos mores, then the new debt is likewise void; because the consideration for the pretended novation is null. But if the old contract is only voidable, in some cases the new one may be good, operating as a ratification of the old. Moreover, if the old debt be conditional, the new is also conditional unless made otherwise by special agreement,—which agreement is rarely omitted.

Second, the parties innovating must consent thereto. In the modern civil law, every novation is voluntary. Anciently, a novation not having this voluntary element was in use. And not only consent is exacted, but a capacity to consent. But capacity to make or receive an absolute payment does not of itself authorize an agreement to innovate.

Third, there must be an express intention to innovate,—the animus novandi. A novation is never presumed. If an intent to destroy the old debt be not proved, two obligations now bind the debtor,—the old and the new. Conversely, if the new contract be invalid, without fraud in the transaction, the creditor has now lost all remedy. The anterior obligation is destroyed without being replaced by a new one.

An important rule of novation is that the extinction of the debt destroys also all rights and liens appertaining thereto. Hence, if any hypothecations be attached to the ancient agreement, they are cancelled by the new one, unless express words retain them. The second contract is simple and independent, and upon its terms is the action ex stipulatu to be brought. Hence, too, the new parties cannot avail themselves of defences, claims, and set-offs which would have prevailed between the old parties.

Obviously, a single creditor may make a novation with two or more debtors who are each liable in solido. In this case any one debtor may make the contract to innovate; and if such a contract be completed, all his fellow-debtors are discharged with him from the prior obligation. Therefore Pothier says that, under the rule that novation cancels all obligations subsidiary to the main one, sureties are freed by a novation contracted by their principal. The creditor must specially stipulate that co-debtors and guarantors shall consent to be bound by the novation, if he wish to hold them liable. If they do not consent to such novation, the parties all remain, as before, bound under the old debt. So in Louisiana the debt due to a community creditor is not necessarily novated by his taking the individual note of the surviving spouse, with mortgages to secure its payment: 11 La. Ann. 687.

It follows that the new debtor, in a delegation, can claim nothing under the old contract, since he has consented to the destruction of that contract. For the same reason, a creditor cannot proceed against the discharged debtor. And this is true though the new debtor should become insolvent while the old remains solvent. And even though at the time of the novation the new debtor was insolvent, still the creditor has lost his remedy against the old debtor. But the rule, no doubt, applies only to a bona fide delegation. And a suit brought by the creditor against a delegated debtor is not evidence of intention to discharge the original debtor; 11 La. Ann. 93.

In a case of mistake, the rule is this: If the new debtor agree to be substituted for the old, under the belief that he himself owes so much to the discharged debtor, although he do not in fact owe the amount, yet he is bound to the creditor on the novation; because the latter has been induced to discharge the old debtor by the contract of the new, and will receive only his due in holding the new debtor bound. But where the supposed creditor had really no claim upon the original debtor, the substitute contracts no obligation with him; and even though he intended to be bound, yet he may plead the fact of no former debt against any demand of the creditor, as soon as this fact is made known to him.

A novation may be made dependent on a condition. In that case the parties remain bound, as before, until the condition is fulfilled. The new debtor is not freed from a conditional novation as to the creditor until the condition happens; and he is not liable in an action to the old debtor until it is performed.

Any obligation which can be destroyed at all may be destroyed by novation. Thus, legacies, judgments, etc., with mortgages, guarantees, and similar accessories, are as much the subjects of novation as simple contract debts. But a covenant by the obligee of a bond not to sue the obligor within a certain time is not an example of the civil-law novation. The agreement was not a release, not a substituted contract, but a covenant merely, for the breach of which the obligee has his action; 19 Johns. 129.

At Common Law. The common-law doctrine of novation mainly agrees with that of the civil law, but in some parts differs from it.

The term novation is rarely employed. The usual common-law equivalent is assignment, and sometimes merger. Still, this form of contract found its way into common-law treatises as early as Flota's day, by whom it was called innovatio. Item, per innovationem, ut si transfusa sit obligatio de una persona in aliam, quæ in se suscepit obligationem. Flota, lib. 2, c. 60, § 12. The same words here quoted are also in Bracton, lib. 3, c. 2, § 13, but we have novationem for innovationem. In England, recently, the term novation has been revived in some cases.

A case of novation is put in Tatlock v. Harris, 3 Term 180. "Suppose A owes B £100, and B owes C £100, and the three meet, and it is agreed between them that A shall pay C the £100: B's debt is extinguished, and C may recover that sum against A."

The subject of novation has been much before the courts in reference to the transfers of the business of life assurance companies. In order to constitute a novation the old obligation must be discharged; and it has often been the interest of claimants on the transferor company, where the transferee company has become insolvent, to contend that there is no "novation," but that the old obligation is still in force. In England the questions which have arisen on this matter are for the most part set at rest by the stat. 35 & 36 Vict. c. 41, s. 7, providing that no policy-holder shall be deemed to have abandoned any claim against the original company, and to have accepted in lieu thereof the liability of the new company, unless such abandonment and acceptance shall have been signified by some writing signed by him, or by his agent lawfully authorized. Moz. & W.

There must always be a debt once existing and now cancelled, to serve as a consideration for the new liability. The action in all cases is brought on the new agreement. But in order to give a right of action there must be an extinguishment of the original debt; 4 B. & C. 163; 1 M. & W. 124; 14 Ill. 34; 4 La. Ann. 281; 15 N. H. 129; 110 Mass. 52; 53 Vt. 345; 78 Ia. 718; 46 Ark. 163. See 93 Mich. 342.

Where there is a substitution of a new contract for an old one, the new contract must be a valid one upon which the creditor can have his remedy; 57 Wis. 534; and the previous obligation of which novation is sought must be a valid one; 59 Ind. 509; 64 id. 413.

No mere agreement for the transformation of one contract into another is of effect until actually carried into execution and the consent of the parties thereto obtained. A good novation is an accord executed; 5 B. & A. 925; 8 N. & M.C. 171; 1 La. 410; 24 Conn. 621; otherwise, if there be no satisfaction; 2 Scott N. H. 988. The discharge of the old debt must be contemporaneous with, and result from the consummation of, an arrangement with the new debtor; 39 Minn. 407.

But where an agreement is entered into by deed, that deed gives in itself a substantial cause of action; and the giving such deed may be a sufficient accord and satisfaction for a simple contract debt; Co. Litt. 212 b; 1 Burr. 9; 2 Rich. 608; 3 W. & S. 276; 1 Hill N. Y. 567.

In the civil law delegatio, no new creditor could be substituted without the debtor's consent. This rule is observed in the common law. Hence, without this consent and promise to pay, a new creditor can have no action against the debtor, because there is no privity of contract between them. To establish such privity there must be a new promise founded on sufficient consideration; 3 Mer. 652; 5 Wheat. 277; 12 Ga. 406; 5 A. & E. 115; 7 Harr. & J. 213, 219; 21 Me. 484; 39 Minn. 407; 123 Mass. 28; 74 Wis. 456; 14 La. Ann. 64.

But in equity a creditor may assign his claim fully to another without any intervention of the debtor; and the assignee is not even compelled to sue in his assignor's name; 14 Conn. 141; 8 Swanst. 392; 4 Rand. 392; Mart. & Y. 378.

The extinction of the prior debt is consideration enough to support a novation. If A holds B's note, payable to A, and assigns this for value to C, B is by such transfer released from his promise to A, and this is sufficient consideration to sustain his promise to C; 1 Pars. Contr. ch. 13; 2 Barb. 849; Ans. Contr. 220; 87 Ohio 279; 95 Ind. 452; 53 Vt. 80. And a consideration need not be expressed in the contract of novation; though one must be proved in order to defend in a suit brought by creditors of the assignor.

When assent or consideration is wanting, the novation operates only as a species of collateral security. The transferee cannot sue in his own name, and will be subject to all the equitable defences which the debtor had against the original creditor. This assent on the debtor's part is said to be essential, for the reason that he may have an account with his assignor, and he shall not be barred of his right to a set-off. Still, if anything like an assent on the part of a holder of money can be inferred, he will be considered as the debtor; 4 Esp. 203; 6 Tex. 163; if the debtor's assent be not secured, the order of transfer may be revoked before it is acted on.

In a delegation, if the old debtor agree to provide a substitute, he must put his creditor into such a position that the latter can claim full satisfaction from the delegated debtor, or otherwise the original liability remains, and there is no novation; 19 Mo. 322, 637. See 8 B. & Ald. 64; 2 M. & W. 484; 6 Cra. 253; 12 Johns. 409; 21 Wend. 450; 1 Misc. Rep. 176; 57 Wis. 534.

One who has contracted to pay the debts of another, and has been notified by a creditor that he accepts the arrangement, cannot be released from liability to such creditor by rescinding the contract without his consent; 25 Ill. App. 130.

The existing Louisiana law is based upon the doctrines of the Civil Code considered above. It is held in numerous cases that "novation is not to be presumed;" hence the receipt of a bill or note is not necessarily a novation, or extinguishment of the debt for which it is given. An express declaration to that effect is required in most of our states, or else acts tantamount to a declaration. An intention to discharge the old debt must be shown in all cases; and this intention is sufficient to work a novation; 4 La. Ann. 329, 543; 6 id. 669; 9 id. 228, 497; 12 id. 299. "The delegation by which the debtor gives to the creditor another debtor, who obliged himself towards such creditor, does not operate as a novation unless the creditor has expressly declared his intention to discharge the debtor who made the delegation." 18 La. Ann. 238.

One of the most common of modern novations is the surrender and destruction of an old promissory note or bill of exchange, and the receipt of a new one in payment thereof. The rules of novation apply as completely to debts evidenced by mercantile papers as to all other obligations; Story, Bills § 441; Pothier, de Change, n. 189; Thoms. Bills, ch. 1, § 8. Hence, everywhere, if the parties intend that a promissory note or bill shall be absolute payment, it will be so considered; Ans. Contr. 278, n.; 10 A. & E. 598; 4 Mas. 336; 1 Rich. 87, 112; 9 Johns. 810; 13 Vt. 452. In some states, the receipt of a negotiable promissory note is prima facie payment of the debt upon which it is given, and no action lies upon the account unless the presumption is controverted; 12 Mass. 287; 118 id. 194; 132 id. 538; 8 Me. 298; 79 Me. 62; 39 Vt. 83; 59 id. 154; 69 Ind. 264; 111 id. 137; 7 Or. 39. "If a creditor gives a receipt for a draft in payment of his account, the debt is novated;" 3 La. 109. But see the cases cited supra for the full Louisiana law. In most states, however, the rule is, as in England, that, whether the debt be pre-existing or arise at the time of giving the note, the receipt of a promissory note is prima facie a conditional payment only, and works no novation.

It is payment only on fulfillment of the condition, i. e. when the note is paid; 5 Beav. 415; 6 Cra. 264; 2 Johns. Cas. 488; 27 N. H. 253; 11 Gill & J. 416; 4 R. I. 383; 8 Cal. 501; 3 Rich. 244; 15 S. & R. 162.

If a vendor transfers his vendee's note, he can only sue on the original contract when he gets back the note, and has it in his power to return it to his vendee; 1 Pet. C. C. 263; 4 Rich. 59.

Where the holder of a note agrees to accept another as debtor in place of the maker, there is a complete novation of the debt, and the indorsers are discharged; 23 Can. S. C. R. 479.

A novation is not a promise to pay the debt of another, within the statute of frauds, and need not be in writing; 18 So. Rep. (Tex.) 646. See 3 Misc. Rep. 301; 45 Ill. App. 648; 54 Mo. App. 221; 160 Mass. 235; 39 Atl. Rep. (Me.) 551.

NOVEL ASSIGNMENT. See NEW ASSIGNMENT.

NOVEL DISSEISIN. The name of an old remedy which was given for a new or recent disseisin.

When a tenant in fee-simple, fee-tail, or for term of life, was put out and disseised of his lands or tenements, rents, and the like, he might sue out a writ of assize or novel disseisin; and if, upon trial, he could prove his title and his actual seisin, and the disseisin by the present tenant, he was entitled to have judgment to recover his seisin and damages for the injury sustained; 3 Bla. Com. 187. This remedy is obsolete.

NOVELLE LEONIS. The ordinances of the Emperor Leo, which were made from the year 887 till the year 893, are so called. These novels changed many rules of the Justinian law. This collection contains one hundred and thirteen novels, written originally in Greek, and afterwards, in 1500, translated into Latin by Aglaeus.

NOVELS, NOVELLE CONSTITUTIONES. In Civil Law. The name given to the constitutions or laws of Justinian and his immediate successors, which were promulgated soon after the Code of Justinian.

It appears to have been the intention of Justinian, after the completion of the second and revised edition of the Code, to supply what had not been foreseen in the preceding laws, together with any necessary amendments or alterations, not by revising the Code, but by supplementary laws. Such laws he promulgated from time to time; but no official compilation of them is known to have been made until after his death, when his laws, 139 in number, with those of the reigns of Justin II. and Tiberias, nine in number, were collected, together with some local edicts, under this name. They belong to various times between 525 and 565.

Although the Novels of Justinian are the best known, and when the word Novels only is mentioned those of Justinian are always intended, he was not the first who used that name. Some of the acts of Theodosius, Valentinian, Leo, Severus, Authentius, and others, were also called Novels. But the Novels of the emperor who preceded Justinian had not the force of law after the legislation of that emperor. Those Novels are not, however, entirely useless; because, the Code of Justinian having been compiled to a considerable extent from the Theodosian Code and the earlier Novels, the latter frequently remove doubts which arise on the construction of the Code.

The original language of the Novels was for the most part Greek; but they are represented in the Corpus Juris Civilis by a Latin translation of 134 of them. These form the fourth part of the Corpus Juris Civilis. They are directed either to some officer, or an archbishop or bishop, or to some private individual of Constantinople; but they all had the force and authority of law.

The 118th Novel is the foundation and groundwork of the English Statute of Distribution of Intestates' Effects, which has been copied in many states of the Union. See 1 P. Wms. 27; Prec. in Chanc. 368; CIVIL CODE; CODE.

NOVELTY. In Patent Law. See PATENT.

NOVIGILD. A pecuniary satisfaction for an injury, amounting to nine times the value of the thing for which it was paid. Spelman.

NOVUS HOMO (Lat. a new man). This term is applied to a man who has been pardoned of a crime, by which he is restored to society and is rehabilitated.

NOW. At this time, or at the present moment; or at a time contemporaneous with something done. 15 Ore. 496. At the present time. 96 Ct. Cl. 15. In a will the word now is construed to mean at the death of the testator; 53 L. J. Ch. 1163 (reversed on other grounds, 90 Ch. D. 50); except where persons or classes must be ascertained or a description of property fixed; 30 L. J. Ex. 290; 6 H. & N. 558, where the word now is held to refer to the date of the will.

NOW RESIDES. The expression "now resides" conveys the idea of a fixed and permanent residence quite as certainly as the expression "usually resides." 78 Ky. 468.

NOXA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Damage resulting from an offence committed by an irresponsible agent. The offence itself. The punishment for the offence. The slave or animal who did the offence, and who is delivered up to the person aggrieved (datur noxae) unless the owner chooses to pay the damage. The right of action is against whoever becomes the possessor of the slave or animal (noxa caput sequitur). D. defurt. L. 41; Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calv. Lex.

NOXAE DEDITIO. Surrender of a wrongdoer. In Roman law, used in connection with the surrender of a slave by a master for the former's misdeeds, in lieu of paying the damages assessed. Hunter, Rom. Law, 166; See NOXA.

NOXAL ACTION. See NOXA.

NOXIOUS. Hurtful; offensive. Within the meaning of a statute prohibiting noxious or offensive trade or manufactures, brick-making is not included. 32 L. J. M. C. 135; 13 C. B. N. S. 479.

A thing is noxious if capable of doing harm. And if noxious as administered, although innoxious if differently administered; 49 L. J. M. C. 44; 5 Q. B. Div. 307; 13 Cox 547; 12 id. 463.

NUBILIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who is of a proper age to be married. Dig. 32, 51.

NUDE. Naked. Figuratively, this word is now applied to various subjects.

A nude contract, nudum pactum, is one without a consideration. Nude matter is a bare allegation of a thing done, without any evidence of it.

NUDUM PACTUM. A species of contract in the civil law. See CONSIDERATION. It is now commonly used to express a contract made without a consideration.

NUISANCE. Anything that unlawfully worketh hurt, inconvenience, or damage. 3 Bla. Com. 5, 216. See COOLEY, Torts 670.

That class of wrongs that arises from the unreasonable, unwarrantable, or unlawful use by a person of his own property, either real or personal, or from his own improper, indecent, or unlawful personal conduct, working an obstruction of or to the right of another, or of the public, and producing such material annoyance, inconvenience, discomfort, or hurt that the law will presume a consequent damage. Wood, Nuisance.

A private nuisance is anything done to the hurt or annoyance of the lands, tenements, or hereditaments of another. It produces damage to but one or a few persons, and cannot be said to be public; 36 N. Y. 297; 35 N. H. 357; 5 R. I. 185; Ad. Eq. 210; 3 Bla. Com. 215; Webb, Poll. Torts 494.

A public or common nuisance is such an inconvenience or troublesome offence as annoys the whole community in general and not merely some particular person. It produces no special injury to one more than another of the people; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. 197; 4 Bla. Com. 166.

A mixed nuisance is one which, while producing injury to the public at large, does some special damage to some individual or class of individuals; Wood, Nuisance 85.

It is difficult to say what degree of annoyance constitutes a nuisance. If a thing is calculated to interfere with the comfortable enjoyment of a man's house, it is a nuisance; 8 Jur. N. S. 571. In relation to offensive trades, it seems that when such a trade renders the enjoyment of life and property uncomfortable it is a nuisance; 1 Burr. 533; 18 Allen 95; 116 E. C. L. 608; 45 Cal. 55; 35 Ia. 231; 84 Tex. 280; 15 N. Y. Supp. 701; for the neighborhood have a right to pure and fresh air; 3 C. & P. 465; 23 N. J. Eq. 26; 68 Pa. 275; 4 B. & S. 608. Every citizen holds his property subject to the implied obligation that he will use it in such way as not to prevent others from enjoying the use of their property; 97 N. C. 477.

A thing may be a nuisance in one place which is not so in another; therefore the situation or locality of the nuisance must be considered. A tallow-chandler, for example, setting up his business among other tallow-chandlers, and increasing the noxious smells of the neighborhood, is not guilty of setting up a nuisance unless the annoyance is much increased by the new manufactory; Peake 91. Such an establishment might be a nuisance in a thickly populated town of merchants and mechanics where no such business was carried on; 3 Grant 302. The same doctrine obtains as regards other trades or employments. Persons living in populous manufacturing towns must expect more noise, smoke, and disturbance than those living elsewhere, and the circumstances of every case must govern; 21 Conn. 213; 58 Pa. 275; 54 Me. 275; 15 Ohio Cir. Ct. Rep. 228. A private hospital in a fashionable square in Dublin is an offensive trade; [1896] 1 I. R. 76. A private lunatic asylum is not an offensive trade; 2 A. & E. 161.

Coal burning was at one time decided to be a nuisance, and on petition Edw. II. issued a proclamation against the using it in London; Chamb. Encyc. tit. Coal, cited in 8 Ont. Q. B. Div. 583, where it was held that a barbed wire fence is not a nuisance. A city ordinance declaring a public laundry to be a nuisance if carried on in a city except in designated parts of it, is unconstitutional as contravening the fourteenth amendment of the United States constitution; 82 Fed. Rep. 623. Carrying on an offensive trade for several years in a place remote from buildings and public roads does not entitle the owner to continue it in the same place after houses have been built and roads laid out in the neighborhood, to the occupants of and travellers upon which it is a nuisance. Formerly the contrary doctrine obtained, on the ground that the complainants were in fault in coming to a nuisance. This doctrine is now very properly exploded, as it is manifest that an observance of it would interfere greatly with the growth of towns and cities; 6 Gray 473; 7 Blackf. 534; 2 C. & P. 463; 23 Wend. 446; 8 Phila. 10; 5 Scott 500; 3 Barb. 167; 52 N. J. Eq. 675; 82 Mich. 471; 11 H. L. Cas. 642; 18 N. J. Eq. 397; 38 id. 58; 62 Ia. 540; 18 Fed. Rep. 753. The trade may be offensive for noise; 51 N. Y. 300; 10 L. T. (N. S.) 241; 2 Bing. 34; L. R. 4 Ch. App. 388; 2 Sim. N. S. 153; L. R. 9 Ch. App. 467; 22 Vt. 321; 6 Cush. 80; 14 Mo. App. 590; see 146 Mass. 349; 133 id. 289; or smell; 2 C. & P. 465; 13 Metc. Mass. 365; 1 Den. 524; 34 Tex. 230; 100 Mass. 597; 33 Conn. 121; 43 N. H. 415; 74 Ia. 169; or for other reasons; 1 Johns. 478; 1 Swan 213; 3 Jur. N. S. 570; 73 Pa. 84; L. R. 5 Eq. Ca. 166; 53 N. H. 262; 51 N. J. L. 42; 25 Fla. 381.

To constitute a public nuisance, there must be such a number of persons annoyed that the offence can no longer be considered a private nuisance; 1 Burr. 337; 2 Chitty, Cr. L. 607; 8 Ind. 494; 1 Wheat. 469; 37 Barb. 301. Where pugilistic entertainments were given at a club and crowds collected outside, and men whistled for cabs during late hours, it was held a nuisance which would be enjoined; 63 L. T. 65.

Public nuisances arise in consequence of following particular trades, by which the air is rendered offensive and noxious; Cro. Car. 510; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 75, § 10; 2 Ld. Raym. 1163; 1 Burr. 333; 1 Stra. 686; 4 B. & S. 608; 23 Vt. 92; 52 N. J. Eq. 675; also where rendered offensive from stagnant ponds; 134 N. Y. 414; 71 Hun 149; from acts of public indecency, as bathing in a public river in sight of the neighboring houses; 2 Campb. 89; 29 Ind. 517; 18 Vt. 574; 5 Barb. 203; 20 Ala. 65; 5 Rand. 627; or for acts tending to a breach of the public peace, as for drawing a number of persons into a field for the purpose of pigeon-shooting, to the disturbance of the neighborhood; 3 B. & Ald. 184; or for rude and riotous sports or pastimes; 5 Hill 121; 8 Cow. 169; 1 S. & R. 40; 6 C. & P. 324; or keeping a disorderly house; 13 Gray 26; 5 Cranch 304; 8 Blackf. 208; 1 Salk. 282; 30 N. J. Eq. 103; or a gaming house; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 75, § 6; or a bawdy-house; 9 Conn. 350; 13 Gray 26; 26 N. Y. 190; 54 Barb. 299; 128 N. Y. 341; 85 Me. 288; or a merry-go-round; 21 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 906; or a dangerous animal, known to be such, and suffering him to go at large, as a large bulldog accustomed to bite people; 28 Wisc. 430; 40 Vt. 347; or exposing a person having a contagious disease, as the smallpox, in public; 4 M. & S. 73, 472; and the like. The bringing a horse infected with the glanders into a public place, to the danger of infecting the citizens, is a misdemeanor at common law; 2 H. & N. 299; 16 Conn. 272; 41 Barb. 329. The selling of tainted and unwholesome food is likewise indictable; 4 Bla. Com. 162; 3 Hawks 376; 3 M. & S. 11. The leaving unburied the corpse of a person for whom the defendant was bound to provide Christian burial, as a wife or child, is an indictable nuisance, if he is shown to have been of ability to provide such burial; 2 Den. Cr. Cas. 325. So of storing combustible articles in undue quantities or in improper places; 56 Barb. 72; 3 East 192; 57 Pa. 274; 2 Hen. & M. 345; or the placing of a powder magazine in dangerous proximity to a city; 34 Ill. App. 364; or the erection and maintenance of purpurses; Story, Eq. § 921; 9 Wend. 571; 28 N. Y. 396; 55 Barb. 404; 10 Pet. 623; 23 Vt. 92; 2 Wall. 403; 10 id. 557; or the keeping of a coal-shed by a railroad in a thickly settled part of a city; 134 Ill. 281; or maintaining a powder magazine within the city limits, against an ordinance; 12 U. S. App. 665.

Private nuisances may be to corporeal inheritances; as, for example, if a man should build his house so as to throw the rain-water which fell on it on my land; Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 184; 39 Barb. 400; 5 Rep. 101; have a tree projecting over the land of another; Poll. Torts 62; keep hogs or other animals so as to incommode his neighbor and render the air unwholesome; 9 Co. 68; 139 Mass. 198; or to incorporeal hereditaments; as, for example, obstructing a right of way by ploughing it up or laying logs across it, and the like; Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 183; 2 Rolle. Abr. 140; 80 Ga. 659; or obstructing a spring; 1 Campb. 463; 6 East 208; or "shooting" a gas well; 131 Ind. 408; or making musical and other sounds, for the purpose of vexing and annoying the next door neighbor; [1893] 1 Ch. 316; interfering with a franchise, as a ferry or railroad, by a similar erection unlawfully made; or with a navigable stream by a railroad bridge erected without authority; 28 Ga. 398; 122 Mass. 1. Any annoyance arising from odors, smoke, unhealthy exhalations, noise, interference with water power, etc., etc., whereby a man is prevented from fully enjoying his own property, may be ranked as a private nuisance. See 131 Ind. 875; 153 Pa. 366; 50 Kan. 478; 67 Hun 401; [1893] 2 Ch. 447; polluting a stream by discharge of drainage; 85 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 499; 39 N. E. Rep. (Md.) 909; lowering the grade of a highway; 17 U. C. Q. B. 165; building a railway across it unlawfully; 4 Gray 22; failing to keep a street railway in repair; 87 Tenn. 748. So making noises in the street and thereby occasioning damage to citizens; 6 Cush. 80; and making a great outcry and clamor in the streets, by which people are drawn together and the highway obstructed; 74 Phila. 365; 101 Mass. 29; and even though the noise disturbed but a single person; 113 Mass. 8; and a continuous and daily beating of drums on the street; 105 Cal. 558; if it be so troublesome as to annoy the whole community; 72 N. C. 27. See several full notes on nuisances in 39 L. R. A.; and see MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS; ORDINANCE.

A person is not liable in damages for a nuisance erected on land by his grantor until after a request to abate; 42 Ill. App. 421; but see 37 Fed. Rep. 901.

The remedies are by an action for the damage done, by the owner, in the case of a private nuisance; 3 Bla. Com. 220; or by any party suffering special damage, in the case of a public nuisance; 4 Wend. 9; 3 Vt. 529; 1 Pa. 309; Vaugh. 341; 3 M. & S. 472; 2 Bingh. 283; 28 Vt. 142; 36 Cal. 193; 2 R. I. 493; 74 Cal. 463; 76 Ga. 804; 51 N. J. L. 26; 74 Ia. 127; 34 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 974; by abatement by the owner, when the nuisance is private; 2 Rolle. Abr. 565; 3 Dowl. & R. 556; 37 Pa. 503; 8 Dana 158; and in some cases when it is public; Add. Torts 71. But in neither case must there be any riot, and very pressing exigency is requisite to justify summary action of this character, particularly in the case of a public nuisance; 14 Wend. 397; 11 Ark. 252; 16 Q. B. 546; by injunction, which is the most usual and efficacious remedy; see INJUNCTION; or by indictment for a public nuisance; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 856; Whart. Cr. L. § 1410, etc.; 57 Vt. 144; 91 Tenn. 445. A private individual cannot abate a nuisance in a public highway, unless it does him special injury, and then only so far as is necessary to the exercise of his right of passing along the highway; 26 U. S. App. 486; 9 Co. 55; 2 Salk. 458; 3 Bla. Com. 5.

Every continuance of a nuisance or recurrence of the injury is an additional nuisance forming in itself the subject-matter of a new action; 38 Minn. 179.

See Wood, Nuisance, as to municipal authority to abate a nuisance; 9 L. R. A. 711, n.

According to the principles of equity as recognized in the courts of the United States, a state can obtain relief by a suit in equity to restrain a public nuisance; 144 U. S. 550.

NUL AGARD (L. Fr. no award). In Pleading. A plea to an action on an arbitration bond, when the defendant avers that there was no legal award made. 3 Burr. 1730; 2 Stra. 923.

NUL DISSEISIN. In Pleading. No disseisin. A plea in a real action, by which the defendant denies that there was any disseisin. It is a species of the general issue.

NUL TIEL RECORD (Fr. no such record). In Pleading. A plea which is proper when it is proposed to rely upon facts which disprove the existence of the record on which the plaintiff founds his action. Andr. Steph. Pl. 234.

Any matters may be introduced under it which tend to destroy the validity of the record as a record, provided they do not contradict the recitals of the record itself; 10 Ohio 100. It is frequently used to enable the defendant to deny the jurisdiction of the court from which the alleged record emanates; 2 McLean 129; 23 Wend. 293.

It is said to be the proper plea to an action on a foreign judgment, especially if of a sister state, in the United States; 2 Leigh 72; 17 Vt. 502; 6 Pick. 232; 11 Miss. 210; 1 Pa. 499; 2 South. 778; 3 Breese 2; though it is held that nul debet is sufficient; 38 Me. 288; 3 J. J. Marsh. 600; especially if the judgment be that of a justice of the peace; 8 Harr. N. J. 408. It has been held that nul tiel record is an inappropriate plea to suits upon foreign judgments, since such judgments do not create a merger, and are only prima facie evidence of an indebtedness; 88 Mo. 406.

See CONFLICT OF LAWS.

NUL TORT (L. Fr. no wrong). In Pleading. A plea to a real action, by which the defendant denies that he committed any wrong. It is a species of general issue.

NUL WASTE. In Pleading. The general issue in an action of waste. Co. 3d Inst. 700 a, 708 a. The plea of nul waste admits nothing, but puts the whole declaration in issue; and in support of this plea the defendant may give in evidence anything which proves that the act charged is no waste, as that it happened by tempest, lightning, and the like; Co. Litt. 283 a; 8 Wms. Saund. 238, n. 5.

NULL. Properly, that which does not exist; that which is not in the nature of things. In a figurative sense it signifies that which has no more effect than if it did not exist. 8 Toullier, n. 520.

NULL AND VOID. The words "null" and "void" mean the same thing. 5 Kv. L. R. 812.

NULLA BONA (L. Lat. no goods). The return made to a writ of fiat facias by the sheriff, when he has not found any goods of the defendant on which he could levy.

NULLITY. An act or proceeding which has absolutely no legal effect whatever. See Chitty, Contr., 12th ed. 671.

NULLITY OF MARRIAGE. The requisites of a valid and binding marriage have been considered in the article on that subject. If any of these requisites are wanting in a given case, the marriage is either absolutely void, or voidable at the election of one or both of the parties. The more usual imperfections which thus render a marriage void or voidable are: 1. Unsoundness of mind in either of the parties. 2. Want of age, i. e. fourteen in males and twelve in females. 3. Fraud or error; but these must relate to the essentials of the relation, as personal identity, and not merely to the accidentals, as character, condition, or fortune. 4. Duress. 5. Physical impotence, which must exist at the time of the marriage and be incurable. 6. Consanguinity or affinity within the prohibited degrees. 7. A prior subsisting marriage of either of the parties. The fifth and sixth are termed canonical, the remainder, civil, impediments.

The distinction between the two is important,—the latter rendering the marriage absolutely void, while the former only renders it voidable. In the one case, it is not necessary (though it is certainly advisable) to bring a suit to have nullity of the marriage ascertained and declared: it may be treated by the parties as no marriage, and will be so regarded in all judicial proceedings. In the other case, the marriage will be treated as valid and binding until its nullity is ascertained and declared by a competent court in a suit instituted for that purpose; and this must be done during the lifetime of both parties: if it is deferred until the death of either, the marriage will always remain good. But the effect of such sentences of nullity, when obtained, is to render the marriage null and void from the beginning, as in the case of civil impediments.

For the origin and history of this distinction between void and voidable marriages, see 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 253.

A suit for nullity is usually prosecuted in the same court, and is governed by substantially the same principles, as a suit for divorce; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 39.

In its consequences, a sentence of nullity differs materially from a divorce. The latter assumes the original validity of the marriage, and its operation is entirely prospective. The former renders the marriage void from the beginning, and nullifies all its legal results. The parties are to be regarded legally as if no marriage had ever taken place; they are single persons, if before they were single; their issue are illegitimate; and their rights of property as between themselves are to be viewed as having never been operated upon by the marriage. Thus, the man loses all right to the property, whether real or personal, which belongs to the woman; and the woman loses her right to dower; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 907, 1597.

Neither is the woman, upon a sentence of nullity, entitled to permanent alimony; though the better opinion is that she is entitled to alimony pendente lite; 2 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. §§ 907, 1597. See ALIMONY; MARRIAGE; DIVORCE.

NULLIUS IN BONIS (Lat.). Among the property of no person; not a subject of private property.

NULLIUS FILIUS (Lat.). The son of no one; a bastard.

A bastard is considered nullius filius as far as regards his right to inherit. But the rule of nullius filius does not apply in other respects, and has been changed by statute in most states so as to make him the child of his mother, in respect of inheritance.

The mother of a bastard, during its age of nurture, is entitled to the custody of her child, and is bound to maintain it; 6 S. & R. 255; 2 Johns. 375; 2 Mass. 109; 4 B. & P. 148. But see East 224, n.

The putative father, too, is entitled to the custody of the child as against all but the mother; 1 Ashm. 55. And it seems that the putative father may maintain an action, as if his child were legitimate, for marrying him without his consent, contrary to law; Add. Pa. 212. See BASTARD; CHILD; FATHER; MOTHER; PUTATIVE FATHER.

NULLIUS JURIS (Lat.). Of no legal force.

NULLUM ARBITRIUM (Lat.). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action on an arbitration bond for not fulfilling the award, by which the defendant asserts that there is no award.

NULLUM FECERUNT ARBITRIUM (Lat.). In Pleading. The name of a plea to an action of debt upon an obligation for the performance of an award, by which the defendant denies that he submitted to arbitration, etc. Bac. Abr. Arbitr. etc. (G).

NULLUM TEMPUS ACT. The statute 3 Geo. III. c. 16. See 32 Geo. III. c. 58, and 7 Will. c. 3. It was so called because the right of the crown to sue, etc., was limited by it to sixty years, in contradiction to the maxim, Nullum tempus occurrat regi. 3 Chitty, Stat. 63.

NUMBER. A collection of units.

In pleading, numbers must be stated truly when alleged in the recital of a record, written instrument, or express contract; Lawes, Pl. 49; 4 Term 814; Cro. Car. 282; Dougl. 689; 2 W. Bla. 1104. But in other cases it is not, in general, requisite that they should be truly stated; because they are not required to be strictly proved. If, for example, in an action of trespass the plaintiff proves the wrongful taking away of any part of the goods duly described in his declaration, he is entitled to recover pro tanto; Bac. Abr. Trespass (12); Lawes, Pl. 48.

And sometimes, when the subject to be described is supposed to comprehend a multiplicity of particulars, a general description is sufficient. A declaration in trover alleging the conversion of "a library of books," without stating their number, titles, or quality, was held to be sufficiently certain; 8 Bulstr. 81; Carth. 110; Bac. Abr. Trover (F 1); and in an action for the loss of goods by burning the plaintiff's house, the articles may be described by the simple denomination of "goods" or "divers goods"; 1 Keb. 835; Plowd. 85, 118, 128; Cro. Eliz. 887; 1 H. Bla. 284. The singular number may be included within the plural; 83 Ind. 238; 71 Ala. 187; 99 Kan. 784; 77 Mo. 246; Bish. Stat. Crimes § 218.

NUMERATA PECUNIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Money counted or paid; money given in payment by count. See PECUNIA NUMERATA and PECUNIA NON-NUMERATA. L. 8, 10, C. de non numerat. pecun.

NUNC PRO TUNC (Lat. now for then). A phrase used to express that a thing is done at one time which ought to have been performed at another.

A nunc pro tunc entry is an entry made now, of something which was actually previously done, to have effect as of the former date. Its office is not to supply omitted action by the court, but to supply an omission in the record of action really had, but omitted through inadvertence or mistake. 31 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 670.

Leave of court must be obtained to act in legal proceedings nunc pro tunc; and this is granted to answer the purposes of justice, but never to do injustice. A judgment nunc pro tunc can be entered only when the delay has arisen from the act of the court; 3 C. B. 970. See 1 V. & B. 312; 1 Moll. 462; 18 Price 604; 52 Kan. 562. Entering a decree nunc pro tunc, and thereby restricting the time for appeal, is not prejudicial error, where the defeated party succeeds in perfecting his appeal; 144 Ill. 248, 651.

A plea puis darrein continuance may be entered nunc pro tunc after an intervening continuation, in some cases; 11 N. H. 299; and lost pleadings may be replaced by new pleadings made nunc pro tunc; 1 Mo. 327. See 159 U. S. 687.

Nunc Pro Tunc Order. The rule is well settled that the court cannot alter, correct, or amend its records at a subsequent term by the recollection of the judge, or the representation of others to him. There must be at least a minute, or a memorandum on the court record evidencing the order or judgment then rendered to justify the court, at a subsequent term, entering a "nunc pro tunc order." 157 Ky. 767, 164 S. W. 72.

NUNCIATIO. In Civil Law. A formal proclamation or protest. It may be by acts (realis) or by words. Mackelday, Civ. Law § 237. Thus, nunciatio novi operis was an injunction which one man could place on the erection of a new building, etc., near him, until the case was tried by the praetor. Id.; Calv. Lex. An information against a criminal. Calv. Lex.

NUNCIO. The name given to the pope's ambassador. Nuncios are ordinary or extraordinary; the former are sent upon usual missions, the latter upon special occasions. See FOREIGN MINISTER.

NUNCIUS. In International Law.

A messenger; a minister; the pope's legate, commonly called a nuncio. See LEGATE.

NUNCUPATIVE WILL. An oral will, declared by a testator in extremis, or under circumstances considered equivalent thereto, before witnesses, and afterwards reduced to writing. Beach, Wills 5; 4 Kent 576; 2 Bla. Com. 500; 1 Jarm. Wills, 6th Am. ed. § 78; Schoul. Wills § 380.

When a man lieth languishing for fear of sudden death, dareth not stay the writing of his testament, and therefore he prayeth his curate and others to bear witness of his last will, and declareth by word what his last will is. Perk. Conv. § 476; Bac. Abr. 305; 24 Atl. Rep. 870.

In early times this kind of will was very common, and before the statute of frauds, by which it was virtually abolished, save in the case of soldiers and sailors, and of equal efficacy, except for lands, tenements, and hereditaments, with a written testament. Such wills are subject to manifest abuses, and by stat. 1 Vict. c. 26, §§ 9, 11 (preceded by 1 Will. IV. c. 20), the privilege is confined to soldiers in actual service, and sailors at sea, and extends only to personal estate. Similar provisions have been enacted in Massachusetts, Minnesota, New York, Rhode Island, Virginia, West Virginia, and Montana. In Georgia, the statute embraces both real and personal property. In California and the Dakotas, the decedent must have been in actual military service, or at sea, and in immediate fear of death. In the other states, nuncupative wills by persons in extremis are still recognized, subject to restrictions as to amount of property bequeathed, similar to those of the English statute of frauds.

The following principles, among others, are well established: Statutes relating to nuncupative wills are strictly construed; 2 Phillim. 194; 78 Ill. 287; 47 Pa. 31; 38 Miss. 629. The testator must be in extremis, overtaken by violent sickness, in contemplation of death, and without time to make a written will; 1 Addams 389; 20 Johns. 529; 6 W. & S. 184; 10 Gratt. 548; 84 Ga. 619; but see 2 Ala. N. S. 242; 83 Ill. 50; the deceased must have clearly intimated by word or sign to those present that he intended to make the will; 9 B. Monr. 553; 27 Ill. 247; 20 N. H. 872; 14 La. Ann. 729; 36 Md. 630; 2 Greenl. 298; 63 Ill. 455; 78 id. 287; 46 Ia. 694; 63 N. C. 637; testamentary capacity must be most clearly proved; 12 Gill & J. 192; 78 Ill. 287. See 53 Me. 561. Sailors must be serving on shipboard; 2 Curt. 389; 2 R. I. 133. The term mariner applies to every one in the naval or mercantile service; 4 Bradf. 154. See note to Sykes v. NUNDINE (Law Lat.). In Civil and Old English Law. Fair or fairs. Dion. Halicarnass. lib. 2, p. 98; Law Fr. & Lat. Dict. Hence Nundination, traffic at fairs.

NUNQUAM INDEBITATUS (Lat. never indebted). In Pleading. A plea to an action of indebitatus assumpsit, by which the defendant asserts that he is not indebted to the plaintiff. McKelv. Pl. 31; 6 C. & P. 545; 1 M. & W. 542; 1 Q. B. 77. In England, this plea has been substituted for nil debet, q. v., as the general issue in debt on a simple contract.

NUNTIVS, NUNCIVS. In Old English Practice. One who made excuse for absence of one summoned. An apparitor, beadle, or sergeant. Cowel. A messenger or legate: e. g. pope's nuncio. Jacob, L. Dict. Esonarius was sometimes wrongly used for nuntius in the first sense. Bracton, fol. 345, § 2.

NUPER OBIT (Lat. he or she lately died). In Practice. The name of a writ which in the English law lay for a sister coheir dispossessed by her coparcener of lands and tenements whereof their father, brother, or any common ancestor died seized of an estate in fee-simple. Fitzh. N. B. 197. Abolished in 1838.

NUPTIAE (Lat.). Marriage; nuptials; the union of man and woman.

NURTURE. The act of taking care of children and educating them. See CHILD.

NURUS (Lat.). A daughter-in-law. Dig. 50. 16. 60.

NYMPHOMANIA. A morbid and insane sexual desire in women. Stand. Dict. A term used to designate hyperaesthesia sexualis or eroticism in women. Bridges, Abn. Psy. 82.

"Nymphomania" is recognised as irresponsible insanity. 6 Bush (Ky.) 278.

O. K. Abbr. (U. S.) I. All correct. (Possibly humorous spelling, oll korrekt.)

II. vt. To pass; certify; indorse; as, to O. K. a bill. Stand. Dict.

"O. K." may operate as a consent. 114 Ky. 332; 70 S. W. 852.

O. NI. Formerly it was the custom for the Exchequer, as soon as the sheriff entered into and made up his account for issues, amerciaments, etc., to mark upon each head "O. Ni."; this denoted "oneratur, nisi habeat sufficientem exonerationem," and presently he became the king's debtor, and a debt was set upon his head; whereupon the parties paravaile became debtors to the sheriff, and were discharged against the king. Wharton; 4 Inst. 116.

OATH. An outward pledge given by the person taking it that his attestation or promise is made under an immediate sense of his responsibility to God. Tyler, Oaths 15.

The term has been variously defined: as, "a solemn invocation of the vengeance of the Deity upon the witness if he do not declare the whole truth, so far as he knows it;" 1 Stark. Ev. 22; or, "a religious asseveration by which a person renounces the mercy and imprecates the vengeance of Heaven if he do not speak the truth;" 2 Leach 492; or, as "a religious act by which the party invokes God not only to witness the truth and sincerity of his promise, but also to avenge his imposture or violated faith, or, in other words, to punish his perjury if he shall be guilty of it;" 10 Toullier, n. 343-348; Puffendorf, b. 4, c. 2, § 4. The essential idea of an oath would seem to be, however, that of a recognition of God's authority by the party taking it, and an undertaking to accomplish the transaction to which it refers as required by his laws.

In its broadest sense, the term is used to include all forms of attestation by which a party signifies that he is bound in conscience to perform the act faithfully and truly. In a more restricted sense, it excludes all those forms of attestation or promise which are not accompanied by an imprecation.

Assertory oaths are those required by law other than in judicial proceedings and upon induction to office: such, for example, as custom-house oaths.

Extra-judicial oaths are those taken without authority of law. Though binding in foro conscientie, they do not; when false, render the party liable to punishment for perjury.

Judicial oaths are those administered in judicial proceedings.

Promissory or official oaths are oaths taken, by authority of law, by which the party declares that he will fulfil certain duties therein mentioned: as, the oath which an alien takes, on becoming naturalized, that he will support the constitution of the United States: the oath which a judge takes that he will perform the duties of his office. The breach of this does not involve the party in the legal crime or punishment of perjury; 3 Zab. 49. Where an appointee neglects to take an oath of office when required by statute to do so, he cannot be considered qualified, nor justify his doings as an officer; 2 N. H. 202; s. c. 9 Am. Dec. 50.

Qualified oaths are circumstantial oaths. Rap. & L. Dict.

The form of administering the oath may be varied to conform to the religious belief of the individual, so as to make it binding upon his conscience; 4 Bla. Com. 43; 1

Whart. Ev. §§ 886-8; 16 Pick. 154; 2 Gall. 346; 3 Park. Cr. 590; 2 Hawks 458; 7 Ill. 540; Ry. & M. 77. The most common form is upon the gospel, by taking the book in the hand: the words commonly used are, "You do swear that," etc., "so help you God," and then kissing the book; 9 C. & P. 137. The oath was in common use long prior to the Christian era; Willes 545, 1744; the oath and Christianity became associated during the reign of Henry VIII. in England; 3 Robertson's Charles V. 257. The origin of this oath may be traced to the Roman law; Nov. 8, tit. 8; Nov. 74, cap. 5; Nov. 124, cap. 1. In ancient times a Bible containing the Gospels was placed upon a stand in view of the prisoner. The jurors placed their hands upon the book, and then the accused had a full view of "the peer" who was to try him. This was called the "corporal oath" because the hand of the person sworn touched the book. Probably, out of reverence, the book may have been kissed sometimes, as a Catholic priest now kisses it in a Mass; but it is doubtful if kissing the book was ever essential to the validity of the "corporal oath"; 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 59.

The terms "corporal oath" and "solemn oath" are synonymous, and an oath taken with the uplifted hand is properly described by either term in an indictment for perjury; 1 Ind. 184. In New England, New York, and in Scotland the gospels are not generally used, but the party taking the oath holds up his right hand and repeats the words here given; 1 Leach 412, 498.

Kissing the book has been abolished by statute (1895) in Pennsylvania.

Where a justice asks affirm if he swears to the affidavit, and he replies that he does, the oath is sufficient though he does not hold up his hands and swear; 65 Miss. 454.

Another form is by the witness or party promising holding up his right hand while the officer repeats to him, "You do swear by Almighty God, the searcher of hearts, that," etc., "and this as you shall answer to God at the great day."

In another form of attestation, commonly called an affirmation (q. v.), the officer repeats, "You do solemnly, sincerely, and truly declare and affirm that," which is the form prescribed in England by 8 Geo. I. ch. 6.

A general oath that the evidence "shall be the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," etc., is all that is necessary for a witness who testifies to the signing of an instrument in his presence, and translates the language of such instrument for the benefit of the jury; 13 Or. 563.

A Jew is sworn on the Pentateuch, or Old Testament, with his head covered; Stra. 831, 1113; a Mohammedan, on the Koran; 1 Leach 54; a Gentoo, by touching with his hand the foot of a Brahmin or priest of his religion; a Brahmin, by touching the hand of another such priest; Wils. 549; 1 Atk. 21; a Chinaman, by breaking a china saucer; 1 C. & M. 248. See 25 Alb. L. J. 301; 92 Mo. 395.

After a witness has taken the oath according to the custom and religion of his country, it is not error to require him to take the statutory oath; 47 Pac. Rep. 961.

The requirement of an "oath" as used in any act or resolution of congress shall be deemed complied with by making affirmation in the judicial form; U. S. R. S. § 1.

The form and time of administering oaths, as well as the person authorized to administer, are usually fixed by statute.

See Gilp. 439; 4 Wash. C. C. 553; 2 Blackf. 35; 2 McLean 135; 9 Fet. 238; 1 Va. Cas. 181; 8 Rich. So. C. 456; 1 Swan 157; 5 Mo. 21; 48 Cal. 197; 41 Conn. 206. The administering of unlawful oaths is an offence against the government; Whart. Lex.

The subject of oaths has undergone much revision of late years by parliament. By the Promissory Oaths Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 72) a number of unnecessary oaths have been abolished, and declarations substituted. The act of 1885 provides that in case of rape of a child under thirteen, the victim or a witness, if too young to be sworn, may give evidence not under oath. See also Promissory Oaths Act, 1871.

In Arkansas, California, Florida, Indiana, Iowa, Kansas, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, Nevada, New York, Ohio, Oregon, and Wisconsin there are constitutional provisions intended to exclude any religious test for the competency of witnesses.

The Bible is not an indispensable requisite in the administration of an oath; 4 Seld. 67. See VOLUNTARY OATH.

OATH AGAINST BRIBERY. One which could have been administered to a voter at an election for members of parliament. Abolished in 1854. Whart. Lex.

OATH OF CALUMNY. In Civil Law. An oath which a plaintiff was obliged to take that he was not actuated by a spirit of chicanery in commencing his action, but that he had bona fide a good cause of action. Pothier, Pand. lib. 5, tt. 16, 17, s. 124. This oath is somewhat similar to our affidavit of a cause of action. See Dunl. Adm. Pr. 289, 290; JURAMENTUM CALUMNIE.

OATH DECISORY. In Civil Law. An oath which one of the parties defers or refers back to the other for the decision of the cause.

It may be deferred in any kind of civil contest whatever, in questions of possession or of claim, in personal actions, and in real. The plaintiff may defer the oath to the defendant whenever he conceives he has not sufficient proof of the fact which is the foundation of his claim; and in like manner the defendant may defer it to the plaintiff when he has not sufficient proof of his defence. The person to whom the oath is deferred ought either to take it or refer it back; and if he will not do either, the cause should be decided against him. Pothier, Obl. pt. 4, c. 8, s. 4.

The decisory oath has been practically adopted in the district court of the United States for the district of Massachusetts; and admiralty causes have been determined in that court by the oath decisory. But the cases in which this oath has been adopted have been where the tender has been accepted; and no case is known to have occurred there in which the oath has been refused and tendered back to the adversary Dunl. Adm. Pr. 290.

It was familiar to the Roman tribunals, and could be administered by the court to either party for the satisfaction of his conscience, when in doubt. 8 Greenl. Ev., Lewis ed. § 412.

OATH IN LITEM. An oath which in the civil law was deferred to the complainant as to the value of the thing in dispute, on failure of other proof, particularly when there was a fraud on the part of the defendant and he suppressed proof in his possession. See Greenl. Ev. § 348; 1 Eq.

Cas. Abr. 399; 1 Me. 87; 1 Yeates 34.

In general, the oath of the party cannot, by the common law, be received to establish his claim, but is admitted in two classes of cases: first, where it has been already proved that the party against whom it is offered has been guilty of some fraud or other tortious or unwarrantable act of intermeddling with the complainant's goods, and no other evidence can be had of the amount of damages. See 1 Pet. 591; 9 Wheat. 486; 3 Pick. 436; 16 Johns. 193; 17 Ohio 156; 3 N. H. 135; as, for example, where a trunk of goods was delivered to a shipmaster at one port to be carried to another, and on the passage he broke the trunk open and rifled it of its contents, in an action by the owners of the goods against the shipmaster, the facts above mentioned having been proved alunde, the plaintiff was held a competent witness to testify as to the contents of the trunk; 1 Me. 27; 11 id. 412. And see 10 Watts 335; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 848; 12 Metc. 44; 12 Mass. 360. Second, the oath in litem is also admitted on the ground of public policy where it is deemed essential to the purposes of justice; 1 Pet. 596; 6 Mood. 137; 2 Stra. 1188. But this oath is admitted only on the ground of necessity. An example may be mentioned of a case where a statute can receive no execution unless the party interested be admitted as a witness; 16 Pet. 203. Parties in interest are now everywhere, and in most cases, permitted to testify.

OATH EX OFFICIO. The oath by which a clergyman charged with a criminal offence was formerly allowed to swear himself to be innocent; also the oath by which the compurgators swore that they believed in his innocence. 3 Bla. Com. 101, 447; Moz. & W. See OFFICIO, EX, OATH OF.

OATH PURGATORY. An oath by which one destroys the presumptions which were against him, for he is then said to purge himself, when he removes the suspicions which were against him: as, when a man is in contempt for not attending court as a witness, he may purge himself of the contempt, by swearing to a fact which is an ample excuse. See PURGATION.

OATH SUPPLEMENTARY. In Civil and Ecclesiastical Law. An oath required by the judge from either party in a cause, upon half-proof already made, which being joined to half-proof, supplies the evidence required to enable the judge to pass upon the subject. See 3 Bla. Com. 270.

OB CONTINENTIAM DELICTI (Lat.). On account of the contaminating character of the offense.

OB CONTINGENTIAM (Lat.). In case of contingency.

OB TURPEM CAUSAM (Lat.). For an immoral consideration.

OBDIANCE. The performance of a command.

Officers who obey the command of their superiors, having jurisdiction of the subject-matter, are not responsible for their acts. A sheriff may, therefore, justify a trespass under an execution, when the court has jurisdiction, although irregularly issued; 3 Chitty, Pr. 75; Hamlin, N. P. 49.

A child, an apprentice, a pupil, a mariner, and a soldier owe respectively obedience to the lawful commands of the parent, the master, the teacher, the captain of the ship, and the military officer having command; and in case of disobedience submission may be enforced by correction. See ASSAULT; CORRECTION.

OBDIENT. Submissive to authority; yielding compliance with commands, orders, or injunctions; performing what is required, or abstaining from what is forbid. 1 Duv. (Ky.) 17.

OBDIENTARIUS. A monastic officer. Du Cange. See 1 Poll. & Matil. 417.

OBDIENTIAL OBLIGATION. See OBLIGATION.

OBITU. That particular solemnity or office for the dead which the Roman Catholic church appoints to be read or performed over the body of a deceased member of that communion before interment; also, the office which upon the anniversary of his death was frequently used as a commemoration or observance of the day. Dy. 818.

OBITU SINE PROLE (Lat.). (He) died without issue.

OBITER (Lat.). By the way; in passing. "This point was not the principal question in the case, but the law concerning it is delivered obiter only, and in the course of argument." 2 Bl. Com. 238.

OBITER DICTUM. See DICTUM.

OBJECT. That which is perceived, known, thought of, or signified; that toward which a cognitive act is directed. Cent. Dict. The term includes whatever may be presented to the mind as well as to the senses; whatever also is acted upon or operated upon affirmatively or intentionally influenced by anything done, moved, or applied thereto; 8 Blatchf. 257; it may be used as having the sense of effect; 3 Wash. Ter. 131; and for all practical purposes the words subject and object are synonymous; id. But the subject of action cannot be the object of action; the latter is the remedy demanded, the relief prayed for, and is no part of the subject of action or the causes of action; 18 Kan. 406.

OBJECTION. Where evidence is objected to at the trial, the nature of the objections must be distinctly stated, whether an exception be entered on the record or not, and, on either moving for a new trial on account of its improper admission, or on arguing the exception, the counsel will not be permitted to rely on any other objections than those taken à nisi prius; 3 Tayl. Ev., Chamb. ed. § 1881 d; objections must state the specific ground; 40 Cal. 390; 99 Ind. 588; 35 Mo. 226; and counsel cannot change his ground on the argument in the appellate court; 70 N. Y. 34; general objections, such as irrelevant, incompetent, and the like, are said to be too general in their terms; 91 Mo. 138; 50 N. H. 121; evidence to which such objections are made will be held in the appellate court to have been properly admitted, if admissible for any purpose; 46 Cal. 397; one who has not objected to evidence when introduced is not entitled to have the court instruct the jury to disregard it; 85 Mo. 106; nor will an objection be heard if made for the first time on the motion for a new trial; 40 Ind. 516; or in the appellate court; 105 U. S. 4.

When testimony was received without objection, the court should not sign a bill of exceptions; if it does, it will be disregarded above; 38 Pa. 56.

Ordinarily, where an objection has been made and overruled, it is not necessary to repeat it to each succeeding question open to the same objection; Thomp. Trials § 705.

Objecting to a judge's instruction is said to be regarded as having the same force as excepting; 98 Mo. 640. See BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where objections have been twice presented and regularly allowed, it is not necessary that they should be renewed at the termination of the testimony of a witness; 169 U. S. 532.

OBJECTS OF A POWER. The persons who are intended to be benefited by the distribution of property settled subject to a power.

OBJURGATRICES. Scolds or unquiet women punished with the cucking stool (q. v.).

OBLATA. See OBLATE ROLL.

OBLATE ROLL. An exchequer-roll containing particulars of oblata, i. e., old debts; fines; amercements, or gifts to the crown. Stand. Dict.

OBLATI ACTIO (Lat.). An action given to a party against another who had offered to him a stolen thing, which was found in his possession.

OBLATIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A tender of money in payment of debt made by debtor to creditor. L. 9, C. de solut. Whatever is offered to the church by the pious. Calv. Lex.; Vicat, Voc. Jur.

OBLATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. Offerings; obventions. See OVENTIONS.

OBLIGATIO. In Roman Law. A legal bond which obliges us to the performance of something in accordance with the law of the land. Ortolan, Inst. 2, § 1179.

It corresponded nearly to our word contract. Justinian says, "Obligatio est juris vinculum quo necessitate adstringimur altius solvendæ rei, secundum nostræ civitatis jura." Pr. J. 8, 13.

The Romans considered that obligations derived their validity solely from positive law. At first the only ones recognized were those established in special cases in accordance with the forms prescribed by the strict jus civile. In the course of time, however, the praetorian jurisdiction, in mitigation of the primitive rigor of the law, introduced new modes of contracting obligations and provided the means of enforcing them; hence the twofold division made by Justinian of obligationes civiles and obligationes prætorie. Inst. 1, 3, 13. But there was a third class, the obligationes naturales, which derived their validity from the law of nature and nations, or the natural reason of mankind. These had not the binding force of the other classes, not being capable of enforcement by action, and are, therefore, not noticed by Justinian in his classification; but they had, nevertheless, a certain efficacy even in the civil law: for instance, though a debt founded upon a natural obligation could not be recovered by an action, yet if it was voluntarily paid by the debtor he could not recover it back, as he might do in the case of money paid by mistake, etc., where no natural obligation existed. L. 38, pr. D. 12, 6. And see Ortolan 2, § 1180.

The second classification of obligations made by Justinian has regard to the way in which they arise. They were, in this aspect, either ex contractu or quasi ex contractu, or ex maleficio or quasi ex maleficio; Inst. 2, 3, 13. These will be discussed separately.

Obligations ex contractu, those founded upon an express contract, are again subdivided into four classes, with reference to the mode in which they are contracted. The contract might be entered into re, verbis, litteris, or consensu.

A contract was entered into re by the actual transfer of a thing from one party to the other. Though in such cases the understanding of the parties as to the object of the transfer, and the conditions accompanying it, formed an essential part of the contract, yet it was only by the actual delivery of the thing that the contract was generated. The only contracts which could be entered into in this way were those known to our law as bailments,—a term derived from the French word bailleur, to deliver, and evidently pointing to the same characteristic feature in the translation which the Romans indicated by the word re. These were the mutuum, or loan of a thing to be consumed in the using and to be returned in kind, the commodatum, or gratuitous loan of a thing to be used and returned, the depositum, or delivery of a thing to be kept in safety for the benefit of the depositor, and the pignus, or delivery of a thing in pledge to a creditor, as security for his debt. See MUTUUM; COMMODATUM; DEPOSITUM; PIGNUS; Ortolan, Inst. § 1208; Mackeldey, Röm. Recht § 806. Besides the above named contractus reales, a large class of contracts which had no special names, and were thence called contractus inominati, were included under this head, from the fact that they, like the former, gave rise to the actio præscriptis verbis. Some of these were the contracts of exchange, of mutual compromise, of doubtful or contested claims (somewhat resembling our accord and satisfaction), of factorship, etc. See Mackelley § 409.

Contracts were entered into verbis, by a formal interrogation by one party and response by the other. The interrogation was called stipulatio, and the party making it, reus stipulandi. The response was called promissio, and the respondent, reus promittendi. The contract itself, consisting of the interrogation and response, was often called stipulatio. In the time of the earlier jurists, the stipulation could only be entered into by the use of certain formula words by the parties: as, for instance, Spondeo? do you promise? Spondeo, I promise; Dabis? will you give? Dabo, I will give; Facies? will you do this? Faciam, I will do it, etc., etc. But by a constitution of the emperor Leo, A. D. 460, the obligation to use these particular words was done away, and any words which expressed the meaning of the parties were allowed to create a valid stipulation, and any language understood by the parties might be used with as much effect as Latin. Such contracts were called verbis, because their validity depended entirely upon the use of the words. The mere agreement of the parties without using the question and response could not beget a stipulation; and, on the other hand, if the question and response had been used, the obligation was created although there might be an absence of consent. In this latter case, however, equitable relief would be granted by the prætor; Ortolan, Inst. § 1250. Stipulations, and, indeed, all other forms of contracts, might be made either pure, i. e. absolutely, or in diem, i. e. to take effect at a future day, or sub conditione, i. e. conditionally. But some kinds of conditions, such as those physically impossible, were inadmissible, and invalidated the contract; while others, such as those which were absurd, were themselves invalidated, and the contract was considered as having been made absolutely. Mackelley § 415-421; Ortolan, Inst. § 1235; Inst. § 13.

Contracts entered into litteris were obsolete in the reign of Justinian. In the earlier days of Roman jurisprudence, every citizen kept a private account-book. If a creditor, at the request of his debtor, entered in such book his charge against his debtor, such entry, in pursuance of the request, constituted not merely evidence of a contract, but the contract itself. This was the contract formed litteris, in writing. The debtor, on his part, might also make a corresponding entry of the transaction in his own book. This was, in fact, expected of him, and was generally done; but it seems not to have been necessary to the validity of the contract. The entry was made in the form of a fictitious payment; it was allowable only in pecuniary transactions; it must be simple and unconditional, and could not be made to take effect at a future day. The charge might be made against the original debtor, a re in personam, or against a third person who agreed to take his place, a persona in personam. This species of literal contract was called nomina, nomina transcriptitia or acceptilatio et expensatio. Ortolan, Inst. § 1414. This species of contract seems never to have been of great importance; they had disappeared entirely before the time of Justinian; Hadley, Rom. Law 218.

There were two other literal contracts known to the early jurisprudence, called syngrapha and chirographia; but these even in the times of Gaius had become so nearly obsolete that very little is known about them. All these, it must be borne in mind, were contracts themselves, not merely evidences of a contract; and this distinguishes them from the instruments of writing in use during the latter ages of the civil law. Ortolan, Inst. § 1414; Mackelley § 422.

Contracts were made consensu, by the mere agreement of the contracting parties.

Although such agreement might be proved by a written instrument, as well as in other ways, yet the writing was only evidence of the contract, not the contract itself. This species of consensual contracts are emptio et venditio, or sale, locatio et conductio, or hiring, emphyteusis, or conveyance of land reserving a rent, societas, or partnership, and mandatum, or agency. See these words; HIRE.

Obligaciones quasi ex contractu. In the Roman law, persons who had not in fact entered into a contract were sometimes treated as if they had done so. Their legal position in such cases had considerable resemblance to that of the parties to a contract, and is called an obligatio quasi ex contractu. Such an obligation was engendered in the cases of negotiorum gestio, or unauthorized agency, of communio incidens, a sort of tenancy in common not originating in a contract, of solutio indebiti, or the payment of money to one not entitled to it, of the tutela and cura, resembling the relation of guardian and ward, of the additio hereditatis and agnitio bonorum possessionis, or the acceptance of an heirship, and many others. Some include in this class the constitutio dotis, settlement of a dower. Ortolan, Inst. § 1522; Mackelley § 457.

Obligaciones ex maleficio or ex delicto. The terms malefictum, delictum, embraced most of the injuries which the common law denominates torts, as well as others which are now considered crimes. This class includes furtum, theft, rapina, robbery, damnum, or injury to property, whether direct or consequential, and injuria, or injury to the person or reputation. The definitions here given of damnum and injuria are not strictly accurate, but will serve to convey an idea of the distinction between them. All such acts, from the instant of their commission, rendered the perpetrator liable for damages to the party injured, and were, therefore, considered to originate an obligatio. Inst. 4. 1; Ortolan, Inst. § 1715.

Obligaciones quasi ex delicto. This class embraces all torts not coming under the denomination of delicta and not having a special form of action provided for them by law. They differed widely in character, and at common law would in some cases give rise to an action on the case, in others to an action on an implied contract. Ortolan, Inst. § 1781.

Obligaciones ex variis causarum figuris. Although Justinian confined the divisions of obligations to the four classes which have been enumerated, there are many species of obligations which cannot properly be reduced within any of these classes. Some authorities have, consequently, established a fifth class, to receive the odds and ends which belonged nowhere else, and have given to this class the above designation, borrowed from Gaius, l. 1, pr. § 1, D. 44. 7. See Mackelley § 474. See, generally, Hadley, Rom. Law 209, etc.

OBLIGATION (from Lat. obligo, ligo, to bind). A duty.

A tie which binds us to pay or do something agreeably to the laws and customs of the country in which the obligation is made. Inst. § 14.

A bond containing a penalty, with a condition annexed, for the payment of money, performance of covenants, or the like, and which differs from a bill, which is generally without a penalty or condition, though it may be obligatory. Co. Litt. 172.

A deed whereby a man binds himself under a penalty to do a thing. Com. Dig. Obligation (A); 2 S. & R. 502; 6 Vt. 40; 1 Blackf. 241; Harp. 434; Baldw. 129. The word has a very broad and comprehensive legal signification and embraces all instruments of writing, however informal, whereby one party contracts with another for the payment of money or the delivery of specific articles. 108 N. C. 844; 6 Minn. 353; 23 Fed. Rep. 585.

An absolute obligation is one which gives no alternative to the obligor, but requires fulfilment according to the engagement.

An accessory obligation is one which is dependent on the principal obligation; for example, if I sell you a house and lot of ground, the principal obligation on my part is to make you a title for it; the accessory obligation is to deliver you all the title-papers which I have relating to it, to take care of the estate till it is delivered to you, and the like.

An alternative obligation is where a person engages to do or to give several things in such a manner that the payment of one will acquit him of all.

Thus, if A agrees to give B, upon a sufficient consideration, a horse, or one hundred dollars, it is an alternative obligation. Pothier, Obl. pt. 2, c. 3, art. 6, no. 245.

In order to constitute an alternative obligation it is necessary that two or more things should be promised disjunctively; where they are promised conjunctively, there are as many obligations as the things which are enumerated; but where they are in the alternative, though they are all due, there is but one obligation, which may be discharged by the payment of any of them.

The choice of performing one of the obligations belongs to the obligor, unless it is expressly agreed that it shall belong to the creditor; Dougl. 14; 1 Ld. Raym. 279; 4 Mart. La. N. S. 187. If one of the acts is prevented by the obligee or the act of God, the obligor is discharged from both. See 2 Evans, Pothier, Obl. 53; Viner, Abr. Condition (S b); CONJUNCTIVE; DISJUNCTIVE; ELECTION.

A civil obligation is one which has a binding operation in law, and which gives to the obligee the right of enforcing it in a court of justice; in other words, it is an engagement binding on the obligor. 4 Wheat. 197; 12 id. 318, 337.

Civil obligations are divided into express and implied, pure and conditional, primitive and secondary, principal and accessory, absolute and alternative, determinate and indeterminate, divisible and indivisible, single and penal, and joint and several. They are also purely personal, purely real, or mixed.

A conditional obligation is one the execution of which is suspended by a condition which has not been accomplished, and subject to which it has been contracted.

A determinate obligation is one which has for its object a certain thing: as, an obligation to deliver a certain horse named Bucephalus. In this case the obligation can only be discharged by delivering the identical horse.

A divisible obligation is one which, being a unit, may nevertheless be lawfully divided, with or without the consent of the parties.

It is clear that it may be divided by consent, as those who made it may modify or change it as they please. But some obligations may be divided without the consent of the obligor: as where a tenant is bound to pay two hundred dollars a year rent to his landlord, the obligation is entire; yet, if his landlord dies and leaves two sons, each will be entitled to one hundred dollars; or if the landlord sells one undivided half of the estate yielding the rent, the purchaser will be entitled to receive one hundred dollars and the seller the other hundred. See APPORTIONMENT.

Express or conventional obligations are those by which the obligor binds himself in express terms to perform his obligation.

Imperfect obligations are those which are not binding on us as between man and man, and for the non-performance of which we are accountable to God only: such as charity or gratitude. In this sense an obligation is a mere duty. Pothier, Obl. art. prel. n. 1.

An implied obligation is one which arises by operation of law: as, for example, if I send you daily a loaf of bread, without any express authority, and you make use of it in your family, the law raises an obligation on your part to pay me the value of the bread.

An indeterminate obligation is one where the obligor binds himself to deliver one of a certain species: as, to deliver a horse, where the delivery of any horse will discharge the obligation.

An indivisible obligation is one which is not susceptible of division: as, for example, if I promise to pay you one hundred dollars, you cannot assign one-half of this to another, so as to give him a right of action against me for his share. See DIVISIBLE.

A joint obligation is one by which several obligors promise to the obligee to perform the obligation. When the obligation is only joint, and the obligors do not promise separately to fulfill their engagement, they must be all sued, if living, to compel the performance; or, if any be dead, the survivors must all be sued. See PARTIES.

A natural or moral obligation is one which cannot be enforced by action, but which is binding on the party who makes it in conscience and according to natural justice.

As, for instance, when the action is barred by the act of limitation, a natural obligation still subsists, although the civil obligation is extinguished; 5 Binn. 578. Although natural obligations cannot be enforced by action, they have the following effect: first, no suit will lie to recover back what has been paid or given in compliance with a natural obligation; 1 Term 285; 1 Dall. 184; second, a natural obligation has been held to be a sufficient consideration for a new contract; 2 Binn. 591; 5 id. 33; Yelv. 41 a, n. 1; Cowp. 390; 2 Bla. Com. 445; 3 Bos. & P. 249, n.; 3 East 506; 3 Taunt. 311; 5 id. 36; 3 Pick. 207; Chitty, Contr., 12th ed. 98; Hare, Contr. 264; Pol. Contr. 168; but see MORAL OBLIGATION; CONSIDERATION.

Obediential obligations. Such obligations are incumbent on parties in consequence of the situation or relationship in which they are placed. Ersk. Prin. 60.

A penal obligation is one to which is attached a penal clause, which is to be enforced if the principal obligation be not performed. See LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

A perfect obligation is one which gives a right to another to require us to give him something or not to do something. These obligations are either natural or moral, or they are civil.

A personal obligation is one by which the obligor binds himself to perform an act, without directly binding his property for its performance.

It also denotes an obligation in which the obligor binds himself only, not including his heirs or representatives.

A primitive obligation, which in one sense may also be called a principal obligation, is one which is contracted with a design that it should itself be the first fulfilled.

A principal obligation is one which is the most important object of the engagement of the contracting parties.

A pure or simple obligation is one which is not suspended by any condition, either because it has been contracted without condition, or, having been contracted with one, it has been fulfilled.

A real obligation is one by which real estate, and not the person, is liable to the obligee for the performance.

A familiar example will explain this. When an estate owes an easement as a right of way, it is the thing, and not the owner, who owes the easement. Another instance occurs when a person buys an estate which has been mortgaged, subject to the mortgage: he is not liable for the debt, though the estate is. In these cases the owner has an interest only because he is seized of the servient estate or the mortgaged premises, and he may discharge himself by abandoning or parting with the property. The obligation is both personal and real when the obligor has bound himself and pledged his estate for the fulfillment of the obligations.

A secondary obligation is one which is contracted and is to be performed in case the primitive cannot be. For example, if I sell you my house, I bind myself to give a title: but I find I cannot, as the title is in another: then my secondary obligation is to pay you damages for my non-performance of my obligation.

A several obligation is one by which one individual, or, if there be more, several individuals, bind themselves separately to perform the engagement. In this case each obligor may be sued separately; and if one or more be dead, their respective executors may be sued. See PARTIES.

A single obligation is one without any penalty: as where I simply promise to pay you one hundred dollars. This is called a single bill, when it is under seal.

Contractual. That form of obligation which is created by an agreement as results in contract between two parties. It is a legal bond whereby constraint is laid upon a person or group of persons to act or forbear on behalf of another person or group. Elliot, Contracts, p. 6, citing Anson Cont. 5, § 3. Not a mere general obligation consisting of a right incident to ownership or a merely public or official right, nor an indefinite one binding a party to the entire community or relating to indefinite acts or forbearances. It is a control exercisable by definite persons over definite persons for the purpose of definite acts or forbearances reducible to a money value. Id.; Anson Cont. 7.

A relation that exists between two persons of whom one has a private and peculiar right (that is, not a merely public or official right, or a right incident to ownership or a permanent family relation) to control the other's actions by calling upon him to do or forbear some particular thing. Id.; Pol. Cont. 3 (new ed. 1885).

Quasi-Contractual. That form of obligation which does not depend upon the consent of the obligor and which is frequently imposed upon him in defiance of his will. It binds him to affirmative action in the form of making restitution and of restoring an unjust enrichment which the obligor has received to the party who is lawfully entitled thereto. 1 Page, Contracts, 2nd ed., p. 42.

Of Tort. That form of obligation which is entered into by reason of the obligor's wrongful act or default in violating a duty which is imposed upon him by law without regard to his assent, the violation of which duty inflicts an injury upon the obligee. 1 Page, Contracts, 2nd ed., p. 42. See CONJUNCTIVE OBLIGATION; HERITABLE OBLIGATION; IRRECUABLE; JOINT; JOINT AND SEVERAL OBLIGATION; MANCOMMUNAL.

OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

A state statute which authorizes the redemption of property sold upon foreclosure of a mortgage, where no right of redemption previously existed, or which extends the period of redemption beyond the time formerly allowed, cannot constitutionally apply to a sale under a mortgage executed before its passage; 168 U. S. 118. The subject is treated under IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATIONS OF CONTRACTS.

OBLIGATORY PACT. In Civil Law. An informal obligatory declaration of consensus, which the Roman law refused to acknowledge. Sohm, Rom. L. 321.

OBLIGATORY RIGHTS. In the Civil Law. One class of private rights between debtors and creditors.

OBLIGEE. The persons in favor of whom some obligation is contracted, whether such obligation be to pay money or to do or not to do something. La. Code, art. 8523, no. 11.

Obligees are either several or joint. An obligee is several when the obligation is made to him alone; obligees are joint when the obligation is made to two or more; and in that event each is not a creditor for his separate share, unless the nature of the subject or the particularity of the expression in the instrument lead to a different conclusion. 2 Pothier, Obl., Evans ed. 56; Hob. 172; Cro. Jac. 261. The words obligee and payee have been held to have a technical and definite meaning under an act relative to promissory notes, bonds, etc., and apply only to notes, bonds, or bills whether given for the payment of money or for the performance of covenants and conditions, and not to mortgages; 2 Ill. 142.

OBLIGOR. The person who has engaged to perform some obligation. La. Code, art. 8523, no. 12. One who makes a bond.

Obligors are joint and several. They are joint when they agree to pay the obligation jointly; and then the survivors only are liable upon it at law, but in equity the assets of a deceased joint obligor may be reached; 1 Bro. Ch. 29; 2 Ves. 101, 871. They are several when one or more bind themselves and each of them separately to perform the obligation. In order to become an obligor, the party must actually, either himself or by his attorney, enter into the obligation and execute it as his own. If a man sign and seal a bond as his own and deliver it, he will be bound by it although his name be not mentioned in the bond; 4 Ala. 479; 4 Hayw. 239; 4 McCord 203; 7 Cow. 484; 5 Mass. 538; 2 Dana 463; 4 Dev. 272. When the obligor signs between the penal part and the condition, still the latter will be a part of the instrument; 7 Wend. 345; 3 Hen. & M. 144.

The execution of a bond by the obligor, in blank, with verbal authority to fill it up, does not bind the obligor, though it is afterwards filled up, unless the bond is redelivered or acknowledged or adopted; 1 Yerg. 69, 149; 1 Hill N. Y. 287; 2 N. & M'C. 125; 2 Brock. 64; 1 Ohio 368; 2 Dev. 369; 6 Gill & J. 250. But see, contra, 17 S. & R. 438; and see 6 id. 308; Wright Ohio 742; BLANK.

All obligors in a joint bond are presumed to be principals, except such as have the word "security" opposite their names; 82 Va. 751.

OBLITERATION. In the absence of statutory provisions to the contrary, the obliteration of part of a will, leaving it otherwise complete, with the intention by the testator to annul only what was cancelled, leaves the residue valid; 123 Mass. 102; 19 Alb. L. J. 328; 39 L. T. (N. S.) 581; 22 N. J. Eq. 463. But under the Wills Act in England; 1 Vict. c. 26; any obliterations or other alterations must be duly attested as is required for the execution of a will, except that such attestation may be limited to the alterations; 1 Wms. Exec. 144. A line drawn through the writing is, doubtless, an obliteration, though it may leave it as legible as it was before; 58 Pa. 244. For a review of the cases see note to 25 Am. Rep. 35; WILLS.

OBEAS. Works or trades which men carry on in houses or in covered places. White, New Recop. b. 1, t. 5, c. 3, § 6.

OBLIQUE. Censure; reproach. 70 Cal. 275.

OBREPTION. Acquisition of escheats, etc., from a sovereign, by making false representations. Bell, Dic. Subreption; Calv. Lex.

OBROGATION. The annulling a law, in whole or in part, by passing a law contrary to it. The alteration of a law. Calv. Lex.

OBSCENE. Ordinarily, something which is offensive to chastity; something that is foul and filthy, and for that reason is offensive to a pure-minded person. 88 Fed. Rep. 732. That which is offensive to chastity and modesty. 45 Fed. Rep. 414; 50 id. 918. See OBSCENITY.

Applied to language spoken, written, or printed, and to pictorial productions. Anderson; 12 Fed. Rep. 673. Obscene, lewd, or lascivious publications of an indecent character, are neither mailable nor importable. Id. The test is whether the tendency of the matter is to deprave and corrupt the morals of those whose minds are open to such influences, and into whose hands a publication of the sort may fall. A book need not have words which are in themselves obscene, in order to be obscene. Regard is had to the idea conveyed by the words used, in any substantial part of the publication. Id.; 16 Blatch. 336.

OBSCENITY. In Criminal Law. Such indecency as is calculated to promote the violation of the law and the general corruption of morals. It is that form of indecency which is calculated to promote the general corruption of morals. 51 Fed. Rep. 41. In all cases an indictment for obscenity must aver exposure and offence to the community generally; mere private indecency is not indictable at common law; 2 Whart. Cr. L. § 1431.

The exhibition of an obscene picture is an indictable offence at common law, although not charged to have been exhibited in public, if it be averred that the picture was exhibited to sundry persons for money; Arch. Cr. Pr. 1034; 2 S. & R. 91. The stat. 20 and 21 Vict. c. 83, gives summary powers for the searching of houses in which obscene books, etc., are suspected to be kept, and for the seizure and destruction of such books. By various acts of congress, the importation and circulation, through the mails or otherwise, of obscene literature or articles of any kind is rendered punishable with fine or imprisonment; R. S. §§ 2491, 3893, 5389. See 8 Phila. 453; 126 Mass. 46; 92 Ill. 182; 51 Fed. Rep. 41. R. S. § 3893, as amended by act of congress (19 Stat. L. p. 90), prohibiting the mailing of obscene papers, is not in contravention of the first amendment to the constitution providing that the freedom of the press shall not be abridged; 96 U. S. 727; 143 id. 110; 50 Fed. Rep. 921. An obscene book or paper within the act relating to non-mailable matter means one which contains immodest and indecent matter, the reading whereof would have a tendency to deprave and corrupt the minds of those in whose hands the publication might fall, and whose minds are open to such immoral influences; 38 Fed. Rep. 732. Mailing a private sealed letter containing obscene matter is an offence within the statute; 162 U. S. 420; 50 Fed. Rep. 410. The character of a publication as to whether obscene or otherwise is not to be determined by the motives of the author or sender in making or sending it; 38 Fed. Rep. 500. An indictment for selling an obscene book need not set out the obscene matter nor even describe the same in general terms, if it identifies the book and states that the contents are too indecent to be placed upon the record; 43 N. Y. Supp. 1046.

The fact that a woman, in whose presence obscene language is used, is herself in the habit of using such language, can in no case constitute a justification, but may mitigate the offence; 86 Ala. 601.

Legislative provisions forbidding the keeping, exhibition, or sale of indecent books or pictures, and authorizing their destruction if seized, are within the police powers of the states and are constitutional; Cooley, Const. Lim. 749.

OBSERVE. In Civil Law. To perform that which has been prescribed by some law or usage. Dig. 1. 3. 32.

OBSELETE. A term applied to laws which have lost their efficacy without being repealed.

A positive statute, unrepealed, can never be repealed by a non-user alone; 4 Yeates 181, 215; 1 P. A. Bro. App. 28; 13 S. & R. 447. The disuse of a law is at most only presumptive evidence that society has consented to such a repeal; however this presumption may operate on an unwritten law, it cannot, in general, act upon one which remains as a legislative act on the statute-book; because no presumption can set aside a certainty. A written law may indeed become obsolete when the object to which it was intended to apply, or the occasion for which it was enacted, no longer exists; 1 P. A. Bro. App. 28. "It must be a very strong case," says Chief Justice Tilghman, "to justify the court in deciding that an act standing on the statute-book, unrepealed, is obsolete and invalid. I will not say that such case may not exist,—where there has been a non-user for a great number of years,—where, from a change of times and manners, an ancient sleeping statute would do great mischief if suddenly brought into action,—where a long practice inconsistent with it has prevailed, and especially where from other and later statutes it might be inferred that in the apprehension of the legislature the old one was not in force." 13 S. & R. 452; Rutherford, Inst. b. 2, c. 6, s. 19; Merlin, Répert., Duesuetude.

OBSTANTE. Withstanding; hindering. See NON OBSTANTE.

OBSTA PRINCIPIS. Withstand beginnings. It is the duty of the court to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principis. 116 U. S. 635.

Oppose (adverse) beginnings. Taylor, L. Gloss. Illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can be obviated only by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. 116 U. S. 635.

OBSTRUCT AND HINDER. The words "obstruct and hinder" import resistance and obstruction of rights. 92 Ky. 624. See DEFEAT OR OBSTRUCT.

OBSTRUCTING MAIL. See POSTAL SERVICE.

OBSTRUCTING PROCESS. In Criminal Law. The act by which one or more persons attempt to prevent, or do prevent, the execution of lawful process.

The officer must be prevented by actual violence, or by threatened violence accompanied by the exercise of force, or by those having capacity to employ it, by which the officer is prevented from executing his writ. The officer is not required to expose his person by a personal conflict with the offender; 2 Wash. C. C. 169. See 3 id. 835; 12 Ala. n. S. 199; 37 Wis. 196; 17 Tex. App. 232; Whart. Cr. L. § 652.

This is an offence against public justice of a very high and presumptuous nature; and more particularly so where the obstruction is of an arrest upon criminal process. A person opposing an arrest upon criminal process becomes thereby particeps criminis; that is, an accessory in felony, and a principal in high treason; 4 Bla. Com. 128; 1 Russ. Cr. 360. See 2 Gall. 15; 2 Chitty, Cr. L. 145; 3 Vt. 110; 25 id. 415; 2 Strobb. 73; 15 Mo. 486; 4 Am. L. J. 489; 10 Ky. L. Rep. 259; 148 U. S. 197.

The fact that a person whom a mayor attempts to arrest does not know that he is authorized by the charter of the city to make arrests, does not change his responsibility for acts committed in resisting arrest; 30 S. C. 493; but where a person, who is not vested by law with authority to make an arrest, attempts to do so, he acts as a private citizen, and one who opposes him therein is not guilty of opposing an officer; 48 Fed. Rep. 554.

OBSTRUCTING PUBLIC WORKS. See DISTURBANCE OF PUBLIC WORKS.

OBSTRUCTING RAILWAYS. Acts constituting the obstruction of railroad tracks a crime exist in many states, e. g. Alabama, California, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Mississippi, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New York, and Tennessee, and in England. The motive with which it is done is not material; 73 Ala. 473; it need not appear that an obstruction maliciously placed on the track did actually hinder the trains; 38 Ia. 257. It is the intent of the act and not the natural consequences which makes a crime; 25 Alb. L. J. 419. A driver of a vehicle who refuses to turn off a street railway track, when notified, may be guilty of obstructing a railway track; 14 Gray 69. In Texas it must be shown that the obstruction was such as would endanger human life; 7 Tex. App. 462. If a person's wagon accidentally becomes caught in a crossing, he is not liable on an indictment for obstructing the track, though he was negligent; Permitting cars to remain for an unnecessarily long time on a highway is a nuisance; 95 N. C. 602; whether it be in bad faith or not; 120 Ind. 289.

The "obstruction" by a railroad company of an easement across its tracks by permitting cars to stand thereon for an unreasonable length of time is not an obstruction amounting to a nuisance which may be abated by the owner of the passway. 161 Ky. 464, 170 S. W. 1194. See NUISANCE; RAILROAD.

OBSTRUCTING A STREET. To block up; to hinder or impede. To omit, after notice, to remove an obstruction, is to wilfully obstruct a highway; 12 Q. B. D. 121; as is the leaving on the side of a highway anything calculated to frighten horses; 12 id. 110. A certain use of the streets by carriages, either in front of private residences, hotels, clubs, theatres, churches, and similar buildings, is a legitimate use of the street as such, and when they are occupied temporarily and reasonably by a licensed coachman or by a private carriage, the practice does not amount to a nuisance; N. Y. Sup. Ct. (1896).

To render passage difficult or impossible. Anderson. The primary purpose of streets is use by public for travel and transportation, and the rule is that any obstruction or encroachment which interferes with such use is a public nuisance. But there are exceptions to the rule, born of necessity and justified by public convenience. Whether an obstruction is necessary and reasonable must generally be a question of fact to be determined upon the evidence relating thereto. Id.; 107 N. Y. 365. See STREET; NUISANCE; HIGHWAY.

OBVENTIO (Lat. obvenire, to fall in). In Civil Law. Rent or profit accruing from a thing, or from industry. It is generally used in the plural.

In Old English Law. The revenue of spiritual living, so called. Cowel. Also, in the plural, offerings. Co. 2d Inst. 661.

OBVIOUS. Apparent; evident; manifest. An obvious imitation of a patent does not mean obvious to an uneducated or unskilled eye, but obvious to a judge or jury, sitting as experts; 15 Ch. D. 181; 50 L. T. 420. See 15 Ct. Sess. Cas., 4th ser. 660.

The word may receive different interpretations when applied to degree of certainty; e. g., highest attainable certainty, absolute certainty, or reasonable certainty. 12 Conn. * 229.

OCCASIO. A tribute imposed by the lord on his vassals or tenants.

Molestation; trouble; hindrance; vexation by suit. Burrill; Spel.

OCCUPANCY. The taking possession of those things corporeal which are without an owner, with an intention of appropriating them to one's own use.

Fothier defines it to be the title by which one acquires property in a thing which belongs to nobody, by taking possession of it with design of acquiring it. Tr. du Dr. de Propriété, u. 29. The Civil Code of Louisiana, art. 3376, nearly following Fothier, defines occupancy to be "a mode of acquiring property by which a thing which belongs to nobody becomes the property of the person who took possession of it with an intention of acquiring a right of ownership in it." The basis of its origin seems to be not an instinctive bias towards the institution of property, but a presumption arising out of the long continuation of that institution, that everything should have an owner. Maine, Ann. L. 249. Occupancy is sometimes used in the sense of occupation or holding possession; indeed it has come to be very generally so used in this country in homestead law, public-land laws, and the like; 21 Ill. 178; 25 Barb. 54; Act of Cong. May 20, 1890 (4 Stat. at L. 420); 86 Wisc. 73; see 47 Minn. 18; 12 Q. B. Div. 356; 2 id. 599; but this does not appear to be a common legal use of the term, as recognized by English authorities.

To constitute occupancy, there must be a taking of a thing corporeal, belonging to nobody, with an intention of becoming the owner of it; Co. Litt. 416.

A right by occupancy attaches in the finder of lost goods unreclaimed by the owner; in the captor of beasts ferae naturae, so long as he retains possession; 2 Bla. Com. 408; the owner of lands by accession, and the owner of goods acquired by confusion.

It was formerly considered, also, that the captor of goods contraband of war acquired a right by occupancy; but this is now held otherwise, such goods being now held to be primarily vested in the sovereign, and as belonging to individual captors only, to the extent and under such regulations as positive laws may prescribe; 9 Kent 290. See PRIZE.

OCCUPANT. One who has the actual use or possession of a thing. See 13 Nev. 65.

When the occupiers of a house are entitled to a privilege in consequence of such occupation, as to pass along a way, to enjoy a pew, and the like, a person who occupies a part of such house, however small, is entitled to some right, and cannot be deprived of it; 2 B. & Ald. 164; 1 Chitty, Pr. 209; 4 Comyns, Dig. 64; 5 id. 199. See 30 L. 242; 3 Q. R. 449.

OCCUPATIO (Lat. from occupare, to occupy). A taking possession of a thing which before belonged to nobody, (quod ante nullius est); as of wild beasts and other wild animals, property and persons captured in war, gems and other things found upon the sea-shore, etc. Burrill: Inst. 2. 1. 12, 17, 18.

OCCUPATION. Use or tenure; as, the house is in the occupation of A. B. A trade, business, or mystery; as, the occupation of a printer. See 99 Ill. 506.

A putting out of a man's freehold in time of war. Co. Litt. s. 412. See MILITARY OCCUPATION.

In International Law. The act by a state of taking possession of unoccupied territory (q. v.) under circumstances which indicate an intention to continue in possession, thus acquiring title to the property. Discovery gives merely inchoate title unless followed up by occupation. The possession must be either by persons acting under the authority of the state or if by unauthorized persons their act must be ratified by the state upon whose behalf they acted. Maxey, Int. Law 138, 139. See TERRITORIAL PROPERTY.

OCCUPAVIT (Lat.). In Old Practice. The name of a writ which lies to recover the possession of lands when they have been taken from the possession of the owner by occupation (q. v.).

OCCUPIER. One who is in the enjoyment of a thing.

A tenant, though absent, is, generally speaking, the occupier of premises; 1 B. & C. 178; but not a servant or other person who may be there virtute officii; 26 L. J. C. P. 12; 47 L. J. Ex. 112; L. R. 1 Q. B. 72.

OCCUPY. To hold in possession; to hold or keep for use; as, to occupy an apartment. 107 U. S. 343. In legal acceptance, actual use, possession, and cultivation. 11 Johns. 202; 37 N. J. Eq. 486.

A statute exempting from taxation the property of an institution so long as it is "occupied" by the institution for the purposes of its organization, does not exempt such portions of the property as may be rented out, although the rents may be applied to such purposes. 90 Ky. 409, 14 S. W. 408.

Occupied as a Family Residence. Where a policy of fire insurance describes the house insured as "occupied as a family residence," and by a subsequent clause provides that the policy shall become void if the house shall be or become vacant or unoccupied, the words "occupied as a family residence" must be regarded as but a representation as to the then use of the house, and the subsequent words as but an undertaking by the insured that the house shall not be without an occupant during time covered by the policy. 83 Ky. 468.

OCCUR. To happen. 91 Ill. 95.

"After a loss shall occur," in a policy of insurance, refers to the time when liability becomes fixed, by proofs of loss, etc.,—when the insurer may lawfully be compelled to pay the amount of the loss. Anderson; 77 N. Y. 243.

OCHLOCRACY. A government where the authority is in the hands of the multitude; the abuse of a democracy. Vaumène, Dict. du Langage Politique. Mob rule. See GOVERNMENT.

OCTAVE (Law Lat. utis). In Old English Practice. The eighth day inclusive after a feast. 3 Bla. Com. 277.

OCTO TALES (Lat. eight such). If, when a trial at bar is called on, the number of jurors in attendance is too small, the trial must be adjourned, and a decem or octo tales awarded, according to the number deficient; as, at common law, namely, a writ to the sheriff to summon eight more such men as were originally summoned. 3 Bla. Com. 364.

OCTROI. In Old French Law. Originally, a duty, which, by the permission of the seigneur, any city was accustomed to collect on liquors and some other goods, brought within its precincts, for the consumption of the inhabitants. Afterwards appropriated to the use of the king. Burrill; Steph. Lect. 361.

ODIO ET ATIA. See DE ODIO ET ATIA.

OF. The word has been held equivalent to after; 5 Term 283; 10 L. J. Q. B. 10; at; 3 Taunt. 147; belonging to; 2 B. & S. 708; 38 Ohio St. 506; manufactured by; 3 Bing. N. C. 668; by; 107 Mass. 355; residing at; 3 Wend. 329; 8 A. & E. 232.

In the expression "bounded north of the heirs of A," held to mean by. Anderson; 107 Mass. 361. The infirmity "of" a county is equivalent to "the property of" or "belonging to" the county. Id.; 38 Ohio St. 506. Entered "of record" means upon a record or records. Id. "Of force" means of binding force, obligatory although possibly not enforced. Id., 1 Paine 336.

OF COUNSEL. A phrase commonly applied in practice to the counsel employed by a party in a cause.

OF COURSE. That which may be done in the course of legal proceedings without making any application to the court; that which is granted by the court, without further inquiry, upon its being asked; as, a rule to plead is a matter of course.

OFFENCE. In Criminal Law. The doing that which a penal law forbids to be done, or omitting to do what it commands. In this sense, it is nearly synonymous with crime. In a more confined sense, it may be considered as having the same meaning with misdemeanor; but it differs from it in this, that it is not indictable, but punishable summarily by the forfeiture of a penalty; 1 Chitty, Pr. 14.

OFFENDING PARTY. Where a policy provides that insured shall not recover if he is killed in a quarrel in which he is the "offending party" insured is the "offending party" if he brings on a difficulty that ends in his death by assaulting the person who kills him unless he has reason to believe he was acting in self-defense. 156 Ky. 271, 160 S. W. 1043.

OFFENSE. See QUASI-CRIMES.

OFFER. A proposal to do a thing.

An offer, as an element of a contract, is a proposal to make a contract. It must be made by the person who is to make the promise, and it must be made to the person to whom the promise is made. It may be made either by words or by signs, either orally or in writing, and either personally or by a messenger; but in whatever way it is made, it is not in law an offer until it comes to the knowledge of the person to whom it is made; Langd. Contr. § 151; 6 H. L. Cas. 112. While an offer remains in force, it confers upon the offeree the power to convert it into a promise by accepting it. The offeror may state how long it shall remain in force; and it will then remain in force during the time so stated, unless sooner revoked; 3 Cush. 224. In the absence of any specification by the offeror, an offer will remain in force a reasonable time unless sooner revoked; Leake, Contr. 38; 119 U. S. 151. As to what will be a reasonable time, no uniform positive rule can be laid down. When an offer is made personally, it will prima facie continue until the interview or negotiation terminates, and longer; 6 Wend. 103. In commercial transactions, when an offer is made by mail, the general rule is that the offeror is entitled to an answer by return mail; but this will not apply in all cases, e. g. when there are several mails each day. In transactions which are not commercial, much less promptitude in answering is required; Langd. Contr. § 152.

Where the offer contemplates a unilateral contract, the length of time that the offer will continue in force depends upon different considerations. The question is no longer one of accepting the offer orally or by letter, but of performing the consideration. The duration of such an offer, therefore, in the absence of any express limitation, will be measured by the length of time which may be reasonably required for the performance of the consideration. When performance of the consideration has been begun in good faith, it seems that the offer will continue, in the absence of actual revocation, until the performance is either completed or abandoned, especially when the performance of the consideration is constantly within the knowledge of the offeror; Langd. Contr. § 155. An offer which contains no stipulation as to how long it shall continue is revocable at any moment. A stipulation that an offer shall remain open for a specified time must be supported by a sufficient consideration, or be contained in an instrument under seal, in order to be binding; Langd. Contr. § 178; 3 Term 653. When thus made binding, the offer is not irrevocable, but the only effect is to give the offeror a claim for damages if the stipulation be broken by revoking the offer. When an offer is made for a time limited in the offer itself, no acceptance afterwards will make it binding; an offer which in its terms limits the time of acceptance is withdrawn by the expiration of the time; 144 U. S. 394.

As an offer can only be made by communication from the offeror to the offeree, so it can only be revoked in the same manner. But the death or insanity of the offeror during the pendency of the offer, revokes it; Langd. Contr. § 180.

An offer can only be accepted in the terms in which it is made; an acceptance, therefore, which modifies the offer in any particular, goes for nothing; L. R. 7 Ch. App. 587; 119 U. S. 151. The other party having once rejected the offer, cannot afterwards revive it by tendering an acceptance of it; 4 Wheat. 225; 14 Pet. 77; 101 U. S. 50; 119 id. 151.

A mere proposal to sell may be revoked at any time before acceptance; 45 La. Ann. 214. Where an offer of sale of land stands for twenty years, and until after the death of the party to whom it is made, without compliance with its terms, the widow and sole devisee of such party cannot accept the proposition, and offer to perform it, and thereby make a contract binding on the proposer; 51 Fed. Rep. 860.

A man may change his mind at any time, if it is not to the injury of another; he may, therefore, revoke or recall his offers at any time before they have been accepted; and, in order to deprive him of this right, the offer must have been accepted on the terms in which it was made; 10 Ves. 458; 2 C. & P. 558. See ANS. CONTR. 81.

Any qualification of, or departure from, those terms invalidates the offer, unless the same be agreed to by the party who made it; 4 Wheat. 225; 3 Johns. 534; 7 id. 470; 6 Wend. 103; Poll. Contr. 38; i. e. there is no contract entered into.

When the offer has been made, the party is presumed to be willing to enter into the contract for the time limited, and, if the time be not fixed by the offer, then until it be expressly revoked or rendered nugatory by a contrary presumption; 6 Wend. 103. See 8 S. & R. 243; 1 Pick. 278; 10 id. 326; 12 Johns. 190; 9 Port. Ala. 605; 33 Neb. 460; 35 W. Va. 463; 1 Bell, Com. 326; Pothier, Vente, n. 32. And see ASSENT; BID; LETTER.

An offer must be communicated, but in many classes of contracts it need not be made to an ascertained person: as, auction sales; an offer of a reward (whether the service must have been rendered after knowledge of the offer of a reward is unsettled: see *Ans. Contr. *24*); an advertisement in railroad time-tables; letters of credit; offers to receive subscriptions for stocks or bonds. An offer of a stock of goods for sale on bids is not such an offer that a person who makes the highest bid is entitled to them (L. R. 5 C. P. 561). An offer may be determined:—by lapse of a specified time; by lapse of a reasonable time for accepting; by failure to comply with the terms of the offer as to the mode of acceptance; by the death of either party before acceptance; by revocation before acceptance; Hollingsworth, Contr. 11.

OFFERINGS. See OBVENTIO.

OFFICE. A right to exercise a public function or employment, and to take the fees and emoluments belonging to it. Shelf. Mortm. 797; Cruise, Dig. Index; 3 S. & R. 149. An office is a public charge or employment; 2 Brock. 102, per Marshall, C. J. An office may exist without an incumbent: 28 Cal. 382.

Judicial offices are those which relate to the administration of justice, and which should be exercised by persons of sufficient skill and experience in the duties which appertain to them.

Military offices are such as are held by soldiers and sailors for military purposes.

Ministerial offices are those which give the officer no discretion as to the matter to be done, and require him to obey the mandates of a superior. 7 Mass. 280. See 5 Wend. 170; 10 id. 514; 8 Vt. 512; 1 Ill. 280; 12 Ind. 569. It is a general rule that a judicial office cannot be exercised by deputy, while a ministerial may.

Political offices are such as are not connected immediately with the administration of justice or the execution of the mandates of a superior officer: the offices of the president of the United States, of the heads of departments, of the members of the legislature, are of this number.

In the United States, all offices, according to the above definition, are public; but in another sense employments of a private nature are also called offices: for example, the office of president of a bank, the office of director of a corporation. For the incompatibility of office, see INCOMPATIBILITY; OFFICER.

See, generally, 3 Kent 362; MANDAMUS; QUO WARRANTO.

For word "office" as used of a place for transacting public business, see Cush. 181. See, as to tenure of office, R. S. §§ 1767-1775. See RANK; FOREIGN OFFICE; LUCRATIVE OFFICE.

OFFICE-BOOK. A book kept in a public office, not appertaining to a court, authorized by the law of any state.

An exemplification of any such office-book, when authenticated under the act of congress of 27th March, 1804, is to have such faith and credit given to it in every court and office within the United States as such exemplification has by law or usage in the courts or offices of the state from whence the same has been taken. See FOREIGN LAWS; FOREIGN JUDGMENT.

OFFICE-COPY. A transcript of a record or proceeding filed in an office established by law, certified under the seal of the proper officer.

A copy made by an officer of the court, bound by law to make it, is equivalent to an exemplification, though it is sometimes called an "office copy"; Steph. Dig. Ev. Art. 77. Copies of public records, whether judicial or otherwise, made by a public officer authorized by law to make them, are often termed "office copies," e. g. copies of recorded deeds; 74 Me. 127.

A copy made by an officer of the court, who is authorized to make it by a rule of court, but not required by law to make it, is equivalent to an exemplification in the same cause and court, but in other causes or courts is not admissible unless it can be proved as an examined copy; Steph. Dig. Ev. Art. 78. These are called "office copies"; 6 Barb. 130. Office copies are said to be secondary evidence; Steph. Dig. Ev.

OFFICE FOUND. In English Law. When an inquisition is made to the king's use of anything, by virtue of office of him who inquires, and the inquisition is found, it is said to be office found. See 100 U. S. 212, 484; INQUEST OF OFFICE.

OFFICE GRANT. See GRANT.

OFFICE OF A JUDGE. In English Law. A criminal suit in an ecclesiastical court, not being directed to the reparation of a private injury, is regarded as a proceeding emanating from the office of the judge, and may be instituted by the mere motion of the judge. But in practice these suits are instituted by private individuals, with the permission of the judge or his surrogate; and the private prosecutor in any such case is, accordingly, said to promote the office of the judge. Cooté's Eccl. Practice; Moz. & W.

OFFICER. One who is lawfully invested with an office.

An office is a public charge or employment; and one who performs the duties of an office is an officer. Marshall, C. J., in 2 Brock. 102.

Executive officers are those whose duties are mainly to cause the laws to be executed.

Legislative officers are those whose duties relate mainly to the enactment of laws, such as members of congress and of the several state legislatures. These officers are confined in their duties by the constitution generally to make laws, though sometimes, in cases of impeachment, one of the houses of the legislature exercises judicial functions somewhat similar to those of a grand jury, by presenting to the other articles of impeachment, and the other house acts as a court in trying such impeachment.

Judicial officers are those whose duties are to decide controversies between individuals, and accusations made in the name of the public against persons charged with violations of the law.

Ministerial officers are those whose duty it is to execute the mandates, lawfully issued, of their superiors.

Military officers are those who have command in the army. Non-commissioned officers are not officers in the sense in which that word is generally used; 16 Ct. Cls. 214.

Naval officers are those who are in command in the navy.

Officers are also divided into public officers and those who are not public. Some officers may bear both characters: for example, a clergyman is a public officer when he acts in the performance of such a public duty as the marriage of two individuals; 4 Conn. 209; and he is merely a private person when he acts in his more ordinary calling of teaching his congregation. See 4 Conn. 134; 18 Me. 155.

Officers are required to exercise the functions which belong to their respective offices. The neglect to do so may in some cases, subject the offender to an indictment; 1 Yeates 519; and in others he will be liable to the party injured; 1

Public office in the constitution means a permanent public trust or employment, not merely transient, occasional, or incidental; 71 N. Y. 238. The term embraces the ideas of tenure, duration, emoluments, and duties; 6 Wall. 385; but it has been held that duration and salary are not of the essence of public office, and that the duty of acting for and on behalf of the state constitutes an office; 68 N. C. 497; even though it expires as soon as a single act is done; 66 N. C. 59. The true test is that it is a parcel of the administration of government; 96 N. C. 241; though it is a clerkship in a department and the duties are confined within narrow limits; 8 Cal. 39; the term includes all persons in any public station or employment conferred by government; id. 39. It is said to depend upon the greater importance and dignity of the position; the requirement of an oath and perhaps of a bond, and usually upon the tenure; 40 Mich. 873. Officers of the United States are those nominated by the president and confirmed by the senate or those who are appointed under an act of congress, by the president alone, a court of law, or a head of a department; 99 U. S. 508; see 124 U. S. 303. The notification of the secretary of the navy is a valid appointment as a passed assistant surgeon; 95 U. S. 702. It is generally true that a relation arising out of a contract and dependent for its duration and extent upon the terms thereof is never considered an office; 36 Miss. 273; 2 Brock. 102. Not every employment under the government is an office; 2 Brock. 96. The distinction between officer and placeman is that the former must take an oath of office, the latter not; 63 N. C. 199.

Who are officers. The following have been held to be officers: All persons entrusted with the receipt of public money; 74 Pa. 124; the receiver of a national bank; 2 Ben. 303; clerks in an executive department of the federal government; 10 Ct. Cl. 426; a collector of city taxes, within the bankruptcy act of 1841; 7 Metc. 152; a representative in a state legislature; 2 N. H. 246 (see infra); members of the boards of public safety and public works; secretaries of such boards; assistant bailiff of the police court; and the stenographer of the said court, within the meaning of a constitutional provision that the salaries of public officers shall be neither increased nor diminished during their term of office; 86 S. W. Rep. (Kan.) 944; a notary public, within the meaning of a constitutional provision that any public officer who shall travel on a free pass shall forfeit his office; 82 N. Y. Supp. 108, affirmed in 145 N. Y. 434; a representative in congress; 77 N. Y. 503; a selectman; 53 N. H. 610; the president of a city council; 45 Ohio St. 196; a city superintendent of streets; 106 Mo. 488; an assistant of the board of aldermen; 3 Hun 680; a deputy county clerk; 89 N. J. Eq. 126; a county solicitor duly elected; 128 Pa. 48; a notary public; 15 Ala. 72; a passed assistant surgeon in the navy; 95 U. S. 760; a cadet engineer, a graduate of the naval academy; 118 U. S. 483; a clerk appointed by an assistant treasurer; 6 Wall. 385; a postmaster; 22 Cal. 886; judges and members of a state senate and house and state directors in corporations; 66 N. C. 59; justices of the peace; 73 Cal. 487; attendants of courts; 83 N. Y. 872; a marshal of the United States; 4 Woods 592; a deputy marshal; 17 Fed. Rep. 150; a sheriff; 63 N. C. 199; 39 Conn. 109; a deputy state treasurer; 41 Ia. 589; an additional paymaster in the army; 6 Wall. 244; trustees of the state university and directors of a state institution for the deaf and dumb, penitentiary, etc.; 66 N. C. 487; the superintendent of a county penitentiary; 11 How. Pr. 240; the medical superintendent of a hospital for the insane; 30 Ohio St. 347; trustees of a state library; 90 Cal. 160; a deputy constable; 80 Mo. 869. As to a policeman, see 45 Conn. 191; 30 Hun 396; 113 Pa. 395; a fire marshal; 49 N. Y. S. 1096. See 63 N. C. 9, where a long list of public officers is given.

It has been said that members of the bar are "public officers and ministers of justice." Barn. Ch. 478; see also 22 N. Y. 67 (which gives a very learned argument by Prof. Dwight); 2 Cow. 13; contra, 20 Johns. 492; 7 Porter (Ala.) 298; 24 Cal. 241. An attorney-at-law is not, indeed, in the strictest sense a public officer, but he comes very near it; 181 Mass. 378, citing 6 Md. 18; 7 Wall. 364.

The following have been held not to be officers:—A special deputy sheriff; 41 Ala. 399; a civil surgeon appointed by the commissioner of pensions to examine applicants for pensions; 99 U. S. 508; a lamp inspector; 180 N. Y. 894; a paymaster's clerk in the navy; 124 U. S. 303; a United States agent of fortifications; 2 Brock. 102; the keeper of a county jail; 59 Fed. Rep. 599; the chief clerk in a city assessor's office; 40 Mich. 673; a mail carrier; 17 Gratt. 243 (contra, 13 Ohio 523); an agent appointed by a state to receive an extradited person; 111 U. S. 624; patrolmen on the police force of a city; 30 Hun 396 (semble); firemen of cities and villages; 82 N. Y. 377; 57 Ohio St. 15; a pilot; 66 Ga. 503; a night watchman of a post-office building; 89 N. C. 133; members of the legislature; 63 N. C. 189. Nine-tenths of the employees of the United States government are said not to be officers; 99 U. S. 509. County commissioners are not officers for the purpose of impeachment; 167 Mass. 559.

See on this subject, 17 L. R. A. 248. Public officers are public agents or trustees and have no proprietary interest or property in their office beyond the lawful term and salary (if any) prescribed. Their official rights and duties may be changed at the discretion of the legislature during their term of office; R. M. Charl. 397; but it has been held that a clerk's office, to be held during good behavior, and many other public offices are, under certain limitations, the subject of property; 4 Dev. (N. C.) 18; the emoluments are private property; id.

The profits of a public office cannot be assigned for the benefit of creditors; 8 Cl. & F. 295.

The buying and selling of offices was forbidden by 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 15, under which it has been held that an officer having a certain salary or certain annual profits may make a deputation of it, reserving a sum not exceeding the amount of his profits, or the deputy may lawfully agree to pay so much out of the uncertain fees of an office; but if the office have uncertain fees or profits, an agreement by the deputy to pay a fixed sum annually is a sale within the statute; and so is an agreement to give the deputy all the profits; 3 Kent 456; see 9 Wend. 173.

An agreement by an applicant for an office to divide the fees with another applicant if the latter withdraw his application for it, is void; 4 Comst. 449; so is a contract for the sale of an office; 51 Mich. 524; whether made by the appointing power or the incumbent; 18 Ind. 890. An agreement for compensation for procuring the appointment or resignation of a public officer is void; 20 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 733. So is the sale by the owners of a vessel of the position of master; 2 B. & C. 661; and the promises of a stockholder that he will secure to the buyer of his stock the office of treasurer; 120 Mass. 501.

The tenure of office is never more permanent than during good behavior; 3 Kent 454; if not protected by the constitution, it may be changed by the legislature; 163 Pa. 284; but its term cannot be extended when fixed by the constitution; 44 Ohio St. 589. In England, servants of the crown, civil as well as military, except in special cases otherwise provided by law, hold their office only during the pleasure of the crown; [1896] 1 Q. B. 116, 121.

When an officer is protected in his office from removal, except for cause to be ascertained and adjudged upon a hearing of a judicial nature, his removal without such hearing is contrary to law, although at such hearing as was held he made no objection; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1841 (Ct. of App. N. Y.).

The right to appoint to a public office, when no term of office is fixed by law, carries with it as an incident the absolute power of removal at any time, without notice or charges or hearing; 66 N. W. Rep. (N. D.) 284.

The suspension of an officer by the governor does not deny him the equal protection of the laws because the governor refuses to produce to him the evidence against him, or to confront him with his accusers. He is not entitled to a jury trial; 169 U. S. 596.

An officer cannot be removed from office during his second term for a violation of duty committed during his first term; 40 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 485.

The power to remove a corporate officer for reasonable and just cause is one of the common-law incidents of all corporations; Dill. Mun. Corp. § 179; 89 N. C. 187; but not for pre-existing cause affecting his capacity to hold the office; id.

The act of a de facto officer is binding on the public; 159 U. S. 596. Persons coming into a public office to transact business, who find a person in charge of it, are not bound to ascertain his authority so to act. To them he is an officer de facto, and so far as they are concerned, de jure; 164 U. S. 657; though there was no power to appoint him; 37 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 732. A municipal corporation who has paid a salary to a de facto officer who has performed the duties of an office while the right to it was in litigation, cannot be held liable therefor again to one who may thereafter establish his title to the office; 68 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 308; the remedy is against the de facto officer; id.; 20 Kan. 296. See 68 N. Y. 379; but see 12 Heisk. 499; 53 Ill. 428; 28 Cal. 21. It is no defence to a prosecution for bribery that the act under which the officer was bribed was unconstitutional; 42 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 909. See DE FACTO.

Where the settlement of a question involves the exercise of discretion and judgment, the duty is not ministerial and is beyond the review of the judicial department; 37 U. S. App. 71.

A town collector is responsible as a debtor and not merely as a bailee; 1 Den. 233. It is the policy of public laws to hold all receivers of public money to a very strict accountability; 15 Wall. 346. The obligation to keep safely the public money was said to be absolute, without any condition express or implied; 3 How. 587; but this was considered in 15 Wall. 347, as being too generally expressed, the court intimating there that loss of funds under special circumstances, as by an earthquake, would probably exonerate the official. In the same case it was said that it appears from all the cases (except that in 1 Den. 233) that the official bond of an officer is regarded as laying the foundation of a more stringent responsibility; but the court held that the forcible seizure by the rebel authorities in 1861 of public moneys in the hands of a loyal government agent, against his will and without fault on his part, was a discharge from his obligation in reference to such moneys, three judges dissenting.

The responsibility of a public officer is determined, not by the law of bailment, but by the condition of his bond; 3 Pa. 372.

Where public money is lost by the failure of a bank; 34 S. W. Rep. (Tenn.) 427; (contra, 151 N. Y. 185;) or a city treasurer is robbed; 113 Cal. 205; (contra, 44 Minn. 427;) the official being free from fault is not liable; but in 44 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 125, an officer was held liable for the safety of public moneys, lost in an insolvent bank, even though he was not negligent; and in New York the liability is very strictly maintained; 151 N. Y. 185. The weight of authority seems to be in favor of a strict accountability; 48 Neb. 1; 14 Wash. 117.

Where a subordinate officer takes the place of his superior in the case of death or disability, he is entitled to the same salary; 45 Pac. Rep. (Nev.) 243.

There is no federal statute expressly bearing upon removals from office, except § 13 of the act of January 16, 1893—the Civil Service Act, relating to removal, etc., by reason of giving or refusing political contributions. The civil service rules of the executive are but regulations imposed by him upon his own actions or those of heads of departments, and do not confer upon an employee any property right in his office; 84 Fed. Rep. 551. Y. 390; 84 Fed. Rep. 554; and it is said that equity will protect the position of officers de facto against the interference of adverse claimants; High, Inj. § 1315; as by enjoining the dispossession of an officer, by force and unlawfully, and compelling the defendant to resort to a remedy at law; 84 Fed. OHIO. One of the states of the American Union.

Massachusetts, Connecticut and Virginia claimed, under their respective charters, the territory lying northwest of the river Ohio. At the solicitation of the continental congress, these claims were, soon after the close of the war of independence, ceded to the United States. Virginia, however, reserved the ownership of the soil of three million seven hundred thousand acres between the Scioto and the Little Miami rivers, for military bounties to the soldiers of her line who had served in the revolutionary war; and Connecticut reserved three million six hundred and sixty six thousand acres in northern Ohio, now usually called the "Western Reserve." The history of these reservations, and of the several "purchases" under which land-titles have been acquired in various parts of the state, will be found in Abbe's Annals of the West, in the Preliminary Sketch of the History of Ohio, in the first volume of Chase's Statutes of Ohio, and in Swan's Land Laws of Ohio. The conflicting titles of the states having been extinguished, congress, on July 13, 1787, passed the celebrated ordinance for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio. 1 Curw. Rev. Stat. of Ohio 8. It provided for the equal distribution of the estates of the deceased among their children, gave the widow dower as at common law, regulated the execution of wills and deeds, secured perfect religious toleration, the right of trial by jury, judicial proceedings according to the course of the common law, the benefits of the writ of habeas corpus, security against cruel and unusual punishments, the right of reasonable bail, the inviolability of contracts and of private property, and declared that "there shall be neither slavery nor involuntary servitude in the said territory, otherwise than in the punishment of crimes whereof the party shall have been duly convicted."

These provisions have been, in substance, incorporated into the constitution and laws of Ohio, as well as of the other states which have since been formed within "the territory." The ordinance has been held to be a mere temporary statute, which was superseded by the adoption of the constitution of the United States. 1 McLean 530; 3 id. 226; 8 How. 212, 589; 10 id. 82, 232. See ORDINANCE OF 1787.

On the 30th of October, 1802, congress passed an act making provision for the formation of a state constitution, under which, in 1803, Ohio was admitted into the Union, under the name of the State of Ohio. This constitution was never submitted to a vote of the people. It continued to be the organic law of Ohio until September 1, 1801 when it was abrogated by the adoption of the present constitution.

The bill of rights which forms a part of this constitution contains the provisions common to such instruments in the constitutions of the different states. Such are the prohibitions against any laws impairing the right of peaceably assembling to consult for the common good, to bear arms, to have a speedy jury, to worship according to the dictates of one's own conscience, to have the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, to be allowed reasonable bail, to be exempt from excessive fines and cruel and unusual punishment, not to be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on presentment or indictment of a grand jury, to have a copy of the indictment, the aid of counsel, compulsory process for witnesses, a speedy and public trial, to be privileged from testifying against one's self, or from being twice put in jeopardy for the same offence. Provision is also made against the existence of slavery, against transporting offenders out of the state, against imprisonment for debt unless in cases of fraud, against granting hereditary honors, against quartering soldiers in private houses, for the security of persons from unreasonable arrest or searches, and for the freedom of speech and the press.

OIL. Petroleum or rock oil is a mineral substance obtained from the earth by process of mining, and the land from which it is obtained is called mining land; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 399; 110 Pa. 313. It is a part of the realty; id.; 88 Pa. 198. But it is held that a reservation of "all timber suitable for sawing, also all minerals," will not include petroleum, the ordinary meaning of the word mineral overcoming the technical meaning; 101 Pa. 36.

A property owner has a right to drill for oil through a stratum of coal belonging to another; 132 Pa. 286. A contract giving the right to explore for oil, and if any be found, to sink wells, is a license only; 55 Pa. 164. A lease of land with the right to bore for oil is a lease and not a sale of the oil; 129 Pa. 94.

Oil produced from wells on lands leased for oil purposes during the owner's life is income: 188 Pa. 606. Where a life tenant united with a remainder-man in a leasing new oil territory, the court appointed a trustee to hold and invest the royalties and pay the income to the life tenant, and at her death, the principal to the remainder-man: 174 Pa. 425. A life tenant cannot lease new oil territory, never operated before her title accrued: 179 Pa. 371.

When oil reaches a well and is produced at the surface, it becomes personal property: 49 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 399. As to whether one holding oil on storage who converts it to his use is guilty of larceny as bailee, see 82 Pa. 472.

See Bryan, Petroleum and Natural Gas; as to oil leases, see 31 L. R. A. 678; as to liability for rent on oil leases, see 38 L. R. A. 847; as to assignment of an oil lease, see 34 L. R. A. 63. See NATURAL GAS; EMINENT DOMAIN; PIPE LINES; MINES AND MINING; WASTE.

OKLAHOMA. The name of one of the states of the United States of America.

OLD BAILY SESSIONS. From time immemorial these sessions had exercised criminal jurisdiction over approximately the same area as that now within the jurisdiction of the Central Criminal Court of England, which was substituted for it by the Central Criminal Court Act, 1834. BYRNE. See CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT.

OLD CODE. A code which came into operation under Justinian on April 7, 529, and came into force six weeks later. Justinian, on February 13 of the preceding year, had appointed a commission of ten jurists and others to consolidate into a single code the Gregorian, Hermogenian, and Theodosian codes, and the novels of the emperors subsequent to A. D. 438. They were instructed, "suppressing preambles, repetitions, contradictory and disused clauses, to collect and classify the laws under proper titles, adding, cutting down, modifying, compressing, if need be, several constitutions into a single enactment, so as to render the sense more clear, and yet preserve in each title the chronological order, so that this order may be noted by position in the code as well as by date." The work was divided into twelve books. Hunter, Rom. L. 90. See NEW CODE.

OLD-LINE MUTUAL COMPANY. See INSURANCE, Assessment Insurance.

OLD-LINE POLICIES. See INSURANCE, Assessment Insurance.

OLD NATURA BREVIVM. The title of an English book, so called to distinguish it from Fitzherbert's work entitled Natura Brevium. It contains the writs most in use in the reign of Edward III., together with a short comment on the application and properties of each of them.

OLD STYLE. The mode of reckoning time in England until the year 1752, when the New Style, at present in use, and which had prevailed in the Roman Catholic countries of the continent since 1582, was introduced. According to the O. S., the year commenced on the 25th of March and every fourth year was a leap-year, instead of, as now, but 97 leap years in 400 years; Moz. & W.

OLD TENURES. The title of a small tract, which, as its title denotes, contains an account of the various tenures by which land was holden in the reign of Edward III. This tract was published in 1719, with notes and additions, with the eleventh edition of the First Institutes, and reprinted in 8vo in 1764, by Sergeant Hawkins, in a selection of Coke's Law Tracts.

OLEOMARGARINE. Artificial butter made out of animal fat, milk, and other substances; imitation butter. Anderson's L. Dict.

Oleomargarine is a recognized article of food and commerce, and being thus a lawful article of commerce it cannot be wholly excluded from importation into a state from another state where it was manufactured, though the former state may so regulate the introduction as to insure purity, without having the power totally to exclude it: 171 U. S. 1.

The New Hampshire Act prohibiting the sale of oleomargarine unless it is of a pink color is invalid as being, in necessary effect, prohibitory. The act is not an inspection law, it provides for no inspection, and apparently none was intended. It is an absolute prohibition of the sale of an article of commerce; 171 U. S. 80.

The Massachusetts Act of March 10th, 1891, "to prevent deception in the manufacture and sale of imitation butter," in its application to the sales of oleomargarine artificially colored and brought into Massachusetts, is in conflict with the commerce clause of the federal constitution; 155 U. S. 461.

The legislature of a state has the power to determine, as a matter of state policy, whether to permit the manufacture and sale of oleomargarine within the state or entirely to forbid the same, so long as the legislation is confined to the manufacture and sale within the state; 127 U. S. 678, explained in 171 U. S. 16.

Under its taxing power and in connection with the internal revenue system, congress has passed a law defining butter and oleomargarine and imposing a tax upon and regulating the sale, etc., of oleomargarine. See 144 U. S. 677.

In many of the states the manufacture and sale of this substance are prohibited by statute, unless made in a specified form and in such manner as will inform the buyer as to its real character.

In England, all packages must be marked, as must each parcel exposed for sale. See [1895] 2 Q. B. 667.

See ORIGINAL PACKAGE.

OLERON, LAWS OF. See CODE.

OLIGARCHY (Gr. ὀλιγος and ἀρχή. The government of a few). A name given to designate the power which a few citizens of a state have usurped, which ought by the constitution to reside in the people. Among the Romans, the government degenerated several times into an oligarchy,—for example, under the decemvirs, when they became the only magistrates in the commonwealth. See GOVERNMENT.

OLOGRAPH. A term which signifies that an instrument is wholly written by the party. See La. Civ. Code, art. 1581; Code Civ. 970; 5 Toullier, n. 357; 1 Stu. Low. C. 327. See TESTAMENT; WILL; Beach, Wills 16.

OMISSION. The neglect to perform what the law requires.

When a public law enjoins on certain officers duties to be performed by them for the public, and they omit to perform them, they may be indicted: for example, supervisors of the highways are required to repair the public roads: the neglect to do so will render them liable to be indicted.

When a nuisance arises in consequence of an omission, it cannot be abated, if it be a private nuisance, without giving notice, when such notice can be given. See COMMISSION; NUISANCE.

OMITTED PROPERTY. Property which is not assessed at all; but property which by mistake has been apportioned to the wrong subdivision or municipality may not be treated as "omitted property" by the county or subdivision where it should have been assessed. 154 Ky. 673, 159 S. W. 538.

J. Marshall (Ky.) 156.

ON BEHALF. Where security is to be given on behalf of a person it cannot be given by the person himself. L. R. 4 C. P. 235.

ON BOARD. A devise of goods on board a ship may pass goods on board at the date of the will, but afterwards removed. 1 Ves. Sen. 271.

ON CALL. There is no legal difference between an obligation payable "on demand" and one payable "on call." 22 Gratt. 609.

ON CONDITION. "On condition" was interpreted as meaning a covenant or agreement. 211 U. S. 582.

ON DEMAND. A promissory note payable on demand is a present debt and is payable without demand. 39 Me. 494. It is payable the instant the note is signed; no demand is necessary prior to bringing an action; 2 M. & W. 481; 29 L. J. Ex. 377; 34 Ch. D. 568.

ON DUTY. As used in the Sixteen Hour Law of 1907 means "to be actually engaged in work or to be charged with present responsibility for such should the occasion for it arise." 197 Fed. 629. See SIXTEEN HOUR LAW.

For one to be "on duty" means that he must be in a position and in condition to see and hear that he exercise the same degree of care and diligence that an ordinarily prudent person would exercise. 163 Ky 146, 173 S. W. 373.

ON STAND. A term used in the law of landlord and tenant. A tenant of a farm who cannot carry away manure but has the right to sell it to his successor, is said to have the right of on stand on the farm for it till he can sell it; he may maintain trespass for the taking of it by the

ONUS IMPORTANDI. The charge of importing merchandise, mentioned in 12 Car. II. c. 28.

ONUS PROBANDI (Lat.). In Evidence. The burden of proof.

It is a general rule that the party who alleges the affirmative of any proposition shall prove it. It is also a general rule that the onus probandi lies upon the party who seeks to support his case by a particular fact; for example, when to a plea of infancy the plaintiff replies a promise after the defendant had attained his age, it is sufficient for the plaintiff to prove the promise, and it lies on the defendant to show that he was not of age at the time; 1 Term 648. But where the negative involves a criminal omission by the party, and, consequently, where the law, by virtue of the general principle, presumes his innocence, the affirmative of the fact is also presumed. See 11 Johns. 513; 19 id. 345; 9 Mart. La. 48; 3 Mart. La. n. s. 576. The burden of proof of the want of mental capacity of a person at the time of his marriage is on those asserting it, in the absence of proof of a confirmed condition of lunacy or idiocy prior to such marriage; 159 Pa. 684.

In general, wherever the law presumes the affirmative, it lies on the party who denies the fact to prove the negative; as when the law raises a presumption as to the continuance of life, the legitimacy of children born in wedlock, or the satisfaction of a debt. See, generally, 1 Phil. Ev.

Ev. 353. As to shifting of burden of proof, see, generally, 44 La. Ann. 1043; 44 Mo. App. 141; 90 Tenn. 688.

The party on whom the onus probandi lies is entitled to begin, notwithstanding the technical form of the proceedings; 1 Stark. Ev. 584. See BURDEN OF PROOF; OPENING AND CLOSING; NEGATIVE.

OOPHORECTOMY. Ovariectomy. The removal of one or both of the ovaries. Webster.

OPEN. To begin. He begins or opens who has the affirmative of an issue. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 74.

To open a case is to make a statement of the pleadings in a case, which is called the opening. This should be concise, very distinct, and perspicuous. Its use is to enable the judge and jury to direct their attention to the real merits of the case and the points in issue; 1 Stark. 439; 2 id. 317.

To vacate; to relieve a party who has an equitable right to such relief against a proceeding which is to him a formal or legal bar; to allow a re-discussion on the merits.

For example, to open a rule of court. 2 Chitty, Bail 285; 5 Taunt. 628; 1 Mann. & G. 555; 7 Ad. & E. 519. To open a judgment or default; 4 R. I. 824; 1 Wisc. 631. See OPENING A JUDGMENT. To open an account: to make a judicial announcement, that a party, e. g. an executor, shall not be absolutely bound by the account he has rendered, but may show that it contains errors to his prejudice. To open a marriage settlement or an estate-tail; i. e. to allow a new settlement of the estate. To open biddings; i. e. to allow a re-sale. See OPENING BIDDINGS. To open a contract; 44 Me. 206; a highway; 37 N. J. L. 14.

OPEN ACCOUNT. A running or unsettled account; not completely settled, but subject to future adjustment. 1 Ala. 62; 6 id. 438; 21 La. Ann. 406; 1 Ga. 275; 18 Oregon 414.

OPEN FOR BUSINESS. A store is open for business when, according to custom, the door is locked after dark, but customers can get in by knocking. 15 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 1034. See INSURANCE.

OPEN COMMISSION. A commission without written interrogatories issued out of any one of certain courts of record, an issue of fact having been joined in that court, to take the testimony of witnesses, not within the state, but within the United States and Canada; N. Y. Code Civ. Proc. § 893, 894, 897. The application for an open commission will be denied where there is reason to believe that a commission with interrogatories will develop all the facts bearing upon the case. 17 Weekly Dig. (N. Y.) 17.

OPEN COURT. A court formally opened and engaged in the transaction of all judicial functions. 45 Ia. 501.

A court to which all persons have free access as spectators while they conduct themselves in an orderly manner.

The term is used in the first sense as distinguishing a court from a judge sitting in chambers or informally for the transaction of such matters as may be thus transacted. See CHAMBERS; COURT.

In the second sense, all courts in the United States are open; but in England, formerly, while the parties and probably their witnesses were admitted freely in the courts, all other persons were required to pay in order to obtain admittance. Stat. 18 Edw. I. c. 42, 44; Barr on the Stat. 129, 127. See Prin. of Pen. Law 165.

In a trial for criminal assault, the court, in the interest of public morality and to prevent undue publicity, ordered the exclusion of all persons not connected by ties of friendship or blood with the accused or complaining witnesses. Newspaper reporters were also permitted to remain. It was held that the constitutional requirements of a public trial must be interpreted in the broadest sense, and that any restriction of the public's right to be present rendered the trial illegal; Mich. Sup. Ct. 1897, 55 Alb. L. J. 429.

In most of the states the constitution provides that persons accused shall have a speedy public trial; Stimson, Am. Stat. L. § 131. This has been construed to mean that "the doors of the court-room are expected to be kept open, the public are entitled to be admitted, and the trial is to be public in all respects . . . with due regard to the size of the court-room and the conveniences of the court, the right to exclude objectionable characters and youth of tender years, and to do other things which may facilitate the proper conduct of the trial;" 103 Cal. 242; in this case a conviction of assault with intent to commit rape was reversed because against defendant's objection all persons were excluded except the officers of the court and the defendant; id. See 65 Cal. 223. In a trial of a civil case of trespass for adultery the judgment was reversed because all but parties and witnesses were excluded; 86 Me. 80.

Judge Cooley says that the requirement of a public trial is for the benefit of the accused, but it is fairly met if a reasonable number are admitted; Const. Lim. 812.

In California the court may direct the trial of issues of fact in private; Cal. Code, C. P. § 125; but this act does not authorize the court to forbid the publication of the testimony, and when such an order was made judgment of guilty of contempt against a newspaper publisher was reversed; 90 Cal. 526. On a trial for assault with intent to kill, the court-room was cleared and all persons excluded except officers of the court, press reporters, and friends of defendant; the order was made on behalf of defendant, who was liable to be excited by a crowd, as well as to preserve order, and it was held that her right to a public trial was not violated; 14 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 849.

See 15 Am. L. Rev. 427; 89 Mich. 276; S. C. 28 Am. St. R. 294, where the subject is fully discussed. See IN CAMERA.

OPEN A CREDIT. To accept or pay the draft of a correspondent who has not furnished funds. Pardessus, n. 296.

OPEN ENTRY. See ENTRY.

OPEN INSOLVENCY. The condition of a person having no property, within the reach of the law, applicable to the payment of any debt. 8 Blackf. 305.

OPEN LAW. The waging of law. Magna Charta, c. 21.

OPEN POLICY. An open policy is one in which the amount of the interest of the insured is not fixed by the policy, and is to be ascertained in case of loss. See POLICY. See RUNNING POLICY.

OPENING. In American Practice. The beginning. The commencement. The first address of the counsel.

The opening is made immediately upon the impanelling of the jury: it embraces the reading of such of the pleadings as may be necessary, and a brief outline of the case as the party expects to prove it, where there is a trial, or of the argument, where it is addressed to the court.

OPENING BIDDINGS. Ordering a re-sale. When estates are sold under decree of equity to the highest bidder, the court will, on notice of an offer of a sufficient advance on the price obtained, open the biddings, i. e. order a re-sale. But this will not generally be done after the confirmation of the certificate of the highest bidder. So, by analogy, a re-sale has been ordered of an estate sold under bankruptcy. Sugd. Vend. 80; 22 Barb. 167; 8 Md. 822; 18 Gratt. 639; 4 Wisc. 242; 31 Miss. 514.

In England, by stat. 30 & 31 Vict. c. 48, s. 7, the opening of biddings is now allowed only in cases of fraud or misconduct in the sale; Wms. R. P. The courts of this country also will not generally open the biddings merely to obtain a higher price, but require irregularity, fraud, or gross inadequacy of price to be shown.

OPENING AND CLOSING. After the evidence is all in, the plaintiff has the privilege of the opening and closing or summing up speeches to the jury; in the closing address he should confine himself to a reply to defendant's speech. It seems doubtful whether it is within the discretion of the court to interfere with this established mode of procedure; at least it should only be done with great caution; 86 Mich. 254; 32 Ohio 234; 8 Daly 61; 16 West. Jur. 18; 56 N. Y. 402; 87 Ky. 410. But in some courts it is the practice for the defendant's counsel to open to the jury, followed by the plaintiff's counsel. See Best's Right to Begin and Reply; TRIAL.

In English Practice. The address made immediately after the evidence is closed. Such address usually states—first, the full extent of the plaintiff's claims, and the circumstances under which they are made, to show that they are just and reasonable; second, at least an outline of the evidence by which those claims are to be established; third, the legal grounds and authorities in favor of the claim or of the proposed evidence; fourth, an anticipation of the expected defence, and statement of the grounds on which it is futile, either in law or justice, and the reasons why it ought to fail. But the court will sometimes restrict counsel from an anticipation of the defence; 3 Chitty, Pr. 881.

OPENING A COMMISSION. See COURTS OF ASSIZE AND NISI PRIUS.

OPENING A JUDGMENT. In Practice. An act of the court by which a judgment is so far annulled that it cannot be executed, although it still retains some qualities of a judgment: as, for example, its binding operation or lien upon the real estate of the defendant.

The opening of the judgment takes place when some person having an interest makes affidavit to facts which, if true, would render the execution of such judgment inequitable. The judgment is opened so as to be in effect an award of a collateral issue to try the facts alleged in the affidavit; 6 W. & S. 493.

The rule to open judgment and let defendant into a defence is peculiar to Pennsylvania practice, and is a clear example of the system of administering equity under common-law forms. By practice it is confined to judgments by default and those entered on warrants of attorney to confess, etc. It was, however, devised in the absence of a court of chancery, as a substitute for a bill in equity, to enjoin proceedings at law; Mitchell's Motions and Rules; 49 Pa. 365; 8 Phila. 553; 2 Watts 879; 6 W. N. C. 484.

OPENING OF A POLICY OF INSURANCE. The question has been made whether, and in what cases, if any, the valuation in a valued policy shall be opened. The valuation, being a part of the agreement of the parties, is not to be set aside as between them in any case. The question is, how shall it be treated where only a part of the subject insured and valued is put at a risk, and also in the settlement of a particular average? and the answer is the same in both cases; viz., when the proportion or rate per centum put at risk or lost is ascertained, the agreed valuation of the whole is to be applied to the part put at risk or the proportion lost, pro rata. 2 Phill. Ins. 1203.

OPENING A RULE. The act of restoring or recalling a rule which has been made absolute to its conditional state, as a rule nisi, so as to re-admit of cause being shown against the rule. Brown.

Thus, when a rule to show cause has been made absolute under a mistaken impression that no counsel had been instructed to show cause against it, it is usual for the party at whose instance the rule was obtained to consent to have the rule opened, by which all the proceedings subsequent to the day when cause ought to have been shown against it are in effect nullified and the rule is then argued in the ordinary way. R. & L. Dict.; Brown.

Opening a rule is where the court allows the propriety of a rule to be again open for argument after it has been made absolute. Where a rule has issued improvidently through a mistake of the officer of the court, or in a case in which the court had no jurisdiction to grant it, the court will allow it to be opened for the purpose of correcting the mistake or discharging the rule; but this will not in general be done on any other ground. Abbott; Lush Pr. (Steph.) 662.

OPERA. See COPYRIGHT.

OPERARI. Such tenants under feudal tenures, as held some portion of land by the duty of performing bodily labor and servile works for their lord.

OPERATING EXPENSES. They are, broadly speaking, those which it is reasonably necessary to incur for the purpose of keeping up a railroad (to which the term is commonly applied) as a going concern, or, as it is sometimes expressed, those which conduce to the conservation of the property. Short, Railw. Bonds § 653.

The term, when used in a reorganization plan, does not include money spent on steel rail betterments, or on steamers owned by the company to make them more efficient, or on the purchase of freight engines and coal cars; 34 Fed. Rep. 582. Under a Massachusetts statute, it was held that damage to property at a railroad crossing must be considered as operating expenses; 124 Mass. 154. See 188 Mass. 122; 124 Mass. 527. Judgments against a receiver for damages to persons by negligence are a part of the operating expenses; 73 Fed. Rep. 112. All outlays made by a receiver in the ordinary course, with a view to advance and promote the business of the road and render it profitable and successful, are fairly within the receiver's discretion; this will include not only keeping the road and rolling stock in repair, but also providing such additional accommodations, stock, and instrumentalities as the necessities of the business may require; 1 Woods 331. The court will authorize the purchase of new rails; 62 Fed. Rep. 771; and the payment of reasonable office rent; 1 Woods 331; and the payment of interest on money which a receiver has been obliged to borrow; id.; and of traffic balances on connecting roads; 64 Ala. 603; and rebates on freight; 1 Woods 331.

Damages paid to the owners of goods lost in transportation and for injury to property during a receivership will be allowed in the receiver's account of earnings; 93 U. S. 352; such claims stand upon the same footing as the other expenses of administration; Short, Railw. Bonds § 669; 62 Miss. 271; 80 N. Y. 458.

Earnings diverted to the payment of interest on receiver's certificates made payable out of the corpus, or to the costs or allowances in the foreclosure suit or any other matter not properly operating expenses, must be returned to the current earnings fund; 25 Fed. Rep. 232. See MORTGAGE; REORGANIZATION.

OPERATION OF LAW. The obligation of law; 1 Cra. C. C. 19; its practical working and effect. 5 Ala. 496. A term applied to indicate the manner in which a party acquires rights without any act of his own: as, the right to an estate of one who dies intestate is cast upon the heir at law, by operation of law; when a lessee for life enfeoffs him in reversion, or when the lessee and lessor join in a feoffment, or when a lessee for life or years accepts a new lease or demise from the lessor, there is a surrender of the first lease by operation of law; 5 B. & C. 269; 9 id. 298; 2 B. & Ad. 119; 5 Taunt. 518. See DESCENT; PURCHASE.

ployed to perform labor for another. See 1 Pa. L. J. 388; 3 C. Rob. 237; 2 Cra. 240, 370. See FACTORY ACTS; MASTER AND SERVANT.

OPERATIVE PART. That part of a conveyance, lease, mortgage or other instrument, which carries out its main object.

Thus, in a conveyance or lease, the operative part consists of the operative words of conveyance or demise and the parcels. Sometimes everything which follows the recitals is called the operative part, for the term has no fixed meaning. (1 Dauids. Conv. 44.) In a mortgage, the operative part consists of (1) the covenant for payment of the mortgage debt; (2) the conveyance of the mortgaged property; and (3) the proviso for reconveyance. R. & L. Dict.; 2 Id. 508 et seq.

OPERATIVE WORDS. In a deed, or lease, the words which effect the transaction of which the instrument is the evidence; the terms generally used in a lease are "demise and lease," but any words clearly indicating an intention of making a present demise will suffice; Fawcett, L. & T. 74; Wms. R. P. 196; Bacon, Abr. (K) 181; see Martindale, Conv. 273.

OPERATOR, OF ELEVATOR. See ELEVATOR.

OPHTHALMOPLÉGIA. See PARALYSIS.

OPINION. In Evidence. An inference or conclusion drawn by a witness as distinguished from facts known to him as facts.

It is the province of the jury to draw inferences and conclusions; and if witnesses were in general allowed to testify what they judge as well as what they know, the verdict would sometimes prove not the decision of the jury, but that of the witnesses. Hence the rule that, in general, the witness cannot be asked his opinion upon a particular question; Tayl. Ev. 1206; 29 N. H. 94; 16 Ill. 513; 18 Ga. 194, 573; 7 Wend. 560; 2 N. Y. 614; 17 id. 340. But while it is incompetent for a witness to state his opinion upon a question of law, where the intent with which an act done by him is drawn in question he may testify as to such intent; 12 Repr. 664.

Some confusion in the application of this rule arises from the delicacy of the line which divides that which is to be regarded as matter of observation from that which is matter of judgment founded upon observation. Thus, it is held that an unprofessional witness may testify to the fact that a person whom he saw was intoxicated, whether he is able to state all the constituent facts which amount to drunkenness or not; 14 N. Y. 562; 26 Ala. N. S. 26; 53 Minn. 532; he may also testify as to the apparent condition of a party as to sobriety, shortly before the commission of an offence; 73 Cal. 7. He is also competent to testify whether a person with whom he is familiarly associated is in good or bad health and hearing, is lame or has the natural use of his limbs, and also whether on certain occasions he was unconscious; 143 Ill. 490; also whether a certain person has African blood in his veins; 118 N. C. 9. But, on the other hand, insanity or mental incapacity cannot, in general, be proved by the mere assertion of an unprofessional witness; 17 N. Y. 340; 7 Barb. 314; 18 Tex. 568. And see 25 Ala. N. S. 31; 117 Ind. 277; but the opinion of non-expert witnesses may be given as to mental capacity where the facts upon which the opinions are based are disclosed; 116 Ind. 278; 126 Ill. 507; 100 N. C. 457; 77 Ga. 734; 7 Mont. 489; 64 N. H. 578; 64 Va. 87; 30 Fla. 170; 36 W. Va. 757.

So handwriting may be proved by being recognized by a witness who has seen other writings of the party in the usual course of business, or who has seen him write; Steph. Ev. § 51; Peake, N. P. 21; 2 Johns. Cas. 211; 19 Johns. 184; 84 Ala. 53. See 85 Va. 146. But, on the other hand, the authorship of an anonymous article in a newspaper cannot be proved by one professing to have a knowledge of the author's style; How. App. Cas. 187.

From necessity, an exception to the rule of excluding opinions is made in questions involving matters of science, art, or trade, where skill and knowledge possessed by a witness, peculiar to the subject, give a value to his opinion above that of any inference which the jury could draw from facts which he might state; 1 Denio 281; 3 Ill. 297; 2 N. H. 490; 2 Story 421. Such a witness is termed an expert; and he may give his opinion in evidence; Whart. Ev. 440. Experts alone can give an opinion based on facts shown by others, assuming them to be true; 100 N. C. 457.

The following reference to some of the matters in which the opinions of expert witnesses have been held admissible will illustrate this principle. The unwritten or common law of foreign countries may be proved by the opinion of witnesses possessing professional knowledge; 1 Cra. 12, 38; 6 Pot. 763; 2 Wash. C. C. 1, 175; 2 Wend. 411; 3 Pick. 293; 4 Conn. 517; 4 Bibb 73; 2 Marsh. 609; 5 Harr. & J. 186; 1 Johns. 385; 14 Mass. 455; 6 Conn. 508; 1 Vt. 336; 15 S. & R. 87; 1 La. 153; 6 Cra. 274; the degree of hazard of property insured against fire; 17 Barb. 111; 4 Zabr. 843; whether a picture is a good likeness or not; 39 Ala. 193; handwriting; 35 Me. 78; 2 R. I. 319; 25 N. H. 87; 1 Jones N. C. 94, 150; 13 B. Monr. 258; mechanical operations, the proper way of conducting a particular manufacture, and the effect of a certain method; 3 N. Y. 823; negligence of a navigator, and its effect in producing a collision; 24 Ala. n. s. 21; sanity; 41 Ala. 700; 12 N. Y. 358; impotency; 3 Phil. Eccl. 34; value of chattels; 22 Ala. n. s. 370; 11 Cush. 257; 23 Barb. 652; value of land; 11 Cush. 201; 9 N. Y. 183; compare 4 Ohio St. 563; value of services; 15 Barb. 550; speed of a railway train; 59 N. Y. 631; benefit to real property by laying out a street adjacent thereto; 2 Gray 107; survey marks identified as being those made by United States surveyors; 24 Ala. n. s. 390; as to the location of surveys; 121 Pa. 182; 71 Mich. 520; seaworthiness; 10 Bingh. 57; and see 9 Cush. 226; whether a person appeared sick or well; 53 N. Y. 603; of the effect of a personal injury; 116 Ind. 446; 56 Fed. Rep. 184; whether fright would produce heart trouble; 128 Ill. 163; whether a child would have been born alive if he had received medical assistance in time; 71 Tex. 507; as to the distance at which it is safe to stop before going upon a crossing; 116 Ind. 60. So an engineer may be called to say what, in his opinion, is the cause of a harbor having been blocked up; 3 Dougl. 158; 1 Phil. Ev. 276; 4 Term 498. Opinion evidence as to the age of a person, from his appearance, is not admissible; 6 Conn. 9; but see 25 Tex. App. 448; 98 Mo. 640; 48 Mo. App. 39; nor is it in cases involving adultery, on the question of guilt or guilty intent; see 18 Ala. 738; nor can an opinion be given as to the meaning of an instrument where the words or phrases are not technical; 79 Ga. 105; 8 Misc. Rep. 253.

It is to be observed, however, that the principle of admitting such opinions is taken with the qualifications necessary to make, as far as possible, the judgment of the jury, and not that of the witness, the final means of determining the issue. Thus opinions of experts are not admissible upon the question of damages; 23 Wend. 425; 60 Vt. 343; 84 Ala. 102; nor whether damages were occasioned by negligence; 76 Ga. 532; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 210; 91 id. 422; 77 Hun 380; and experts are always confined to opinions within the scope of their professions, and are not allowed to give opinions on things of which the jury can as well judge; 4 Wend. 320; 14 Me. 398; 3 Dana 382; 1 Pa. 161; 2 Halst. 244; 7 Vt. 161; 6 Rand. 704; 9 Conn. 102; 3 N. H. 349; 5 Harr. & J. 498. A distinction is also to be observed between a feeble impression and a mere opinion or belief; 3 Ohio St. 406; 19 Wend. 477. See Mr. Lawson's article, in 25 Alb. L. J. 887. The testimony of experts is not admissible upon matters of judgment within the knowledge and experience of ordinary jurymen; 100 N. C. 310. See 87 W. Va. 524. The opinions of a witness are not admissible as to one's agency; 51 Minn. 141.

Upon an issue, in a suit upon a life policy, as to the insanity of the insured at the time he took his own life, the opinion of a non-professional witness as to his mental condition, in connection with a statement of the facts and circumstances, within his personal knowledge, upon which that opinion is based, is competent evidence; 111 U. S. 613.

Opinion evidence is not admissible as to whether the mode of coupling cars was careless and not the best way of performing the act; 89 Fed. Rep. 487. There are cases where the opinion of witnesses may be asked as to distance and other circumstances, but such questions are not permissible when it is practicable to draw out with exactness the data upon which a judgment must be founded; 109 Mass. 499. It must be left somewhat to the trial court; 58 Fed. Rep. 948. Whether a particular position on a wharf is a safe place for a wharfinger to stand while a steamboat is approaching is not matter for expert testimony; 139 U. S. 551.

In Practice. The statement of reasons delivered by a judge or court for giving the judgment which is pronounced upon a case. The judgment itself is sometimes called an opinion; and sometimes the opinion is spoken of as the judgment of the court.

A declaration, usually in writing, made by a counsel to the client of what the law is, according to his judgment, on a statement of facts admitted to him.

An opinion is in both the above cases a decision of what principles of law are to be applied in the particular case, with the difference that judicial opinions pronounced by the court are law and of authority, while the opinions of counsel, however eminent, are merely advice to his client or argument to the court.

Where there are several judges, and they do not all agree in the disposition of the cause, the opinion of the majority is termed the opinion of the court. The opinion of the minority is termed the dissenting opinion. The opinions of the courts, collected and provided with such preliminary statements of facts and of the arguments of counsel as may be necessary in each case to an understanding of the decision, make up the books of reports.

Opinions are said to be judicial or extra-judicial. A judicial opinion is one which is given on a question which is actually involved in the matter brought before the judge for his decision; an extra-judicial opinion is one which, although given by a judge in deciding a case, is not necessary to the judgment; Vaugh. 382; 1 Hale, Hist. 141; and, whether given in or out of court, is no more than the prolatum of him who gives it, and has no legal efficacy; 4 Pa. 28. Where a point is essential to the decision rendered, it will be presumed that it was duly considered, and that all that could be urged for or against it was presented to the court. But if it appears from the report of the case that such point was not taken or inquired into at all, there is no ground for this presumption, and the authority of the case is proportionably weakened; 8 Abb. Pr. 316.

Where two or more points are discussed in the opinions delivered on the decision of a cause, and the determination of either point in the manner indicated in such opinions would authorize the judgment pronounced by the court, the judges concurring in the judgment must be presumed to have concurred in such opinions upon all the points so discussed, unless some dissent is expressed or the circumstances necessarily lead to a different conclusion; 6 N. Y. 9. Where a judgment is reversed upon a part only of the grounds on which it went, it is still deemed an authority as to the other grounds not questioned. See 5 Johns. 125.

The opinion of the court assigning reasons for its conclusions cannot be treated as a special finding; 189 U. S. 222.

Counsel should, in giving an opinion, as far as practicable, give, first, a direct and positive opinion, meeting the point and effect of the question, and, if the question proposed is properly divisible into several, treating it accordingly. Second, his reasons, succinctly stated, in support of such opinion. Third, a reference to the statutes or decisions on the subject. Fourth, when the facts are susceptible of a material difference in statement, a suggestion of the probability of such variation. When an opinion is sought as a guide in respect to maintaining an action or defence, some other matters should be noticed:—as, Fifth, any necessary precautionary suggestions in reference to the possibility of a fatal defect in the evidence, arising from the nature of the case. Thus, where some important fact is stated as resting principally on the statement of the party interested, if by the law of the place such party is incompetent to testify respecting it, a suggestion ought to be made to inquire how that fact is to be proved. Sixth, a suggestion of the proper mode of proceeding, or the process or pleadings to be adopted.

In English and American law, the opinions of counsel, however eminent, are not entitled to any weight with the court, as evidence of the law. While the court will deem it their duty to receive such opinions as arguments, and as such entitled to whatever weight they may have, they will not yield to them any authority; 4 Pa. 28, per Gibson, C. J. In many cases, where a client acts in good faith under the advice of counsel, he may on that ground be protected from a liability which the law might otherwise have imposed upon him.

Expressions of opinion which are not statements of fact do not constitute fraud; 125 U. S. 247.

The attorney-general of the United States gives to the president his opinion and advice upon questions of law whenever required; and upon the request of the head of any of the executive departments of the government, he is required to give his opinion on questions of law arising in the administration of the department; R. S. §§ 354, 356. See JUDGE; EXPERT; OPINION OF JUDGES; PRECEDENT; LEGISLATIVE POWER.

OPINION OF JUDGES. Occasionally English judges have given opinions on legal matters to the crown, but the last instance appears to be in 1760. See 126 Mass. 562. The practice still obtains in the house of lords. See McNaghten's Case, 10 C. & F. 200. The federal judiciary can be called upon only to decide controversies brought before them in legal form. In Colorado, Florida, Maine, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and South Dakota, the constitution requires the supreme court to give opinions, at the request of the governor or legislature, or sometimes both. In Vermont the same practice obtains by statute, and in Nebraska without either constitutional or statutory sanction; 6 A. & E. Encyc. 1068. In Idaho, the constitution requires the supreme court judges to report annually to the governor as to defects and omissions in existing laws.

It has been held that the courts are the judges of whether the questions presented to them for their opinion fall within the scope of the law, and, generally, whether the exigency requires them to act. The court usually require that the questions shall be matters of public law and not those involving merely private rights; see Thayer on Advisory Opinions; Story, Const.; 6 A. & E. Encyc. 1065, where much law on the subject is collected. See LEGISLATIVE POWER.

OPIMUM. A medicinal drug which has no claim to rank as a necessary of life. Its use has been mainly in medicine, as an anodyne; and is classed in science among the active poisons. In the East it has been used for centuries, by smoking and mastication, to produce a kind of intoxication. It is said to be a vice less easy of detection than alcoholic intoxication, which it is said to replace where law and custom have made the latter disreputable. Its evil effects are most manifest upon the nervous and digestive systems, and its final results resemble delirium tremens. 137 Mo. 147-8, quoting 28 Fed. Rep. 308.

In English Law: The Dangerous Drugs Act, 1920, regulates the importation, exportation, manufacture, sale and use of "opium and other dangerous drugs." For the purposes of the act opium is divided into (1) "raw opium," which includes powdered or granulated opium but not "medicinal opium"; (2) "prepared opium," which means opium prepared for smoking and includes dross and any other residues remaining after opium has been smoked; and (3) "medicinal opium," which means raw opium artificially dried. Part I. prohibits the importation of raw opium except under license and at approved ports, and gives power to regulate the possession, etc., of such opium. Part II. absolutely prohibits the importation or exportation of prepared opium, and provides penalties for possessing or smoking it, and for the possession of opium-smoking utensils, and for keeping or using premises for opium smoking. Part III. prohibits the importation or exportation without license of "medicinal opium," morphine, cocaine, ergonine, diamorphine (heroin) and new drugs which may be specified in an Order in Council, and of their respective salts, and of anything containing not less than .005 of morphine or .001 of cocaine, ergonine or diamorphine; and it regulates the manufacture and sale of such drugs.

The act gives the police power to arrest without warrant, even upon suspicion, persons whose names and addresses cannot be ascertained or who are likely to abscond. Byrne.

Death by. "Death by opium" means not the accidental or involuntary, but the rational and voluntary use of opium. 6 Bush (Ky.) 271.

OPPOSITE. Over against, standing in front or facing. 58 Me. 360. See 15 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 706; 23 L. J. Ch. 45.

An old word for opponent. R. & L. Dict.

OPPOSITION. In Practice. The act of a creditor who declares his dissent to a debtor's being discharged under the insolvent laws. 14 Bankr. Reg. 449.

OPPRESSION. An act of cruelty, severity, unlawful exaction, domination, or excessive use of authority. 14 Fed. Rep. 597.

To make an act oppressive on the part of an officer under Rev. Stat., § 3169, it must be done wilfully, "under color of law," and "without legal authority." Id.

OPPRESSOR. One who having public authority uses it unlawfully to tyrannize over another: as, if he keep him in prison until he shall do something which he is not lawfully bound to do. To charge a magistrate with being an oppressor is actionable; 1 Stark. 81. 185.

OPPROBRIUM. In Civil Law. Ignominy; shame; infamy.

OPTION. Choice; election. See those titles.

In Contracts. A contract by which A, in consideration of the payment of a certain sum to B, acquires the privilege of buying from or selling to B, specified securities or property at a fixed price within a certain time. 71 N. Y. 420; 88 id. 93.

Where notes are given to cover losses on deals in options in grain, a part of which is to be delivered, the illegality of a part taints the whole, the consideration being entire; 40 Ill. App. 155. See 40 id. 807; 49 Ohio St. 240; 75 Hun 174; [1892] 2 Q.

B. 484; 54 Mo. App. 606. The sale of commodities to be delivered at a future day is not per se unlawful where the parties intend in good faith to comply with the terms of the contract; 47 Minn. 288; 64 Hun 686; 37 Neb. 766. See WAGER; CONTRACTS.

These options are of three kinds, viz.: "calls," "puts," and "straddles," or "spread eagles." A call gives A the option of calling or buying from B or not certain securities. A put gives A the option of selling or delivering to B or not. A straddle is a combination of a put and a call, and secures to A the right to buy of, or sell to, B or not. Where neither party, at the time of making the contract, intends to deliver or accept the shares, but merely to pay differences according to the rise or fall of the market, the contract is void either by virtue of statute or as contrary to public policy; 11 C. B. 538. In each transaction the law looks primarily at the intention of the parties; and the form of the transaction is not conclusive; 11 Hun 471; 71 N. Y. 420; 5 M. & W. 466; 69 Pa. 250; 10 W. N. C. 112. Option contracts are not prima facie gambling contracts; 11 Hun 471; 71 N. Y. 420. But see 78 Ill. 48; 88 id. 83. See in general Dos Passos, Stock-Brokers.

OPTIONAL WRIT. An original writ in the alternative, commanding either to do a thing or show cause why it has not been done. 3 Bla. Com. 274; Finch, Law 267.

OPUS LOCATUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A work (i. e. the result of work) let to another to be used. A work (i. e. something to be completed by work) hired to be done by another. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Opus, Locare; L. 51, § 1, D. Locat.; L. 1, § 1, D. ad leg. Rhod.

OPUS MAGNIFICIUM or MANIFICIUM (from Lat. opus, work, manus, hand). Manual labor. Fleta, l. 2, c. 48, § 3.

OR. A disjunctive particle.

As a particle, or is often construed and, and and construed or, to further the intent of the parties, in legacies, devises, deeds, bonds, and writings; 8 Gill 492; 7 id. 197; 1 Cal. 212; 2 Rep. Leg. 1400, 1405; 8 Greenl. Ev. §§ 18, 25; 1 Jarm. Wills, c. 17, 427, 2d ed.; 1 Wills. Exrs. 932; 5 Co. 112 a; Cro. Jac. 822; 4 Zab. 696; 3 Term 470; 37 N. J. Eq. 805; 98 U. S. 143; 30 Ohio St. 407; 33 Minn. 419; but its more natural meaning, when used as a connective, is to mark an alternative and present a choice, implying an election to do one of two things; 60 Conn. 82. It sometimes has the same effect as the word "nor"; 64 Hun 635; 65 id. 145.

As a disjunctive particle "or" to be read "and" when such change will give effect to the evident intention of law makers, testators, or contracting parties. Anderson. In the construction of statutes, it is the duty of the court to ascertain the clear intention of the legislature. In order to do this, courts are often compelled to construe "or" as meaning "and," and again "and" as meaning "or." 3 Wall. (U. S.) 447. But, "or" is never construed to mean "and," when the evident intent of the parties would be thereby defeated. 98 U. S. 142.

The ending -or, in assignor, consignor, covenantor, deviser, donor, etc., designates the actor or doer; while -ee, designates the recipient—the person toward whom the action is directed, for whom the thing is done, as in assignee, consignee, devisee, etc. Originally, a Latin suffix. Id.

Where an indictment is in the alternative, as forged or caused to be forged, it is bad for uncertainty; 2 Stra. 900; 1 Y. & J. 22. But a description of a horse as of a brown or bay color, in an indictment for larceny of such horse, is good; 13 Vt. 687; and so an indictment describing a nuisance as in the highway or road; 1 Dall. 150. See 28 Vt. 583; 24 Conn. 286; 13 Ark. 397. So, "break or enter," in a statute defining burglary, means "break and enter"; 82 Pa. 306, 326; 105 Mass. 185.

When the word or in a statute is used in the sense of to wit, that is, in explanation of what precedes, and making it signify the same thing, a complaint or indictment which adopts the words of the statute is well framed. Thus, it was held that an indictment was sufficient which alleged that the defendant had in his custody and possession ten counterfeit bank-bills or promissory notes, payable to the bearer thereof, and purporting to be signed in behalf of the president and directors of the Union Bank, knowing them to be counterfeit, and with intent to utter and pass them, and thereby to injure and defraud the said president and directors; it being manifest from the statute on which the indictment was framed, that promissory note was used merely as explanatory of bank-bill, and meant the same thing; 8 Mass. 59; 2 Gray 403.

In general, see Cro. Eliz. 832; 2 Sandf. 369; 1 Jones N. C. 309; 3 Term 470; 1 Bingh. 500; 2 Dr. & War. 471; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr., 9th ed. §§ 181, 251.

OR OTHERWISE. Authority is given by Missouri Rev. Stat. 1909, § 11417, to the Circuit Court to enforce "by mandamus or otherwise" an order to the county court to have the tax assessed, etc. But the words "or otherwise" do not authorize the Circuit Court to collect the tax, but only allow the resort to other means beside mandamus to compel the county court to do so. 236 U. S. 57.

ORACULUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of a kind of decision given by the Roman emperors.

ORAL. Spoken, in contradistinction to written: as, oral evidence, which is evidence delivered verbally by a witness. Steph. Ev. 185. Formerly pleadings were put in in vivo voce, or orally; Kerr's Act. Law. When a pleading sets up a contract, and does not allege that it was in writing, it will be taken to have been oral; 84 Ind. 588.

ORAL EVIDENCE. See TESTIMONY.

ORAL PLEADING. Pleading by word of mouth, in the actual presence of the court.

ORANDO PRO REGE ET REGNO. An ancient writ which issued, while there was no regular collect for a sitting parliament, to pray for the peace and good government of the realm.

Before the Reformation it was customary for a new parliament to petition the king to require the clergy to offer up prayers for the kingdom and for a good understanding between the king and the parliament; and thereupon the writ de orando pro rege et regno (to pray for the king and the kingdom) was issued to the clergy. Byrne.

ORATOR. In Chancery Practice. The party who files a bill. Oratrix, is used of a female plaintiff. These words are disused in England, the customary phrases now being plaintiff and petitioner. Brown.

In Roman Law. An advocate. Code 1. 3. 33. 1.

ORCINUS LIBERTUS. In Roman Law. A freedman who obtained his liberty by the direct operation of the will or testament of his deceased master was so called, being the freedman of the deceased (orcinus), not of the heres.

ORDAIN. To make an ordinance, to enact a law.

The preamble to the constitution of the United States declares that the people "do ordain and establish this constitution for the United States of America." The third article of the same constitution declares that "the judicial power shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." See 1 Wheat. 304, 324; 4 id. 316, 402.

To confer on a person the holy orders of priest or deacon. 4 Conn. 134.

ORDAINERS. One who ordains. A person given power by Henry II., of England, to prescribe ordinances. English.

ORDEAL. An ancient superstitious mode of trial.

When in a criminal case the accused was arraigned, he might select the mode of trial either by God and his country, that is, by jury, or by God only, that is, by ordeal.

The trial by ordeal was either by fire or by water. Those who were tried by the former passed barefooted and blindfolded over nine hot glowing ploughshares, or were to carry burning irons in their hands, and accordingly as they escaped or not they were acquitted or condemned. The water ordeal was performed either in hot or cold water. In cold water, the parties suspected were adjudged innocent if their bodies were not borne up by the water contrary to the course of nature; and if after putting their bare arms or legs into scalding water they came out unhurt, they were taken to be innocent of the crime.

It was supposed that God would, by the mere contrivance of man, exercise his power in favor of the innocent. 4 Bla. Com. 342; 2 Am. Jur. 280. See 110 U. S. 529. For a detailed account of the trial by ordeal, see Herbert, Antiq. of the Inns of Court 146.

ORDEFFE or ORDELFE. A liberty whereby a man claims the ore found in his own land; also, the ore lying under land. Cowel.

ORDELFE. See ORDEFFE.

ORDELS. The right of administering oaths and adjudging trials by ordeal within a precinct or liberty. Cowell.

ORDENAMIENTO. In Spanish Law. An order from the sovereign and differing from a cedula in form and in the mode of its promulgation. Schm. Civ. L. Introd. 98, n.

ORDER. Command; direction.

An informal bill of exchange or letter of request requiring the party to whom it is addressed to deliver property of the person making the order to some one therein described.

A designation of the person to whom a bill of exchange or negotiable promissory note is to be paid. See 14 Conn. 445; 49 N. H. 45; 89 N. Y. 98. This order, in the case of negotiable paper, is usually by indorsement, and may be either express, as, "Pay to C D," or implied merely, as by writing A B (the payee's name).

See INDORSEMENT; STORE ORDERS.

In French Law. The act by which the rank of preferences of claim, among creditors who have liens over the price which arises out of the sale of an immovable subject, is ascertained. Dalloz, Dict.

In the Practice of Courts. An order is any direction of a court or judge made or entered in writing, and not included in a judgment. N. Y. Code of Proc. § 400; 51 Ia. 137. But a decree is often called an order. See DECREE. For distinction between order and requisition, see 19 Johns. 7.

In Governmental Law. By this expression is understood the several bodies which compose the state. In ancient Rome, for example, there were three distinct orders: namely, that of the senators, that of the patricians, and that of the plebeians.

In the United States there are no orders of men; all men are equal in the eye of the law. See RANK. FRAUD ORDER; INTERIM ORDER.

Punishing for Contempt. An order punishing for contempt made in the progress of a case, when not in the nature of an order in a criminal proceeding is an interlocutory order and to be reviewed only upon appeal from a final decree in the case. 204 U. S. 599.

See AGREED ORDER; FINAL ORDER; FINAL ORDER OR JUDGMENT.

ORDER IN COUNCIL. An order by the sovereign with the advice of the privy council. See PRIVY COUNCIL.

Also an order of a Colonial Viceroy with the advice of the Privy or Executive Council of the British Colony or Possession to which the order relates.

Some Orders in Council come within the class of Statutory Orders, that is to say, of orders made under statutory authority. Jenks, Hist. E. L. 187. The issue of Orders in Council is expressly authorized by various modern statutes, the effect of this authorization being to give the government a power to legislate, subject in many cases to the right of parliament to nullify the Order in Council by an address disapproving thereof.

Other Orders in Council are made by virtue of the royal prerogative. Thus the Civil Service of the United Kingdom is regulated by Orders in Council made under the prerogative. Byrne.

ORDER OF DISCHARGE. In England, an order made under the Bankruptcy Act of 1869, by a court of bankruptcy, the effect of which is to discharge a bankrupt from all debts, claims, or demands provable under the bankruptcy. Robeson, Bkcy.; Whart. Lex.

ORDER OF FILIATION. The name of a judgment rendered by two justices, having jurisdiction in such case, in which a man therein named is adjudged to be the putative father of a bastard child, and it is further adjudged that he pay a certain sum for its support.

The order must bear upon its face—first, that it was made upon the complaint of the township, parish, or other place where the child was born and is chargeable; second, that it was made by justices of the peace having jurisdiction; 1 Salk. 122, pl. 6; 2 Ld. Raym. 1197; third, the birthplace of the child; fourth, the examination of the putative father and of the mother, but it is said the presence of the putative father is not requisite if he has been summoned; Cald. 808; fifth, the judgment that the defendant is the putative father of the child; Sid. 863; Style 154; Dougl. 662; sixth, that he shall maintain the child as long as he shall be chargeable to the township, parish, or other place, which must be named; 1 Salk. 121, pl. 2; but the order may be that the father shall pay a certain sum weekly as long as the child is chargeable to the public; Vent. 310; seventh, it must be dated, signed, and sealed by the justices. Such order cannot be vacated by two other justices; 15 Johns. 208. See 4 Cow. 263; 2 Blackf. 42.

ORDER NISI. A conditional order, which is to be confirmed unless something be done, which has been required, by a time specified. Eden, Inj. 123.

ORDER OF REVIVOR. In English Practice. An order as of course for the continuance of an abated suit. It superseded the bill of revivor. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 53. Whart. Lex.

ORDERS. Rules made by a court or other competent jurisdiction. The formula is generally in these words: It is ordered, etc.

The instructions given by the owner to the captain or commander of a ship, which he is to follow in the course of the voyage.

ORDERS OF THE DAY. Matters which the house of commons may have agreed beforehand to consider on any particular day, are called the "orders of the day," as opposed to original motions. May's Parl. Prac. Orders of the day are also known to the parliamentary practice of this country; Cusb. Pr. Leg. Assemblies 1512.

ORDINANCE. A law; a statute; a decree.

Municipal ordinances are laws passed by the governing body of a municipal corporation for the regulation of the affairs of the corporation. The term ordinance is now the usual denomination of such acts, although in England and in some states, the technically more correct term by-law is in common and approved use. The main feature of such enactments is that they are local, as distinguished from the general applicability of the state laws; hence, the word law, with the prefix by, should in strictness be preferred to the word ordinance; Horr. & Bemis, Mun. Pol. Ord. 1. See 117 Ind. 221; By-Laws.

They are not, in a constitutional sense, public laws, but mere local rules or by-laws, police or domestic regulations, devoid in many respects of the characteristics of public or general laws; 17 Colo. 302.

This word is more usually applied to the laws of a corporation than to the acts of the legislature. The following account of the difference between a statute and an ordinance is from Bacon's Abridgment, Statute (A). "Where the proceeding consisted only of a petition from parliament and an answer from the king, these were entered on the parliament roll; and if the matter was of a public nature, the whole was then styled an ordinance: if, however, the petition and answer were not only of a public but a novel nature, they were then formed into an act by the king, with the aid of his council and judges, and entered on the statute roll." See Co. Litt. 159 b, Butler's note; 3 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 146.

According to Lord Coke, the difference between a statute and an ordinance is that the latter has not had the assent of the king, lords, and commons, but is made merely by two of these powers. Co. 4th Inst. 25. See Barrington, Stat. 41, note (x).

A resolution of a council is but another name for an ordinance, and if it is a legislative act it is immaterial whether it is called a resolution or an ordinance, so long as the requirements essential to the validity of an ordinance be observed; 99 Pa. 330; but if the action is merely declaratory of the will of the corporation, it is proper to act by resolution, which is more in the nature of a ministerial act; 19 U. S. App. 622.

A municipal ordinance not passed under legislative authority, is not a law of the state within the meaning of the constitutional prohibition against state laws impairing the obligation of contracts; 146 U. S. 258.

Equity will not restrain a city council from passing an ordinance allowing a gas company to lay pipes in its streets, although it has granted the exclusive privilege to do so to another company; 87 Ala. 245. See 92 Ky. 85. An illegal ordinance may be enjoined before passage; 92 Ky. 95; or the enforcement of an invalid ordinance; 132 Ind. 575; but not an ordinance restraining a certain act, unless it be a nuisance per se; 7 Mont. 173.

While it is not per se negligence for a railroad company to run its cars at a higher rate of speed than the limit specified in a city ordinance, yet the fact that it did so in the particular case may be taken into consideration by the jury, with other evidence, in ascertaining whether or not the defendant was negligent; 165 Pa. 118. In 34 Minn. 29, it was held that running a railroad train at a speed exceeding the limit fixed by ordinance was evidence of negligence which should go to the jury. That it is negligence per se is held in 96 Mo. 509; 84 Ala. 141; 178 Ill. 197. (Also where the rate of speed is fixed by statute; 34 Ia. 276.) An ordinance as to the right of way between two street cars is not conclusive of the question of negligence; it is merely evidence of negligence on the part of the driver of a car whose duty under it was to give way; 173 Pa. 602.

An ordinance requiring an opening in a street to be guarded is admissible in evidence in an action against a city for injuries sustained by falling into such opening; 150 Pa. 611.

An ordinance which has the effect of denying to the owner of property the right to conduct a lawful business thereon is invalid, unless the business is of such a noxious or offensive character that the health, safety, or comfort of the community require its exclusion from the neighborhood; 98 Cal. 73; this does not extend to an asylum for the treatment of mild forms of insanity; id.; or to a laundry; 89 Fed. Rep. 623.

The burden of proving the unreasonableness of an ordinance is upon him who denies its validity; 38 N. J. L. 182; 19 L. R. A. 632.

A copy of an ordinance having the seal of the city attached is admissible in evidence without further proof; 118 Mo. 395. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS; NUISANCE; POLICE POWERS. See MUNICIPAL ORDINANCE. BY-LAW.

ORDINANCE OF 1647. A law passed by the Colony of Massachusetts, still in force, in a modified form, whereby the state owns the great ponds within its confines, which are held in trust for public uses. 147 Mass. 548. See LAKE.

ORDINANCE OF 1648. A law of England relating to admiralty jurisdiction. See Bened. Adm. § 90. It expired in 1660.

ORDINANCE OF 1681. An ordinance of France relating to maritime affairs. See Bened. Adm. § 173.

It has no force in Illinois except as incorporated in its statutes; 168 Ill. 179.

ORDINANCES OF EDWARD I. Two laws and ordinances published by Edward I. in the second year of his reign, at Hastings, relating to admiralty jurisdiction. These are said to have been the foundation of a consistent usage for a long time. See Bened. Adm. § 55.

ORDINARY. In Ecclesiastical Law. An officer who has original jurisdiction in his own right, and not by deputation.

In England, the ordinary is an officer who has immediate jurisdiction in ecclesiastical causes. Co. Litt. 344. A bishop is an ordinary, and archbishops are the ordinaries of the whole province. Also an archdeacon; and an officer of the royal household.

In the United States, the ordinary possesses, in those states where such officer exists, powers identical with those usually vested in the courts of probate. In South Carolina, the ordinary was a judicial officer; 1 Const. S. C. 287; 2 id. 884; but the office no longer exists in South Carolina, where they have now a probate court. Georgia retains courts of ordinary. See COURTS OF ORDINARY.

ORDINARY CALLING. Those things which are repeated daily or weekly in the course of trade or business are parts of the ordinary calling of a man exercising such trade or business. 5 Ga. App. 618.

A business in which one is at least partly engaged, a business which occupies a portion of one's time as a calling. Id.; 617.

ORDINARY CARE. That degree of care which men of ordinary prudence exercise in taking care of their own persons or property. Story, Bailm. 11; 95 Cal. 279; 148 Ill. 127; 106 Mo. 397; 3 S. Dak. 93; 49 Kan. 260. It can only be determined by the circumstances of each particular case whether ordinary care was used. This degree of care is said to be required of bailees for the mutual benefit of bailor and bailee; 6 Metc. 91; 16 Ark. 308; 23 Conn. 437, 448; 40 Me. 64; 26 Ala. N. S. 203; 38 E. L. & E. 506. See 4 Misc. Rep. 104; 156 Pa. 353; BAILEE; NEGLIGENCE; CARE.

ORDINARY NEGLIGENCE. The want of such care and diligence as reasonably prudent men, generally, in regard to the subject-matter of inquiry, would use to prevent or avoid an injury. 49 Kan. 460. See GROSS NEGLIGENCE.

ORDINARY ROOF. See ROOF, Ordinary Roof.

ORDINARY SKILL. Such skill as a person conversant with the matter undertaken might be reasonably supposed to have. 11 M. & W. 118; 20 Mart. La. 68, 75; 8

B. Monr. 515; 18 Johns. 211; 7 C. & P. 289; 16 S. & R. 368; 15 Mass. 816; 108 N. C. 187. See COOLEY, TORTS 777; NEGLIGENCE.

One who undertakes to act in a professional or other clearly defined capacity is bound to exercise the skill appropriate to such capacity; Webb, Poll. Torts 20; though the undertaking be gratuitous; 20 Pa. 186; 31 N. H. 119.

ORDINATION. The act of conferring the orders of the church upon an individual. See ORDAIN.

ORDINATIONE CONTRA SERVIENTES. A writ that lay against a servant for leaving his master contrary to the ordinance of 23 & 24 Edw. III.

ORDINIS BENEFICIUM. See BENEFICIUM ORDINIS.

ORDINANCE DEBENTURES. Bills which were issued by the Board of Ordinance on the treasurer of that office for the payment of stores, etc.

ORDINANCE OFFICE, or BOARD OF ORDINANCE. An office which was kept within the Tower of London, and which superintended and disposed of all the arms, instruments, and utensils of war, both by sea and land, in all the magazines, garrisons, and forts of Great Britain. It is divided into two distinct branches, the civil and the military. 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 24. But by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 117, the powers, duties, etc., of the board were transferred to the secretary of state for war. Wharton.

ORDO JUDICIORUM. The order of judgment: the rule by which the due course of hearing each cause was prescribed. 4 Reeves, Hist. Eng. L. 17.

ORDONNANCE DE LA MARINE. See CODE.

ORE LEAVE. A right to dig and take ore from land. 84 Pa. 340.

ORE TENUS (Lat.). Verbally; orally: Formerly the pleadings of the parties were ore tenus; and the practice is said to have been retained till the reign of Edward III. 8 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 95; Steph. Pl. Andr. ed. § 59. And see Bracton 372 b.

In chancery practice, a defendant may demur at the bar ore tenus; 3 P. Wms. 370; if he has not sustained the demurrer on the record; 1 Swanst. 288; Mitf. Pl., Tyler's ed. 310; 6 Ves. 779; 8 id. 405; 17 id. 215.

OREGON. One of the Pacific coast states of the American Union, and the thirty-third state admitted therein.

The territory called Oregon from the early name of its principal river—now called the Columbia—originally included all the country on the Pacific coast west of the Rocky mountains, and north of the 42d and south of the 49th parallel of north latitude. From 1818 to 1846, this country was subject to the joint occupancy of the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States, under a disputed claim of title, which was settled by the treaty of June 15, of the latter year, in favor of the United States.

As early as 1841 the American and British occupants west of the Cascade mountains commenced to organize a government for their protection. These efforts resulted in the establishment of the "Provisional Government of Oregon" by a popular vote on July 6, 1845, consisting of an executive, legislative (one house), and judicial department, the officers of which were chosen and supported by the voluntary action of the citizens and subjects of both nations. On March 3, 1849, this government was superseded by the territorial government provided by congress in the act of August 14, 1848. On September 27, 1850, congress passed the "donation act," giving the settlers the land held by them under the provisional government—640 acres to a married man and his wife, and 320 to a single man.

In 1857 a state constitution was formed and ratified by the people, under which a portion of the territory was admitted into the Union on February 14, 1859, on an equal footing with the other states.

ORFGILD (Sax. orf, cattle, gild, payment. Also called cheapgild). A payment for cattle, or the restoring them. Cowel. A restitution made by the hundred or county of any wrong done by one that was in pledge. Lambard, Archæon 135, 136.

A penalty for taking away cattle. Blount.

ORGANIC LAW. The fundamental law or constitution of a state or nation. See LAW.

ORIGINAL. An authentic instrument which is to serve as a model or example to be copied or imitated.

Originals are single or duplicate: single when there is but one; duplicate, when there are two. In the case of printed documents, all the impressions are originals, or in the nature of duplicate originals, and any copy will be primary evidence; 2 Stark. 180. But see 14 S. & R. 200. See TELEGRAPH; PHOTOGRAPH; PRESS COPY.

When an original document is not evidence at common law, and a copy of such original is made evidence by an act of the legislature, the original is not therefore made admissible evidence by implication; 2 Campb. 121, n.

Not deriving authority from any other source: as, original jurisdiction, original writ, original bill, and the like.

ORIGINAL BILL. In Chancery Practice. A bill relating to a matter not before brought before the court by the same parties, standing in the same interests. Mitf. Eq. Pl. 33.

Proceedings in a court of chancery are either commenced by way of information, when the matter concerns the state or those under its protection, or by original petition or bill when the matter does not concern the state or those under its protection. The original bill states simply the cause of complaint, and asks for relief. It is composed of nine parts; Story, Eq. Pl. 7; and is the foundation of all subsequent proceedings before the court. See 1 Dan. Ch. Pr., 8th Am. ed. *314; BILL.

ORIGINAL CHARTER. In Scotch Law. That one by which the first grant of land is made. Bell, Dict.

ORIGINAL CONSTRUCTION. This term, as distinguished from repairs, has a technical meaning in relation to railroads, and is that construction of bridges, etc., that is necessary to be done before the railroad can be opened, not such structures as are intended to replace worn-out counterparts. 86 Fed. Rep. 73.

Where a portion of an old turnpike road became a public way of a city by reason of the extension of its limits, so as to include the same, the regrading and paving thereof was an "original construction" within the meaning of a statute. 99 Ky. 232, 35 S. W. 645.

A street is not "originally constructed" until it is improved at the cost of the adjoining property owners. 159 Ky. 138, 166 S. W. 811.

Where a fill to protect a city from overflow and the improvement thereof with macadam were paid for out of the proceeds of a bond issue, without cost to the abutting property owners, a subsequent improvement by granite pavement, was held an "original construction" within the meaning of a statute. 159 Ky. 138, 166 S. W. 811.

ORIGINAL CONVEYANCES (sometimes called primary conveyances). Those conveyances by means whereof the benefit or estate is created or first arises: viz. feoffment, gift, grant, lease, exchange, partition. 2 Bla. Com. 306; 1 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 464.

ORIGINAL AND DERIVATIVE ESTATES. An original estate is the first of several estates, bearing to each other the relation of a particular estate and a reversion. It is contrasted with a derivative estate, which is a particular interest carved out of another estate of larger extent. 1 Pres. Est. *123.

made by a merchant, tradesman, or other person in his account-books, charging another with merchandise, materials, work, or labor, or cash, on a contract made between them.

Such an entry, to be admissible as evidence, must be made in a proper book. In general, the books in which the first entries are made, belonging to a merchant, tradesman, or mechanic, in which are charged goods sold and delivered or work and labor done, are received in evidence. There are many books which are not evidence, a few of which will be here enumerated. A book made up by transcribing entries made on a slate by a journeyman, the transcript being made on the same evening, or sometimes not until nearly two weeks after the work was done, was considered as not being a book of original entries; 1 Rawle 435; 4 id. 408; 2 Watts 451; 6 Whart. 189. A book purporting to be a book of original entries, containing an entry of the sale of goods when they were ordered, but before delivery, is not a book of original entries; 4 Rawle 404; 3 Dev. 449. And unconnected scraps of paper, containing, as alleged, original entries of sales by an agent, on account of his principal, and appearing on their face to be irregularly kept, are not to be considered as a book of original entries; 13 S. & R. 126; contra, 4 Harring. 532. See 2 Whart. 38; 4 M'Cord 76; 20 Wend. 72; 1 Yeates 196. A notched stick kept as a tally was admitted to prove items of different amount indicated by different cuts and notches; 2 Harring. 288.

The entry must be made in the course of business, and with the intention of making a charge for goods sold or work done; it ought not to be made after the lapse of one day; Tayl. Ev. 620; 1 N. & McC. 130; 4 S. & R. 5. Memoranda of sales found in an account-book are competent, when made contemporaneously with orders, by a witness knowing them to state correctly the facts; 35 Fed. Rep. 314.

The entry must be made in an intelligible manner and not in figures or hieroglyphics which are understood by the seller only; 4 Rawle 404. A charge made in the gross as "190 days work;" 1 N. & McC. 180; or "for medicine and attendance," or "thirteen dollars for medicine and attendance on one of the General's daughters in curing the whooping-cough;" 2 Const. So. C. 476, were rejected. An entry of goods without carrying out any prices proves, at most, only a sale; and the jury cannot, without other evidence, fix any price; 1 South. 370. The charges should be specific, and denote the particular work or service charged as it arises daily, and the quantity, number, weight, or other distinct designation of the materials or articles sold or furnished, and attach the price and value to each item; 2 Const. So. C. 745; 1 N. & McC. 180.

The entry must, of course, have been made by a person having authority to make it; 4 Rawle 404; and with a view to charge the party; 8 Watts 545.

The proof of the entry must be made by the person who made it. If made by the seller, he is competent to prove it from the necessity of the case, although he has an interest in the matter in dispute; 5 Conn. 496; 12 Johns. 461; 1 Dall. 289. When made by a clerk, it must be proved by him. But in either case, when the person who made the entry is out of the reach of the process of the court, as in the case of death, or absence from the state, the handwriting may be proved by a person acquainted, with the handwriting of the person who made the entry; 2 W. & S. 137; if he is absent, proof must first be made that he cannot be found; 57 Ark. 402. But the plaintiff was not competent to prove the handwriting of a deceased clerk who made the entries; 1 Bro. App. liii. A book containing entries in defendant's handwriting of payments by him to payee in her lifetime, on the note in action, is not admissible as evidence in defendant's favor; 84 Va. 841.

The books and original entries, when proved by the supplementary oath of the party, are prima facie evidence of the sale and delivery of goods, or of work and labor done; 1 Yeates 347; 3 Vt. 463; 1 M'Cord 481; 2 Root 59. See 30 Fla. 419; 97 Ala. 619. But they are not evidence of money lent or cash paid; 1 Day 104; Kirb. 289; or of the time a vessel lay at the plaintiff's wharf; 1 Browne 257; or of the delivery of goods to be sold on commission; 2 Whart. 38. See, generally, Greenl. Ev. § 118.

These entries are sometimes evidence in suits between third parties; 8 Wheat. 326; 3 Campb. 305, 377; 2 P. & D. 573; 15 Mass. 380; 20 Johns. 168; 15 Conn. 206; 7 S. & R. 116; 2 Harr. & J. 77; 2 Rand. 87; 1 Y. & C. 53; and also in favor of the party himself; 2 Mart. La. n. s. 508; 2 Mass. 217; 1 Dall. 239; 2 Bay 173, 382; 5 Vt. 813; 108 Mo. 277. See 26 Tex. App. 404; 68 Hun 190; 160 Mass. 328.

ORIGINAL IMPOSSIBILITY.

See IMPOSSIBILITY.

ORIGINAL IMPROVEMENT. The word "original" when used in connection with an improvement, referred to an improvement when first made. 128 Ky. 555, 108 S. W. 878.

ORIGINAL JURISDICTION.

ORIGINAL PACKAGE. The casing in which imported merchandise is kept and handled in course of transportation, whether hogsheads, bales, bottles, or boxes. Such as are used in bona fide transactions carried on between the manufacturer and wholesale dealers residing in different states. 179 U. S. 359.

The doctrine upon the subject of original packages was contained in the decision of the court in 12 Wheat. (U. S.) 419, in which Mr. Chief Justice Marshall observed: "It is sufficient for the present to say, generally, that when the importer has so acted upon the thing imported, that it has become incorporated and mixed up with the mass of property in the country, it has perhaps lost its distinctive character as an import, and has become subject to the taxing power of the state; but while remaining the property of the importer, in his warehouse, in the original form or package in which it was imported, a tax upon it is too plainly a duty on imports to escape the prohibition in the Constitution." Id., 351. The whole theory of the exemption of the original package from the operation of state laws is based upon the idea that the property is imported in the ordinary form in which, from time to time immemorial, foreign goods have been brought into the country. The doctrine has no application where the manufacturer puts up the package with the express intent of evading the laws of another state. Id., 359, 360.

The term "original package" is not defined by any statute, and is simply a convenient form of expression adopted by Chief Justice Marshall to indicate that a license tax could not be exacted of an importer of goods from a foreign country who disposes of such goods in the form in which they were imported. Whatever the form or size employed there must be a recognition of the fact that the transaction is a bona fide one, and the usual methods of interstate shipment have not been departed from for the purpose of evading the police laws of the state. 196 U. S. 270.

The term "original package" as used in a state statute does not necessarily have the same meaning as when used in some of the decisions of this court. 222 U. S. 415. See also PACKAGE.

The package delivered by the importer to the carrier at the initial point of shipment in the exact condition in which it was shipped. In the case of liquors in bottles, if the bottles are shipped singly, each is an original package, but if a number are fastened together and marked, or are together in a box, etc., such box, etc., constitutes the original package; 81 Fed. Rep. 997.

An original package is a bundle put up for transportation and usually consists of a number of things bound together and convenient for handling; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 10.

An original package, trade in which is protected by the federal constitution, is such form and size of package as is used by purchasers or shippers for the purpose of securing both convenience in handling and security in transportation of merchandise between dealers in the ordinary course of commerce; 156 Pa. 201.

The power to regulate or forbid the sale of a commodity after it has been brought into a state does not carry with it the right and power to prevent its introduction by transportation from another state; 125 U. S. 465. This was followed by Leisy v. Hardin, 135 U. S. 100, where it was held (three judges dissenting), that a state statute prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, except for medicinal, etc., purposes, and under a license, is, as applied to a sale by an importer and in the original packages or kegs unbroken and unopened, of such liquor brought from another state, unconstitutional and void as repugnant to the commerce clause of the constitution. See 4 Harv. L. Rev. 221, for a criticism of this case. The rule established in Leisy v. Hardin, does not justify the contention that a state is powerless to prevent the sale of foods made in or brought from another state, if their sale may cheat the people into buying something they do not intend to buy, and which is wholly different from what its condition and appearance import; 155 U. S. 461, upholding the Massachusetts Oleomargarine Act.

The act of congress of August 8, 1890 (Wilson Act), provided that upon the arrival in any state of liquors they should be subject to the laws of the state the same as if produced there, and should not be exempt therefrom whether in original packages or not. This was held constitutional in 140 U. S. 545. It does not confer upon any state the power of prohibiting the importation of articles by any one except certain officers appointed by the state. The South Carolina Dispensary Act of 1895 is therefore contrary to the commerce clause, and so far as it is so is invalid; 165 U. S. 58.

A consignment of liquor has arrived in the state, within the meaning of the Wilson Bill, as soon as it crosses the state boundary, although the contract of carriage is not then completed; 24 L. R. A. 245.

A state may regulate or prohibit the sale of liquor even in the original package; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 674; but it cannot impose a penalty on a carrier for transporting such goods within the state and before their delivery; id. 664.

Opening a barrel of intoxicating liquor to obtain a small quantity for testing does not destroy the nature of the original package; 27 L. R. A. (1a.) 219.

The peddling of separate articles after a package has been broken is subject to regulation by the state police power; 166 Pa. 89.

An act prohibiting the manufacture and sale of cigarettes interferes with interstate commerce as applied to sales in small boxes containing ten each imported in that form from other states; 76 Fed. Rep. 156; 82 id. 615.

A sale of ten-pound packages of oleomargarine, manufactured and packed in one state and imported into another, is a valid sale, though made to a person who was himself a consumer. The importer has not only a right to sell personally but to employ an agent to sell for him. The right of the importer to sell does not depend upon whether the original package was suitable for retail trade or not, but is the same even if the consumers are wholesale dealers, provided he sells in original packages. The Pennsylvania act of May 31st, 1885, forbidding the manufacture of any imitation of butter or cheese, and providing that no one should sell or have such imitation in his possession with intent to sell as an article of food, is invalid to the extent that it prohibits the introduction of oleomargarine into another state and its sale in the original packages; 171 U. S. 1, two judges dissenting, reversing 170 Pa. 284. Whether the right to sell extended beyond the first sale by the importer was not decided. The right to import a lawful article of commerce from one state to another continues until a sale in the original package; 171 U. S. 23; when the package is broken it becomes a part of the general mass of property; 134 Mo. 436.

Retail trade as well as wholesale is included in the idea of commerce; 81 Fed. Rep. 1000.

The form or size of the package the importer determines for himself; 25 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 235; however small it may be, if it is an original package, it is protected; 42 Fed. Rep. 545.

Bottles, if sealed without the state, are the original packages and not the boxes or barrels in which they come; 138 Pa. 642; 82 Ia. 401; 86 id. 839; but where bottles were shipped separately in tissue paper, each labelled original package, and packed in an open box with hay, it was held that the boxes were the original packages; 91 Ala. 2. See 47 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 411; 40 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 462; 53 id. (Ia.) 330; 43 Fed. Rep. 873.

Where cigarettes are put up in small boxes, ten to a box, and these boxes are placed in larger boxes for shipping, the small boxes constitute original packages; but when they reach their place of destination for sale they become a part of the mass of property of the state; 81 Fed. Rep. 997; 83 id. 422.

Merely labelling each bottle "original package" does not make it one; 91 Ala. 2.

See 84 Am. L. Reg. 784; 29 id. 721; COMMERCE; LIQUOR LAWS; OLEOMARGARINE.

ORIGINAL PROCESS. Process to compel an appearance by the defendant.

The means of compelling the defendant to appear is sometimes called "original process," being founded upon the original writ, and also to distinguish it from "mesne (intermediate) process," which issues, pending the suit, upon some collateral interlocutory matter, as, to summon juries, witnesses, and the like. Anderson.

ORIGINAL WRIT. In English Practice. A mandatory letter issued in the king's name, sealed with his great seal, and directed to the sheriff of the county wherein the injury was committed or supposed to have been done, requiring him to command the wrongdoer, or party accused, either to do justice to the complainant, or else to appear in court and answer the accusation against him. This writ is deemed necessary to give the courts of law jurisdiction. Andr. Steph. Pl. 62; Gould, Pl. 14.

This writ is now disused, the writ of summons being the process prescribed by the Uniformity of Process Act for commencing personal actions; and under the Judicature Act, 1873, all suits, even in the court of chancery, are to be commenced by such writs of summons; Brown. But before this, in modern English practice, the original writ was often dispensed with, by recourse to a fiction and a proceeding by bill substituted. In this country, our courts derive their jurisdiction from the constitution, and require no original writ to confer it. Improperly speaking, the first writ which is issued in a case is sometimes called an original writ; but it is not so in the English sense of the word. See 3 Bla. Com. 273; Walker, Am. Law, passim.

ORIGINALIA (Lat.). In English Law. The transcripts and other documents sent to the office of the treasurer-remembrancer in exchequer are called by this name to distinguish them from recorda, which contain the judgments of the barons. The treasurer-remembrancer's office was abolished in 1883.

ORIGINALITY. In Patent Law. The finding out, the contriving, the creating of something which did not exist and was not known before, and which can be made useful and advantageous in the pursuits of life, or which can add to the enjoyment of mankind. 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 18.

ORNAMENT. An embellishment. In questions arising as to which of two things is to be considered as principal or accessory, it is the rule that an ornament shall be considered as accessory.

ORPHAN. A minor or infant who has lost both of his or her parents. Sometimes the term is applied to a person who has lost only one of his or her parents. 2 S. & S. 93; Aso & M. Inst. b. 1, t. 2, c. 1; 40 Wisc. 276. See 14 Hazard, Penn. Reg. 189, 189, for a correspondence between Joseph Hopkinson and ex-president J. Q. Adams as to the meaning of the word orphan; see, also, Hob. 247; 147 Mass. 300.

ORPHANAGE. In English Law. The share reserved to an orphan by the custom of London. See LEGITIME; DEAD'S PART.

ORPHANS' COURT. In American Law. Courts of more or less extended jurisdiction, relating to probate, estates of decedents, etc., in Delaware, Maryland, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania. See the titles of the respective states.

ORPHANOTROPHI. In Civil Law. Persons who have the charge of administering the affairs of houses destined for the use of orphans. Clef des Lois Rom. Administrateurs.

ORBEUM. See HORREUM.

OSCULI, JUS (IUS). According to the old phraseology there could be no intermarriage within the circle of the jus osculi ("the right of kiss").

A patrician citizen, if his marriage was to be reckoned lawful, had to wed either a fellow-patrician or a woman who was a member of an allied community. In either case it was essential that she should not be of kin to him within the 7th degree. Muirhead, Rom. L. 26.

OSTENSIBLE PARTNER. One whose name appears in a firm as a partner, and who is really such. Pars. Part. 27. See PARTNERS.

OSTEOPATHY. A method of treating diseases by kneading or manipulation of the body, and does not teach surgery, bacteriology, materia medica, or therapeutics. 108 Ky. 769; 57 S. W. 504.

OSWALD'S LAW. The law by which was effected the ejection of married priests, and the introduction of monks into churches. Named from Oswald, Bishop of Worcester, about 964. Whart. Lex.

OTHER CASUALTY. In a lease providing that rent shall cease if the premises become untenable by fire or other casualty, it refers to some fortuitous interruption of the use. 6 U. S. App. 42.

OTHER WRONGS. See ALIA ENORMIA.

OTHERWISE. See OR OTHERWISE.

OTHESWORTHE (Sax. eothe, oath). Worthy to make oath. Bract. 185, 192.

OUGHT. The word is generally directory, but may be taken as mandatory if the context requires it. Bract. fol. 185, 292 b.

OUST. To put out; to turn out or eject. 3 Bl. Com. 201, 202.

OUSTER (L. Fr. oultre, oultre; Lat. ultra, beyond). Out; beyond; besides; farther; also; over and more. Le ouster, the uppermost. Over; respondent ouster, let him answer over. Britton, c. 29. Ouster le mer, over the sea. Jacob, L. Dict. Ouster cit, he went away. 6 Co. 41 b; 9 id. 120.

To put out; to oust. Il oust, he put out or ousted. Oustes, ousted. 6 Co. 41 b.

In Torts. The actual turning out or keeping excluded the party entitled to possession of any real property corporeal.

It is the wrongful dispossession or exclusion from real property of a party entitled to the possession thereof; ouster of one co-tenant by another is produced by the same acts as any other ouster; 91 Cal. 170.

An ouster can properly be only from real property corporeal, and cannot be committed of anything movable; 1 C. & P. 123; 1 Chitty, Pr. 148; nor is a mere temporary trespass considered as an ouster. Any continuing act of exclusion from the enjoyment constitutes an ouster, even by one tenant in common of his co-tenant; Co. Litt. 199 b, 200 a. See 3 Bla. Com. 167; Webb, Poll. Torts 447; 1 Chitty, Pr. 374, where the remedies for an ouster are pointed out. See 33 Cent. L. J. 297. A demand of possession by a tenant in common from his co-tenant, and refusal by the latter, constitutes an ouster from the joint possession; 107 Mo. 520. In an action of quo warranto, the judgment rendered, if against an officer or individuals, is called judgment of ouster; if against a corporation by its corporate name, it is ouster and seizure. See JUDGMENT; RESPONDEAT OUSTER; ROSC. Real Actions 502, 552, 574, 582; 2 Crabb, R. P. § 2454 a; 1 Woodd. Lect. 501; Washb. R. P.

OUSTER LE MAIN (L. Fr. to take out of the hand). In Old English Law. A delivery of lands out of the hands of the lord after the tenant came of age. If the lord refused to deliver such lands, the tenant was entitled to a writ to recover the same from the lord; this recovery out of the hands of the lord was called ouster le main. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24. Also, a livery of land out of the king's hands by judgment given in favor of the petitioner in a monstrans de droit; 3 Steph. Com. 657.

OUSTRE LE MER. Beyond the sea. A cause of excuse, if a person, being summoned, did not appear in court. Cowell.

OUT OF COURT. A plaintiff in an action at common law must have declared within one year after the service of the summons, otherwise he was out of court unless the court had, by special order, enlarged the time for declaring. See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. xxi. r. 1. Whart. Lex.

Also used as a colloquial phrase applied to a litigant party when his case breaks down, equivalent to saying, "he has not a leg to stand on;" Moz. & W.

OUT OF THE STATE. Beyond sea, which title see.

OUT OF TIME. In Marine Insurance. Missing. Generally speaking, a ship may be said to be missing or out of time when she has not been heard of after the longest ordinary time in which the voyage is safely performed. 1 Arn. Ins., 6th ed. 536; 2 Duer, Ins. 469, n.

OUTBORH. See INBORH.

OUTBUILDING. Something used in connection with a main building. 140 Mass. 287. While a stable may be a necessary outbuilding, yet when erected for use in connection with a tent placed temporarily on land, it is not so, within a restriction against the erection of a building other than dwellings of a specified value with necessary outbuildings; 159 Mass. 6. See OUTHOUSES.

OUTCAST. The word "outcast" implies being a degraded and disgraced character. 158 Ky. 40; 164 S. W. 370.

OUTFANGTHEF. A liberty in the ancient common law, whereby a lord was enabled to call any man dwelling in his manor and taken for felony in another place out of his fee to judgment in his own court. Du Cange. See INFANGTHEF.

OUTFIT. An allowance made by the government of the United States to an ambassador, a minister plenipotentiary, or chargé d'affaires, on going from the United States to any foreign country.

The outfit can in no case exceed one year's full salary. No outfit is allowed to a consul. See MINISTER.

As to the meaning of "outfit" in the whaling business, see 9 Meto. 354.

OUTHOUSES. Buildings adjoining or belonging to dwelling-houses.

Buildings subservient to, yet distinct from, the principal mansion-house, located either within or without the curtilage. 4 Conn. 446; 4 Gill & J. 402; 2 Cr. & D. 479.

It is not easy to say what comes within and what is excluded from the meaning of outhouse. It has been decided that a schoolroom, separated from the dwelling-house by a narrow passage about a yard wide, the roof of which was partly upheld by that of the dwelling-house (the two buildings, together with some other, and the court which inclosed them, being rented by the same person), was properly described as an outhouse; Russ. & R. Cr. Cas. 295. See, for other cases, Co. 3d Inst. 67; 1 Leach 49; 2 East Pl. Cr. 1020; 5 C. & P. 535; 8 B. & C. 461; 1 Mood. Cr. Cas. 323, 336; 4 Conn. 446; 11 Ala. N. S. 594; 20 id. 30; 37 Ky. 454; 25 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 1062.

OUTLAND. Land lying beyond the desmesnes and granted out to tenants at the will of the lord, like copyholds. Spelman.

OUTLAW. In English Law. One who is put out of the protection or aid of the law. 22 Viner, Abr. 316; 1 Phill. Ev. Index; Bacon Abr. Outlawry; 2 Sell. Pr. 277; Doctr. Plac. 331; 3 Bla. Com. 283, 284.

As used in the Alabama act of December 28, 1898, § 1, declaring counties liable for persons killed by an "outlaw," it is not used in the strict common-law sense of the term, but merely refers in a loose sense to the disorderly persons then roving through the state, committing acts of violence; 46 Ala. 118, 137. See 37 Me. 399.

When used with reference to a claim, as, a debt due on a promissory note, "outlawed" means barred by the statute of limitations; 37 Me. 392.

OUTLAWRY. In English Law. The act of being put out of the protection of the law, by process regularly sued out against a person who is in contempt in refusing to become amenable to the court having jurisdiction. The proceedings themselves are also called the outlawry.

At four successive county courts held month by month, a proclamation was made calling on the person "to come in to the king's peace," and at the fifth court he would be declared an outlaw. If, after this, he were caught he would be condemned to death without investigation. To slay him wherever he was found was not only the right but the duty of every true man, and even in the middle of the thirteenth century this was still the customary law of the Welsh marches; 1 Social England 296.

Outlawry may take place in criminal or in civil cases; 3 Bla. Com. 283; Co. Litt. 128.

In the United States, outlawry in civil cases is unknown, and if there are any cases of outlawry in criminal cases they are very rare; Dane, Abr. ch. 193 a, 34.

See Bac. Abr. Abatement (B), Outlawry; Gilbert, Hist. 196, 197; 2 Va. Cas. 244; 2 Dall. 92; 37 Me. 399.

OUTPARTERS. Stealers of cattle. Cowell.

OUTPENY. See INPENY AND OUTPENY.

OUTPUTERS. Such as set watches for the robbing any manor house. Cowell.

OUTRAGE. A grave injury; a serious wrong. This is a generic word which is applied to everything which is injurious in a great degree to the honor or rights of another. 44 La. 814.

OUTRE MEER. See OSTER LE MER.

OUTRIDERS. In English Practice. Bailiffs employed by the sheriffs and their deputies to ride to the farthest places of their counties or hundreds, to summon such as they thought good to attend their county or hundred court.

OUTROPER. A person to whom the business of selling by auction was confined by statute. 2 H. Bla. 557.

OUTSTANDING. Unpaid; uncollected; remaining undischarged.

OUTSTANDING CROP. One not harvested or gathered. It is outstanding from the day it commences to grow until gathered and taken away. 53 Ala. 474.

OUTSTANDING DEBT. Due but not paid; overdue; uncollected, as an outstanding draft, bond, premium, or other demand or indebtedness.

OUTSTANDING STOCK. See STOCK.

OUTSTANDING TERM. A term in gross at law, which, in equity, may be made attendant upon the inheritance, either by express declaration or by implication.

OUTSUCKEN MOLTURES. Quantities of corn paid by persons voluntarily grinding corn at any mill to which they are not thirled or bound by tenure.

OUVERTURE DES SUCCESSIONS. In French Law. The right of succession which arises to one upon the death, whether natural or civil, of another. Brown.

OVERCYTED; OVERCHYSED. Proved guilty or convicted. Blount.

OVERDRAFT. See OVERDRAW.

OVERDRAW. To draw bills or checks upon an individual, bank, or other corporation, for a greater amount of funds than the party who draws is entitled to.

When a person has overdrawn his account without any intention to do so, and afterwards gives a check on a bank, the holder is required to present it, and on refusal of payment to give notice to the maker, in order to hold him bound for it; but when the maker has overdrawn the bank knowingly, having no funds there between the time the check is given and its presentment, the notice is not requisite; 2 N. & M.C. 433; 16 Me. 36. A bank may properly refuse to pay a check which will overdraw the depositor's account, though on the bank books his balance seems to be larger than the amount of the check, because a check of his, paid by the bank two days before, had not yet been charged to such depositor; 138 Ill. 596. The president of a bank who directs the payment of checks of a customer who has no money in the bank, drawn in payment of property purchased by the customer, has no such interest in the property as will support an action by him for its conversion; 43 Mo. App. 666.

An overdraft on a bank is in the nature of a loan; it is considered a fraud on the part of the depositor; 52 Pa. 206. See 10 Wall. 647. Indebitatus assumpsit will lie against the depositor to recover the overdraft; 9 Pa. 475; 46 Ill. App. 461. See, generally, 24 N. J. L. 484.

A cashier who knowingly permits an overdraft is guilty of a breach of trust, and liable to an action to make good the amount, even though the directors had been wont to countenance him in a custom of allowing good depositors to overdraw; Morse, Bank., 8d ed. § 387.

If an overdraft on a national bank is properly made and allowed, or even if improperly allowed, the entry of the transaction on the books of the bank just as it occurred is not a false entry, under R. S.

§ 5209; 82 Fed. Rep. 904. The mere payment of a check which creates an overdraft is not a fraudulent misapplication of the funds; id.; and where a national bank officer arranges with a depositor in good faith to give him credit beyond his deposit and makes proper entries of his overdrafts, it is not a false entry under K. S. § 5200; 165 U. S. 323. But where the president of a bank, not acting in good faith, permitted overdrafts which he did not believe and had no reasonable ground to believe would be repaid, and it appeared that he intended by the transaction to injure and defraud the bank, the act becomes a crime; 162 U. S. 664.

OVERDUE. A bill, note, bond, or other contract for the payment of money at a particular day, when not paid upon the day, is overdue.

The indorsement of a note or bill overdue is equivalent to drawing a new bill payable at sight; 2 Conn. 419; 18 Pick. 260; 9 Ala. N. S. 153.

A note when passed or assigned after it is overdue, is subject to all the equities between the original contracting parties; 6 Conn. 5; 10 id. 30, 55; 18 N. J. L. 222; Byles, Bills 190.

Overdue Check. A check drawn on Saturday and negotiated on the following Monday is not "overdue." 151 Ky. 142, 151 S. W. 372.

OVER-INSURANCE. See DOUBLE INSURANCE.

OVERHAUL. To inquire into. The merits of a judgment can never be overhauled by an original suit. 2 H. Bla. 414.

OVERISSUE. Bonds. Where there is an agreement that a railroad company shall issue only a fixed number of bonds per mile, bonds issued in excess of the limit will be postponed in lien and payment to those within the limit; 134 U. S. 150; and one who buys bonds within the limit upon the faith of this agreement is fully entitled to the benefit of it; id.; where bonds are issued, secured by a mortgage which recites the amount of the bonds and that part of them were to be used to take up bonds of a prior issue, the lien of the mortgage will be confined to an amount of bonds which, added to the specified incumbrances, shall not exceed the limit fixed; 8 Fed. Rep. 118, where the question was raised by subsequent bondholders.

Where an issue of railroad bonds was limited in amount, and the governor of a state indorsed on them a recital that they were issued in pursuance of law, it was held that a bona fide purchaser was not bound to look beyond his certificate and that the bonds so certified in excess of the authorized issue were entitled to share pro rata with the other bonds; 2 Woods 523. Bonds are numbered for mere convenience, and holders of those of a higher number stand on the same footing, in a distribution of a fund, as those of lower numbers; id.

Where a mortgage was given to secure a specified issue of bonds and by mistake a larger number were issued and the excess came into the hands of a bona fide holder, there being nothing to put him on inquiry, the company was held estopped to set up that they were not secured by the mortgage, and it was held that the excess bonds had a prior lien as against income bonds not secured by a recorded mortgage, but not against a subsequent recorded mortgage; 1 Duv. 112. Where a statute limited the issue of bonds to the amount of the capital stock actually paid in, it was held that bonds issued in excess of this amount were illegal, and that a second mortgage bondholder could take advantage of their illegality, though the company itself did not seek to repudiate them; 10 Allen 448; but see 69 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 641, where bonds issued in excess were held to be valid to the extent of the consideration received for them. Where a railroad company was authorized to issue bonds to a certain amount in relation to the amount of the capital stock, and a mortgage was executed for a larger amount than was authorized. It was held that between bona fide holders of the mortgage bonds and the company, the bonds were entitled to the lien of the mortgage, and that subsequent creditors with notice of the bonds occupied no better position than the company: 138 Pa. 494. A constitutional provision forbidding the fictitious increase of corporate indebtedness will not be enforced where mortgage bonds are sold at par to innocent purchasers, for construction and equipment: Id.

Stock. Any issue of stock of a corporation in excess of that authorized by statute or charter is void: 34 N. Y. 30; even in the hands of a bona fide purchaser: 99 Pa. 344, 513. A bona fide holder of overissued stock, purporting to be signed by an authorized corporate officer, and actually issued by the corporation, may sue the corporation in tort and recover damages: 34 N. Y. 30 (the leading case); 99 Pa. 513; Pars. Sel. Cas. 190, 216; the doctrine of estoppel applying: 18 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 383; and the same rule applies where the overissued stock is held as collateral for notes: 99 Pa. 513; not so, as to a purchaser not in good faith for full value: 134 N. Y. 83; although the signature of one corporate officer had been forged by another: 33 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 378.

If statutory or charter provisions authorize an increase of the capital stock, but the formalities prescribed for making the increase are not complied with, it is termed an irregular issue, and is voidable: 105 U. S. 143.

The authorized corporate officers and the corporation are jointly and severally liable to immediate or subsequent purchasers (buying upon the faith of certificates) of an overissue or irregular issue of stock, who have sustained damage thereby: 36 N. Y. 200.

Equity will enjoin the transfer of spurious stock, the payment of dividends thereon, or the voting thereof by the pretended owners: 78 N. Y. 159. Such stock is a cloud upon the title of the genuine stock, which a court of equity will remove at the suit of the corporation or the stockholders: 96 U. S. 193; and the holder thereof who knew it to be overissued, at the time of the subscription, can defeat an action at law on his subscription therefor: 105 U. S. 143; or an action upon a promissory note given therefor: 50 La. 404.

See Cook, St. & Stookh.; MORTGAGE; BOND; STOCK.

OVERPLUS. What is left beyond a certain amount; the residue; the remainder of a thing. The same as surplus.

The overplus may be certain or uncertain. It is certain, for example, when an estate is worth three thousand dollars, and the owner asserts it to be so in his will, and devises of the proceeds one thousand dollars to A, one thousand dollars to B, and the overplus to C, and in consequence of the deterioration of the estate, or from some other cause, it sells for less than three thousand dollars, each of the legatees, A, B, and C, shall take one-third. The overplus is uncertain where, for example, a testator does not know the value of his estate and gives various legacies, and the overplus to another legatee: the latter will be entitled only to what may be left: 18 Ves. 466. See RESIDUE; SURPLUS.

OVERRATE. In its strictest signification, a rating by way of excess and not one which ought not to have been made at all. 2 Ex. 352.

OVERREACHING CLAUSE. In a resettlement, a clause which saves the powers of sale and leasing annexed to the estate for life created by the original settlement, when it is desired to give the tenant for life the same estate and powers under the resettlement.

The clause is so called because it provides that the resettlement shall be overreached by the exercise of the old powers. If the resettlement were executed without a provision to this effect, the powers annexed to the estate for life created by the original settlement would be gone after the resettlement:

but this is not now a matter of much importance in England because the powers given to a tenant for life by the English Settled Land Acts, 1882 to 1890, remain notwithstanding the resettlement; and the clause is therefore frequently omitted, although it is, on the whole, better to insert it. Byrne.

OVERRULE. To annul; to make void. This word is frequently used to signify that a case has been decided directly opposite to a former case; when this takes place, the first-decided case is said to be overruled as a precedent, and cannot any longer be considered as of binding authority.

It also signifies that a majority of the judges of a court having decided against the opinion of the minority, in which case the latter are said to be overruled.

See PRECEDENTS.

OVERSAMESA. A forfeiture for contempt or neglect in not pursuing a malefactor. 3 Inst. 116.

OVERSEERS OF HIGHWAYS. Officers having supervision of highways in some of the states. See COMMISSIONERS OF HIGHWAYS.

OVERSEERS OF THE POOR. Persons appointed or elected to take care of the poor with moneys furnished to them by the public authority.

The duties of these officers are regulated by local statutes. In general, the overseers are bound to perform those duties, and the neglect of them will subject them to an indictment. See 1 Bla. Com. 360; 16 Vin. Abr. 150; 1 Mass. 459; 3 id. 486; 2 N. J. L. 6, 136; 77 N. C. 494; Com. Dig. Justitie of the Peace (B 63).

OVERSMAN. In Scotch Law. A person commonly named in a submission, to whom power is given to determine in case the arbiters cannot agree in the sentence. Sometimes the nomination of the oversman is left to the arbiters. In either case the oversman has no power to decide unless the arbiters differ in opinion; Erskine, Inst. 4. 8. 16. The office of an oversman very much resembles that of an umpire.

OVERT. Open.

An overt act in treason is proof of the intention of the traitor, because it opens his designs: without an overt act, treason cannot be committed: 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 40. An overt act, then, is one which manifests the intention of the traitor to commit treason; Archb. Cr. Pl. 379; 4 Bla. Com. 79; Co. 3d Inst. 12; 1 Dall. 33; 2 id. 346; 4 Cra. 75; 3 Wash. C. C. 234. In order to sustain a conviction for treason under the United States constitution, there must be the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act or a confession in open court. A conspirator can be tried in any place where his co-conspirators perform an overt act; Rev. Stat. § 440. The phrase is used in relation to the Fugitive Slave Act in 5 How. 215.

In conspiracy, no overt act is needed to complete the offence: 11 Cl. & F. 155; 48 Md. 381; 49 Ind. 186. See 7 Biss. 175.

The mere contemplation or intention to commit a crime, although a sin in the sight of Heaven, is not an act amenable to human laws. The mere speculative wantonness of a licentious imagination, however dangerous or even sanguinary in its object, can in no case amount to a crime. But the moment that any overt act is manifest, the offender becomes amenable to the laws. See Cro. Car. 577; ATTEMPT; CONSPIRACY; SOLICITATION.

OWELTY. The difference which is paid or secured by one coparcener or cotenant to another for the purpose of equalizing a partition. 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 619. Littleton § 251; Co. Litt. 169 a; 1 Wats. 285; 18 Vin. Abr. 238, pl. 3. See 158 Pa. 396; 113 id. 578.

A charge on land for owelty of partition follows the land into the hands of a purchaser from the person to whom it was allotted; and the statute of limitation does not run against it, as the possession is not adverse: 106 N. C. 444.

OWING. Something unpaid. A debt, for example, is owing while it is unpaid, and whether it be due or not. See 40 La. Ann. 671.

In affidavits to hold to bail it is usual to state that the debt on which the action is founded is due, owing, and unpaid: 1 Pa. L. J. 210.

OWLER. In English Law. One guilty of the offence of owling (q. v.).

OWLING. In English Law. The offence of transporting wool or sheep out of the kingdom.

The name is said to owe its origin to the fact that this offence was carried on in the night, when the owl was abroad.

OWNER. He who has dominion of a thing, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal, which he has a right to enjoy and do with as he pleases,—even to spoil or destroy it, as far as the law permits, unless he be prevented by some agreement or covenant which restrains his right. See 18 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 578; 21 Or. 339.

Although there can be but one absolute owner of a thing, there may be a qualified ownership of the same thing by many. Thus, a bailor has the general ownership of the thing bailed, the bailee the special ownership. See 2 Cra. C. C. 83. The right of the absolute owner is more extended than that of him who has only a qualified ownership: as, for example, the use of the thing. Thus, the absolute owner of an estate, that is, an owner in fee, may cut the wood, demolish the buildings, build new ones, and dig wherever he may deem proper for minerals, stone, plaster, and similar things, which would be considered waste and would not be allowed in a qualified owner of the estate, as a lessee or a tenant for life. The word owner, when used alone, imports an absolute owner; but it has been held in Ohio that the word owner, in the mechanic's lien law of that state, includes the owner of the leasehold as well as of the reversion, on the ground that any other construction would be subversive of the policy and intent of the statute. 2 Ohio 123.

The owner continues to have the same right although he perform no acts of ownership or be disabled from performing them, and although another perform such acts without the knowledge or against the will of the owner. But the owner may lose his right in a thing if he permit it to remain in the possession of a third person for a sufficient time to enable the latter to acquire a title to it by prescription or under the statute of limitations. See La. Civ. Code, b. 2, tit. 2, c. 1; Encyclopédie d'Alembert, Propriétaire.

When there are several joint owners of a thing,—as, for example, of a ship,—the majority of them have the right to make contracts in respect of such thing in the usual course of business or repair, and the like, and the minority will be bound by such contracts; Holt 586; 5 Whart. 366; 105 Pa. 222. See PART-OWNER. LIMITED OWNER.

OWNER'S RISK. There is no exact meaning of "owner's risk." (1906) T. S. 973 (30. Afr.)

The Supreme Court of the Cape Colony expressed in one case (Naylor vs. Munick 3 Searle, 187) an opinion that a carrier who conveys goods at owner's risk is not excused in case of gross negligence or malfeasance. Id., 973. There has been a judicial expression of opinion that owner's risk does not include freedom from liability arising from gross negligence or from malfeasance. . . . If, however, the carrier employs suitable servants, and by some error of judgment on their part, but through no malfeasance or gross negligence, an accident occurs by which the goods are damaged, then the carrier will not be liable if he takes the goods at "owner's risk" and at lower rate. Id., 974.

OWNERSHIP. The right by which a thing belongs to some one in particular, to the exclusion of all others. 1 A. Civ. Code. art. 490. See CO-OWNERSHIP; UNCONDITIONED OWNERSHIP.

OXGANG (fr. Sax. gang, going, and ox; Law Lat. bovata). In Old English Law. So much land as an ox could till. In the north of England a division of a carucate. According to some, fifteen acres. Co. Litt. 69 a; Crompton, Jurisd. 220. According to Balfour, the Scotch oxgang, or oxgate, contained twelve acres; but this does not correspond with ancient charters. See Bell, Dict. Ploughgate. Skene says thirteen acres. Cowell. See 1 Poll. & Maitl. 347.

OYER (Lat. audire; through L. French oyer, to hear).

In Pleading. A prayer or petition to the court that the party may hear read to him the deed, etc., stated in the pleadings of the opposite party, and which deed is by intendment of law in court when it is pleaded with a profert. The same end is now generally attained by giving a copy of the deed of which oyer is asked, or, in other instances, by setting forth the instrument in full in the plaintiff's statement of his case. Oyer as it existed at common law seems to be abolished in England; 1 B. & P. 646; 3 id. 398; 25 E. L. & E. 304. Oyer may be demanded of any specialty or other written instrument, as, bonds of all sorts, deeds-poll, indentures, letters testamentary and of administration, and the like, which the adverse party is obliged to plead with a profert in curia; Gould, Pl. 408. But pleading with a profert unnecessarily does not give a right to demand oyer; 1 Salk. 497; and it may not be had except when profert is made; Hempst. 295. Denial of oyer when it should be granted is ground for error; Andr. Steph. Pl. 59; 1 Blackf. 128. In such cases the party making the claim should move the court to have it entered on record, which is in the nature of a plea, and the plaintiff may counterplead the right of oyer, or strike out the rest of the pleading following the oyer, and demur; 1 Saund. 9 b, n. 1; Bac. Abr. Pleas 1; upon which the judgment of the court is either that the defendant have oyer, or that he answer without it; id.; 2 Lev. 142; 6 Mod. 28. See PROFERT IN CURIA.

After craving oyer, the defendant may set forth the deed or a part thereof, or not, at his election; 1 Chitty, Pl. 872; and may afterwards plead non est factum, or any other plea, without stating the oyer; 2 Stra. 1241; 1 Wils. 97; and may demur if a material variance appear between the oyer and declaration; 2 Saund. 366, n.

See, generally, Com. Dig. Pleader (P), Abatement (I 22); 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2890.

OYER AND TERMINER. See ASSIZE; COURT OF OYER AND TERMINER.

OYEZ (Fr. hear ye). The introduction to any proclamation or advertisement by public crier. Used also by court officers in opening court. It is wrongly and usually pronounced oh yes. 4 Bla. Com. 340, n.

OYSTER. The right to take shell fish below high water mark from natural beds in tide waters is common to all citizens of the state, except as restrained by positive law or grants from the state; 50 N. J. L. 409; 32 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 166; 33 id. (Conn.) 1006. "A natural oyster-bed" is one not planted by man. 104 N. C. 764. There is a right of property in artificial oyster beds planted in public or navigable waters, in spots designated by stakes or otherwise; 27 N. J. L. 117; 22 Hun 53; the owner must clearly mark out and define his beds; 11 Barb. 248; this right is in the nature of a license from the state, which the state may revoke; 14 Wend. 41; 65 Md. 586.

The state, subject to the paramount right of navigation, is the owner of the oyster-beds in its waters and can prohibit their taking by any but its own citizens, and prescribe the times, instruments, and conditions of taking them; 36 Fed. Rep. 652; 94 U. S. 891; 76 Va. 989.

One who plants oysters on a natural bed cannot recover against one who removes them with the natural growth; 66 Conn. 285.

One who plants a bed of oysters in a bay on an arm of the sea, designating the bed, does not interfere with the common right of fishing, and may maintain trespass for an invasion of his property; 91 N. Y. 96; 7 Q. B. D. 106. Oysters deposited artificially may obstruct navigation and be a nuisance; 7 Q. B. 339.

A riparian owner has not the right to bed oysters along his entire water front; 65 Md. 586.

In Maryland by statute any citizen of any county bordering on the waters of the state may appropriate any area not exceeding an acre for bedding oysters.

An act (Maryland) exacting a license fee of three dollars per ton on oyster boats is not a tonnage tax, but a lawful compensation to the state for the privilege of taking oysters; 36 Fed. Rep. 651.

Statutes in several states, especially Delaware, Maryland, and Virginia, regulate the matter.

PAAGE. A toll for passage through another's land.

PACARE. To pay.

PACE. A measure of length, containing two feet and a half. The geometrical pace is five feet long. The common pace is the length of a step; the geometrical is the length of two steps, or the whole space passed over by the same foot from one step to another.

PACIFIC BLOCKADE. A means of coercion short of war, usually adopted by the joint action of several nations. An instance of it occurred when Great Britain and Germany united to prevent the slave traffic and stop the importation of arms on the east coast of Africa; Snow, Int. Law 79. In 1827 Greece was blockaded by France, Russia, and Great Britain; in 1850 the Greek ports were blockaded by Great Britain, and again in 1855 by the combined fleets of the five Great Powers.

In the blockade of Mexico by France in 1838, neutral vessels as well as Mexican were both seized and condemned. In other cases both classes of ships were seized, but were restored without compensation at the termination of conflict. In the blockades of Greece in 1850 and 1886, only Greek vessels were sequestered.

Different nations have given to the term a different scope. For instance, France has claimed the right under it to intercept not only the ships of the state against which the remedy is applied, but the ships of other nations as well. England, upon the other hand, has usually applied it only to the ships of the country whose coast is blockaded.

The line of demarcation between blockade and war is a shadowy one. It might not be inaccurate to define a pacific blockade as a form of restraint used against a weak power which if used against a strong power would be war. This much is clear, that any form of restraint of which force is the essence may at any moment be considered as an act of war. Maxey, Int. Law, 364, 365.

In 1887 the Institute of International Law unanimously declared in favor of the legality of pacific blockade, subject to these conditions:—“(1) That the neutral flag can enter freely; (2) that there must, of course, be formal notice and a sufficient force; and (3) that ships of the blockaded country may be sequestered, but should be restored with their cargoes at the end of the blockade, but without compensation.” See 21 L. Mag. & Rev. 285; BLOCKADE.

PACIFICATION (Lat. paz, peace, facere, to make). The act of making peace between two countries which have been at war; the restoration of public tranquillity.

PACK. To deceive by false appearances; to counterfeit; to delude.

PACK OF WOOL. A horse load consisting of seventeen stone and two pounds. Cowell.

PACKAGE. A bundle put up for transportation or commercial handling. A parcel is a small package; 1 Hugh. 529; 44 Ala. 469, where a bale of cotton was held not a package; contra, 2 Daly 434. See L. R. 9 Ex. 67. Certain duties charged in the port of London on the goods imported and exported by aliens. Now abolished. Whart. Lex. See ORIGINAL PACKAGE.

“Package” or its equivalent, as used in the Food and Drugs Act, refers to the immediate container of the article which is intended for consumption by the public.

To limit the requirements of the act to the outside box which is not seen by the purchasing public would render nugatory one of the principal provisions of the act. 228 U. S. 115.

PACKED PARCELS. The name for a consignment of goods consisting of one large parcel made up of several small ones, collected from different persons by the immediate consignor, who united them into one for his own profit, at the expense of the carrier. Whart.

PACKER. A person employed by merchants to receive and (in some instances) to select goods from manufacturers, dyers, calenders, etc., and pack the same for exportation. Arch. Bankr., 11th ed. 37.

PACKING A JURY. Improperly and corruptly selecting a jury to be sworn and impanelled for the trial of a cause. 12 Conn. 289.

PACT. In Civil Law. An agreement made by two or more persons on the same subject, in order to form some engagement, or to dissolve or modify one already made: Conventio est duorum, in idem placitum consensus de re solvenda, id est faciendi vel prestanda. Dig. 2, 14; Clef des Lois Rom.; Ayliffe, Pand. 558; Merlin, Rép. Pacte.

PACT DE NON ALIENANDO. A clause inserted in mortgages in Louisiana which secures to the mortgage creditor the right to foreclose his mortgage by executory process directed solely against the mortgagor, and gives him the right to seize and sell the mortgaged property, regardless of any subsequent alienations. 85 La. Ann. 585; 38 id. 645; 124 U. S. 355. This rule applies to an alienation by condemnation in proceedings for confiscation, and as against the heirs-at-law of the person whose property is confiscated; 118 U. S. 293. If a mortgage debtor in Louisiana, in a suit to foreclose a mortgage containing this clause, waives the benefit of prescription, those who take through him are estopped from pressing it, as effectually as he is estopped; 124 U. S. 351.

PACTIONS. In International Law. Contracts between nations which are to be performed by a single act, and of which execution is at an end at once. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 100.

PACTUM. (Lat. from pangere, to strike). A pact. An agreement or convention without specific name, and without consideration, which, however, might, in its nature, produce a civil obligation. Burrill; Heinecc. Elem. Jur. Civ. 3. 14. 775. A pact was distinguished from a contract (contractus) which had a specific name or present consideration, and carried with it a civil obligation, both being species of conventio, (convention), which was the general term. Id.; 773. An action lay upon a contract, but not on a pact. Id.

PACTUM CONSTITUTE PECUNIÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement by which a person appointed to his creditor a certain day, or a certain time, at which he promised to pay; or it may be defined simply an agreement by which a person promises a creditor to pay him.

When a person by this pact promises his own creditor to pay him, there arises a new obligation, which does not destroy the former by which he was already bound, but which is accessory to it; and by this multiplicity of obligations the right of the creditor is strengthened. Pothier, Obl. pt. 2, c. 6, s. 9.

There is a striking conformity between the pactum constituta pecuniæ, as above defined, and our indebitatus assumpsit. The pactum constituta pecuniæ was a promise to pay a subsisting debt, whether natural or civil, made in such a manner as not to extinguish the preceding debt, and introduced by the pretor to obviate some formal difficulties. The action of indebitatus assumpsit was brought upon a promise for the payment of a debt; it is not subject to the wager of law and other technical difficulties of the regular action of debt; but by such promise the right to the action of debt was not extinguished nor varied; 4 Co. 91, 92. See 1 H. Bl. 550, 551; Brooke, Abr. Action sur le Case (pl. 7, 69, 72); 4 B. & B. 295; 3 Chitty, Pl. 82.

PACTUM DE NON ALIENANDO. A stipulation in a mortgage by which the mortgagor agrees not to alienate or encumber the mortgaged premises to the prejudice of the mortgage. 113 U. S. 299. The effect of this stipulation is well settled in Louisiana. In 2 Martin, N. S. 32, the effect was decided to be, that “the mortgagee is not bound to pursue a third possessor, but may have the hypothecated property seized in via executionis as if no change had taken place in its possessors, because any alienation or transfer made in violation of the pact de non alienando is ipso jure void as it relates to the creditor, and that this effect of the pact is not annulled by the provisions of the Civil Code in relation to mortgages, and the rules laid down for pursuing the action of mortgage.” Id. Where a mortgage contains the pact de non alienando the mortgagee may enforce his mortgage by proceeding against the mortgagor alone, notwithstanding the alienation of the property, and all those claiming under the mortgagor, whether directly or remotely, will be bound, although not made parties. Id., p. 300.

PACTUM DE NON PETENDO (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement made between a creditor and his debtor that the former will not demand from the latter the debt due. By this agreement the debtor is freed from his obligation. This is not unlike the covenant not to sue, of the common law. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 755; Leake, Contr., 3d ed. 798.

PACTUM DE QUOTA LITIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An agreement by which a creditor of a sum difficult to recover promises a portion—for example, one-third—to the person who will undertake to recover it. In general attorneys should abstain from making such a contract; yet it is not unlawful at common law. See CHAMPERTY.

PAID UP LIFE POLICY. A “paid up life policy” is the equivalent of the insurer's bond to pay a sum definite at a time certain or upon the happening of an inevitable contingency. It can not be said that such an obligation is without specific money value. It may be stated generally that any tangible, definable interest in property having a value, and not exempt by law, is subject to the owner's debts. 111 Ky 64, 63 S. W. 12.

PAIN FORTE ET DURE. See PEINE FORTE ET DURE.

PAINS AND PENALTIES. See BILL OF PAINS AND PENALTIES.

PAINTING. A likeness, image, or scene depicted with paints. Cent. Dict. The term does not necessarily mean anything upon which painting has been done by a workman, but rather something of value as a painting and something on which skill has been bestowed in producing it; 3 Exch. Div. 231. Whether certain articles fall within the description of paintings as used in a statute is a question of fact for a jury; id.

Paintings on porcelain, the value of which depends on the skill of the artist, are dutiable as porcelain and not as china porcelain and parian ware gilded, decorated, or ornamented in any manner; 103 U. S. 677. As to copyright in paintings, see COPYRIGHT.

PAIRING-OFF. A system in vogue both in parliament and in legislative bodies in this country, whereby a member agrees with a member on the opposite side, that they shall both be absent from voting during a given time, or upon a particular question. It is said to have originated in the house of commons in Cromwell's time. See May, Parl. Prac.

PAIS, PAYS. A French word, signifying country. In law, matter in pais is matter of fact, in opposition to matter of record; a trial per pais is a trial by the country,—that is, by a jury. See IN PAIS.

PALACE CAR. See SLEEPING CAR.

PALACE COURT. In English Law. A court which had jurisdiction of all personal actions arising between any parties within twelve miles of Whitehall, not including the city of London.

It was erected in the time of Charles I., and was held by the steward of the household, the knight-marshal and steward of the court, or his deputy. It had its sessions once a week, in the borough of Southwark. It was abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101, § 13. See COURT OF MARSHALSEA.

PALAGIUM. A duty to lords of manors for exporting and importing vessels of wine at any of their ports. Jacob.

PALATINE. Possessing royal privileges. See COUNTY PALATINE; COURTS OF COUNTY PALATINE.

PALFRIDUS (L. Lat.). A palfrey; a horse to travel on. Fitzherbert, Nat. Brev. 98.

PALLIO COOPERIRE. (To cover with a cloak.) An ancient custom, where the parents of children born out of wedlock afterwards intermarried, of the parents and children standing together under a cloth extended, while the marriage was solemnized, the act being in the nature of adoption. Toml. See LEGITIMATION.

PALMER'S ACT. Statutes 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16, which enable a person accused of crime committed out of the jurisdiction of the central criminal court to be tried in that court.

PALMISTRY. The art or practice of telling fortunes by a feigned interpretation of the lines and marks on the hand. The word is used by good writers in the sense of a trick with the hand. 2 Exch. Div. 268.

PALPABLY DANGEROUS. A set screw, that is suffered to remain uncovered and unguarded, is "palpably dangerous." 145 Ky. 1, 139 S. W. 1059.

PAMPHLET. A small book usually printed in octavo form and stitched.

Pamphlet laws. The name given in some states to the publication of the acts of the legislature. In Pennsylvania and Delaware they are originally published from session to session, unbound, with continuous paging, and indexed and bound after a number of sessions.

PAMPHLET LAWS. In the United States, the acts of each session of Congress are published under the title "Statutes of the United States," but since they are issued in paper covers, and are later superseded by bound volumes under another title, they are usually referred to as "Pamphlet Laws." These Pamphlet Laws of the United States Congress for each session are now issued in two parts. The first part contains public acts and joint resolutions arranged in chronological order. Part two contains private acts, concurrent resolutions, treaties, proclamations and amendments to the United States Constitution. At the beginning of the two parts are chronological lists, and at the end alphabetical indices. These Pamphlet Laws are merely advance issues of volumes which contain all of the laws, resolutions, etc., of a Congress, the latter when published being called "Statutes at Large." Hicks, Mater. & Meth. Leg. Res., p. 61, 62.

PANDECTS. In Civil Law. The name of an abridgment or compilation of the civil law, made by Tribonian and others, by order of the emperor Justinian, and to which he gave the force of law. A. D. 529.

It is also known by the name of the Digest, because in his compilation the writings of the jurists were reduced to order and condensed quasi digesta. The emperor, in 529, published an ordinance entitled De Conceptione Digestorum, which was addressed to Tribonian, and by which he was required to select some of the most distinguished lawyers to assist him in composing a collection of the best decisions of the ancient lawyers, and compile them in fifty books, without confusion or contradiction. The instructions of the emperor were to select what was useful, to omit what was antiquated or superfluous, to avoid contradictions, and by the necessary changes, to produce a complete body of law. This work was a companion to the Code of Justinian, and was to be governed in its arrangement of topics by the method of the Code. Justinian allowed the commissioners, who were sixteen in number, ten years to complete it; but the work was completed in three years, and promulgated in 529. A list of the writers from whose works the collection was made, and an account of the method pursued by the commissioners, will be found in Smith's Dict. of Gr. & Rom. Antiq. About a third of the collection is taken from Ulpian; Julius Paulus, a contemporary of Ulpian, stands next; these two contributed one-half of the Digest. Paulus comes next. The Digest, although compiled in Constantinople, was originally written in Latin, and afterwards translated into Greek.

The Digest is divided in two different ways: the first into fifty books, each book in several titles, and each title into several extracts or leges, and at the head of each series of extracts is the name of the lawyer from whose work they were taken. The fifty books are allotted in seven parts.

The division into digestum vetus (book first to and including title second of book twenty-fourth), digestum infortitum (title third of book twenty-fourth, to and including book thirty-eighth), and digestum novum (from book thirty-ninth to the end), has reference to the order in which these three parts appeared. As to the methods of citing them, see CITATION OF AUTHORITIES.

The Pandects, as well indeed as all Justinian's laws, except some fragments of the Code and Novels—were lost to all Europe for a considerable period. During the pillage of Amalfi, in the war between the two said-popes Innocent II. and Asclepius II., a soldier discovered an old manuscript, which attracted his attention to its envelope of many colors. It was carried to the Emperor Clovis, and proved to be the Pandects of Justinian. The work was arranged in its present order by Warner, a German, whose Latin name is Imerius, who was appointed by that emperor Professor of Roman Law at Bologna. 4 Fournel, Hist. des savants, c. 44. The style of the work is very grave and pure, and contrasts in this respect with that of the Code, which is very far from classical. On the other hand, the learning of the Digest stands rather in the discussing of subtle questions of law, and enumerations of the variety of opinions of ancient lawyers thereon, than in practical matters of daily use, of which the Code so simply and directly treats. See Ridley, View, pt. I. ch. 1, 2.

While the Pandects form much the largest fraction of the Corpus Juris their relative value and importance are far more than proportional to their extent. They are, in fact, the soul of the Corpus Juris. Radley, Rom. L. 11. See FIFTY DECISIONS, THE.

PANEL (diminutive from either pane, apart, or page, pagella. Cowell). In Practice. A schedule or roll, containing the names of jurors summoned by virtue of a writ of venire facias, and annexed to the writ. It is returned into court whence the venire issued. Co. Litt. 158 b; 3 Bla. Com. 353; 40 Cal. 558. See 89 Ill. 575. The word may be used to designate either the whole number of jurors summoned or those selected by the clerk by lot according to the connection in which it is used. 78 Ia. 141.

In Scotch Law. The prisoner at the bar, or person who takes his trial before the court of justiciary for some crime. So called from the time of his appearance. Bell, Dict. Spelled, also, pannel. See REGULAR PANEL.

PANEL OF ARBITRATORS. See HAGUE CONFERENCE.

PANTOMIME. A dramatic performance in which gestures take the place of words. 3 C. B. 871.

PAPACY. See PAPIST.

PAPAL SUPREMACY, DOCTRINE OF. That supremacy which the pope claimed in the Holy Roman Empire, not only over the emperor but over all other Christian princes. The theory was that all Christian princes stood to the Roman pontiff as great vassals to a supreme lord or suzerain, and as such supreme lord the pope claimed the right to enforce the duties due to him from his feudal subordinates through an ascending scale of penalties culminating in the absolution of the subject from the bonds of allegiance, and in the deposition of the sovereign himself. Taylor, Jurispr., 323, 608.

PAPER. A manufactured substance composed of fibres (whether vegetable or animal) adhering together in forms consisting of sheets of various sizes and of different thicknesses, used for writing or printing or other purposes to which flexible sheets are applicable. 4 H. & N. 470. Books are not paper within the meaning of the tariff act; 104 U. S. 735.

In a statute against sending obscene papers, includes letters. Anderson; 103 Ind. 419. In the sense of a printed sheet or sheets containing the current news, see NEWSPAPER. A commercial, business, or negotiable instrument. Id. A list of the business to be transacted exhibited in each court in England, to enable the parties to know when their presence will be required. R. & L. Dict.

PAPER BLOCKADE. An ineffective blockade. See BLOCKADE.

PAPER-BOOK. In Practice. A book or paper containing an abstract of all the facts and pleadings necessary to the full understanding of a case.

The issues in actions, etc., upon special pleadings, made up by the clerk of the papers, who is an officer for that purpose. Upon an issue in law, it is termed the demurrer-book. The clerks of the papers of the court of K. B., in all copies of pleas and paper-books by them made up, shall subscribe to such paper-books the names of the counsel who have signed such pleas, as well on behalf of the plaintiff as defendant; and in all paper-books delivered to the judges of the court, the names of the counsel who did sign those pleas are to be subscribed to the books by the clerks or attorneys who deliver the same. Jac. L. Dict.; 2 Hill, Abr. 288.

The courts of error, and other courts, on arguments, require that the judges shall each be furnished with such a paper-book; Tr. & H. Pr. 687. In Pennsylvania the printed copy of the record, the argument, etc., used in the supreme and superior courts is so called.

In the court of king's bench, in England, the transcript containing the whole of the proceedings filed or delivered between the parties, when the issue joined is an issue in fact, is called the paper-book. Stebb. Pl. 95; 3 Bla. Com. 317; 3 Chitt. Pr. 52f; 2 Stra. 1181, 1266; 2 Wils. 248.

In modern English practice under the Jud. Act of 1875, printed copies of every special case must now be delivered by the plaintiff (Ord. xxxiv. r. 3). And any party who enters an action for trial must deliver to the officer of the court a copy of the whole of the pleadings in the action for the use of the judge at the trial. Ord. xxxvi. r. 17.

PAPER CREDIT. Credit given on the security of any written obligation purporting to represent property.

PAPER-DAYS. In English Law. Days on which special arguments are to take place. Tuesdays and Fridays in term-time are paper-days appointed by the court. Lee, Dict. of Pr.; Arobb. Pr. 101.

PAPER MILL. See PAPER OFFICE.

PAPER MONEY. The engagements to pay money which are issued by governments and banks, and which pass as money. Parlessus, Droit. Com. n. 9. Bank-notes are generally considered as cash, and will answer all the purposes of currency; but paper money is not a legal tender if objected to. But see LEGAL TENDER.

See NATIONAL BANKS; MONEY; GOLD.

PAPER OFFICE; PAPER MILL. In 1578 Queen Elizabeth established "the Office of Her Majesty's Papers and Records for Business of State and Council," and appointed a keeper of the papers. This office—popularly known as the Paper Office—existed until 1854 at a number of different addresses in and about Whitehall. Upon the death in 1854 of the then keeper of the State papers, the Paper Office became merged in the Public Record Office.

In the old Court of King's Bench there was an office known as the Paper Office or Paper Mill. In it were kept the records of the Court pending their removal to the Treasury of the Exchequer, in which latter office all records of the Courts were finally deposited. Byrne. See RECORD OFFICE.

PAPER TITLE. A title to land evidenced by one or more conveyances, the term generally implying that such title, while it has color or plausibility, is without substantial validity. Black, L. Diet.

PAPERS. The term does not mean newspapers or perhaps even include them within the meaning of a statute, the object of which is to prevent a jury from receiving any evidence, papers, or documents not authorized by the court. 42 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 216. In a will, "all my books and papers" include a promissory note; 49 N. H. 107.

The constitution of the United States provides that the rights of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated. See SEARCH WARRANT; VALUABLE PAPERS.

PAPIST. A term applied by Protestants to Roman Catholics.

By the act of 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, known as the Catholic Emancipation Act, Roman Catholics were restored in general to the full enjoyment of all civil rights, except that of holding ecclesiastical offices and certain high appointments in the state. Before that act their condition had been much ameliorated by various statutes, beginning with 18 Geo. III. c. 60. As to the right of holding property for religious purposes, the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 115, placed them on a level with Protestant dissenters, and the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 49, repealed all enactments oppressive to Roman Catholics. See Whart. Lex.

See 2 Phill. Int. L. for a history of the political status of the Papacy.

PAR. Equal. It is used to denote a state of equality or equal value. Bills of exchange, stocks, and the like, are at par when they sell for their nominal value; above par, or below par, when they sell for more or less; 87 Ga. 324; 8 Paige 527; 23 Pa. 479.

PAR DELICTUM. Equal guilt. See IN PARI DELICTO; PARI DELICTO.

PAR OF EXCHANGE. The par of the currencies of any two countries means the equivalence of a certain amount of the currency of the one in the currency of the other, supposing the currency of both to be of the precise weight and purity fixed by their respective mints. 26 Wend. 224. The exchange between the two countries is said to be at par when bills are negotiated on this footing. Bowen, Pol. Econ. 321. See 11 East 267.

PAR ONERI. Equal to the burden or charge, or to the detriment or damage.

PAR VALUE. A current phrase having no other meaning than the value of the pound sterling formerly fixed by law for the purposes of revenue. 10 Allen 44. It is commonly used to indicate the face value of bonds or stock.

A phrase which implies a dollar in money for every dollar in security. Anderson; 26 Wend. 224.

PARAGE. Equality of blood, name, or dignity, but more especially of land in the partition of an inheritance between co-heirs. Co. Litt. 166 b. See TENURE.

In Feudal Law. Where heirs took of the same stock and by same title, but from right of primogeniture, or some other cause, the shares were unequal, the younger was said to hold of the elder, jure of feodo parage, by right and title of parage, being equal in everything but the quantity, and owing no homage or fealty. Calv. Lex. See 3 Poll. & Matl. 261, 274, 289.

PARAGIUM (from the Latin adjective par, equal; made a substantive by the addition of agium; 1 Thomas Co. Litt. 691). Equality.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The portion which a woman gets on her marriage. Ayl. Par. 336.

PARAGRAPH. A distinct part of a discourse or writing relating to a particular point.

An entire or integral statement of a cause of action equivalent to a count at common law. 63 Fed. Rep. 488. Where a complaint contains several causes of action, each must be distinctly paragraphed and numbered; 19 U. S. App. 157.

PARALLEL. Extending in the same direction, and in all parts equidistant; having the same direction or tendency. 14 S. E. Rep. (Va.) 803. See 144 Mass. 254.

In the specification of a patent the word was construed in its popular sense of going side by side and not in its purely mathematical sense; 3 App. Cas. 423; and so in 82 Cal. 281; 2 Cal. Cas. 363; 5 Johns. 499; 3 Mo. 1081, where it was held that parallel lines were not necessarily straight lines. As to parallel and competing railroads, see MERGE.

Parallel Line. Two "parallel lines" of railroad are lines running in one general direction, traversing the same section of country and running within a few miles of each other. Two lines are parallel when they run between the same two points or localities. 144 Ky. 330, 138 S. W. 291.

PARALYSIS. Loss or material diminution of the power of contractility in the voluntary or involuntary muscles, and sometimes of the power of perceiving sensations, in one or more parts of the body; palsy. Stand. Dict.

There are two types of paralysis; organic paralysis resulting from a neural lesion, and functional paralysis due, not to a physiological lesion of the nervous system, but to dissociation. The latter type is often wrongly attributed to malingering. It is a common symptom of hysteria. There are three kinds of organic paralysis depending upon the locus of the neural lesion: upper motor neurone, lower motor neurone, and peripheral paralyses.

Monoplegia: paralysis of a single limb or other muscle group.

Paraplegia: paralysis of the lower extremities.

Hemiplegia: paralysis of one side.

Diplegia: paralysis of both sides.

Ophthalmoplegia: paralysis of eye muscles internal or external. Bridges, Outline Ab. Psych. 89. See APOPLECT; LIL-NESE; PARESIS.

That which is superior; usually applied to the highest lord of the fee of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. Fitch. N. B. 135. Where A lets land to B, and he underlets them to C, in this case A is the paramount and B is the mesne landlord. See 2 Bla. Com. 90; 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 484, n. 79, 485, n. 81; MESNE.

PARANOIA. A form of insanity which comes under the class of degenerative diseases. The main fundamental characteristic of this disease is a delusion which has become a part of the belief of the individual, and which he believes himself able to explain and defend. 3 With. & Beck.

Med. Jur. 288.

A chronic progressive psychosis which occurs mostly in adult life, and develops on the basis of certain character anomalies. In this type of psychosis, delusions are well systematized, usually taking the form of false interpretation of facts, and might very well be true. They are persecutory and expansive. The delusional system appears so logical that others may be persuaded of its truth. There are numerous forms of paranoia resulting from the general trend of the delusion. For example, the delirium of revindication (Litigious paranoia) is the form in which the patient is continually seeking legal redress for supposed wrongs; inventive paranoia, in which the patient besieges patent offices with his many usually useless devices; religious paranoia, in which the patient develops some original but usually fantastic religious system, etc. The courts have the first type of paranoia to contend with most frequently, i. e., Litigious paranoia. Bridges, Outline of Ab. Psych. 136, 137.

It is sometimes characterized as logical perversion, and is said to have "misplaced the antiquated term monomania, which not only implied that the delusion was restricted to one subject, but was otherwise insufficient and misleading;" 2 Clevenger, Med. Jur. 860. The memory, emotions, judgment, and conceptions are in most cases unimpaired, though each of these mental divisions may be involved; id. The intellect is rarely much involved. In all other relations the individual may be able to carry on his business in life. There is little doubt but that they are thoroughly responsible for their own actions. But if the act be the result of their delusion it is not so much a question of their ability to control their actions, as that they do not attempt to do so. 3 With. & Beck. 289.

PARAPHERNA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Goods brought by wife to husband over and above her dower (dow). Voc. Jur. Utr.; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 23, § 6; Mack. C. L. § 529.

PARAPHERNALIA. Apparel and ornaments of a wife, suitable to her rank and degree. 2 Bla. Com. 435.

Those goods which a wife could bequeath by her testament. 3 Poll. & Matl. 427.

These are subject to the control of the husband during his lifetime; 3 Atk. 394; but go to the wife upon his death, in preference to all other representatives; Cro. Car. 348; and cannot be devised away by the husband; Noy, Max. They are liable to be sold to pay debts on a failure of assets; 1 P. Wms. 730. See, also, 2 Atk. 642; 11 Vin. Abr. 176. The judge of probate may, in the practice of most states, make an allowance to the widow of a deceased person which more than takes the place of the paraphernalia.

While a married woman may acquire title to articles of apparel by gift from her husband, yet her mere use and enjoyment of such articles purchased by her husband does not give title thereto as her separate property; 12 S. C. 180; s. c. 32 Am. Rep. 508. See, also, 86 Ohio St. 514. The wearing apparel purchased by a married woman after her marriage, with her husband's money, or upon his credit, belongs to him as against her creditors; 87 Mich. 62. In New York, by statute, a married woman may sue in her own name for injury to her paraphernalia; 48 N. Y. 212; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 548; but in the absence of proof of a gift to her, the husband can sue; 74 N. Y. 116; s. c. 30 Am. Rep. 271.

In some states, the paraphernalia of a wife is protected by statute (in Georgia by name, and in Rhode Island and Colorado by description). The articles covered by one or more of the statutes are: wearing apparel of the wife and such ornaments, jewelry, silver, table ware, plate, and such articles of property as have been given to her for her own use and comfort. In Louisiana the property not declared to be brought in marriage by the wife, or given to her in consideration of the marriage, is paraphernalia, and she has a right to administer it without the assistance of her husband; but as to any which is administered by her husband without her opposition, he is accountable for it. See MARRIED WOMAN.

PARAPHERNAUX BIENS. In French Law. All the property of the wife which is not subject to the régime dotal. Brown.

The wife has the entire administration of this property; but she may allow the husband to enjoy it, and in that case he is not liable to account. B. & L. Dict.; Brown.

PARAPLEGIA. See PARALYSIS.

PARASYNEXIS. In Civil Law. A conventicle or unlawful meeting. Whart.

PARATITLA (Lat.). In Civil Law. An abbreviated explanation of some titles or books of the Code or Digest.

PARATUM HABEO (Lat. I have ready). In Practice. A return made by the sheriff to a capias ad respondendum, which signified that he had the defendant ready to bring into court. This was a fiction, where the defendant was at large. Afterwards he was required, by statute, to take bail from the defendant, and he returned cepi corpus and bail-bond. But still he might be ruled to bring in the body; 7 Pa. 535.

PARAVAIL. Tenant paravail is the lowest tenant of the fee, or he who is the immediate tenant to one who holds of another. He is called tenant paravail because it is presumed he has the avails or profits of the land. Fitzh. N. B. 135; Co. 2d Inst. 296.

PARCEL. A part of the estate. 38 La. 141; 1 Comyns, Dig. Abatement (H 51), Grant (E 10). Under a statute providing for an assessment of unplatted lands, synonymous with lot. 38 N.E. Rep. (Ind.) 468. To parcel is to divide an estate. Bac. Abr. Conditions (O).

A small bundle or package.

The word "parcel" is not a sufficient description of the property alleged in an indictment to have been stolen. The prisoner was indicted for stealing "one parcel, of the value of one shilling, of the goods," etc. The parcel in question was taken from the hold of a vessel, out of a box broken open by the prisoner. Held an insufficient description; 7 Cox, C. C. 13. See PACKAGE.

PARCEL MAKERS. Two officers in the exchequer who formerly made the parcels of the escheator's accounts, wherein they charged them for everything they had levied for the sovereign's use within the time of their being in office, and delivered the same to the auditors to make up their accounts therewith. Whart. Law Lex.

PARCEL POST. Domestic. Fourth-class matter embraces that known as domestic parcel-post mail exceeding 8 ounces in weight and includes merchandise, farm and factory products, seeds, cuttings, bulbs, roots, scions, and plants, books (including catalogues), circulars and other printed matter, and all other mailable matter not embraced in the first and second classes. U. S. Off. Postal Guide, 1924, p. 11. See MAIL MATTER, DOMESTIC; MAILABLE, UNMAILABLE.

International (Foreign). International parcel-post service is maintained by direct or indirect service; that is, parcels are either dispatched from the United States by steamships landing parcel-post mails at a port in the country of destination or are dispatched from the United States to some intermediate country for onward dispatch in the parcel-post mails of that intermediate country to the place of destination. Id.; 108 et seq.

PARCELS, BILL OF. See BILL OF PARCELS.

PARCENARY. The state or condition of holding title to lands jointly by parceners, before the common inheritance has been divided.

PARCENERS. The daughters of a man or woman seized of lands and tenements in fee-simple or fee-tail, on whom, after the death of such ancestor, such lands and tenements descend, and they enter. See ESTATE IN COPARCENARY.

PARCHMENT. Sheepskins dressed for writing, so called from Pergamus, Asia Minor, where they were invented. Used for deeds, and was used for writs of summons in England previous to the Judicature Act, 1875. Whart. Lex.

PARCO FRACTO (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ against one who violently breaks a pound and takes from thence beasts which, for some trespass done, or some other just cause, were lawfully impounded.

PARDON. An act of grace, usually proceeding from the power intrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual on whom it is bestowed from the punishment which the law inflicts for a crime he has committed. 7 Pet. 160; 19 N. Y. S. 508.

Every pardon granted to the guilty is in derogation of the law; if the pardon be equitable, the law is bad; for where legislation and the administration of the law are perfect, pardons must be a violation of the law. But, as human actions are necessarily imperfect, the pardoning power must be vested somewhere, in order to prevent injustice when it is ascertained that an error has been committed.

An absolute pardon is one which frees the criminal without any condition whatever.

A conditional pardon is one to which a condition is annexed, performance of which is necessary to the validity of the pardon. 1 Bail. 283; 10 Ark. 284; 1 McCord 176; 1 Park. Cr. Cas. 47. See 27 N. J. L. 637.

A general pardon is one which extends to all offenders of the same kind. It may be express, as when a general declaration is made that all offenders of a certain class shall be pardoned, or implied, as in case of the repeal of a penal statute. 2 Over. 423.

The pardoning power is lodged in the executive of the United States and of the various states, and extends to all offences except in cases of impeachment. In some states a concurrence of one of the legislative bodies is required; in other states, boards of pardon have been provided, whose recommendation of a pardon to the executive is a prerequisite to the exercise of the power. See the titles of the several states. The constitutional power of pardon vested in the executive is not subject to legislative control, either to limit the effect of a pardon, or to exclude from its operation any class of offenders; 4 Wall. 333; 169 Pa. 316. In Pennsylvania, the act of March 81, 1860, provides that when any person convicted of a felony, etc., has endured his punishment, it shall have the same effect as a pardon, and he becomes a competent witness; this is a legislative pardon and has the same effect as an executive pardon; 58 Fed. Rep. 352. The pardoning power is by no means confined to the executive; it was possessed by parliament (4 Bla. Com. 401; 7 Pet. 162); and from the very nature of government, in Pennsylvania it is vested in the legislative branch by the inherent supreme law-making power, and in the executive by constitutional provision; 58 Fed. Rep. 352.

The power of pardon conferred by the constitution upon the president is unlimited, except in cases of impeachment. It extends to every offence known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken, or during their pendency, or after conviction and judgment. A pardon reaches the punishment prescribed for an offence, and the guilt of the offender. If granted before conviction, it prevents any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching; if granted after conviction, it removes the penalties and disabilities, and restores him to all his civil rights. It gives him a new credit and capacity. It blots out his guilt and makes him, in the eye of the law, as innocent as if he had never committed the offence. There is only this limitation to its operation; it does not restore offices forfeited, or property or interests vested in others, in consequence of the conviction and judgment; 4 Wall. 333. See 68 Ky. 156; 26 N. J. L. 326; 27 id. 637. It may be granted after conviction and before sentence while exceptions are pending; 109 Mass. 338, where there is an extended discussion of the pardoning power by Gray, J.

The granting of a full and unconditional pardon by the president to a person convicted of a felony restores his competency as a witness, and this result is not affected by a recital in a pardon that it was granted for the reason, among others, that his testimony was desired by the government in a cause then pending in a federal court; 142 U. S. 450; and a pardon granted after the person has served his term of imprisonment has the same effect; 80 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 98.

There are several ways (as given by Judge Cooley) in which the pardoning power of the president may be exercised: 1. A pardon may be given to a person under conviction by name, and this will take effect from its delivery, unless otherwise provided therein. 2. It may be given to one or more persons named, or to a class of persons, before conviction, and even before prosecution begun. Such a pardon is rather in the nature of an amnesty. 3. It may be given by proclamation, forgiving all persons who may have been guilty of the specified offence, or offences; 4 Wall. 330, 390; 13 id. 128; and in this case the pardon takes effect from the time the proclamation is signed; 17 Wall. 191. See infra. 4. It may in any of these ways be made a pardon on conditions to be first performed, in which case it has effect only on performance; or on conditions to be thereafter performed, in which case a breach of the condition will place the offender in the position occupied by him before the pardon was issued; 7 Pet. 150; 2 Caines 57; 1 McCord 176; 64 Cal. 29.

In Michigan it has been held that a pardoned convict charged with having violated the conditions of his release must be arrested and tried in the same manner as other offenders against the law; 62 Mich. 490; but in South Carolina a convict who has broken the conditions of his pardon may be remanded to the penitentiary to serve out the remainder of his sentence, though the time in which he was to serve has expired; 32 S. C. 14. A power to grant pardons on condition that the person pardoned shall leave the state and not return to it, is not in conflict with a constitutional provision which provides that no one shall be exiled from the state; 38 S. W. Rep. (Ark.) 106.

It is to be exercised in the discretion of the power with whom it is lodged.

As to promises of pardon to accomplices, see 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 88; 1 Leach 115.

In order to render a pardon valid, it must express with accuracy the crime intended to be forgiven; 4 Bla. Com. 400; 3 Wash. C. C. 385; 7 Ind. 359; 1 Jones N. C. 1.

The effect of a pardon is to protect the criminal from punishment for the offence pardoned; 6 Wall. 766; 16 id. 147; 91 U. S. 474; but for no other; 10 Ala. 475; 1 Bay 34. It seems that the pardon of an assault and battery, which afterwards becomes murder by the death of the person beaten, would not operate as a pardon of the murder; 12 Pick. 496. See Plowd. 401; 1 Hill N. Y. 426. In general, the effect of a full pardon is to restore the convict to all his rights; 169 Pa. 319; even though granted after he has served out his sentence, it restores his competency to testify; 23 U. S. App. 844; 142 U. S. 450; but to this there are some exceptions. First, it does not restore civil capacity; 2 Leigh

724. See 1 Strobb. 150; 2 Wheel. Cr. Cas. 431; 33 N. H. 338. Second, it does not affect a status of other persons which has been altered or a right which has accrued in consequence of the commission of the crime or its punishment; 10 Johns. 232; 2 Bay 565; 5 Gilm. 214; or third persons who, by the prosecution of judicial proceedings, may have acquired rights to a share in penalties or to property forfeited and actually sold; 4 Wash. C. C. 64; 9 Fed. Rep. 645; but see 4 Biss. 316; 4 Wall. 766 (as to forfeiture to U. S.).

In England a pardon removes not only the punishment but the legal disabilities consequent on the crime, wherever the latter are the consequence of the judgment, but where it is declared by act of parliament to be a part of the punishment, as in case of perjury under the 6 Eliz. c. 9, pardon will not make the person competent; 2 Russ. Cr. 975, followed in 1 Park. Cr. Rep. 241; 24 Ill. 298. See 11 Am. Jur. 356. But this distinction does not obtain here; 169 Pa. 316; 4 Wall. 333. It has been held in Ohio that a prisoner could not be tried on the charge of being a habitual criminal after having been pardoned by the governor for the previous offence; 56 Alb. L. J. 5.

When the pardon is general, either by an act of amnesty, or by the repeal of a penal law, it is not necessary to plead it; because the court is bound, ex officio, to take notice of it; Baldw. 91; 145 U. S. 546. A criminal cannot even waive such pardon, because by his admittance no one can give the court power to punish him when it judicially appears there is no law to do it. But when the pardon is special, to avail the criminal it must judicially appear that it has been accepted; and for this reason it must be specially pleaded; 4 Bla. Com. 401; 7 Pet. 160, 163; and if he has obtained a pardon before arraignment, and, instead of pleading it in bar, he pleads the general issue, he shall be deemed to have waived the benefit of it, and cannot afterwards avail himself of it in arrest of judgment; 1 Rolle 207. See 1 Dy. 34 a; 1 Raym. 13; 3 Metc. Mass. 453.

The power to pardon extends to punishments for contempt; 7 Blatch. 23.

All contracts made for the buying or procuring a pardon for a convict are void; and such contracts will be declared null by a court of equity, on the ground that they are opposed to public policy; 4 Bouvier, Inst. 3857.

A mayor of a city may be vested with power to pardon one convicted of the violation of an ordinance. See 46 Fed. Rep. 52. See AMNESTY.

PARDONERS. Persons who carried about the pope's indulgences and sold them. Whart. Law Lex.

PARENS PATRIÆ (Lat.). Father of his country. In England, the king; 8 Bla. Com. 427; 2 Steph. Com. 528; in the United States the state, as sovereign, has power of guardianship over persons under disabilities. See 17 How. 393.

PARENTAGE. Kindred in the direct ascending line. See 2 Bouv. Inst. n. 1935. For a discussion of the subject in connection with citizenship, see 2 Kent 49; Morse, Citizenship; CITIZEN; NATURALIZATION.

PARENTAL RIGHTS. See COMPULSORY SCHOOL ATTENDANCE ACTS.

PARENTELA. The sum of those persons who trace descent from one ancestor. 2 Poll. & Maitl. 294. See LINE.

This, or the fuller form of parentela se tollere, signified a renunciation of kindred and of all rights of inheritance from them, effected in court before twelve men, who made oath that they believed it to be done for good cause. Byrne; Leg. Hen. I. c. 88.

PARENTS. The lawful father and mother of the party spoken of. 1 Murph. N. C. 336; 11 S. & R. 98.

The term parent differs from that of ancestor, the latter embracing not only the father and mother, but every person in an ascending line. It differs also from predecessor, which is applied to corporators. 7 Ves. Ch. 529; 1 Murph. N. C. 336; 6 Binn. 255. See FATHER; MOTHER.

By the civil law, grandfathers and grandmothers, and other ascendants, were, in certain cases, considered parents. Dict. de Jur. Parents. See 1 Ashm. 55; 2 Kent 169; 5 East 223.

PARES (Lat.). A man's equals; his peers. 8 Bla. Com. 849.

PARES CURIE (Lat.). In Feudal Law. Those vassals who were bound to attend the lord's court. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, tit. 3, s. 17; 1 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. 1. See MAGNA CHARTA.

PARESIS. Paresis is another name for dementia paralytica, or general paralysis of the insane. It is a chronic psychosis of middle age characterized by progressive mental deterioration leading to absolute dementia, and by physical symptoms leading to paralysis and death usually within three years. Rapid progressive intellectual enfeeblement is a fundamental symptom. There are several predisposing causes of paresis, such as hereditary taints, and social factors. The exciting causes are emotional stress, cranial traumatism, excessive alcoholism and syphilis, which is probably the essential cause, sine qua non. Bridges, Outline Ab. Psych. 151-155. See PARALYSIS.

PARI DELICTO (Lat.). In a similar offence or crime; equal in guilt or in legal fault.

A person who is in pari delicto with another differs from a particeps criminis in this, that the former term always includes the latter, but the latter does not always include the former. 8 East 331.

Ordinarily where two persons are in pari delicto the law will not relieve them; see CONTRIBUTION. But this doctrine does not apply where a president of a national bank has borrowed an amount exceeding twenty per cent. of its capital stock and suit is brought to recover the amount; 49 N. Y. Supp. 270.

The rule that both parties to an ultra vires contract are in pari delicto, and therefore a court of equity will not interpose to restore to one of them rights which it has thus parted with, is inapplicable to a municipal corporation whose trustees attempt to make an invalid grant; 56 Fed. Rep. 667.

PARI MATERIA (Lat.). Of the same matter; on the same subject; as laws pari materia must be construed with reference to each other. Bacon, Abr. Statute (13).

PARI PASSU (Lat.). By the same gradation. Used especially of creditors who, in marshalling assets, are entitled to receive out of the same fund without any precedence over each other.

PARI PASSU BONDS. A name given in Scotland to certain bonds secured upon lands which share an equal benefit of the security. Where several securities are created over the same lands by separate bonds and dispositions in security, they would ordinarily have priority according to the date of registration of the sasine or bond, as the case may be. If it is intended to have them rank as pari passu, it is usual to insert a clause in each bond declaring that they shall be so ranked without regard to their priority of registration. 9 Jurid. Rev. 74.

PARIS, DECLARATION OF. See DECLARATION OF PARIS; BLOCKADE; NEUTRALITY.

PARIS MUTUAL. See FRENCH POOL.

PARISH. A district of country, of different extents. As used in the revised statutes, the word is synonymous with county; 28 Fed. Rep. 840; as also in the state of Louisiana.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The territory committed to the charge of a parson, or vicar, or other minister. Ayl. Par. 404; 2 Bla. Com. 112; Hoffm. Ecol. Law.

Although, in the absence of a state church in this country, the status of parishes is comparatively unimportant, yet in the Protestant Episcopal Church, at least, their boundaries and the rights of the clergy therein are quite clearly defined by canon. In the leading case of Stubbs and Buggs v. Treg, decided in New York, in March, 1848, the defendant was found guilty of violating a canon of the church, in having officiated, without the permission of plaintiffs within the corporate bounds of the city of New Brunswick, N. J., which then constituted the plaintiffs' parochial cure. Haun 108. As to their origin, see 2 Hallam, Mid. Ages, c. 7, p. 144. See also, 1 Poll. & Maitl. 488, 602.

In New England. Divisions of a town, originally territorial, but which now constitute quasi-corporations, consisting of those connected with a certain church. See 2 Mass. 501; 16 id. 457, 488; 1 Pick. 91. Synonymous with church and used in the same sense as society. 16 Conn. 299.

PARISH APPRENTICES. The children of parents unable to maintain them, who are apprenticed by the overseers of the poor of their parish, to such persons as may be willing to receive them. 2 Steph. Com. 230.

PARISH CLERK. In English Law. An officer, in former times often in holy orders, and appointed to officiate at the altar; now his duty consists chiefly in making responses in church to the minister. By common law he has a freehold in his office, but it seems now to be falling into desuetude. 2 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 713; Moz. & W.

PARISH CONSTABLE. See CONSTABLE.

PARISH COURT. In Louisiana the local courts in each parish, corresponding generally to county and probate courts, and, in some respects, justices' courts, in other states were formerly so called.

PARISH OFFICERS. Churchwardens, overseers, and constables.

PARISH PRIEST. The parson; a minister who holds a parish as a benefice.

If the predial tithes are appropriated, he is called "rector"; if impropriated "vicar." R. & L. Dict.

PARISHIONERS. Members of a parish. In England, for many purposes they form a body politic. See PARISH.

PARITOR. A beadle; a summoner to the courts of civil law.

PARIUM JUDICIUM (Lat. the decision of equals). The right of trial by one's peers: i. e. by jury in the case of a commoner, by the house of peers in the case of a peer.

PARK (L. Lat. parcus). An inclosure. 2 Bla. Com. 38. A pound. Reg. Orig. 166; Cowell. An inclosed chase extending only over a man's own grounds. 13 Car. II. c. 10; Manw. For. Laws; Crompton, Jur. fol. 148; 2 Bla. Com. 38.

A pleasure-ground in or near a city, set apart for the recreation of the public; a piece of ground enclosed for purposes of pleasure, exercise, amusement, or ornament. 86 N. Y. 120. A place for the resort of the public for recreation, air, and light; a place open for everyone. 40 N. J. L. 618. See 98 Cal. 43.

Public parks may be dedicated to the public like highways; 148 Mass. 521; 23 Ore. 176; and at common law, upon such dedication, the fee remains in the owners; 154 Mass. 828. Non-user by the public, however long continued, will not affect the public right or revert the title in the donor; 81 Wis. 318. The title is usually vested in municipalities by the legislature; 106 N. Y. 496; 27 Mich. 262; 148 Mass. 580; and held by them in trust for the use of the public. The municipality cannot lease them; 60 Ga. 321; nor can the legislature; 7 Ohio 218; but see 3 West. L. Bul. 561, where a right of way was granted through a public park in consideration of an agreed rental.

A public park may be crossed by a street railway where such use will not materially interfere with its enjoyment by the public; 76 Cal. 176; and compensation may not be demanded for the taking; 44 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 446; but it is also held that parks dedicated to the public use are not subject to a right of way for a street railway, and that neither the municipality nor the legislature can divert them for that purpose; 67 Ill. 540; Booth, St. Ry. L. § 11.

A park or public square may be enclosed, notwithstanding it has remained open many years; 58 Tex. 188; 2 Ohio St. 107; contra, 3 Pa. 206, where it was held that a public square was as much a highway as though it were a street, and that neither the county nor the public could block it up, to the prejudice of the public or an individual. See, also, 3 Ore. 226; 85 Mo. 674.

A city is not bound to keep parks in safe condition; 148 Mass. 580; 128 id. 584; and is not liable for injuries caused by a horse frightened by the firing of a cannon therein; 148 Mass. 580; but it must contribute to an assessment for the improvement of streets by which a park is bounded in common with private owners benefited thereby; 42 Ill. 192.

As to the right of the municipality to make regulations for the preservation of order in a park or public square, see POLICE POWER; LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

See, generally, DEDICATION; EMINENT DOMAIN; RAILROAD; PUBLIC PARK.

PARLE HILL (also called Parling Hill). A hill where courts were held in olden times. Cowell. See MALBERGE.

PARLIAMENT' (said to be derived from parler la ment, to speak the mind, or parum lamentum).

In English Law. The legislative branch of the government of Great Britain, consisting of the house of lords and the house of commons.

The parliament is usually considered to consist of the kings, lords, and commons. See 1 Bla. Com. 147; 157; Chitty's note; 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 241. In 1 Woodd. Lect. 30, the lords temporal, the lords spiritual, and the commons are called the three estates of the realm: yet the king is called a part of the parliament, in right of his prerogative of veto and the necessity of his approval to the passage of a bill. That the connection between the king and the lords temporal, the lords spiritual, and the commons, who when assembled in parliament form the three estates of the realm, is the same as that which subsists between the king and those estates—the people at large—out of parliament, the king not being in either case a member, branch, or co-estate, but standing solely in the relation of sovereign or head. See Colton. Record 710; Rot. Parl. vol. iii. 623 a; 2 M. & G. 457. n.

The House of Lords was the supreme court of judicature in the kingdom. It had no original jurisdiction (except to a certain extent before the reign of Charles II.), but was the court of appeal in the last resort with a few exceptions and under some limitations as to the right, from the inferior courts upon appeal or writ of error for mistakes of law. Appeals lay to this tribunal from Scotch and Irish courts, in some cases. See stat. 4 Geo. IV. c. 85, as to Scotch, and stat. 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 67, art. 8, as to Irish, appeals.

This body, when sitting as a court of law, was presided over by the lord chancellor, whose attendance alone was in any respect compulsory, and was composed of as many of its members who had filled judicial stations as chose to attend. Three laymen also attended in rotation, but did not vote upon judicial matters; 11 Cl. & F. 421. In the absence of the chancellor, deputy speakers, who were members of the profession but not of the house, have been appointed; 3 Bla. Com. 66.

By statute 30 & 40 Vict. ch. 66, an appeal, by petition, lies to the House of Lords from the Court of Appeal in England and from Scotch and Irish courts from which an appeal or writ of error formerly lay to the House of Lords. The appeal is heard by the Lord Chancellor, two Lords of Appeal in Ordinary (whose appointment is provided for by the act), and such peers as are holders of or have held certain high judicial offices. The House of Lords sits also to try impeachments.

Records of writs summoning knights, burgesses, and citizens to parliament are first found towards the end of the reign of Henry III., such writs having issued in the thirty-eighth and forty-ninth years of his reign. 4 Bla. Com. 425; Prynce, 4th inst. 2. The earliest parliamentary roll is said to be 1290. 1 Pol. & Maint. 175. In the reign of Edward III. it assumed its present form. Since the reign of Edward III. the history of England shows an almost constant increase in the power of parliament. Anne was the last sovereign who exercised the royal prerogative of veto; and, as this prerogative no longer practically exists, the authority of parliament is absolutely unrestrained. The parliament can only meet when convened by the sovereign, except on the demise of the sovereign with no parliament in being, in which case the last parliament is to assemble; 6 Anne, c. 7. The sovereign has also power to prorogue and dissolve the parliament. The origin of the English parliament seems traceable to the witena-gemote of the Saxon kings. Encyc. Brit. A recent writer traces the origin back to the local institutions of the Germanic tribes, but considers that the final stages of its growth are to be sought in the period between the accession of Henry II. and the close of the reign of Edward I.; 1 Social Eng. 396. See May, Law, Priv. and Proc. of Parliament; St. Armand, Legislative Power; Bagehot, English Constitution; Pike, History of the House of Lords; Hiaon Court of PARLIAMENT; FOLK-GEOMOTE; WITENA-GEOMOTE; LEGISLATIVE POWER; PEERS; HOUSE OF LORDS.

PARLIAMENT. See CONVENTION PARLIAMENT.

PARLIAMENTARY ACT. The act of 1911 which provided that an act can be passed by the sovereign and the Commons without the concurrence of the Lords, in the circumstances set forth in the act. Byrne. Before 1911 acts of Parliament were invariably made by the sovereign with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons in Parliament assembled. Id.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENTS. Persons professionally employed in the promotion of or opposition to private bills, and otherwise in relation to private business in parliament. Whart. Law Lex. Business in relation to private bills must be transacted through them, and counsel may be instructed by them. 2 Brett, Com. 775.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE. A committee of members of the house of peers, or of the house of commons, appointed by either house for the purpose of making inquiries, by the examination of witnesses or otherwise, into matters which could not be conveniently inquired into by the whole house. Whart. Law Lex.

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEES. These consist of (1) committees of the whole House, (2) standing or sessional committees, (3) select committees, (4) joint committees.

A committee of the whole House, whether in the Lords or the Commons, is really the House of Lords or the House of Commons, as the case may be, presided over by a chairman instead of by the Lord Chancellor or the Speaker. In the House of Commons, there are the Committee of Supply and the Committee of Ways and Means. These committees do not legislate. They merely pass resolutions on financial matters. But a resolution of the Committee of Ways and Means which varies or renews taxation has, under the Provisional Collection of Taxes Act, 1913, statutory effect for a limited period. That act was passed because it was decided—as indeed was obvious—that the practice which had grown up of acting on resolutions of the Committee of Ways and Means before they had been embodied in an Act of Parliament was wholly illegal.

The standing or sessional committees and the select committees consist in each House of a certain number of members who perform various functions in connection with bills.

Joint committees consist of equal numbers of members of each House. Since 1864 they have frequently been constituted; but between 1695 and 1864 there had been no such committee. Byrne.

PARLIAMENTARY COUNSEL TO THE TREASURY. An office established in 1869, which was to be responsible for the preparation of all government bills, and which should be subordinate to the Treasury and thus brought into immediate relation, not only with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but with the First Lord of the Treasury, who was usually Prime Minister.

The Parliamentary Counsel was to settle all such departmental bills, and draw all such other governmental bills (except Scotch and Irish bills) as he might be required by the Treasury to settle and draw. The instructions for the preparation of every bill were to be in writing and sent to the heads of the departments to the Parliamentary Counsel through the Treasury, to which latter department he was to be considered responsible. On the requisition of the Treasury he was to advise on all cases arising on bills or acts drawn by him, and to report in special cases referred to him by the Treasury on bills brought in by private members. It was not to be part of his duty to write memoranda or schemes for bills, or to attend parliamentary committees, unless under instructions from the Treasury.

The staff of the Parliamentary Counsel's office still remains practically the same as when first established in 1869. The permanent staff consists of the Parliamentary Counsel and the Assistant Parliamentary Counsel, with three shorthand writers, an office-keeper, and an office boy, and these together run what may be called the legislative workshop. Ilbert, Legis. Meth. & Forms 84-86.

PARLIAMENTARY LAW. That body of the recognized usages of parliamentary and legislative assemblies by which their procedure is regulated, which takes its name from the British parliament and on the practice of which it is mainly founded, with such changes and modifications in American deliberative bodies as have been necessary to adapt it to the usages of that country. See MEETINGS; QUORUM.

PARLIAMENTUM DIABOLICUM. A parliament held at Coventry, 88 Henry VI., wherein Edward, Earl of March (afterwards Edward IV.), and many of the chief nobility were attainted, was so called; but the acts then passed were annulled by the succeeding parliament. Jacob.

PARLIAMENTUM INDOCTUM (Lat. unlearned parliament). A name applied to a parliament assembled at Coventry, under a law that no lawyer should be a member of it. 6 Hen. IV.; 1 Bla. Com. 177; Walsingham 412. n. 30; Rot. Parl. 6 Hen. IV.

PARLIAMENTUM INSANUM. A parliament assembled at Oxford, 41 Hen. III., so styled from the madness of their proceedings, and because the lords came to it with armed men. Jacob. See MAD PARLIAMENT.

PARLOR CAR. See SLEEPING CAR

PAROCHE. A parish.

PAROCHIAL BOARD. In Scotch Law. A body of men in a parish who manage the relief of the poor. Ersk. Prin. 612.

PAROL (more properly, parole. A French word, which means, literally, word, or speech). A term used to distinguish contracts which are made verbally, or in writing not under seal, which are called parol contracts, from those which are under seal, which bear the name of deeds or specialties. 1 Chitty, Contr., 12th ed. 7; 7 Term 350; 3 Johns. Cas. 60; 1 Chitty, Pl. 86. When a contract is made under seal, and afterwards it is modified verbally, it becomes wholly a parol contract; 3 Watts 451; 9 Pick. 293. See CONTRACT.

Pleadings are frequently denominated the parol. In some instances the term parol is used to denote the entire pleadings in a cause: as, when in an action brought against an infant heir, on an obligation of his ancestors, he prays that the parol may demur, i. e. that the pleadings may be stayed till he shall attain full age; 3 Bla. Com. 300; 4 East 485; 1 Hoffm. 178. See a form of a plea in abatement, praying that the parol may demur, in 1 Wentw. Pl. 43, and 2 Chitty, Pl. 520. But a devise cannot pray the parol to demur; 4 East 485.

PAROL DEMURRER. See PAROL

PAROLEVIDENCE. Evidence verbally delivered by a witness. See 56 Am. St. Rep. 639; 6 Harv. L. Rev. 417; Browne, Parol Evidence; EVIDENCE; RECEIPT; CONTRACT.

PAROL LEASE. An agreement made orally between parties, by which one of them leases to the other a certain estate. See LEASE.

PAROL PROMISE. A simple contract, a verbal promise.

PAROLE. In International Law. The agreement of persons who have been taken prisoner by an enemy that they will not again take up arms against those who captured them, either for a limited time or during the continuance of the war. Vattel, liv. 3, c. 8, § 151.

It is a sacred obligation to the fulfillment of which the national faith is pledged. 5 Phila. 299; Fed. Cas. No. 16777.

A parole can be given only by a commissioned officer for himself or the troops under him. And an inferior officer, if his superior is within reach, cannot give his parole without the consent of the latter. If the prisoner's government refuse to confirm his parole, he is bound in honor to return into captivity. A captor is not bound to offer, nor a prisoner to accept, parole; it is voluntary on both sides. Giving a parole precludes only active service in the field. It is ended by the prisoner's exchange or by peace. A prisoner who violates his parole and is again captured may be shot as a bandit; Risley, Law of War 131.

In Criminal Law. In some states acts have been passed providing for the release on parole of prisoners committed to prison upon conviction of crime. Such acts were passed in 1897 in Connecticut, Illinois, Idaho, Indiana, Minnesota, and Missouri. See PRISONER.

PARQUET. In French Law. The magistrates who are charged with the conduct of proceedings in criminal cases and misdemeanors.

PARRICIDE (from Lat. pater, father, caedere to slay). In the Civil Law. One who murders his father. One who murders his mother, his brother, his sister, or his children. Merlin. Rep. Parricide; Dig. 48. 9. 1. 3, 4.

This offence is defined almost in the same words in the penal code of China. Penal Laws of China, b. 1, s. 2, § 4.

The criminal was punished by being scourged, and afterwards thrown in a sort of sack, with a dog, a cock, a viper, and an ape, and then thrown into the sea or into a river; or, if there were no water, he was thrown in this manner to wild beasts. Dig. 48. 9. 9; Code 9. 17. 1. 4, 18 8; Brown, Civ. Law 423. By the laws of France, parricide is the crime of him who murders his father or mother, whether they be the legitimate, natural, or adopted parents of the individual, or the murder of any other legitimate ascendant. Code Penal, art. 277. This crime was there punished by the criminal's being taken to the place of execution without any other garment than his shirt, barefooted, and with his head covered with a black veil. He was then exposed on the scaffold, while an officer of the court read his sentence to the spectators; his right hand was then cut off, and he was immediately put to death. Id. art. 18.

The common law does not define this crime, and makes no difference between its punishment and the punishment of murder; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 386; Prin. Penal Law, c. 18, § 2, p. 248; Daloz, Dict. Homicide, § 3.

PARSENTIA (Lat.). In Old English Law. The share of the eldest daughter where lands were parted between daughters by lot, she having her first choice after the division of the inheritance. Co. Litt. 166 b; Glanv. lib. 7, c. 3; Fleta, lib. 5, c. 10, § In divisionem.

PARS RATIONABILIS (Lat. reasonable part). That part of a man's goods which the law gave to his wife and children. 2 Bla. Com. 492; Magn. Chart.; 9 Hen. III. c. 18; 2 Steph. Com., 11th ed. 184. See DEAD MAN'S PART.

PARSON. In Ecclesiastical Law. One that hath full possession of all the rights of a parochial church.

So called because the church, which is an invisible body, is represented by his person. In England he is himself a body corporate, in order to protect and defend the church (which he personates) by a perpetual succession; Co. Litt. 300. He is sometimes called the rector (q. v.), or governor, of the church; but the appellation of parson, however it may be depreciated by familiar, clownish, and indiscriminate use, is the most legal, most beneficial, and most honorable title that a parish priest can enjoy; because "such a one," Sir Edward Coke observes, "and he only, is said vicem seu personam Ecclesie gerere"; 1 Bla. Com. 384.

The parson has, during life, the freehold in himself of the parsonage-house, the glebe, the tithes, and other dues, unless these are appropriated, i. e. given away, to some spiritual corporation, sole or aggregate, which the law esteems as capable of providing for the service of the church as any single private clergyman; id.; 1 Hagg. Cons. 102; 5 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 5.

The ecclesiastical or spiritual rector of a rectory. 1 Woodd. Lect. 311; Fleta, lib. 7, c. 18; Co. Litt. 300. Also, any clergyman having a spiritual preferment. Co. Litt. 17. Holy orders, presentation, institution, and induction are necessary for a parson; and a parson may cease to be such by death, resignation, cession, or deprivation, which last may be for simony, non-conformity to canons, adultery, etc.; Co. Litt. 120; 4 Co. 75, 76.

PARSON IMPERSONEE (Lat.). A persona, or person, may be termed impersonata, or impersones, only in regard to the possession he hath of the rectory by the act of another. Co. Litt. 300. One that is inducted and in possession of a benefice; e. g. a dean and chapter. Dy. 40, 221. He that is in possession of a church, be it presentative or appropriate, and with whom the church is full.—persona in this case meaning the patron who gives the title, and persona impersonata the parson to whom the benefice is given in the patron's right. Reg. Jud. 24; 1 Barb. 330; 1 Busb. Eq. 55.

PARSONAGE. The house set apart for the minister's residence. A portion of lands and tithes established by law for the maintenance of a minister. Toml.

PART. A share; a purport. This word is also used in contradistinction to counter-part: covenants were formerly made in a script and rescript, or part and counter-part.

PART AND PERTINENT. In Scotch Law. A term in a conveyance including lands or servitudes held for forty years as part of, or pertinent to, lands conveyed, natural fruits before they are separated, woods and parks, etc.; but not steelbow stock, unless the lands have been sold on a rental. Bell, Dict.; Erskine, Inst. 2. 5. 8, et seq.

PART-OWNERS. Those who own a thing together, or in common.

In Maritime Law. A term applied to two or more persons who own a vessel together, and not as partners.

In general, when a majority of the part-owners are desirous of employing such a ship upon a particular voyage or adventure they have a right to do so upon giving security in the admiralty by stipulation to the minority, if required to bring her back and restore the ship, or in case of her loss, to pay them the value of their respective shares; Abb. Ship., 18th ed. 84; 3 Kent 151; Story, Partnership § 489; 11 Pet. 175. When the majority do not choose to employ the ship, the minority have the same right, upon giving similar security; 11 Pet. 175; 1 Hagg. Adm. 306; Jacobsen, Sea-Laws 442.

Where part-owners are equally divided as to the employment upon any particular voyage, the courts of admiralty have manifested a disposition to support the right of the court to order a sale of the ship; Story, Partn. § 439; Bee 2; Gilp. 10; 18 Am. Jur. 466. See VESSEL.

Owners of a part; those who have an interest in a chattel in common with another, or with others.

PARTES FINIS NIL HABUE-RUNT (Lat. the parties to the fine had nothing; i. e. nothing which they could convey). In Old English Pleading. The plea to a fine levied by a stranger, which only bound parties and privies. 2 Bla. Com. *356; Hob. 334; 1 P. Wms. 520; 1 Woodd. Lect. 315.

PARTIAL LOSS. See LOSS.

PARTIAL RESTRAINT OF TRADE. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE; RESTRAINT.

PARTIBLE LANDS. Lands which might be divided; lands held in gavelkind. See 2 Poll. & Matl. 268, 271; GAVELKIND.

PARTICEPS. Literally, a part-taker; a partaker or sharer; one jointly interested with another; an associate or accomplice.

PARTICEPS CRIMINIS. A partner in crime.

PARTICIPATE. To take equal shares and proportions; to share or divide. 6 Ch. 696. Participate in an estate. To take as tenants in common. 28 Beav. 266.

PARTICULAR AVERAGE. Every kind of expense or damage, short of total loss, which regards a particular concern, and which is to be wholly borne by the proprietor of that concern or interest alone. See 3 Bosw. N. Y. 385; 14 Allen 320; 2 Phill. Ins. § 354; 1 Pars. Marit. Law 284; Gourlie, Gen. Average; AVERAGE.

PARTICULAR AVERTMENT. See AVERTMENT.

PARTICULAR CHALLENGE. See CHALLENGE.

PARTICULAR CUSTOM. A custom which only affects the inhabitants of some particular district.

To be good, a particular custom must have been used so long that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary; must have been continued; must have been peaceable; must be reasonable; must be certain; must be consistent with itself; must be consistent with other customs. 1 Bla. Com. 74, 79.

PARTICULAR ESTATE. An estate which is carved out of a larger, and which precedes a remainder, as, an estate for years to A, remainder to B for life; or, an estate for life to A, remainder to B in tail: this precedent estate is called the particular estate, and the tenant of such estate is called the particular tenant. 2 Bla. Com. 165; 4 Kent 226; 16 Vin. Abr. 216; 4 Com. Dig. 32; 5 id. 346; Will. Real P. 281. See REMAINDER.

PARTICULAR LIEN. The right which a person has to retain property in respect of money or labor expended on such particular property. See LIEN.

PARTICULAR MALICE. Ill will; grudge; a desire to be revenged on a particular person. 11 Ind. 261. See MALICE.

Personal Malice. Spite against some particular individual. It is one of the two varieties of malice in fact, the other being what Blackstone terms "universal" malice, or malice against the world generally, without reference to individuals; as, where a person discharges a gun into a multitude, or starts out to kill and does kill the first man he meets. Anderson; 4 Bl. Com. 200.

PARTICULAR SERVICES. In this phrase is included the professional services of an expert; 59 Ind. 13; but not of a witness; 14 Ore. 20.

PARTICULAR STATEMENT. In Pennsylvania Pleading and Practice. A statement particularly specifying the date of a promise, book-account, note, bond (penal or single), bill, or all of them, on which an action is founded and the amount believed by the plaintiff to be due from the defendant. 6 S. & R. 21. It is founded on the provisions of a statute passed March 21, 1806. See 4 Sm. Pa. Laws 328. It is an unmethodical declaration, not restricted to any particular form; 2 S. & R. 537; 3 id. 405; 6 id. 316.

PARTICULAR TENANT. See PARTICULAR ESTATE.

PARTICULARS. See BILL OF PARTICULARS.

PARTIDAS. See LAS PARTIDAS.

PARTIES (Lat. pars, a part). Those who take part in the performance of an act, as, making a contract, carrying on an action. Parties in law may be said to be those united in interest in the performance of an act; it may then be composed of one or more persons. The term includes every party to an act. It is also used to denote all the individual, separate persons engaged in the act,—in which sense, however, a corporation may be a party.

In Contracts. Those persons who engage themselves to do or not to do the matters and things contained in an agreement.

In general, all persons may be parties to contracts. But no person can contract with himself in a different capacity, as there must be an agreement of minds: 2 Bro. C. C. 400; 13 S. & R. 210; 2 Johns. Ch. 252; 4 How. 503; 63 Vt. 231. See 5 Misc. Rep. 309.

Aliens were under greater disabilities at common law with reference to real than to personal property; 7 Co. 25 a; 6 Pet. 102; 11 Paige, Ch. 292; 1 Cush. 531. The disability is now removed, in a greater or less degree, by statutes in the various states, and alien friends stand on a very different footing from alien enemies; 2 Sandf. Ch. 586; 2 Woodb. & M. 1; 2 How. 65. See ALIEN; WAR.

Bankrupts and insolvents are disabled to contract, by various statutes, in England, as well as by insolvent laws in the states of the United States.

Duress renders a contract voidable at the option of him on whom it was practised. See DURESS.

Infants are generally incapable of contracting before the age of twenty-one years. This provision is intended for their benefit; and therefore most of their contracts are voidable, and not void. It is the infant's privilege at majority to elect whether to avoid or ratify the contract he has made during minority; 39 Kan. 495. Though the infant is not bound, the adult with whom he may contract is. The infant may always sue, but cannot be sued; Stra. 937. The infant cannot avoid his contract for necessities: 11 N. H. 51; 12 Metc. 559; 6 M. & W. 42; 65 Hun 57. See [1891] 1 Q. B. 413. If he avoids an executed contract when he comes of age, on the ground of infancy, he must restore the consideration which he has received; the privilege of infancy is to be used as a shield, not as a sword; 7 Mont. 171; 1 App. D. C. 359. See INFANT; NECESSARIES.

Married women, at common law, were almost entirely disabled to contract, their personal existence being almost entirely merged in that of their husbands; 2 J. J. Marsh. 82; 23 Mo. 305; 5 Exch. 888; so that contracts made by them before marriage could be taken advantage of and enforced by their husbands, but not by themselves; 15 Mass. 384; 17 Me. 29; 2 Dev. 360; 9 Cow. 230; 14 Conn. 99; 6 T. B. Monr. 257. The contract of a feme covert was, then, generally void, unless she was the agent of her husband, in which case it was the husband's contract, and not hers; 6 Mod. 171; 6 N. H. 124; 16 Vt. 390; 5 Binn. 285; 15 Conn. 347. See MARRIED WOMAN.

Non computes mentis. At common law, formerly, in this class were included lunatics, insane persons, and idiots. It is understood now to include drunkards; 4 Conn. 203; 2 N. H. 435; 15 Johns. 593; 11 Pick. 304; 1 Rice 56; 3 Blackf. 51; 13 M. & W. 623; 56 Minn. 216. See 89 Va. 56; 63 Hun 629. Spendthrifts under guardianship are not competent to make a valid contract for the payment of money; 13 Pick. 206. Seamen "are the wards of the admiralty, and though not technically incapable of entering into a valid contract, they are treated in the same manner as courts of equity are accustomed to treat young heirs dealing with their expectancies, wards with their guardians, and custodes que trust with their trustees." 2 Mas. 541. See 3 Kent 193; 2 Dods. 504.

As to the character in which parties contract. They may act independently or severally, jointly, or jointly and severally. The decision of the question of the kind of liability incurred depends on the terms of the contract, if they are express, or, if not express, upon the intention of the parties as gathered from the circumstances of the case. Whenever, however, the obligation is undertaken by two or more, or a right given to two or more, it is a general presumption of law that it is a joint obligation or right; words of joinder are not necessary for this purpose; but, on the other hand, there should be words of severance in order to produce a several responsibility or a several right; 13 M. & W. 499; 6 Wend. 629; 7 Mass. 68; 1 B. & C. 407; 12 Gill & J. 265; 37 W. Va. 884. See 53 N. J. L. 638. It may be doubted, however, whether anything less than express words can raise at once a joint and several liability. No joint liability exists upon separate individual contracts, though for the same subject-matter; 43 Ill. App. 378. Parties may act as the representatives of others, as agents, factors, or brokers, attorneys, executors, or administrators, and guardians. See these titles; JOINT PROMISE. They may also act in a collective capacity, as corporations, joint-stock companies, or as partnerships. See these titles.

New parties may be made to contracts already in existence, by novation, assignment, and indorsement, which titles see.

To Suits in Equity. The person who seeks a remedy in chancery by suit, commonly called the plaintiff, or complainant, and the person against whom the remedy is sought, usually denominated the defendant, or respondent, are the parties to a suit in equity.

In equity all persons materially interested, either legally or beneficially, in the subject-matter of a suit, are to be made parties to it, either as plaintiffs or defendants, so that there may be a complete decree which shall bind them all; 183 U. S. 233, 579; it is not indispensable that all the parties should have an interest in all the matters contained in the suit, but it is sufficient if each party has an interest in some material matter in the suit, and it is connected with the others; 128 U. S. 403. In the absence of parties, and without their having an opportunity to be heard, a court is without jurisdiction to make an adjudication affecting them; 164 U. S. 471.

Active parties are those who are so involved in the subject-matter in controversy that no decree can be made without their being in court. Passive parties are those whose interests are involved in granting complete relief to those who ask it. 1 Wash. C. C. 517. See 3 Alb. 361.

PLAINTIFFS. In general, all persons, whether natural or artificial, may sue in equity; and an equitable title only is sufficient; 10 Ill. 332. Incapacities which prevent suit are absolute, which disable during their continuance, or partial which disable the party to sue alone.

Persons representing antagonistic interests cannot be joined as complainants; 14 So. Rep. (Ala.) 765.

Alien enemies are under an absolute incapacity to sue. Alien friends may sue; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 129; if the subject-matter be not such as to disable them; Co. Litt. 129 b; although a sovereign; 1 Sim. 94; 8 Wheat. 464; 4 Johns. Ch. 370; Ad. Eq. 314. In such case he must have been first recognized by the executive of the forum; Story, Eq. Pl. § 55; 3 Wheat. 324.

In such case the sovereign submits to the jurisdiction, as to the subject-matter, and must answer on oath; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 30; Ad. Eq. 318; 6 Beav. 1. See SOVEREIGN.

Attorney-general. Government (in England, the crowns) may sue both in its own behalf, for its own political rights and interests, and in behalf of the rights and interests of those partaking of its prerogatives or claiming its peculiar protection; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 421; Coop. Eq. Pl. 21, 101; usually by the agency of the attorney-general or solicitor-general; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 7; Ad. Eq. 312. See INJUNCTION; QUO WARRANTO; MANDAMUS; TRUSTS.

Corporations, like natural persons, may sue; Moraw. Pr. Corp. § 357; Grant, Corp. 198; although foreign; id. 200; but in such case the incorporation must be set forth; 1 Cr. M. & R. 296; 4 Johns. Ch. 527; as it must if they are domestic and created by a private act; 3 Conn. 199; 15 Viner, Abr. 198. All the members of a voluntary association must be joined; 15 Ill. 251; unless too numerous; 2 Pet. 566; 3 Barb. Ch. 362. See JURISDICTION; EXPRESS COMPANIES.

As to the right of a stockholder to sue, see 104 U. S. 460; 106 id. 537; 18 How. 331.

Idiots and lunatics may sue by their committees; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 29. As to when a mere petition is sufficient, see 7 Johns. Ch. 24; 2 Ired. Eq. 294. See NEXT FRIEND.

Infants may sue; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 25; and, if they be on the wrong side of the suit, may be transferred at any time, on suggestion; 8 Edw. Ch. 32. The bill must be filed by the next friend (q. v.); Coop. Eq. Pl. 27; 2 Ala. 406; who must not have an adverse interest; 2 Ired. Eq. 478; and who may be compelled to give bail; 1 Faig. Ch. 178. If the infant have a guardian, the court may decide in whose name the suit shall continue; 12 Ill. 424.

A married woman, at common law, was under partial incapacity to sue; 7 Vt. 369. Otherwise, when in such condition as to be considered in law a feme sole; 2 Hayw. 408. She could sue on a separate claim by aid of a next friend of her own choice; Story, Eq. Pl. § 61; 1 Freem. 215; but see 2 Faig. Ch. 454; and the defendant might insist that she should sue in this manner; 2 Paige, Ch. 255; 4 Rand. 307.

Though at common law an action could not be maintained by a partnership against another partnership having a common member with the former, upon an agreement made between the two firms, equity will take jurisdiction, and afford an adequate remedy; 50 Minn. 171.

Societies. A certain number of persons belonging to a voluntary society may sue on behalf of themselves and their associates for purposes common to them all; 2 Pet. 366; such as bondholders and stockholders.

The objection for want of proper parties may be taken advantage of either by demurrer, plea, answer, or at the hearing; 24 U. S. App. 601.

Where a defendant insists upon the joinder of a certain party, as a necessary party, there is, upon joining such party, no ground for demurrer for improperly uniting causes of action; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1797, Supreme Ct. of N. Y., App. Div.

DEFENDANTS. Generally, all who are able to sue may be sued in equity. To constitute a person defendant, process must be prayed against him; 2 Bland, Ch. 106; 4 Ired. Eq. 175; 5 Ga. 51; 1 A. K. Marsh. 594. Those who are under incapacity may be made defendant, but must appear in a peculiar manner. One, or more, interested with the plaintiff, who refuse to join may be made defendants; 2 Bland, Ch. 264; 3 Des. 31; 10 Ill. 534; 15 id. 251; 156 Mass. 203. A court of equity even after a final hearing on the merits, and on appeal to the court of last resort, will compel the joinder of necessary parties defendant; 89 Mo. 284. One cannot be made a defendant on his own application, against the objection of the complainant; 15 So. Rep. (Miss.) 33; 2 Tenn. Ch. 140. See INTERVENTION.

Corporations must be sued by their corporate names, unless authorized to come into court in the name of some other person, as president, etc.; Story, Eq. Pl. § 70. Governments cannot, generally, be sued in their own courts; Story, Eq. Pl. § 69; yet the attorney-general may be made a party to protect its rights when involved; 1 Barb. Ch. 137; and the rule does not prevent suits against officers in their official capacity; 1 Dougl. Mich. 225. The directors of a corporation may be included as parties defendant in a bill against a corporation for infringement of a trade-mark; 53 Fed. Rep. 124; or of a patent; 45 id. 482; or where discovery is sought from the officers; 43 id. 849; but not on a bill for an accounting in which no discovery is sought against the officers; 44 id. 219. See INFRINGEMENT; PATENT.

Foreclosure. For the mere purpose of extinguishing an equity of redemption, the mortgagor is strictly the only necessary party; 33 Fed. Rep. 513; but if it be intended to divest other liens, other parties must be brought in; 64.

In a suit to foreclose a junior mortgage, a prior mortgagee need not be joined; 112 U. S. 8; and more particularly if the prior mortgage is not yet due; 94 U. S. 734; but it is otherwise where the bill prays a receiver for the property covered by such prior mortgage; 106 U. S. 286; or where the junior mortgagee seeks a sale of the property free of incumbrance; 94 U. S. 734; or where there is a doubt as to the amount of the debt due under the prior incumbrance; 43 Hun 521; 94 U. S. 734. Senior mortgagees cannot become parties to an action to foreclose a junior mortgage; 9 Abb. N. C. 256. But where joined he may enforce his lien by a cross-bill; 30 Fed. Rep. 805. Even junior incumbrancers are not indispensable parties, but if not joined, their rights will not be affected; 62 Ill. App. 418; 23 Fed. Rep. 849.

A receiver is a proper, though not a necessary party to foreclosure proceedings begun after his appointment; 105 N. Y. 346; 38 N. J. Eq. 234; he may be permitted to intervene; 4 N. J. Eq. 377.

Bondholders cannot bring proceedings to foreclose a mortgage without showing that they have requested their trustee to proceed and he has refused; 79 Fed. Rep. 25.

Mortgage bondholders may proceed for the protection of their interests where the trustee has refused to sue; 130 Mass. 393; 35 Fed. Rep. 3; 106 U. S. 47; or has acquired interests adverse to those of the bondholders; 52 Fed. Rep. 826; and, in such case, one or more bondholders may sue for themselves and other like bondholders; 59 Fed. Rep. 957; such others may come in at any stage; 2 Woods 447.

A mortgage trustee is the only necessary party to a bill to foreclose the mortgage; he represents the bondholders; see 93 U. S. 156; 4 Dill. 533; 117 U. S. 434; and he is the proper person to bring foreclosure proceedings; 122 U. S. 1; 15 Fed. Rep. 52. A non-resident mortgage trustee may be brought in as defendant by publication in the federal courts; 13 Fed. Rep. 857. The dissolution of marriage by divorce does not enable the wife to sue her husband for a tort committed on her during coverture; 46 Ill. App. 106. She may maintain in her own name an action for the alienation of her husband's affections; 29 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 389; 32 id. 932. See 31 Cent. L. J. 29.

Ch. 118. Where there is a total destruction or conversion of the property, one tenant in common may sue his co-tenant in trespass; Co. Litt. 290

DEPENDANTS. He who commits the tortious act or asserts the adverse title is to be made defendant: as the wrongful occupant of land, in ejectment; 1 B. & P. 578; the party converting in trover; Broom, Part. 246; making fraudulent representations; 3 Term 56; 3 M. & W. 583. Subsequent ratification is equivalent to prior authority; Broom, Part. 259.

Agents are liable to their principals for conversion; 14 Johns. 128; 8 Pa. 442.

Bankrupts; 3 B. & Ald. 408; 2 Den. 73; and insolvents; Broom, Part. 284; 2 B. & Ald. 407; 9 Johns. 161; are liable even after a discharge, for torts committed previously.

Corporations are liable for torts committed by their agents; Moraw. Fr. Corp. § 725; 2 Wend. 452; 17 Mass. 503; 4 S. & R. 18; 2 Ark. 255; 4 Ohio 500; 4 Wash. In an action against a corporation for a tort, the corporation and its servant by whose act the injury was done may be joined as defendants; 98 N. C. 34.

Death of a tort-feasor, at common law, takes away all cause of action for torts disconnected with contract; 5 Term 651; 1 Saund. 291 e. But actions against the personal representatives are provided for by statute in most of the states, and in England by stat. 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 42, § 2.

Executors and administrators, at common law, are liable for the continuance of torts first committed by the deceased; W. Mich. 7.

Idiots and lunatics are liable, civilly, for torts committed; Bac. Abr. Trespass (G); Webb, Poll. Torts 59, n.; though they may be incapable of design; Broom, Part. 281. But if the lunatic is under control of an attorney, proceedings must be in that court, or it will constitute a contempt; 8 Paige 199.

Master is liable for a negligent tortious act or default of his servant while acting within the scope of his employment; 6 Cow. 189; 2 Gray 181; 23 N. H. 157; 10 Me. 241; 5 Rich. 44; 18 Mo. 362; 75 Hun 68; 160 Pa. 300; 37 W. L. & Eq. 468; 3 Cush. 270; 15 Barb. 574; 6 Ind. 205; 22 Ala. n. s. 294; 28 Me. 269; 4 Sneed 36; 161 Pa. 270; 160 Mass. 45; 98 Mich. 185; 7 Wash. 178; 154 U. S. 349; if the servant injured be not unnecessarily exposed; 28 Vt. 59; 6 Cal. 209; 4 Sneed 36.

In an action to recover damages for a tort committed by a corporation prior to the appointment of a receiver, the latter is not a proper party; 83 Fed. Rep. 93. See INTERVENTION; MORTGAGE; UNITED STATES COURTS; REMOVAL; JOINDER; MISJOINDER; MISNUMBER; NAME; RECEIVER; PATENT.

PARTITION. The division which is made between several persons of lands, tenements, or hereditaments, or of goods and chattels which belong to them as co-proprietors. The term is more technically applied to the division of real estate made between co-parceners, tenants in common, or joint tenants.

Voluntary partition is that made by the owners by mutual consent. It is effected by mutual conveyances or releases to each person of the share which he is to hold, executed by the other owners. Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 6, § 14.

Compulsory partition is that which takes place without regard to the wishes of one or more of the owners.

At common law the right of compulsory partition existed only in cases of co-parcenary; Litt. § 284. By statutes of 31 Henry VIII. c. 1, and 32 id. c. 2, the right was extended to joint tenants and tenants in common. These statutes have been generally re-enacted or adopted in the United States, and usually with increased facilities for partition; 4 Kent 862; Co. Litt. 175 a; 2 Bla. Com. 185; 16 Vin. Abr. 217. Partition at common law is effected by a judgment of the court and delivering up possession in pursuance of it, which concludes all the parties to it. In England the writ of partition has been abolished by stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, § 36.

Courts of equity also exercise jurisdiction in cases of partition where no adequate remedy could be had at law, as where the titles to the estates in question are such as are cognizable only in equity or where it is necessary to award owelty of partition. This jurisdiction was first settled in Elizabeth's time, and has increased largely on account of the peculiar advantages of the chancery proceeding; 1 Spence, Eq. 654. Nor have the increased facilities granted by statute upon the common-law proceedings ousted the jurisdiction; 1 Story, Eq. § 646.

Partition in equity is effected by first ascertaining the rights of the several parties interested; and then issuing a commission to make the partition required; and finally on return of the commissioners and confirmation thereof, by decreeing mutual conveyances between the parties; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 120; 2 Sc. & L. 371. Where the titles of the parties are legal titles, the decree in the partition has been held to vest the titles in the purports without conveyances.

A suit in the nature of partition cannot be maintained where there has been an ouster of the complainants by the defendant tenant in common, by acts so overt and notorious as to imply notice to his co-tenants; 37 Fed. Rep. 273; 80 Ala. 70. An adverse holding by any one of the parties for a period of time, however short, before the institution of proceedings in partition, is effectual to defeat the proceedings; 126 Pa. 297.

A voluntary partition of land by persons under legal disabilities is binding when fairly and equally made and free from fraud; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 373.

Where there is a parol partition, a party acquiescing in it and accepting exclusive possession under it is estopped from asserting title or right to possession in violation of its terms; 85 Fed. Rep. 742.

PARTNERS. Members of a partnership.

General partners are those whose liability for partnership debts is unlimited.

Ostensible partners are those whose names appear to the world as partners, and who in reality are such.

Nominal partners are those who are held out as partners but who have no interest in the firm or business. They may be liable as partners by reason of their own acts, without being actually partners.

Secret partners are partners whose connection with the firm is not publicly made known.

Silent partners are those who, though having a share in the firm profits, have no voice in the firm business.

Dormant partners are those whose names and transactions as partners are professedly concealed from the world. They combine the characters of both secret and silent partners.

A dormant partner is one whose name is not mentioned in the title of the firm, or embraced in some general term, as company, son, etc.; 4 Phil. 1. It is not necessary that his membership be universally unknown; it is enough if he is not an ostensible partner; 2 Fed. Rep. 640.

Special partners are those whose liabilities are limited by statute to the amount of their respective contributions. Ordinarily a special partner is associated with at least one general partner by whom the business is managed, but in the "partnerships limited" organized under recent statutes, all the parties have a limited liability.

WHO MAY BE. General rule. Persons who have the legal capacity to make other contracts may enter into that of partnership; Lind. Part. *77; 1 Col. Part. § 11; Pars. Part. § 14.

Aliens. An alien friend may be a partner; Lind. Part. *78; Co. Litt. 129 b. An alien enemy cannot enter into any commercial contract; 1 Kent *66; 16 Johns. 436; 7 Pet. 536; 9 Bush 15; 11 Exch. 135; and the breaking out of a war between two countries in which partners reside dissolves the partnership; 91 U. S. 70. See WAR.

Clergymen were disqualified to enter into a partnership in England by 57 Geo. III.

Corporations. There is no general principle of law which prevents a corporation from being a partner with another corporation, or with ordinary individuals, except the principle that a corporation cannot lawfully employ its funds for purposes not authorized by its charter; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *78; 46 Conn. 136; Grant, Corp. § 5; 5 Gray 58; they are said to be prima facie ineligible as partners; George, Partn. 15; 121 N. Y. 582; 68 Pa. 173; 86 Tenn. 598; Beach, Corp. § 842. The purchase of an interest in a firm by a corporation does not make it a partner; 62 Mo. App. 390; but see 46 Conn. 136, where the charter authorized the corporation to enter into a partnership. See also 7 Wend. 412, where it was held that two corporations cannot form a partnership. A corporation which shares profits may be held to make good losses; 14 Barb. 479. While a contract of partnership between a corporation and an individual is ultra vires as to this corporation, yet if the corporation has received the benefit of the contract, it must account to the other party for what is due him under the contract; 182 Pa. 206.

Firms. Two firms may be partners in one joint firm; 1 Abb. Pr. 243; 1 Fed. Rep. 800. Where a partnership and an individual form a second partnership, all the members of the first partnership are members of the new firm; 114 Ill. 574.

Felons. Felons probably are not disqualified, in the absence of any statutory restriction, to enter into a contract of partnership in this country; George, Partn. 11.

Infants. An infant may contract the relation of partner, as he may make any trading contract which is likely to prove for his advantage; 17 Gratt. 503; 5 B. & Ald. 147. Such a contract made by a person during infancy is voidable and may be affirmed or disaffirmed by him at majority; Story, Part. § 7; 42 Mich. 134; but whether he may disaffirm before majority is doubtful; 31 Mich. 182; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *74, n.; though it is said that he may; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 136. He may reclaim his contribution before majority; 83 N. Y. 245. Unless he gives notice of disaffirmance, or in some manner repudiates the contract within a reasonable time after becoming of age, he will be presumed to have ratified it; Story, Part. § 7; 9 Vt. 368; but it is held that there must be positive acts of ratification after majority; neglect to disaffirm is not ratification; 3 Cush. 372; see 8 Exch. 181; 8 N. Y. 228; and his liability then relates back to firm contracts made during his minority; 33 S. C. 285; 21 Mich. 304. The person with whom the minor contracts will be bound; 2 M. and S. 205; 1 Watts 412; 3 Green N. J. 343. In England and in Maine ratification, after majority, must be in writing.

Lunatics. A lunatic is probably not absolutely incapable of being a partner; Lind. Part. *84; since the insanity of a partner does not per se dissolve the firm, but simply amounts to a sufficient cause for a court of equity to decree a dissolution; 1 Cox, Ch. 107; 2 Myl. & K. 125; 15 Johns. 57; contra, 6 Humphr. 85. Whether a contract by a lunatic to become a partner can in all cases be avoided by him, is, perhaps, unsettled; Story, Part. § 7, n. 1.

Married women. Married women, at common law, are incapable of becoming partners, since they are generally unable to contract or engage in trade; 30 Md. 402; Story, Part. § 10; 3 De G., M. & G. 19; see 36 S. C. 424; and cannot be made partners by estoppel; 27 S. C. 525; 31 Ind. 113. But where a married woman is authorized by custom, statute, or otherwise to trade as a feme sole, she may probably be a partner; 52 Miss. 402; 43 Ark. 212; 57 Ia. 361; contra, 91 Ind. 834; Story, Part. § 10; Pars. Part. § 10. The mere consent of her husband to her trading as a feme sole does not necessarily permit her to become a partner; Story, Part. § 12. In some states she may be a partner as to her separate estate; 74 Pa. 448; 94 Mich. 230; contra, 20 W. Va. 571. A married woman, by acting as partner and continuing the business after her husband's death, creates a partnership from the beginning; 10 Paige 82.

Except as above stated, a married woman cannot become a partner without statutory authority; 23 Fla. 83; 27 S. C. 525; 20 W. Va. 571; in any case, however, the capital she puts in is liable for the firm debts; 66 Mo. 617. It has been held that where the wife cannot be a partner, the husband will be considered as such; 65 Tex. 181.

Under modern married women statutes, a wife is not, according to most of the cases, permitted to enter into partnership with her husband; 140 Mass. 521; 4 Wash. St. 263; 16 L. R. A. (Ark.) 526; 78 Mich. 140; contra, 122 N. Y. 308. See 8 Biss. 406.

Number of persons. Generally speaking, the common law imposes no restriction as to the number of persons who may carry on trade as partners; 1 Col. Part. § 10; 27 Ind. 300; unless by statute, as in England, where the limit is twenty. But a partnership cannot consist of but one person; 46 Mich. 449.

As to who are partners, see PARTNERSHIP.

POWERS OF PARTNERS. General rule. It has been customary to derive the authority of a partner from an assumed relation of mutual agency between the members of the firm, and it is true that the firm is responsible for whatever is done by any of the partners while acting for it within the limits of the authority conferred by the nature of the business carried on; 8 H. L. Cas. 268; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *124; 36 Pa. 498; 58 Mo. 532; 45 Miss. 490; 59 Ala. 886. The principle of agency applies to co-partners; but it is only when one is acting as their agent that he binds them; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1315. It is perhaps more accurate to trace a partner's power to his standing as a co-principal, and to consider his agency an incident of this relation; 5 Ch. Div. 458; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. The relation is a peculiar sort of agency, where the partner is agent for the firm and not merely for the other partners; 5 Ch. Div. 458. Whatever the source of a partner's power, it is, as a rule, limited to acts incident to carrying on, in the usual way, the particular business in which the firm is engaged, and each partner has the power to manage the ordinary business of the firm, and, consequently, to bind his co-partners, whether they be ostensible, dormant, actual, or nominal; 2 B. & Ald. 673; 1 Cr. & J. 316; by whatever he may do, in the course of such management, as entirely as to bind himself. But the acts of a partner wholly unconnected with the business of the partnership do not bind the firm; 2 B. & Ald. 678; 8 Me. 320; 15 Pick. 290; 3 Johns. Ch. 23; nor will an act beyond the scope of the partnership; 79 Ga. 268.

The partner's authority is incident to, and co-extensive with, the business; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 133. A partner's authority to act cannot be restricted by notice from another partner to a third party; 5 Den. 541; 41 N. Y. 376. An insolvent partner has the same authority, even after dissolution; 1 Duer 662. Partners may, by agreement, restrict the authority of a partner, as between themselves, but not as to third parties, without notice; Pars. (Jas.) Part. § 134.

One of two partners in the practice of the law has no authority to accept for the firm an agency for the mere sale of real estate; 152 U. S. 673.

Accounts. One partner can bind his firm by rendering an account relating to a partnership transaction; 8 Cl. & F. 121; 47 Mo. 346; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *28.

Actions. One partner can bring an action on firm account in his own and his co-partners' names without their consent, but they are entitled to indemnity if he sues against their will; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *271; 2 Cr. & M. 313; 67 Mo. 588. This power of a partner survives the dissolution of the firm; 1 E. D. Sm. 423. One partner cannot, as a rule, sue in his own name for a firm debt; the suit must be in the names of all; Penn. N. J. 711.

Admissions. After the relation of partnership has been established, a partner may bind his co-partner by an admission; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 121; 143 Mass. 473; 65 Wis. 247; but the existence of the partnership must be shown by other evidence; 102 N. Y. 336. See infra.

Appearance. In an action against partners, one may enter or authorize an appearance for the rest; 7 Term 207; 17 Vt. 531; 1 Binn. 214; 9 Johns. 296; 32 N. Y. Supp. 940; 4 Kan. 240; contra, L. R. 8 Q. B. 398; 3 Ohio 519; see Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 119; 10 App. Cas. 690; but not after dissolution of the firm; 2 McCord 311. Nor can one partner bind his co-partners personally and individually by entering an appearance for them when they are not within the jurisdiction, nor served with process; 9 Cush. 390; 11 How. 163. A partner cannot authorize an appearance for a co-partner, not subject to the jurisdiction of the court, or if the firm has been dissolved; 91 U. S. 160; but a solicitor instructed by a managing partner may enter an appearance for all partners. [1896] 1 Q. R. 388.

Arbitration. As a general rule, one partner cannot bind the firm by submitting any of its affairs to arbitration, whether by deed or parol; 3 Kent 49; 3 C. & B. 742; 35 Mich. 5; 3 So. Rep. (Ala.) 268; 40 Vt. 460; 19 Johns. 137; 1 Pat. 321. The reason given being that such a power is unnecessary for carrying on the business in the ordinary way; Lind. Partn., 2d Am. ed. *129, *372. But the acting partner may be bound; 19 Johns. 137; 5 G. & J. 412. And the general rule is perhaps somewhat relaxed; Pars. Partn. § 121. It is held that one partner may bind the firm by submission to arbitration, by an agreement not under seal; 89 Pa. 453; 3 T. B. Monr. 435; 25 Ill. 48; but apparently only so as to bind firm assets; 12 S. & R. 243; 89 Pa. 453.

Assignments. The right of a partner to dispose of the property of the firm extends to the assignment of at least a portion of it as security for antecedent debts, as well as for debts thereafter to be contracted; Story, Part. § 101; 5 Cra. 289; 58 Mo. 592; 17 Vt. 394. Although the authorities differ, the better opinion seems to be that one partner cannot, without the knowledge or consent of his co-partners, assign all the property of the firm to a trustee for the benefit of creditors; 13 Minn. 43; 34 Mo. 329; 50 Ala. 251; 29 Ohio St. 441; 32 Wis. 444; 17 Vt. 390; 69 Miss. 17; 2 Tex. App. 226; 134 U. S. 206; unless the co-partner is absent, or is incapable of giving his assent or dissent; 90 Va. 200; 27 Minn. 255; but not against the assent, or without the consent, of the co-partner, if the latter is present and capable of acting; 176 Pa. 52. A surviving partner has power to make an assignment for the benefit of the firm's creditors; 76 Md. 581.

Bills of exchange and promissory notes. A partner may draw, accept, and indorse bills and notes in the name and for the use of the firm, for purposes within the scope of its business; 7 Term 210; 20 Miss. 226; 119 Mass. 215; 78 Ill. 234. A restriction of this power by agreement between the partners does not affect third persons unless they have notice; 27 La. Ann. 352; 44 Miss. 283. This power cannot be exercised after dissolution of the firm; 42 Mich. 110; 51 Cal. 531; but its exercise may bind the firm if such dissolution be without proper notice; 130 Mass. 591; or when the other party subsequently assents thereto; 98 Ga. 468.

The doctrine is generally limited to partnerships in trade and commerce, and does not apply to other partnerships, unless it is the common usage of such business so to bind the firm, or it is necessary for the due transaction thereof; 145 U. S. 512. Non-trading partners, such as farmers; 57 Ill. 531; lawyers; 37 Wis. 285; physicians; 1 Humph. 23; cannot usually bind the firm by such instruments. Parties dealing with non-trading partnerships are put on inquiry; 10 Heisk. 629; 33 La. Ann. 196; the doctrine of general agency does not apply; 53 Conn. 53.

A bill or note made by one partner in the name of the firm is prima facie for partnership purposes; 31 Mich. 373; 34 Pa. 344; 16 Wend. 504; 44 Miss. 283.

A partner has no implied authority to indorse a note made payable to a co-partner, although for firm account; 64 Ga. 221; nor to bind the firm as a party to a note for the accommodation of or as surety for another; 19 Johns. 154; 5 Conn. 574; 21 Miss. 122; 31 Me. 452; 40 Minn. 557; 1 App. D. C. 171; unless by special authority implied from the nature of the business or previous course of dealing; 3 Kent 46; 3 Humph. 597; 4 Hill N. Y. 261; and the burden is on the holder of the instrument to show such authority; 19 Johns. 154; 96 Mich. 632; 60 Miss. 17. Direct proof is not necessary; the authority or ratification may be inferred from circumstances; 2 Cush. 309; 22 Me. 189; 14 Wend. 133; 10 Vt. 269. Indorsement of a note for a third person by a partner in the firm name without the knowledge of the other member of the firm and having no connection with its business, does not bind the firm; 129 U. S. 372.

Borrowing money. One partner may borrow money on the credit of the firm, when it is necessary for the transaction of the business in the ordinary way; 115 Mass. 388; 63 Pa. 393; 75 Ill. 629; 61 Ala. 143; but the amount must be within the usual business of the firm; Pars. (Jas.) Partn. § 125; but a partner in a cash business, as a firm of solicitors, cannot borrow; 37 Wis. 285; or physicians; Humph. 23. It is said that a partner cannot borrow to increase the firm's capital; 2 Hare 218. A contract to borrow money in violation of a partnership agreement is not valid, though made in furtherance of the interests of the firm; 13 So. Rep. (Miss.) 282.

Checks. One partner has the implied power to bind the firm by firm checks drawn on its bankers; 3 C. B. N. S. 442. See 159 Pa. 287. Such checks must not be post-dated; L. R. 6 Q. B. 209.

Compromise. A partner may compromise with debtors or creditors of the firm; Story, Part. § 113; 30 Conn. 1; 7 Gill 49.

Confession of judgment. One partner cannot, by confessing a voluntary judgment against the firm, bind his co-partners; 172 Pa. 70; see 51 Mo. App. 470; 43 id. 121. But a judgment so confessed will bind the partner who confessed it; 91 U. S. 160; 3 C. B. 742; 154 Pa. 152; 13 La. 496; 32 Vt. 709; 30 La. Ann. 692; but see 23 How. 209; and will bind the firm assets; see 8 Kulp Pa. 264; 32 La. Ann. 607, where it was held that a "commercial partner" has a right to confess judgment on behalf of the firm. Only the other partner can object to it; 42 Ill. App. 291. Where a judgment note has been signed in the firm name only, the plaintiff may name the individual members, and judgment may be entered in this form; 172 Pa. 70.

Contracts. A partner has the power to bind the firm by simple contracts within the scope of the partnership business; 15 Mass. 75; 5 Pet. 529; and make a contract which will bind them as partners and also as individuals; 78 Ga. 797; but not a contract to convey firm real estate; 5 Hill N. Y. 107.

Debts. One partner may receive debts due the firm, and payment to him by the debtor extinguishes the claim; 12 Mod. 446; 1 Wash. Va. 7; 2 Blackf. 371; 14 La. Ann. 681; 4 Binn. 375; even after dissolution; 15 Ves. 198; although the debtor knew there was an agreement that one party alone was to collect and pay the debts; 44 Ill. App. 500. A partner may also bind the firm by assenting to the transfer of a debt due to it, as the transfer of the firm's account from one banker to another; 2 H. & N. 326. A partner cannot employ partnership funds to pay his own pre-existing debt, without the consent of his co-partners; 18 Conn. 294; 12 Pet. 221; 31 Ala. 582; 28 Ohio St. 55; 94 Pa. 31; 87 Ga. 651; 121 U. S. 310. But in 57 Fed. Rep. 257, it was held that one of two co-partners could pledge the partnership property to secure his private debts, to the extent of his interest therein.

Deeds. One partner has no implied authority to bind his co-partners by a deed, even for a debt or obligation contracted in the ordinary course of commercial dealings within the scope of the partnership business; 3 Kent 47; 11 Ohio St. 223; 26 Vt. 154. Such an instrument binds the maker only; 62 Pa. 393; 7 Ohio St. 463. But such a deed may be ratified; 12 Ill. App. 517; and this consent or adoption may be by parol; 26 Vt. 154; 11 Pick. 400. It binds the firm if they were present at the execution; 3 Ves. 578. The fact that the partnership articles are under seal does not give such authority; 7 Term 297; unless they contain a particular power to that effect; id. One partner may convey by deed property of the firm which he might have conveyed without deed. The seal in such a case would be surplusage; 2 Ohio St. 478; 5 Hill N. Y. 107; 7 Metc. 244; he may assign a mortgage in payment of a firm debt, or release a mortgage; 4 Gill & J. 310; 4 Mas. 206. See infra under Release. One partner may acknowledge a deed for the firm; 70 Mo. 206.

Distress. Where a lease has been granted by the firm, any partner may distrain or appoint a bailiff to do so; 4 Bing. 562, and cases there cited.

Firm property. Each partner has the power to dispose of the entire right of his co-partners in the partnership effects, for the purposes of the partnership business and in the name of the firm; Story, Part. § 9. This power is held not to extend to real estate, which a single partner cannot transfer without special authority; Story, Part. § 101; 1 Brock. 436; 3 McLean 27. Since the power to transfer the firm property must be exercised for the ordinary purposes of the partnership business, it is held that a partner's employment of firm capital in a new partnership, which he forms for his firm with third persons charges him for a conversion of the fund to his own use; 25 Ohio St. 180.

Guarantees. A partner derives no authority from the mere relation of partnership to bind the firm as guarantor of the debt of another; 4 Exch. 623; 31 Me. 454; 21 Miss. 122; 35 Pa. 517. If the contract of guaranty is strictly within the scope of the firm business, one partner may bind the firm by it; 41 La. 518; or if guaranty is usual in that kind of business or is such as the firm has frequently recognized; Pars. Partn. § 144; and where a partner sold notes and applied the proceeds to firm use; 24 Barb. 549.

Insurance. One partner may effect an insurance of the partnership goods; 1 M. & G. 130; 54 Mich. 531; 141 Mass. 298. The assignment of a partner's interest in the firm stock without the insurer's consent, does not violate a policy of insurance upon it; 27 Ohio St. 1.

Leases. The rule is that a partner has no power to contract on behalf of the firm for a lease of a building for partnership purposes; 22 Beav. 606. But it is held that a partner may bind the firm for the rent of premises necessary for partnership purposes, and so used; 47 Conn. 26; 21 La. Ann. 21; 51 Wis. 547; but see 22 Beav. 606. A partner can give a valid notice to quit; 1 B. & Ad. 135.

Statute of limitations. Before dissolution an acknowledgment by one partner of a debt barred by the statute will bind the firm; Pars. Part. § 127; as to whether it will do so, if made after dissolution, the authorities are conflicting; the better view appears to be that it will not; id.; 15 Fed. Rep. 898; 78 Ala. 501; 5 Neb. 369; some cases distinguish between acknowledgments made before and after the statutory period has run; if made after, it does not bind; 43 Md. 70; if made before, it does; 36 Conn. 270; 45 Mo. 365. Some cases hold that it binds though made after dissolution and after the statutory period has run; 50 Vt. 421; 6 Cal. 51. If made after dissolution by a liquidating partner, it is binding; 3 W. & S. 345; but not otherwise; 101 Pa. 233. In England and in many states statutes have rendered the acknowledgment of one partner insufficient to toll the statute.

Majority, power of. The weight of authority seems to be in favor of the power of a majority of the firm, acting in good faith, to bind the minority in the ordinary transactions of the partnership business; 3 Kent 45; 33 Beav. 595; 4 Johns. Ch. 473; 46 Pa. 434; 27 Ala. 452; 49 Ga. 417. But see 6 Ves. 773; 1 Yo. & Jer. 227; 57 Pa. 365. It is said that, in the absence of an express stipulation, a majority may decide as to the disposal of the partnership property; 3 Chitty, Com. L. 234; but the power of the majority must be confined to the ordinary business of the partnership; 14 Beav. 367; 2 De G. M. & G. 49; it does not extend to the right to change any of the provisions therein; 4 Johns. Ch. 573; 32 N. H. 9; nor to engage the partnership in transactions for which it was never intended; 3 Maule & S. 489; and all must be consulted; 2 La. 504. Where a majority is authorized to act, it must be fairly constituted and must proceed with the most entire good faith; 10 Hare 493; 5 De G. & S. 310. A majority cannot change the place of business after a lease has expired; 8 Ch. Div. 129. The American cases are said to have enlarged the power of the majority; Pars. Partn. § 147; but the question is not clearly settled; id.

Mortgages. A partner has no implied power to make a mortgage of partnership real estate; Lind. Part. 2d Am. ed. *139; 2 Humph. 534. See 37 Neb. 666. But one partner may execute a valid chattel mortgage of firm property, without the consent of his co-partners; 47 Wis. 261; 18 Minn. 232; 16 Or. 153; 30 W. Va. 586; 96 Mich. 233; 130 Ind. 63; 83 Ia. 449. A deed of trust of partnership property to secure certain creditors to the exclusion of others will bind the partnership, though executed by only two out of three partners; 136 U. S. 223. Two or three members of a firm have authority to mortgage partnership stock for the security of the debts of the firm; 73 Ia. 399. A mortgage by one partner of the whole stock in trade to secure a firm debt has been held valid; 1 Metc. 515.

Pledges of firm property. A partner may pledge its personal property to raise money for the firm; 3 Kent 46; 10 Hare 453; 7 M. & G. 607; 3 Bradw. 261. It is thought that a partner's equitable mortgage of firm real estate, by depositing deeds of partnership property as a pledge, would be valid; Lind. Part. 2d Am. ed. *140.

Purchases. A partner may bind the firm by purchasing on credit such goods as are necessary for carrying on the business in the usual way; 1 Camp. 185; 5 W. & S. 564; 19 Ga. 520; 76 N. C. 189; even land; 14 Nev. 265; but see 13 Bush 67.

Ratification. If a contract on behalf of the co-partnership, executed under seal by one partner, be, after its execution, ratified by the other partners, it becomes the deed of the firm as fully as if executed under seal by all the partners; even if the contract did not pertain to the ordinary business of the firm; 45 Minn. 11; see 70 Tex. 517.

Receipts. The power of a partner to receipt for the firm is incident to his power to receive money for it; see Debts; Story, Part. § 115.

Relative extent of each partner's power. In all ordinary matters relating to the partnership, the powers of the partners are co-extensive, and neither has a right to exclude another from an equal share in the management of the concern or from the possession of the partnership effects; 2 Paige, Ch. 810; 2 J. & W. 558.

Release. The rule that one partner cannot bind his co-partners by deed does not extend to releases; 75 Ill. 583; 2 Co. 68; 3 Johns. 68; 4 Gill & J. 310; 3 Kent 48; but see 40 Ia. 76. As a release by one partner is a release by all; 21 Ill. 604; 37 Vt. 573; so a release to one partner is a release to all; 5 Gill & J. 314; 28 Pick. 444.

Sales. A partner has power to sell any of the partnership goods; Cowp. 445; 3 Kent 44; or its negotiable notes; 102 U. S. 564; even the entire stock, if the sale be free from fraud on the part of the purchaser; and such sale dissolves the firm, although the term for which it was formed has not expired; 24 Pick. 89; 5 Watts 22; 59 Ala. 338; see, contra, 8 Bosw. 495; and this rule is doubted; George, Partn. 234; the implied power of a partner to sell applies only to property which is held for the purposes of sale; 37 Pa. 217; 12 Misc. Rep. 620; a partner has no power to sell all the partnership property without his co-partners' assent. A partner cannot transfer the whole of the partnership assets to a third person who is not a creditor; 32 N. Y. S. App. 428. A partner has power to sell after dissolution; 4 De G. M. & G. 542; and may then sell partnership realty to pay debts; 104 U. S. 18. A sale by one partner of his share of the stock dissolves the firm and gives the purchaser the right to an account; 50 Cal. 615. A bona fide sale of all the partnership effects by one partner to another is valid, although the firm and both partners are at the time insolvent; 9

Servants. One partner has the implied power to hire servants for partnership purposes; 9 M. & W. 79; 74 Pa. 166; and probably to discharge them, though not against the will of his co-partner; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *147.

Specialties. As a rule, the relation of partnership gives a partner no authority to bind his co-partners by specialty; Story, Part. § 117; and see Deeds and Mortgages, supra. The reason is that a seal belongs to the common law and partnership to the law merchant; Pars. Part. § 123. But it has been held that a partner may bind his firm by an executed contract under seal, because the firm is really bound by the act, and the seal is merely evidence; 33 Pa. 231; and, as stated above, a partner may bind his firm by a release under seal. If the seal was not necessary, it will be regarded as surplusage; as in an assignment for creditors; 5 Cra. 289; a mortgage of firm chattels; 7 Metc. 244; an assignment of a chose in action due the firm; 5 Hill 163. The general rule is now of less importance than formerly; Pars. Part. § 123. A lender may disregard a specialty executed by one partner, for a loan, and recover from the firm in assumpsit; 98 Ill. 27.

Warranties. It is laid down as a general rule that a power to sell does not carry with it the implied authority to bind the firm by a warranty; Pars. Part. 4th ed. § 144. See 48 Ill. App. 213. But if the partner has power to sell, his warranty would probably bind the firm; Pars. Part. § 144; 24 Barb. 549.

LIABILITIES. General Rule. If an act is done by one partner on behalf of the firm, and it can be said to have been necessary for the carrying on of the partnership business in the ordinary way, the firm will prima facie be liable, although in point of fact the act was not authorized by the other partners; but if the act cannot be said to have been necessary for the carrying on of the partnership business in the ordinary way, the firm will prima facie not be liable; 10 B. & C. 128; 14 M. & W. 11. As to reason for such liability, see Powers, supra.

Admissions. It is laid down as a general rule that partners are bound by the admissions, representations, and acknowledgments of one of their number, concerning partnership transactions; Story, Part. § 107; 1 Harr. N. J. 41. A better rule seems to be that the admissions of one partner with reference to a partnership transaction are evidence against the firm; 2 C. & P. 232; but not necessarily conclusive evidence; 2 K. & J. 491; 5 Stew. N. J. 828. It is held that the admission of one partner in legal proceedings is the admission of all; 1 Maule & S. 259; 40 Md. 499; 68 Ind. 110; 47 Mo. 346; 4 Conn. 326; 15 Mass. 44; 2 Wash. C. C. 388. See supra.

Agreements inter se. No arrangement between the partners themselves can limit or prevent their ordinary responsibilities to third persons, unless the latter assent to such arrangement; 2 B. & Ald. 670; 3 Kent 41; 5 Pet. 129; 3 B. & C. 427. But where the creditor has express notice of a private arrangement between the partners, by which either the power of one to bind the firm or his liability on partnership contracts is qualified or defeated, such creditor will be bound by the arrangement; 4 Ired. 129; 38 N. H. 287; 6 Pick. 372; 4 Johns. 251; 5 Conn. 597; 5 Bro. P. C. 489.

Attachment. A partner's interest in a firm is liable to attachment by his creditors; 7 C. B. 229; 2 Johns. Ch. 546; 8 N. H. 252; but one partner cannot maintain an attachment against the firm of which he is a member; 98 Ala. 526.

Contracts. See Powers, supra.

Contribution. A partner's contribution to the capital of his firm is a partnership debt for the repayment of which each partner is liable on an accounting and after payment of debts; 119 Mass. 38. Failure of a partner to pay his contribution in full does not entitle his co-partner to exclude him from the business without a dissolution; 8 C. E. Green 385.

Debts. Each partner is liable to pay the whole partnership debts. In what proportion the partners shall contribute is a matter merely among themselves; 5 Burr. 2618. Universally, whatever agreement may exist among the partners themselves, stipulating for a restricted responsibility, and however limited may be the extent of his own separate beneficial interest in, and however numerous the members of, the partnership, each individual member is liable for the joint debt; 5 Burr. 2611; 1 V. & B. 157; 2 Des. 148; 6 S. & R. 333; 34 Ohio St. 187. See 45 N. J. Eq. 738. In Louisiana, ordinary partners are not bound in solido for the debts of the partnership; La. Civ. Code, art. 28; though commercial partners who deal in personal property are bound in solido; a partner is bound for his share of the partnership debts, calculating such share in proportion to the number of partners, without attention to the proportion of the stock or profits each is entitled to; id. art. 2873. In equity, partnership debts are regarded as both joint and several; 45 N. J. Eq. 738.

An incoming partner is not liable for the debts of the firm incurred before he became a member, unless he assumes them by agreement; 58 Pa. 179; 27 La. Ann. 352; 73 Ill. 381; 6 Wash. 514; 53 Kan. 251; 49 Ark. 457; 77 Cal. 440. But a retiring partner remains liable for the outstanding debts of the firm; 4 Russ. 430.

Dormant partners. Dormant partners are, when discovered, equally liable with those who are held out to the world as partners, upon contracts made during the time they participate in the profits of the business; 1 Cr. & J. 316; 5 Mas. 176; 9 Pick. 272; 5 Pet. 529; 2 Harr. & G. 159; 9 Watts 454; 1 Dougl. 371; 21 Miss. 656; 25 Ill. 359; 46 La. Ann. 894. This liability is said to be founded on their participation in the profits; 5 Pet. 574; 10 Vt. 170; 16 Johns. 40; 1 H. Bla. 31. Another reason given for holding them liable is that they might otherwise receive usurious interest without any risk; 4 B. & Ald. 603; 10 Johns. 226. But inasmuch as a dormant partner differs from an ostensible partner only in being unknown as such, the liability of each must be owing to the same cause, viz.: that they are principals in the business, the dormant partner being undisclosed; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. Sharing profits is simply evidence of this relation; 5 Ch. Div. 458; and the usurious interest theory is so palpably illogical that it has never been accepted to any extent; 2 W. Bla. 997.

Dower. It has been held that a partner's widow is entitled to dower in firm lands subject to the equities of the parties; 3 Stew. N. J. 415. Firm debts are a lien on partnership lands paramount to a widow's right of dower; 8 Ohio St. 328; 86 Ill. 286; where partnership land is sold to pay debts, the widow of a partner has no dower; 65 Mo. 138; but contra, 20 S. C. 550; 7 How. (Miss.) 437. See 34 Fed. Rep. 375. Where the firm debts are all paid the dower survives; 68 Ala. 210.

Firm funds. A partner who withdraws firm funds from the business, thereby diminishing the stock, and applies them to his own use, is liable to the others for the injury; 1 J. J. Marsh. 507; 3 Stor. 101; and funds so used by a partner may be followed into his investments; 1 Stew. N. J. 595.

Fraud. One partner will be bound by the fraud of his co-partner in contracts relating to the affairs of the partnership, made with innocent third persons; 6 Cow. 497; 2 Cl. & F. 230; 7 T. B. Monr. 617; 15 Mass. 75, 331; 56 Ind. 406; 73 Ill. 381. This doctrine proceeds upon the ground that where one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third person, he shall suffer who has been the cause or the occasion of the confidence and credit reposed in such third person; 1 Metc. 562, 563. The liability, therefore, does not arise when there is collusion between the fraudulent partner and the party with whom he deals; 1 East 48; or the latter has reason to suppose that the partner is acting on his own account; 2 C. B. 821; 10 B. & C. 293. See infra.

Not only gross frauds, but intrigues for private benefit, are clearly offences against the partnership at large, and, as such, are relievable in a court of equity; 3 Kent 51, 53; 1 Sim. 32, 89.

A fraud committed by a partner (in a law firm) while acting on his own separate account is not imputable to the firm, although, had he not been a member of the firm, he would not have been in a position to commit the fraud; 18 N. Y. L. J. (Dec. 17, 1897).

Insolvency. It has been held that the discharge of the partners in insolvency, as individuals, does not relieve them from liability for the firm debts; 56 Cal. 631.

Judgments. The rule is that a judgment obtained against one partner on a firm liability is a bar to an action against his co-partners on the same obligation; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *255, *703; 3 De G. & J. 38; 4 McLean 51; 11 Gill & J. 11; see contra, 14 Bush 777; except when they are abroad and cannot be sued with effect; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *255; 43 Ohio St. 11; 71 Ga. 466; 4 De G. & S. 199; and this is so even if the other partners were not known to him. But in Pennsylvania and other states this rule is changed by statute. Where one partner is sued and judgment is given for him, the creditor may still have recourse to the others; 2 H. & C. 717.

Mismanagement. As a rule, a partner is not liable to the firm for the mismanagement of its business; Penn. N. J. 717; 1 Gray 378. See 41 Pa. 505; see infra, Torts. Because it is unreasonable to hold a partner, who acts fairly and for the best interests of the firm according to his judgment, liable for a loss thus unwittingly occasioned; 3 Wash. C. C. 224.

Notice. A retiring ostensible partner remains liable to persons who have had dealings with the firm and who have no notice of his retirement; 51 Ala. 126; 57 Ind. 284; 83 Pa. 148. Actual notice is not necessary to escape liability to new customers; Wade, Notice 226; Pars. Part. § 317; even though the business is continued in the same firm name; 36 Ohio St. 135. As a general rule, notice to one partner of any matters relating to the business of the firm is notice to all; 40 Mich. 546; 40 N. H. 267; 6 La. Ann. 684; 20 Johns. 178; 79 Pa. 251; even if two firms have a common partner; 3 Pa. 399.

Surviving partner. The surviving partner stands chargeable with the partnership debts, and takes the partnership property by survivorship, for all purposes of holding and administering the estate, until the effects are reduced to money and the debts paid; 3 Kent 37; 5 Metc. 578; 10 Gill & J. 404; 30 Me. 386; 3 Paige, Ch. 527; 13 Miss. 44; 18 Conn. 294. See 1 Exch. 184. The debts of the partnership must be collected in his name; 6 Cow. 441; Story, Part. § 346; 3 Kent 37; 4 Metc. 540. He has full power to control and dispose of the firm assets for the purpose of winding up its affairs and may secure a firm creditor by the execution of a mortgage, which is not invalid by reason of the fact that it also secures money borrowed by him after the death of his partner, if used for the partnership debts; 46 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 932. He has power to make an assignment for the benefit of firm creditors with preferences; 118 U. S. 3.

Torts. The firm is not liable for the torts of a partner committed outside of the usual course of the business, unless they are assented to or adopted by its members; 42 N. H. 25; 87 Ill. 508; 2 Ia. 580; 4 Blatch. 129; 82 Miss. 17; otherwise, in regard to torts committed in conducting the affairs of the partnership or those assented to by the firm; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *198, *702; as for the negligent driving of a coach by a member of a firm of coach proprietors; 4 B. & C. 223; or for the negligence of a servant employed by the firm while transacting its business; 14 Gray 191; or for the conversion of property by a partner, to be appropriated to the use of the firm; 87 Ill. 508; or for obtaining goods by false pretences and fraudulently disposing of them; 67 N. W. Rep.

(Mich.) 116. Demand of, and a refusal by, one partner to deliver up property is evidence of a conversion by the firm; 24 Wend. 169; 4 Rawle 120. A partnership may be liable for the publication of a libel; 83 Ala. 404. See 73 Mich. 203. If the firm is liable for the tort of a partner, each partner is liable in solido; Pars. Part. § 100; and all or one or more may be sued; 142 Ill. 9.

It has been held that the fraud of one partner does not charge the firm; 6 Mass. 245; without participation by the firm; 5 Greenl. 295 (but see as to these cases 1 Metc. 564); and that it is not liable for malicious prosecution instituted by one partner for the larceny of firm property, unless the others participated in the prosecution; 101 Ala. 165.

RIGHTS AND DUTIES. General rules. Good faith, reasonable diligence and skill, and the exercise of a sound judgment and discretion, lie at the very foundation of the relation of partnership. In this respect the same general rules apply to partners which are applicable to the other fiduciary relations; Story, Part. § 169; 14 Beav. 250; 1 Johns. Ch. 470; 53 Mo. 122; 81 Ill. 221; 80 Pa. 234. It becomes, therefore, the implied duty of each partner to devote himself to the interests of the business, and to exercise due diligence and skill for the promotion of the common benefit of the partnership. No partner has, ordinarily, a right to engage in any business or speculation which must necessarily deprive the partnership of a portion of his skill, industry, or capital; 3 Kent 51; 1 Johns. Ch. 305; 1 S. & S. 133; nor to place himself in a position which gives him a bias against the discharge of his duty; Story, Part. § 175; 1 S. & S. 124; 11 S. & R. 41, 48; 3 Kent 61; see 129 U. S. 512; nor to make use of the partnership property for his own private benefit; 6 Madd. 367; 4 Beav. 534; 1 Sim. 52; 3 Stew. N. J. 254; nor to make a personal profit out of any transaction connected with firm interests; 61 N. Y. 123. He cannot make a profit out of any transaction between himself and the firm; 18 Beav. 75; L. R. 18 Eq. 524; a partner cannot engage in any other business in which he competes with his firm; 1 S. & S. 124. But a partner may traffic outside of the scope of the firm's business for his own benefit and advantage; 150 U. S. 524.

Account in equity. Every partner has a right to an account from his co-partner, which may be enforced in equity, whereby a partner is enabled to secure the application of partnership assets to firm debts and the distribution of the surplus among the members of the firm; 8 Beav. 106; 24 Conn. 279. A silent partner may have a bill for an account; 98 Mass. 118. It has been held that a partner's bill for an account will be barred by the statute of limitations; 3 C. E. Green 457. See 66 Hun 469. But not for secret profits made by one partner in transacting firm business; 8 Stew. N. J. 254. A partner cannot maintain account against a co-partner for the profits of an illegal traffic; 120 Mass. 285.

Accounts to be kept. In order to give the partners information that the business is being carried on for their mutual advantage, it is the duty of each to keep an accurate account ready for inspection; 2 J. & W. 576; Story, Part. § 181; and see 104 Mass. 436; 16 Fla. 99; 3 Y. & C. 655; 20 Beav. 219.

Actions. As a general rule an action at law does not lie by one partner against his co-partners for money paid or liabilities incurred on account of the partnership, because without an account it is impossible to tell whether a partner is a debtor or creditor of the firm; 83 Mo. 557; 54 Barb. 358. See, contra, Gow, Part. c. 2, § 3. There are, however, many circumstances under which partners may sue each other; see Story, Part. § 219, note (2).

Articles of co-partnership. Partners may enter into any agreements between themselves, which are not void as against statutory provisions or general principles of law, even though they do conflict with the ordinary rules of the law of partnership, and such engagements will be enforced between the parties; Pars. Part., 4th ed. § 160; 28 E. L. & Eq. 7.

One partner may obtain an injunction to restrain his co-partner from violating his rights under the contract of partnership, even when the dissolution of the partnership is not asked; 12 U. S. App. 163. But it is held that equity will not interfere with the suit of a partner to prevent a dissolution made in contravention of the partnership articles, or to compel specific performance of them, the contract being of an essentially personal character; 4 Del. Ch. 337; 118 Mass. 279; 168 U. S. 336.

But the partnership articles do not affect third persons, unless they have notice of them; 2 B. & Ald. 697; 8 M. & W. 703; 1 Dall. 269; 14 Ohio St. 592; 10 Wend. 505.

Claims against the firm. A partner may be a firm creditor and is entitled to payment of his claim before judgment creditors of the individual partners; 5 C. E. Green 288.

Compensation. As it is the duty of partners to devote themselves to the interests of the business, it follows that they are not entitled to any special compensation for so doing, although the services performed by them are very unequal in amount and value, unless there is an express stipulation for remuneration; 7 Paige, Ch. 483; 4 Gill 338; 2 D. & B. Eq. 123; 44 Ia. 428; 69 Pa. 30; 11 So. Rep. (Ala.) 754; 89 Mich. 233; 99 U. S. 355; nor for services performed prior to the partnership, although they enure to its benefit; 124 Mass. 305. A surviving partner has been held entitled to compensation for continuing the business, in order to save the good-will; 26 Ohio St. 190. A surviving partner is ordinarily entitled to compensation after dissolution; 25 Beav. 282; but it is held that a liquidating partner is not entitled to compensation for winding up the concern; 82 Hun 488; 89 Pa. 139; 99 U. S. 355; 124 Mass. 305; so of a surviving or liquidating partner; 31 N. Y. Supp. 614; but he is entitled to be paid his expenses; 2 Super. Ct. Pa. 306. But where it was agreed that a partner should not give personal services, he may recover for services rendered the firm at their request; 11 Ill. 892. See Liquidating partner, infra.

Contribution. Since partners are co-principals and all liable for the firm debts, any partner who pays its liabilities is, in the absence of agreement to the contrary, entitled to contribution from his co-partners; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *367; 8 De G. M. & G. 572; 3 Ill. 464; 18 Pa. 351.

Dissolution. A member of an ordinary partnership, the duration of which is indefinite, may dissolve it at any time; Pars. Part. § 308; Lind. Part. *220; 51 Ind. 478; 76 N. Y. 373; 168 U. S. 836; 4 Col. 567. It will then continue only for purposes of winding up; 17 Ves. 298; 5 Leigh 583; 55 N. J. L. 427. But a court of equity would perhaps interfere to prevent irreparable injury by an untimely dissolution; 1 Swanst. 512. Where there is an agreement to continue the business for a certain time, one partner has no right to have a dissolution except for special cause; 50 Barb. 169; 9 Utah 236. But it is held that a partner can dissolve a partnership formed for a definite period, before the end of that period, but that he is liable in damages for the value of the profits which the other partner would otherwise have received; 10 N. Y. 489; 168 U. S. 337. In general, any circumstance which renders the continuance of the partnership, or the attainment of the end for which it was created, practically impossible, would seem sufficient to warrant a dissolution; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *576; 22 Beav. 471. A sale by one partner of his interest in the firm's property to the others has been held not necessarily to work a dissolution of the firm; 93 Mich. 569; but see 28 Fla. 680; PARTNERSHIP.

Exemption. The right of partners to statutory exemption out of firm property is a disputed point, and depends somewhat on the statutes of the several states. It has been held that they are not so entitled; 77 Cal. 408; 7 Neb. 184; 61 Wis. 385; 26

Ohio St. 817; 44 Pa. 442; contra, 57 Ga. 229; 44 Mich. 86; 37 N. Y. 350. See Thomps. Hom. & Ex. § 197.

Firm name, use of. It has been held that one partner has no right to use the firm name after dissolution; 7 South. 749; 7 Abb. Pr. 202; 7 Phila. 257; the reason given being that such a continued use of the firm name would impair the value of the goodwill (q. v.), and might also subject the retired partners to additional liabilities; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. § 444; 43 Ch. D. 206 (C. A.). For cases contra see 3 Swanst. 490; 7 Sim. 421; 28 Beav. 536; 34 id. 566; 121 N. Y. 484; 4 Denio 559. It is said to be the better opinion that the firm name is an asset of the firm; Pars. Partn. § 182, n. Where there is a sale of the business to a partner, the latter does not, without express agreement, acquire a right to the firm name; 43 Ch. D. 206 (C. A.); 88 Mich. 473; but see 10 Ch. D. 436 (C. A.); 87 Conn. 278; even so as to advertise himself as "successor," id.; but he may advertise that he is "late of" the former firm; id. A continuing partner who has acquired the right to a retiring partner's name, cannot transfer it to a corporation; Bagby, etc., Co. v. Rivers, Ct. of App. Md., 57 Alb. L. J. 281.

Firm property. Each partner has a claim, not to any specific share or interest in the property in specie, as a tenant in common has, but to the proportion of the residue which shall be found to be due to him upon the final settlements of their accounts, after the conversion of the assets and the liquidation of all claims upon the partnership; and therefore each partner has a right to have the same applied to the payment of all such claims, before any one of the partners, or his personal representatives, or his individual creditors, can claim any right or title thereto; Story, Part. § 97; 4 Ves. 396; 6 id. 119; 17 id. 193.

Each partner has also a specific lien on the present and future property of the partnership, the stock brought in, and everything coming in during the continuance and after the determination of the partnership, not only for the payment of debts due to third persons, but also for the amount of his own share of the partnership stock, and for all moneys advanced by him beyond that amount, as also for moneys withdrawn by his co-partners beyond the amount of his share; 3 Kent 65; 8 Dana 278; 10 Gill & J. 253; 20 Vt. 479; 9 Cush. 578; 25 Beav. 280; 52 N. J. Eq. 628. This lien attaches to real estate held for partnership purposes, as well as to the personal estate; 5 Metc. Mass. 562, 577; and is co-extensive with the transactions on joint account; 1 Dana 58; 11 Ala. n. s. 412.

Upon a settlement of a partnership by an account, the assets are divided among the partners in proportion to their contributions; and each partner is liable for a deficit in proportion to his share of the profits; 120 Mass. 324.

Fraud. A partner has an equity to rescind the partnership and be indemnified for his co-partner's fraud in inducing him to enter the business; 126 Mass. 304; 3 De G. & J. 304; 1 Giff. 355. Where the partnership suffers from the fraud or wanton misconduct of any partner in transacting firm business, he will be responsible to his co-partners for it; Story, Part. § 169. See supra.

Interest. As a general rule partners are not entitled to interest on their respective contributions to capital unless by special agreement, or unless it has been the custom of the firm to have such interest charged in its accounts; 3 De G. J. & S. 1; 6 Beav. 433; 89 Pa. 139; 119 Mass. 38; 20 Ala. 747; 92 Ill. 92. See 52 Minn. 342; 56 Mich. 276. But a partner is entitled to interest on advances made by him to the firm; 6 Mad. 145; 129 Mass. 517; 85 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 60; 14 N. J. Eq. 44; 17 Vt. 242; 79 N. Y. 366; and no express agreement is necessary; 1 McCart. Ch. 44. See, however, 8 Dana 214; 24 Conn. 185. But it is held that interest will not be allowed on advances and profits not drawn out; 25 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 728. Where profits are left in the business, a partner is not entitled to interest thereon; L. R. 5 Ch. 519; 89 Pa. 139; 53 Mich. 421; a partner who has not paid in his contribution to capital will be charged with interest; 42 Kan. 247; 109 Ill. 94; a partner will not be charged with interest on overdrafts; 72 Ga. 154. A partner has been held entitled to interest on a sum contributed to capital in excess of the agreed share; 17 Ala. 32.

Liquidating partner. It is the duty of those upon whom, by appointment or otherwise, it devolves, after the dissolution of a firm, to wind up the affairs of the partnership, to act for the best advantage of the concern, to make no inconsistent use of the property, and to seek no private advantage in the composition of debts or in any other transaction in the performance of this business; 1 Swanst. 507; 2 id. 627; 11 Ill. 392; 54 Kan. 793. Nor, in this case, can any partner claim any commission for getting in the debts, or, in any other particular, reward or compensation for his trouble; id.; 14 Misc. Rep. 18; 99 U. S. 355; 1 Knapp, P. C. 312; 3 Kent 64, note; Story, Part. § 317; 17 Pick. 519; 4 Gratt. 138; but in 10 Vt. 613, a partner who performed services in settling up the affairs of a firm after dissolution was allowed compensation for them, and where one partner contributed all the capital and exercised complete management of the business, he was allowed compensation; 35 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 921; and where there is a great difference between the services of the partners, there may be compensation; 19 Pa. 516; see 124 Mass. 305; it is held that no compensation will be allowed for an excess of services without a special agreement; 57 Ill. App. 20. But it is held that a partner will be allowed compensation for extra and outside services in winding up; 118 Mass. 236. See Compensation, supra.

Litigation. A partner may recover the costs of carrying on litigation for the firm—but not compensation for conducting it, unless by express agreement; 3 Stew. N. J. 504.

Profits and losses, how distributed. As between the partners, they may by agreement stipulate for equal or unequal shares in the profit and loss of the partnership; 132 U. S. 539; Story, Part. § 23; but in the absence of any express agreement or stipulation between them, and of all controlling evidence and circumstances, the presumption has been held to be that they are interested in equal shares; 183 Pa. 186; 6 Wend. 263; 9 Ala. n. s. 372; 2 Murph. 70; 5 Dana 211; 1 Ired. Eq. 332; 1 J. J. Marsh. 506; 20 Beav. 98; 54 Fed. Rep. 237; 132 U. S. 539; 70 Md. 528. And the circumstance that each partner has brought an unequal amount of capital into the common stock, or that one or more have brought in the whole capital and the others have only brought industry, skill, and experience, would not seem to furnish any substantial ground of difference as to the distribution; Story, Part. § 24; 3 Kent 28, 29; 21 Me. 117.

It has sometimes been asserted, however, that it is a matter of fact, to be settled according to all the circumstances, what would be a reasonable apportionment, uncontrolled by any natural presumption of equality in the distribution; Story, Partn. § 24; 2 Camp. 45. The opinion in England seems divided; but in America the authorities seem decidedly to favor the doctrine of a presumed equality of interest. See American cases cited above; Story, Part. § 24. "The better view is that although all or a large part of the capital is furnished by one partner, the entire loss is to be borne by all. Hence, after payment of the debts, the contributions of partners to capital are all to be repaid before there can be any division of profits (L. R. 7 Eq. 538; 119 Mass. 38; 113 N. Y. 39). And if the assets are not sufficient, after paying the debts, to repay the capital, the deficit must be shared by all the partners; and the partner who has contributed more than his share of capital is therefore entitled to contribution from the rest (37 Fed. Rep. 294; 124 Pa. 498)." Pars. Partn., Beale's ed. § 178.

Receiver, appointment of. To authorize a partner to demand the appointment of a receiver of a subsisting partnership, he must show such a case of gross abuse and misconduct on the part of his co-partner, that a dissolution ought to be decreed and the business wound up; Story, Part. §§ 228, 231; 2 Mer. 405; 8 C. E. Green 208, 388. Where it appears that the surviving members of a firm are conducting the business for the purpose of enlarging and continuing it, and not to close it up, a receiver may be appointed for that purpose, on application of the legal representatives of the deceased member; 20 N. Y. S. 65. After dissolution a court of equity will appoint a receiver almost as a matter of course; Lind. Part. § 1008; 1 Ch. Div. 600; 65 N. C. 162; 2 C. E. Green 343; 20 Md. 30. But see 18 Ves. 281; and [1892] Ch. 633, where it was held that the mere fact of dissolution of a partnership does not give one partner an absolute right, as against his co-partners, to have a receiver appointed of the partnership business.

Set-off. It may be stated as a general rule in law and equity that there can be no set-off of joint debts against separate debts unless under a special agreement; Story, Part. § 396. Thus, a debt due by one of the members of a firm cannot be set off against a debt due the firm; 2 C. B. 821; 16 R. I. 288; 2 Bay 146; 4 Wend. 583; 88 Ala. 356; unless the partners assent; 89 Pa. 392. Nor can a debt owing to a partner be set off against a debt due by the firm; 119 Ill. 407; 6 C. & P. 60; Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. § 269; 1 South. 220; but see 67 Miss. 60. But otherwise where the partnership's debt is reduced to judgment; Pars., Partn., Beale's ed. § 262; 89 Wis. 410.

Torts. If the partnership suffers loss from the gross negligence, unskillfulness, fraud, or other wanton misconduct of a partner in the partnership business, or from a known deviation from the partnership articles, he must bear the loss; 6 W. & S. 529; 1 Sim. 89; Pothier, Partn. n. 133; 3 Kent 52, note; Story, Part. § 178. But not if it be the result of an honest mistake in judgment, not caused by gross negligence or ignorance; 1 McCart. 44; 76 Ia. 288.

See SPECIAL PARTNER

PARTNERSHIP. A relation founded upon a contract between two or more persons to do business as individuals on joint, undivided account.

A contract of two or more competent persons to place their money, effects, labor, and skill, or some or all of them, in lawful commerce or business, and to divide the profit and bear the loss in certain proportions. 3 Kent 23; 94 Ala. 116.

This definition was criticised by Jessel, M. R., in 5 Ch. D. 472, on the ground that there may be partners who do not contribute any property, labor, or skill, as where a share is given to the widow of a former partner. Pollock (Partnership 3) considers it the most businesslike and substantially accurate definition, and one which might be accepted, with more or less verbal condensation and amendment.

A voluntary contract between two or more persons for joining together their money, goods, labor, and skill, or any or all of them, in some lawful commerce or business, under an understanding, express, or implied from the nature of the enterprise, that there shall be a communion of profit and loss between them, will constitute a partnership. Colly. Part. § 2; 10 Me. 489; 3 Harr. N. J. 485; 5 Ark. 278.

A legal entity formed by the association of two or more persons for the purpose of carrying on business together and dividing its profits between them. Parsons, Partn., Beale's ed. § 1. See 5 Ch. D. 458.

The relation which subsists between persons who have agreed to share the profits of a business carried on by all or any of them on behalf of all of them. Colly. Part., 5th ed. 4.

Sir F. Pollock says: "The nearest approach to a definition which has been given by judicial authority in England is the statement that 'to constitute a partnership the parties must have agreed to carry on business and to share profits in some way in common," but he adds that this principle "excludes several kinds of transactions which, at first sight, have some appearance of partnership." Poll. Part. 4.

A contract of partnership is one by which two or more persons agree to carry on a business for their own benefit, each contributing property or services and having a community of interest in the profits. It is, in effect, a contract of mutual agency, each partner acting as a principal in his own behalf and as agent for his co-partner. Gray, J., in 168 U. S. 334.

An agreement that something shall be attempted with a view to gain, and that the gain shall be shared by the parties to the agreement, is the grand characteristic of every partnership, and is the leading feature in every definition of the term. *Ewell's Lind. Part., 2d Am. ed. *2, where many definitions are collected.*

The relation which subsists between persons carrying on a business in common with a view of profit. English Partnership Act, 1890.

It has been said that "the various definitions have been approximate rather than exhaustive." 145 U. S. 811.

Partnership, though often called a contract, is in truth the result of a contract; the relation which subsists between persons who have so agreed that the profits of a business inure to them as co-owners. George, Part. 30.

That a partnership is an entity, distinct from the partners, is the view of the business world everywhere. And such is the state of the law where the civil law is in force. In our law, the partnership has not been clearly recognized as an entity. In an action at law, at least, the partners alone are recognized as parties in interest, yet even at law certain doctrines are explained only by recognizing the firm as an entity. The courts of equity show more recognition of the true character of a partnership; but even in equity this has not been made clear until recently. There is now, however, a strong disposition on the part of the courts to recognize the mercantile doctrine. Para. Part., Beale's ed. 2.

"The firm is the contracting party, not the individuals composing the firm; the credit is given to the firm; the partnership, the ideal person, formed by the union of interest, is the legal debtor. A partnership is considered in law as an artificial person, or being, distinct from the individuals composing it." 2 Green, L. 410.

"Everybody knows that partnership is a sort of agency, but a very peculiar one. You cannot grasp the notion of agency, properly speaking, unless you grasp the notion of the existence of the firm as a separate entity from the existence of the partners; a notion which was well grasped by the old Roman lawyers, and which was partly understood in the courts of equity before it was part of the whole law of the land, as it is now. But when you get that idea clearly, you will see at once what sort of agency it is. It is the one person acting on behalf of the firm." 5 Ch. D. 476, per Jessel, M. R.

"When one joins a partnership, he makes himself a part of an entity already existing, which has acquired certain property and business, and in acquiring it has incurred certain indebtedness. The firm owns the property, holds the business, and owes the debts." 17 Kan. 340, per Brewer, J.

A partnership is a distinct entity, having its own property, debts, and credits; for the purpose for which it was created, it is a person, and as such is recognized by the law. 22 Neb. 744. See 83 Ga. 129.

The partnership for most legal purposes is a distinct entity." 39 Mich. 784, per Cooley, J.

"A partnership, or joint stock company, is just as distinct and palpable an entity in the idea of the law, as distinguished from the individuals composing it, as is a corporation. . . . The obligation and the liability, inter partes, are the same in the one case as the other. The only practical difference is a technical one, having reference to the forum and form of remedy." 50 Vt. 676.

There are statutes in some states providing that a partnership may sue and be sued by its name.

The relation between the partners and the firm is that of agent to principal; and the firm property, the legal title to which is held by the partners, is in trust for the firm. Each partner, in doing an act which is within the scope of his agency, is acting therefor for the firm, and not for himself nor for his co-partners. Para. Part., Beale's ed. 4.

The law of partnership, as administered in England and in the United States, rests on foundations derived from three sources,—the common law, the law merchant, and the Roman law; Colly. Part. § 1.

Partnership in the Roman law (societas) included every associated interest in property which resulted from contract; e. g. where two bought a farm together. Every other associated interest was styled communitas, e. g. where a legacy was left to two; *Pothier, Droit Franc. III. 444; Ewell's Lind. Part. *58, note 2; 11 La. Ann. 277.*

Partnership at the common law is an active notion. The relation implies a business and a turning of capital. It is to be contrasted with ownership, which is, whatever the tenancy, a passive notion; 1 Johns. 106; 54 Cal. 429. But there may be at the common law a joint purchase and an individual liability for the whole price without a partnership. In a purchase expressly by two the contract is prima facie joint with a consequent liability of each for the whole price. But this inference may be contradicted by circumstances known to the seller which indicate a division of title; 1 Wms. Saund. 291 c; 4 Cow. 163, 282; 27 Ia. 131; 9 Johns. 475; 15 Me. 17.

Partnership, in the Roman law, was in buying or selling. True partnership, at common law, is only in buying and selling. This peculiarity of the common law is due to the commercial origin of the relation and of the rules by which the relation is governed. The Roman societas was an outgrowth of the ancient tribal constitution. The common-law partnership is an expedient of trade; 15 Wend. 187; 42 Ala. 179; 41 Me. 9; 1 Pa. 140; Camp. 793; 1 Johns. 106. Buying to sell again fixes the transaction as a joint one. The transaction is joint because the sale excludes the idea of division of title in the purchase. The property dealt in becomes the instrument of both parties in obtaining a totally distinct subject of distribution, i. e. the profit; *14 Wend. 187; 3 Kent *25.* There must be an agreement, not a mere intention, to sell jointly; 47 N. Y. 199.

In a partnership, the members do business in their unqualified capacity as men, without special privilege or exemption; they are treated in law as a number of individuals, occupying no different relation to the rest of the world than if each were acting singly; 7 Ves. 778. On the other hand, a corporation, though in fact but an association of individuals with special privileges and exemptions, is in contemplation of law a fictitious person distinct from the members who compose it; *Ewell's Lind. Part. *4.* Every unincorporated association for purposes of gain is a partnership; unless it can claim corporate privilege on the ground of a de facto standing; 27 Ind. 399; 66 N. Y. 426; 7 Pa. 165; 66 Ill. 582. A club or association not for gain is not a partnership; it is not a commercial relation; 6 Mo. App. 465; 23 Ohio St. 159; 97 Pa. 493; 2 M. & W. 172. In this country there is a far wider extent in the variety of purposes for which partnerships are established than anywhere else; Para. Part. § 87; including farming, manufacturing, mining, lumbering, the business of lawyers, physicians, etc.; id.

Whether a partnership exists or not in a particular case is not a mere question of fact, but one mixed of law and fact; 111 U. S. 530. It is, nevertheless, generally to be decided by a jury. See 3 Harr. N. J. 358; 1 N. & M'C. 20; 1 Cal. 184; 3 Fla. 541; 3 C. B. N. s. 562, 563; 42 Ala. 179; 61 Mich. 216. If the facts are admitted or the evidence consists of a written instrument, it is for the court to say whether a partnership exists; 58 Conn. 413; 13 R. I. 27.

Elements of partnership. The elements of partnership are the contribution and a sharing in the profits. These two elements must be combined. Without contribution the alleged partner cannot be said to do business; unless he shares the profits, the business is not carried on for his account. Contribution without a share in the profits is a simple gift to the firm, by which firm creditors are enriched, not damaged. Sharing profits without contribution is a gift by the firm to the beneficiary, with which creditors may of course interfere by seizing the property and closing out the concern. In neither case does the alleged partner enter into business relations with the customers and creditors of the firm; 8 H. L. Cas. 286; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 8 Hun 189; L. R. 7 Exch. 218.

Contribution need not be made to the firm stock; any co-operation in the business will be enough; 4 East 144; 16 Johns. 34; Story, Partn. §§ 27, 40. A contribution must be kept in the concern, and take the risk of the business; a loan, on the other hand, is made upon the personal credit of the partners merely, and may be used by them as they please; it is to be repaid at all events. Because of this difference, sharing profits in lieu of interest upon a loan does not create a partnership. The English statute to this effect has been decided to be merely declaratory; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 7 Ch. Div. 511; 62 N. Y. 508; 6 Pick. 372. Mere loaning of money to a partnership for a definite period, the creditor to receive interest in proportion to the profits, does not make the lender liable as a partner; 145 U. S. 811. It is not necessary, however, that each partner should bring into the concern both labor and property; Parsons, Partn. Beale's ed. § 63. The contribution of money or property by an incoming partner is not essential to the creation of a partnership; it is competent for the prior partners, in consideration of the new partner undertaking the entire charge and control of the business of the company, to give him an interest as partner in the property which is to constitute, at the outset, the whole capital of the partnership; 132 U. S. 539.

It was formerly held that sharing profits constituted the parties partners, though no such relationship was intended between them; 2 W. Bla. 998; 2 H. Bla. 235; 1 Story 371; 58 N. Y. 272; but not sharing gross profits; 1 Camp. 329. Again, it is called prima facie evidence of partnership, but a contribution will have the same effect. Each is an element in a relation not complete without both.

It has been held that a partnership subsists between merchants who divide the commissions received by each other on the sale of goods recommended or "influenced" by the one to the other; 4 B. & Ald. 663. See 95 Ky. 387. So between persons who agree to share the profits of a single adventure; 9 C. B. 431; 1 Rose 297; and between persons one of whom is in the position of a servant to the others, but is paid a share of the profits instead of a salary; 1 Deac. 341; 1 Rose 92; (contra, 182 Pa. 624); and between persons one of whom is paid an annuity out of the profits made by the others; 17 Ves. 412; 8 Bingh. 469; or an annuity in lieu of any share in those profits; 2 W. Bla. 999. So between the vendor and purchaser of a business, if the former guarantee a clear profit of so much a year, and was to have all profits beyond the amount guaranteed; 3 C. B. 641. The character in which a portion of the profits was received did not affect the result; see 1 Maule & S. 412; 21 Beav. 164. Persons who share profits were quasi-partners, although their community of interest was confined to the profits; 2 B. & C. 401. But it is held that a contract for the sale of goods, which provides that they shall be charged for at reasonable prices, and that the purchaser shall have a credit of one-half the profits, does not establish a partnership between the seller and purchaser; 16 Colo. 447.

An agreement to share losses is not essential; that follows as an incident to the relation. Indeed all liability inter se may be provided against by contract and a partnership may nevertheless subsist; 3 M. & W. 357; 8 C. B. 32, 39; Ewell's Lind. Part. *22; 7 Ala. 761; 5 La. An. 44. Partnership is a question of intention, and the intention which makes a partnership is ordinarily to contribute to the business and share the profits. In this way, the parties become co-principals in a business carried on for their account. The question of intention is to be decided by a consideration of the whole agreement into which the parties have entered, and ought not to be made to turn upon a consideration of only a part of its provisions; 15 M. & W. 292; 3 Kent 27; Ewell's Lind. Part. *10.

An agreement to share profits, nothing being said about the losses, amounts prima facie to an agreement to share losses also; so that an agreement to share profits is prima facie an agreement for a partnership; and, accordingly, it is held that, unless an agreement to the contrary is shown, persons engaged in any business or adventure, and sharing the profits derived from it, are partners as regards that business or adventure. It is strong presumptive evidence of partnership; 37 Conn. 250. Still, it cannot be said that persons who share profits are necessarily partners in the proper sense of the word; Ewell's Lind. Part. *7, *12; 28 Ohio St. 319; 54 Mo. 325; 5 Gray 59, 60; 12 Conn. 69; 12 N. H. 185; 15 Me. 294; 8 H. L. Cas. 268; see 18 Johns. 34; 18 Wend. 175; 6 Conn. 347; 132 U. S. 539; unless the business is carried on by them personally or by their agents; 8 H. L. Cas. 268. Although a presumption of partnership would seem to arise in such a case; Colly. Part. § 85; 101 Cal. 500; 127 Pa. 442; still, the particular circumstances of the case may be such as to repel this presumption. It may appear that the share of the profits taken was merely a compensation to one party for labor and service, or for furnishing the raw materials, or a mill privilege, or a factory, or the like, from which the other is to earn profits; 5 Gray 60; 8 Kent 33; 6 Halst. 181; 2 McCord 421; but see 38 N. H. 289. Originally it was immaterial whether the profits were shared as gross or net; but the later cases have established a distinction. A division of gross returns is thought to be identical with a purchase for the purpose of division; the price represents the thing. There is no unity of interest; 1 Camp. 329; 3 Kent *25; 4 Maule & S. 240; 5 N. Y. 186. But the distinction is not absolutely decisive on the question of partnership. See 1 Camp. 330; 6 Vt. 119; 6 Pick. 335; 4 Me. 264; 12 Conn. 69; 58 N. H. 287, 304; 4 B. & Ald. 663. The officers and crews of whaling and other fishing vessels, who are to receive certain proportions of the produce of the voyage in lieu of wages; 4 Esp. 182; 17 Mass. 208; 2 Y. & C. 61; captains of merchant-ships who, instead of wages, receive shares in the profits of the adventure; 4 Maule & S. 240; or who take vessels under an agreement to pay certain charges and receive a share of the earnings; 16 Mass. 330; 7 Me. 261; persons making shipments on half-profits; 14 Pick. 195; have generally been held not to be partners with the owners, and the like. Running a steamboat on shares does not make the owners partners in respect of the vessel; 35 Fed. Rep. 785; so of an agreement between two parties to farm on shares; 42 Ga. 326; 67 Mo. 170; 30 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 637; and a purchase of land on joint account for the purpose of sale and profit; 142 U. S. 662; and a hotel lease where the rental depends in part on the profit of the hotel; 28 N. Y. Supp. 134; or running a saw mill where one erects it and another furnishes logs and they divide profits; 58 Ala. 618. But a partnership can be created in a single business transaction, as upon the sale of horses, sharing the profits and loss; 2 Super. Ct. Pa. 104; or in the purchase and sale of lands; 149 U. S. 248. A seaman who is to receive pay in proportion to the amount of fish caught, is not a partner; 68 Me. 241. Sharing profits in lieu of wages is not a partnership. There is no true contribution; 192 Pa. 624; 69 Ill. 237; 118 Mass. 443; 34 Md. 49; 28 N. J. L. 270; 14 Cal. 73; 43 Mo. 538; 44 Ga. 228; 15 So. Rep. (Ala.) 444; 41 Kan. 503; 112 N. Y. 419. Where a person enters into a contract with another by which the latter is to receive a certain salary and a percentage of the profits, while the former is to own the entire capital, no partnership exists; 104 Mo. 425; nor where one receives a share of the profits by way of compensation; 76 N. Y. 55; 4 Nev. 420. A factor, simple or del credere, may receive a portion of the profits in lieu of commissions, without becoming a partner; 62 Pa. 374; 24 L. J. Ch. 58. A mere participation in profits and losses of a business does not necessarily constitute a partnership; 89 Mo. 192.

Where a business is assigned to trustees who are to manage it and pay creditors out of the profits, the creditors are not partners; the distribution of so-called profit is really the payment of a debt; 8 H. L. C. 268; but creditors who set up their insolvent debtor in business and share the profits with him, forbearing meanwhile to press their claims, have been held to be partners; 8 Hun 189.

The case of Cox v. Hickman, 8 H. L. C. 268, which held that persons who share profits do not thereby incur the liability of partners, is said to have put an end to two doctrines formerly held to be fundamental: that persons may be held to the liability of partners who are not partners in fact, merely because some other relation exists between them; and that profit-sharing is conclusive of the existence of a partnership; Pars. Part. § 43. The true question of partnership is said in L. R. 1 C. P. 86, to be as stated by Lord Cranworth in 8 H. L. C. 268: "Whether the trade is carried on, on behalf of the person sought to be charged as a partner, the participation in the profits being a most important element in determining that question, but not being in itself decisive; the test being whether it is such a participation of profits as to constitute the relation of principal and agent between the person taking the profits and those actually carrying on the business."

The doctrine of Cox v. Hickman has been generally followed in this country: 145 U. S. 611; George, Partn. 43, where cases in nearly all the states are collected; but in Pennsylvania the rule in Waugh v. Carver, 2 H. Bla. 285, supra, has been held to be firmly established, though overruled in England; 62 Pa. 374. There is a distinction in Pennsylvania between participation in profits as such and a compensation or consideration merely measured by a proportion of profits; while this distinction is of a very refined and shadowy character, it is said to be too late to question the rule or the exception; 62 Pa. 374; 176 Pa. 361. In New York, Cox v. Hickman was considered, but not followed, in 58 N. Y. 272; and in 115 N. Y. 625, the rule in Waugh v. Carver was held to be still in force in that state. The rule was fully discussed in 53 N. H. 276 and 45 Mich. 188. The result of the English doctrine is said to be that there can be no partnership between parties unless by contract among themselves, but parties may be charged as partners by way of estoppel. It is the present law of England that no person who does not hold himself out as a partner is liable to third persons for the acts of persons whose profits he shares, unless he and they are really partners inter se; 1 Lind. Part. *42; L. R. 1 C. P. 86.

Mutual agency as a final test of partnership has been approved in some cases; 53 N. H. 276; 64 L. J. Q. B. 170; and rejected in others; 5 Ch. Div. 458; 145 U. S. 611.

The ultimate test is said to be the ownership of the profits, which the owner receives as owner and not by way of compensation for something, such as services, etc.; George, Partn. 50. To constitute partnership each person must have an interest in the profits as a principal in the joint business; 54 Mo. 325.

A distinction is made between a share in the profits and a commission equal to a certain per cent. on the profits. In the latter case there is no partnership, because no sharing in the profits as such. The rule is based upon authority, but is acknowledged to have no foundation in common sense. It is said to be an attempt to escape from the rigidity of the proposition that a share in the profits must in all cases make a man a partner; L. R. 4 P. C. App. 419; 62 Pa. 374; 18 Ves. 300; 12 Conn. 69; 6 Metc. 82.

In other cases, it is held that in order to render a man liable as partner he must have a specific interest in the profits as a principal trader; 1 Den. 337; 15 Conn. 73; 10 Metc. 308; 28 Ohio St. 319. But in reference to these positions the questions arise: When may a party be said to have a specific interest in the profits, as profits? when, as a principal trader?—questions in themselves very nice, and difficult to determine. See 6 Metc. 82; 12 Conn. 77.

Sometimes the partnership relation has been made dependent on the power to control the business. In strictness the only control necessary is the power to control the application of the contribution. A partner may have no power, as between him and his partners, to manage the business; 4 Sandf. 311.

Again, partnership has been said to require that a partner have an initiative in the conduct of the business; but the proposition seems to lose sight of dormant partners; L. R. 4 P. C. 419.

Again, partnership has been made to depend on what is termed the legal title to the business: A was held not a partner, though he shared in the profits of a business created solely by his contribution but assigned to B for A's protection; L. R. 1 C. P. 86. There are other cases in which considerable stress is laid on the right to an account of profits, as furnishing a rule of liability; 3 Kent 25; 18 Wend. 184; 3 C. B. n. s. 544, 561. But, although it is true that every partner must have a right to an account, it seems not to be equally true that every party who has a right to an account is a partner; 5 Gray 58.

Partnership has sometimes been styled a branch of the law and relation of principal and agent. But mutual agency is not the basis, it is the incident of partnership. Partners are co-principals, and the right and power of representation springs from this circumstance. A dormant partner is not at all the agent of the firm; L. R. 7 Ex. 227. The principal distinction between a partnership and a mere agency is that a partner has a community of interest with the other partners in the business and responsibilities of the partnership,—sometimes both in the stock and profits, and sometimes only in the profits,—whereas an agent, as such, has no interest in either; 4 B. & C. 67. The authority of a partner is very much more extensive than that of a mere agent; 10 N. H. 16. See PARTNERS. The reference to agency as a test of partnership is unfortunate and inconclusive, inasmuch as agency results from partnership, rather than partnership from agency; 145 U. S. 611.

The formation of a contract of partnership does not require any particular formality. It is, in general, sufficient that it is formed by the voluntary consent of the parties, whether that be express or implied, whether it be by written articles, tacit approbation, or by parol contract, or even by mere acts; 3 Kent 27; Davis 320; 4 Conn. 568; Pars. Part. § 627. As a general rule a writing is unnecessary; 2 Barb. Ch. 336; Ewell's Lind. Part. *80. Under the statute of frauds, where there is an agreement that a partnership shall commence at some time more than a year from the making of the agreement, a writing is necessary; 6 B. & C. 108. As to partnership in lands, see infra.

Where there is no written agreement, the evidence generally relied upon to prove a partnership is the conduct of the parties, the mode in which they have dealt with each other, and the mode in which each has, with the knowledge of the others, dealt with other persons. This can be shown by the books of account, by the testimony of clerks, agents, and other persons, by letters and admissions, and, in short, by any of the modes by which facts can be established. As to the presumption arising from the joint retainer of solicitors, see 20 Beav. 98; 7 Hare 159. For cases in which partnership has been inferred from various circumstances, see 4 Russ. 247; 2 Camp. 45. Though formed by deed, partnership may be dissolved by parol; Ewell's Lind. Part. *572. See ARTICLES OF PARTNERSHIP.

A contract for the creation of a partnership is enforceable at law; 3 Super. Ct. Pa. 327. The practical construction of partnership articles given for several years by the partners to its language will usually be accepted by the courts as conclusive; 152 Mass. 316.

Kinds. The Roman law recognized five sorts of partnership. First: societas universorum bonorum, a community of goods; probably a survival of the old tribal relation. Second: societas universorum quæ ex quaestu veniunt, or partnership in everything which comes from gain—the usual form; Pothier, Part. nn. 29, 43. Such contracts are said to be within the scope of the common law; but they are of very rare existence; Story, Part. § 72; 5 Mas. 183. Third: societas vectigalium, a partnership in the collection of taxes. It was not dissolved by the death of a member; and if it was so agreed in the beginning, the heir immediately succeeded to the place of the ancestor. Fourth: societas negotiationis alicuius, i. e. in a given business venture. Fifth: societas certarum rerum vel unius rei, i. e. in the acquisition or sale of one or more specific things; Pothier, Part. *24.

In the French law there are four principal classes of partnership: First: en nom collectif, the ordinary general partnership. Second: en commandite, an association corresponding to our limited partnership, composed of general and special partners in which the liability of the latter is limited to the fund invested by them. Third: anonyme, a joint stock company with limited liability. Fourth: en participation, simply a partnership with a dormant partner; Merlin, Répert. de Jur. tit. Sociétés; Mackenzie, Rom. Law 217; Pothier, Part. *39. See Goiraud, Code, etc.

In the common law all partnership is for gain. General partnership is for a general line of business; 3 Kent *25; Cowp. 814. But where the parties are engaged in one branch of trade or business only, they would be usually spoken of as engaged in a general partnership; Story, Part. § 74. Special or particular partnership is one confined to a particular transaction. The extent or scope of the agreement is different in the two cases, but the character of the relation is the same. A partnership may exist in a single transaction as well as in a series; Daveis 323; 2 Ga. 18; 3 C. B. 341; 49 Pa. 63. Special or limited partnership differs from the ordinary relation. It is composed of general partners to whom all the ordinary rules of partnership apply, and of limited partners with circumscribed power and liability limited to the amount of their contribution. The privilege is imparted by charter in England. In America it exists by statute; and unless the provisions of the act are strictly complied with, the association will be treated as a general partnership; 3 Kent *35; 62 N. Y. 513; 91 Ill. 90; 127 Pa. 181, 255; 151 id. 79; 35 Ill. App. 386. The special exemption of a limited partner will be recognized in other jurisdictions than the one in which the association is formed, though the firm has made the contract in the foreign jurisdiction; 69 N. Y. 24.

Another sort of association is styled limited partnership (q. v.). It is of recent, statutory origin and strongly resembles a corporation. The members incur no liability beyond the amount of their subscription; unless they violate in some manner the requirements of the statute under which they organize. It is a general requirement, that the word "limited" be in all cases added to the firm name. Limited partnerships in Pennsylvania, which can be sued in the partnership name, are nevertheless not corporations entitled to sue as artificial citizens of the states, within the constitution and laws of the United States; 38 Fed. Rep. 574.

There is still another class of partnerships, called joint-stock companies (q. v.).

Sub-partnerships. The delectus personæ, q. v., which is inherent in the nature of partnership (excepting mining partnerships; see 103 U. S. 641; 29 Cal. 569; and joint-stock companies, and certain partnership associations in Massachusetts; see 137 Mass. 510; 47 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 502) precludes the introduction of a stranger into the firm without the concurrence of all the partners; 7 Pick. 235; 11 Me. 488; 1 Hill, N. Y. 284; 8 W. & S. 63; 16 Ohio 166; 2 Rose 354; Pars. Part. § 106. Yet no partner is precluded from entering into a sub-partnership with a stranger: nam socii mei socius meus socius non est. In such case the stranger may share the profits of the particular partner with whom he contracts; and although it has been decided that it is not true as a general proposition that such stranger will not be liable for the debts of the general partnership; 13 Gray 468; still, it is quite evident that a mere participation in profits renders one responsible only for the debts and liabilities of those with whom he participates; and, inasmuch as such stranger shares the profits only and with one of the partners, he can be held only as the partner of that partner; he cannot be held as a partner in the general partnership, because he does not share or participate with the other persons who compose it. See 2 Rose 255; 3 Kent 52; 1 B. & P. 546; 19 Ind. 113; 3 Ired. Eq. 226; 114 Ill. 574. Besides, a sub-partner does not receive a certain share of the whole profits of the firm, but only a part of a share thereof; and he does not receive this part of a share, nor is he entitled to interfere with it at all, to say whether it shall be more or less in amount, until it has actually been set out and the time has come for a division between himself and the partner with whom he contracted. He does not draw out of the general concern any of its profits; he only draws from the profits of one who has previously drawn them from the general partnership. See 6 Madd. 5; 4 Russ. 285. If this stranger has caused damage to the partnership by his default, the party who has taken him into the partnership will be liable to the other partners the same as if he had done the damage himself; Pothier, Part. n. 98.

Any number of partners less than the whole may form an independent co-partnership, which, though not strictly a sub-partnership, is entitled to a separate standing in equity. In case of insolvency the subordinate co-partnership is treated as a distinct concern, and the assets are marshalled accordingly. Consequently, although the creditors of the smaller firm are strictly separate creditors when compared with the creditors of the larger firm; yet debts owing by one firm to the other are collected on insolvency for the benefit of the creditors of the creditor firm; 1 B. & P. 539; 1 Cox 140. See 176 Pa. 354. Indeed, one partner may have this independent standing if the trade is distinct; Lind. Part. 2d Am. ed. *725. But the debts must arise in the ordinary course of trade; Lind. Part. 2d Am. ed. *527.

Quasi-partnership. This is simply the case of a man who without being actually a partner, holds himself out or suffers himself to be held out as such; he is estopped to deny his liability as a partner; Pars. Part. § 93; 37 N. H. 252; 2 Campb. 802; 3 McLean 847; 17 Vt. 449; 6 Ad. & E. 469; 122 U. S. 583. This rule of law rests, not upon the ground of the real transaction between the partners, but upon principles of general policy, to prevent the frauds to which creditors would be liable if they lent their money upon the apparent credit of three or four persons, when in fact they lent it only to two of them, to whom, without others they would not have been willing to lend anything; 8 Kent 32; 6 S. & R. 259, 338; 16 Johns. 40; 2 Des. 148; 2 N. & M. C. 427; 39 Minn. 404; 70 Md. 205.

The term "holding one's self out as partner" imports, at least, the voluntary act of the party holding himself out; 3 Conn. 324; 2 Camp. 617; but no particular mode of holding himself out is requisite to charge a party. It occurs most frequently where a partner retires from a firm and his retirement is not made known. It may be express and either by direct assertion or by authority to a partner to use the party's name. It may result from negligence, as a failure to forbid the use of one's name by the firm; 2 Zab. 372; 61 N. Y. 456; 41 Pa. 30; 44 Ind. 545; 53 Ga. 98; 30 Md. 1; 32 Ark. 733. It must appear that the "holding out" was done by him or by his consent; 61 N. J. L. 103.

Holding out is a question of fact; 10 Ind. 475; 47 Mo. App. 81; 70 Md. 205. The usual evidence to charge a party in such cases is that he has suffered the use of his name over the shop-door, etc., or that he has done other acts, or suffered his agents to do acts; 37 N. H. 9; no matter of what kind, sufficient to induce others to believe him to be a partner; 3 McLean 364, 549; 3 Camp. 310; 20 N. H. 453; 39 Me. 157; 55 Ga. 116; 139 Mass. 275; 48 La. Ann. 258. A person is not relieved from liability though he was induced by the fraud of others to hold himself out as a partner with them. See 5 Bingh. 521; 1 Rose 69. The holding out must have been before the contract with the third person was entered into, and must have been the inducement to it; 7 B. & C. 409; 8 Ala. 560; 67 Ill. 161; 37 Me. 253; 30 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 351. A third party will be held liable as a partner only to one who knew of the holding out at the time he acted and who acted in reliance upon it; 1 B. & Ald. 11; 111 U. S. 529; 62 Ala. 322; 130 Mass. 476; 81 N. Y. 550. The cases contra in 61 N. Y. 456 and 2 H. Bla. 242, cannot be considered as good law; Pars. Partn. Beale's ed. § 93. If the plaintiff knew at the time he made the contract that the party he seeks to charge was not a partner, he cannot hold him as such; 50 Fed. Rep. 684; or if the plaintiff had notice of any kind; 85 Ala. 19; 1 Camp. 404; and a representation made after the contract was entered into will not charge the defendant; 1 C. M. & R. 415. The doctrine is based upon estoppel. But it has been held that even where there was no evidence that the plaintiff was misled, the reputed partner will be held liable; 26 Kan. 221.

A person who is not actually a partner cannot, by reason of having held himself out to the world as a partner, be held liable on a contract made by the partnership with one who had no knowledge that he was so held out; 111 U. S. 529.

Where the new firm had the same name as the old, one who sold goods to the former may recover of the members of the old firm, though notice of dissolution was published in a newspaper, and though the old firm, owed him nothing at the dissolution, and though he did not know the names of the members of the old firm; 148 Mass. 479.

A person does not become liable as partner because he represents that he is willing or intends to become one; 9 B. & C. 632; 15 M. & W. 517.

Where persons hold themselves out as a corporation, without having even a de facto corporate existence, persons dealing with them, if not estopped to deny their corporate existence, may hold them liable as partners; Clark, Corp. 106; 76 Mich. 579; 108 Pa. 569; 64 Fed. Rep. 90. Other cases hold that the remedy is against the agent who professed to act for a non-existent corporation; 1 Thomps. Corp. § 418; 7 Cush. 186. Where there is a de facto corporation, the members cannot be held as partners;

91 Ala. 224; 80 Tex. 344; 48 N. J. L. 599; 69 Ga. 159. If the organization is defective and the parties act in good faith, they are not liable as partners; 22 Fed. Rep. 187; 80 Tex. 344; 48 N. J. L. 599; contra, 72 Mo. 446; 20 Mich. 369; 56 Ia. 104; 43 N. H. 636. Text writers differ widely. That stockholders in a defective or illegal corporation are liable as partners, see Cook, Stockh. §233; Beach, Priv. Corp. §162; Spell, Priv. Corp. §838; contra, whether the corporation is de facto or not; Moraw, Priv. Corp. §748; Tayl. Priv. Corp. §148; Bates, Partn. §4. Incorporators who transact business upon the strength of an organization which is materially defective, are individually liable, as partners, to those with whom they have dealt. Failure to record the charter as required by law, renders the incorporators personally liable to persons who deal with them without knowledge of the attempted incorporation or without knowledge of facts which ought to put them on inquiry; 159 Pa. 303.

Where persons enter into articles of association for banking purposes, and go through the usual steps for forming a corporation, such as subscribing for shares, etc., but without a charter, they are liable as partners; 60 Ill. 454. Where persons associate together to form a corporation, but none is formed, by reason of a failure to comply with the statute, they become a quasi-partnership; 85 Ill. 164; but not as against a creditor who is also a stockholder; 161 Ill. 417; or is a director; 48 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 399; or when it appears that third parties dealt with the concern as a corporation; 38 Mich. 779.

If the charter is obtained by fraud, the members will be held liable as partners; 45 Pa. 410; or if it be obtained for gambling purposes; 85 Tenn. 572. Where parties go to another state to get a charter to carry on business in their own state, with powers which they could not obtain at home, they will be held liable as partners, the transaction being substantially forbidden by statute; 12 L. R. A. (Tex. App.) 366; 148 Mass. 249; contra, 128 N. Y. 205. It is held that when parties incorporate in one state to do business in another, they are partners; 12 N. J. Eq. 31; contra, 34 N. Y. 207; 35 Ohio St. 158; Cook, St. & Stockh. §237; 35 Kan. 242. The intent to form a corporation will not prevent parties being held as partners; 79 Mo. 401.

After dissolution of a corporation, stockholders are not liable as partners for corporate debts; 66 N. Y. 424; unless they agree to continue the business as partners; 45 N. Y. 410.

The fact that a special partner fails to comply with the stipulated requirements, does not change his special partnership into a general one, but simply makes him liable to creditors as a general partner; 131 U. S. 66.

The Domain. A partnership is primarily a commercial relation. The notion has, however, been gradually extended to include other associations than those for trade merely; e. g. partnerships between two attorneys at law; 6 Pa. 360; 8 Wend. 665; 13 Ark. 173. It is said by Collyer that "perhaps it may be laid down generally that a partnership may exist in any business or transaction which is not a mere personal office, and for the performance of which payment may be enforced." Colly. Part. 5th ed. §56.

The early law did not recognize partnerships for trading in land, because the land was all held by the barons who did not engage in trade. But in modern times, and especially in America, where the social conditions are different, land is largely held by speculators whose operations as partners the law must recognize; 21 Me. 421, 422; 7 Pa. 165; 10 Cush. 458; 4 Conn. 568; 4 Ohio St. 1; 54 N. Y. 1. In transferring title to and from the firm the ordinary rules of conveyancing must be observed. When the title is in all the partners, all must join in the deed; if in the name of one, he alone need execute; Story, Part. §92, note 1; 10 Johns. 158; 15 Gratt. 11; 16 B. Monr. 681; 2 Nev. 234.

Building operations are now upon the same footing as land speculations; 4 Cow. 282. But the tradition has been too strong to be impaired as yet in landlord and tenant cases. Farming on shares is not partnership. The owner of land may either receive a share in the produce as rent, or give such a portion to a laborer in lieu of wages; Lind. Part. Am. ed. *651; 56 Ind. 379. But there may be a partnership in the development of land owned by one; 59 Ala. 587. See supra, as to mining partnerships; also MINES AND MINING.

Firm Property. Partners have, presumptively, the same interest in the stock that they have in the profits; 16 Hun 183. Their shares are presumed to be equal both in capital and profits; Ewell's Lind. Part. *318; 23 Cal. 427; 16 Hun 163; 23 Cal. 427. Where no definite arrangement is made between partners as to division of profits, the presumption of law is that they are to be equally divided; 182 Pa. 186. But a joint stock is not essential to a partnership. The partner without capital is then interested, not in the fund, but in the adventure; 2 Bingh. 170; 7 Hun 426; Ewell's Lind. Part. *13.

Sometimes a partnership exists between parties merely as the managers and disposers of the goods of others; 4 B. & Ald. 663; 15 Johns. 409, 422. So, it seems, two persons may be owners in common of property, and also partners in the working and management of it for their common benefit; 2 C. B. N. S. 357, 363; 16 M. & W. 503.

Whether a partnership includes the capital stock, or is limited to the profit and loss, must be determined from the agreement and intention of the parties; 21 Me. 120. See 5 Taunt. 74; 4 B. & C. 867; Story, Part. §26.

A partner may contribute only the use of his capital, retaining full control of the principal; and he may charge interest for the use whether profits are earned or not; Ewell's Lind. Part. *328. If, however, the firm funds are expended in repairing and improving the property thus placed at their disposal, it becomes partnership stock; Ewell's Lind. Part. *330; 49 Me. 252; 23 N. J. Eq. 247; 72 Pa. 142.

The partnership property consists of the original stock and the additions made to it in the course of trade. All real estate purchased for the partnership, paid for out of the funds thereof, and devoted to partnership uses and trusts, whether the legal title is in one or all of the partners, is treated in equity in the same manner as other partnership property until the partnership account is settled and the partnership debts are paid; Story, Part. §98; 5 Ves. 189; 10 Cush. 458; 4 Metc. Mass. 527; 3 Kent 37; 27 N. H. 37; Ewell's Lind. Part. *324. See 111 N. Y. 423. Leases or real estate taken by one partner for partnership purposes, mines, and trade-marks are held to be partnership property; 17 Ves. 298; 1 Taunt. 250; Story, Part. §98. See 83 Ia. 571. The good-will of a business is an asset of the firm. It does not always have a salable value, however; Ewell's Lind. Part. *327, *443; 9 Neb. 258; 4 Sandf. Ch. 405; 1 Hoff. Ch. 68; 5 Ves. 539. But Chancellor Kent says, "The good-will of a trade is not partnership stock;" 3 Kent 64. The good-will of a professional partnership belongs, in the absence of express stipulations, exclusively to the survivors; 3 Madd. 64; a surviving partner has the right to carry on the business under the firm name; 7 Sim. 421; 4 Den. 569; contra, 7 Abb. Pr. 202. The firm name is a part of the good-will; 8 Daly 1. Upon dissolution, it passes with the assets and good-will to one who buys the business and continues it; 7 Abb. N. C. 292; L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 436. On dissolution and a division of firm assets, each partner may use the firm name in a similar business; 34 Beav. 566; 47 How. Fr. 532 (but see 53 Hun 501); see 79 N. Y. 490; but he must not do it in such a way as to mislead the public; L. R. 9 Ch. Div. 196; 22 Ohio St. 370. The name of a withdrawing partner cannot be used by the remaining partners without an agreement; L. R. 43 Ch. Div. 208; nor can a partner who buys the firm stock in trade, but not the good-will, keep the name of the retiring partner in the firm name; 26 L. J. N. S. 391. There are statutes which partially govern the subject in New York and Massachusetts. See 15 L. R. A. 462; GOOD-WILL.

A ship, as well as any other chattel, may be held in strict partnership; 3 Kent 154; 12 Mass. 54; 15 Me. 427. But ships are generally owned by parties as tenants in common; and they are not in consequence of such ownership to be considered as partners; 6 Me. 77; 24 Pick. 19; 14 Conn. 404; 14 Pa. 34, 38; 47 N. Y. 462. The same is true of any other species of property in which the parties have only a community of interest; Ewell's Lind. Part. 51; 8 Exch. 825; 21 Beav. 536. As against an assignment of partnership property for the benefit of creditors, property in the possession of and used by the firm, cannot be claimed to have been the individual property of a member of the firm, by one to whom such member subsequently assigned it; 70 Hun 593.

Partners hold land by a peculiar title. In one respect it most resembles an ancient joint tenancy. Neither partner can convey title to a moiety of the goods; his assignee takes subject to the right of the other partner to have firm debts paid out of that fund; he therefore can assign only a moiety of what is left after firm debts paid. Upon this principle depends also the special right of survivorship for the purposes of liquidation. With these qualifications the partner's title at law differs but slightly from a tenancy in common; Story, Part. §§90, 97; 9 Me. 28; 5 Johns. Ch. 417. See 85 Tex. 22. They hold the land in common and must grant it as other tenants in common; 11 Gray 179. The legal title to the land, with all the characteristics of realty, attaches to it until applied to partnership purposes; 76 Ala. 501; equity interferes for partnership purposes only; 13 Allen 252. Co-partners may withdraw realty from the partnership for the purpose of holding it in severalty; and in this event they become simply co-tenants in such land; 7 Mont. 206.

A partner has the same title to the stationary capital of the firm that he has to its product in his hands for sale, but his power over it is less extensive. He cannot sell the permanent capital stock. The power of a partner to sell results not from the title, but from the general partnership relation; 37 Pa. 217.

It has been held that in order to make the land really firm assets the title should be in the partners as a firm, otherwise, the partners would be mere tenants in common, and the land, as to purchasers and creditors, would be the individual estate of the partners, regardless of the funds by which it was purchased and the uses to which it was put; 81 Pa. 377; but as to the partners and their representatives, the land would belong to the firm, in such case; 5 Metc. 582; 89 Pa. 203 (even if the title is in one partner's name; 31 N. Y. Supp. 78, 543). The rule is applied to cases of equitable, as well as legal, estates; 70 Pa. 79. In other cases it has been held that where land has been bought with firm money and is used for firm purposes, or been dedicated to the firm, it must be regarded as partnership property without considering the record title; 64 N. Y. 479; 55 Ill. 416; 14 Fla. 565; 17 Cal. 262. It has been thought necessary to resort to an equitable conversion of firm land into personality in order to subject it to the rules governing partnership property; 7 J. Bart. 212; 15 Gratt. 11; 74 Pa. 391; 135 U. S. 621. But this fiction seems unnecessary. See 25 Ala. 825; 3 Stew. N. J. 415; 11 Barb. 43.

Partnership lands are liable for firm debts prior to the claim of the widow or heirs of a deceased partner; 118 U. S. 97. After liquidation, the lands or their surplus proceeds pass as real estate; 3 Stew. N. J. 415; 7 J. Bart. 212; 11 Barb. 43; 74 Pa. 391; upon a dissolution the equitable title to land passes to the surviving partner; 34 Fed. Rep. 875; 86 Wis. 552; 109 N. Y. 338. If one partner buys land with firm money and takes title in his own name, a resulting trust arises to the firm; 39 Pa. 535; 133 U. S. 621; 81 Me. 207; 73 Cal. 394; 85 Ky. 589. No length of possession by one partner of real estate paid for with partnership funds and conveyed to him, bars the other partners; 133 U. S. 621. A deed made to a partnership as grantee in the firm name, vests in the individual partners the power to convey; 8 C. C. App. 600; 15 Oreg. 476; but it has been held that such a conveyance vests title only in the partner whose name appears in the firm name; 22 Mo. 378. See 36 Ark. 476. In Pennsylvania, so far as third parties without notice are concerned, the title of the firm must appear of record; 128 Pa. 153. As to partnership realty, see 28 L. R. A. 86, 129, 161; 27 Md. 449.

Profits made by a member of a firm through individual outside transactions do not belong to the firm, though he employs therein the skill and information acquired by him as a member thereof; 150 U. S. 524. Nor do they when made with the consent of the firm which receives a commission on them; 30 N. Y. Supp. 321; but if a partner avails himself of information obtained by him in the firm business, and uses it for any purposes within the scope of the firm business, or in competition with the firm in its business, he is liable to account to it for the profits made by him; [1891] 3 Ch. 244.

Marshaling Assets. A firm is not a corporation, and hence firm creditors are in theory separate creditors as well. But in administering insolvent estates equity has established the "rule of convenience" that firm and separate creditors shall have priority upon, and be confined to, the firm and separate funds respectively; 116 Ind. 317; 84 Ky. 85; 31 W. Va. 688; 22 Neb. 526; 98 N. C. 1; 133 U. S. 670. A surplus of a separate fund is divided among firm creditors pro rata; and a surplus of a firm fund is divided among the separate creditors of the various partners in proportion to the shares of the partners therein; Pars. Part. § 382; 67 Ind. 485; 50 Miss. 300; 44 Pa. 503; 13 N. J. Eq. 126; 41 N. H. 12; 35 Vt. 44; 94 Ill. 271; 28 Ga. 371; 29 Ala. 172. If there is no firm fund and no solvent partner, the firm creditors come in on an equal footing with separate creditors against the separate estates of partners pari passu with individual creditors; 39 Fed. Rep. 203; 78 Mo. 491; 58 Wis. 499; contra, 46 N. H. 188; 100 Ind. 598; 9 Cush. 553. A very slight firm fund over and above costs will suffice to exclude firm creditors from the separate estate; five shillings has been said to be enough; 7 Am. L. Reg. 499; and five pounds is enough, and so is a joint estate of less than two pounds; 2 Rose 54; one dollar and a quarter was considered too little; Pars. Part. 4th ed. § 384. A solvent partner, if living, is equivalent to a firm fund; 8 Conn. 584; Lind. Part. *731.

But though there is no separate estate, separate creditors cannot come against the joint estate until the firm debts are paid, after which they may resort to the partners' interest in any surplus remaining; Pars. Part. § 382; 3 B. & P. 288, 289; 12 Ohio 647; 43 N. H. 144.

As a general rule partnership creditors, after they have exhausted firm assets, cannot share equally with individual creditors in the individual assets; 89 Ala. 503; 133 U. S. 670; 103 Mo. 78; some cases hold that they can; 33 La. Ann. 1279; 21 Conn. 41; 86 Va. 478. In Kentucky they share the separate assets equally with the separate creditors after the latter have received the same dividend from the separate estate that the firm creditors have received from the firm estate; 70 Ky. 133. It has been said not to be settled that, at law, the partnership creditors may not look to the several funds at once, in common with several creditors, but that the law is now tending towards the adoption of the rule to that effect which prevails in equity; Pars. Part. § 383.

If two firms having one or more common members, are both bankrupt, there can be no proof by one against the other; Pars.

Part. § 381. Various explanations have been offered for this rule. Sometimes it is called a "rule of convenience"; sometimes a fundamental principle of equity; Ewell's Lind. Part. *699; 23 Pick. 450; 5 Johns. Ch. 60; Story, Part. § 377; 44 Pa. 503. Sometimes it is said to depend on the principle of destination; the partners by gathering together a firm fund have dedicated it to the firm creditors. Upon this theory, the partnership stock becomes a trust fund. The firm creditors occupy a commanding position and restrain even the partners in dealing with the property; 3 Biss. 132; 41 Barb. 307; 53 N. Y. 146. Usually it is declared to be the outgrowth of the partner's equity, i. e. his right to have firm funds applied first to the payment of firm debts; 7 Md. 398; 32 Gratt. 431; 4 Bush 25; 4 R. I. 173; 7 B. Monr. 210. Consequently, where the partner gives up this right, the firm creditor loses his priority; 3 Fred. L. 213; 59 Tenn. 167; 2 Dian. 286; 1 Woods 127; 32 Gratt. 481. The rule does not apply where a partnership creditor has acquired a lien by contract; 84 Ky. 85. If insolvent partners divide the firm fund among their separate creditors in proportion to the interest of each in the partnership, firm creditors cannot object; 39 Pa. 389; 77 N. Y. 195.

As a general rule, insolvency fixes the position of the different funds. A debt to a partner by the firm cannot be collected for the benefit of separate creditors; a debt of a partner to the firm cannot be collected for the benefit of firm creditors; because a man cannot prove against his own creditors; 4 H. & McH. 167. What one partner owes his co-partner independently of the firm can be collected from the separate estate of the debtor for the benefit of the separate estate of the creditor; but this will not be allowed unless the situation is such that the firm creditors can derive no benefit even indirectly from the enforcement of the claim, i. e. there must be no surplus to go to them; 4 De G. J. & S. 551; contra, where both partners owe the firm one-half of the excess of one debt over the other, it is payable to the firm creditors out of the estate of the greater debtor; 55 Pa. 252. Partners, before insolvency, may, by an executed agreement, change firm into separate property. Firm creditors have no lien to prevent the alteration; e. g. where one partner sells out to the others, the fund becomes primarily liable for the claims of the creditors of the new firm; 20 N. J. Eq. 13; 6 Bosw. 533; 19 Ga. 190; 9 Cush. 553; 35 Ia. 328; 21 Pa. 77; 6 Ves. 119.

Equity will not interfere to embarrass a vested legal right. Therefore if a firm creditor levies on a separate estate, he has priority over the subsequent execution of a separate creditor; 24 Ga. 625; 22 Pick. 450; 9 N. J. Eq. 353; 17 N. Y. 300. A separate creditor can sell nothing but his debtor's interest. An execution against the firm, though subsequent, has priority, because it attaches this paramount right of the co-partner. But a firm creditor, without a legal lien, has no standing; 22 Cal. 194; 17 N. J. Eq. 259; 5 Johns. Ch. 417; 9 Me. 28. But where there is an execution against each partner and a subsequent execution against the firm, and the sheriff seizes and sells firm goods under the three, the proceeds are given first to the joint creditor, and the remainder to the separate creditors in proportion to each partner's interest; 29 Pa. 90. So in the case of judgments against real estate. A judgment on a separate claim has no lien on the firm real estate, but only on the partner's interest. But a firm judgment is a lien on a partner's separate real estate, and takes priority over a subsequent separate judgment; Ewell's Lind. Part. *209; 17 N. Y. 300; 46 Ia. 461. Partnership creditors who have a levy on partnership goods are entitled to be paid before a creditor of one of the partners, who had a prior attachment on the individual interest of one partner; 97 Mo. 145.

When an assignment for creditors has been made by a firm, and also by the partners individually, the holder of a note executed by the firm and by the individual members is entitled to have the estates of the partnership and of each partner kept separate, and to receive a dividend from each, though the note was given for a firm liability; 67 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 289.

Duration. Prima facie every partnership is determinable at will. But it may be entered into for a definite term by agreement express or implied; Ewell's Lind. Part. *121, 418.

A partnership at will is presumed to continue so long as the parties are in life and of capacity to continue it; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 42; 9 Humphr. 750. See PARTNERS. A partnership for a term is presumed to continue during the term, provided the parties are in life and of legal capacity to continue it. See 7 Mo. 29. If a partnership be continued by express or tacit consent after the expiration of the prescribed period, it will be presumed to continue upon the old terms, but as a partnership at will; 17 S. & R. 165. But in no case will the law presume a partnership to exist beyond the life of the parties; 1 Wils. Ch. 181. When a partnership has been entered into for a definite term, it is nevertheless dissolved by death within the term; Story, Part. § 195. The delectus personarum is so essentially necessary to the constitution of a partnership that even the executors or other representatives of partners themselves do not, in their capacity of executors or representatives, succeed to the state and condition of partners; 7 Pick. 237, 238; 9 Kent 55; 42 Ill. 342; 46 Mo. 197. The civilians carried this doctrine so far as not to permit it to be stipulated that the heirs or executors of partners should themselves be partners; Domat, lib. 1, tit. 8, s. 2; Pothier, Part. n. 145; though Pothier thinks it binding.

At common law, the representatives of a deceased partner may be made partners in his stead either by original agreement or by testamentary direction; Ewell's Lind. Part. *590; 47 Tex. 481. Clauses providing for the admission into the firm of a deceased partner's representatives will, in general, be construed as giving them an option to become partners, and not as constituting them partners absolutely; 7 Jarm. Conv. 120; 1 McCl. & Y. 569; 2 Russ. 62. The executor of a deceased partner is not compelled in such case to become a partner, so as to charge the estate with debts incurred after the partner's death; 168 Pa. 331. In any event it must be a new partnership; Pars. Part. 4th ed. § 343; 5 Allen 290; 32 Barb. 425; 79 Ala. 540; 31 Minn. 186; contra, 46 Conn. 136; 66 Mo. 468; 81 Me. 207; 51 Tex. 578; and such is said to be the tendency of modern decisions; Pars. Part. Beale's ed. § 343, n.

Only the fund already invested or directed to be invested by the testator is subject to the claims of new creditors; 15 Gratt. 11; 10 Ves. 110; 47 Tex. 481; 135 N. Y. 430; any direction, in order to charge the general assets, must be clear and unambiguous; 2 How. 577; 48 Pa. 375.

The rule in England is clear that when an executor undertakes to participate in the business, whether in consequence of a testamentary direction or otherwise, he becomes personally liable to creditors as a partner, in addition to the liability of the estate. The common-law relation of partnership will not admit of a qualified liability; Ewell's Lind. Part. *593, *604; 11 Moo. P. C. 198. See 118 N. Y. 586; 59 Miss. 305. But simply taking the profits will not charge the executor; L. R. 7 Ex. 218. In America, some authorities have declared that the executor is not personally liable when the testator has directed him to continue the business, but only when he does so of his own motion; 4 Ala. 588; 39 Md. 382; 39 How. Pr. 82; 48 Pa. 275; contra, for personal liability of executor; 8 Conn. 584. A simple direction to allow a fund to remain in a partnership may be construed as a loan to the survivors; 9 Hare 141. An executor is not liable personally if he merely leaves the estate of his testator in the business and takes no part in it; 60 Miss. 367; 48 N. J. L. 129.

Dissolution. A partnership may be dissolved: 1. By the act of the parties: as by their mutual consent; Pars. Part. § 284; 98 Ill. 109; 3 Kent 54; and where no specified period is limited for the continuance of the partnership, either party may dissolve it at any time; 4 Russ. 260; 181 Mass. 312; 76 N. Y. 373; 168 U. S. 334; 3 Kent 53; Story, Part. § 84, 272. Whether a partnership for a certain time can be dissolved by one partner at his mere will before the term has expired, seems not to be absolutely and definitively settled; Story, Part. § 275. In favor of the right of one partner in such cases, see 3 Kent 55; 17 Johns. 525; 3 Bland, Ch. 674; 55 Mich. 256, per Cooley, J.; 58 Pa. 155; 168 U. S. 337. Against it, see Story, Part. § 275; 5 Ark. 281; 4 Wash. C. C. 234; Pothier, Part. 152; Ewell's Lind. Part. *571, note; 20 N. J. Eq. 172; 9 Utah 236.

A partner exercising such right would be liable for his breach of the partnership articles; 55 Mich. 256; 168 U. S. 337, 256. As against third persons, a partner may certainly withdraw from a partnership at his pleasure; 3 C. B. n. s. 561. Partners may terminate the partnership at any time by mutual agreement; 126 Ill. 166; and this may be inferred from an abandonment of the undertaking; 109 Ill. 94; 54 Cal. 463; but see 16 Pick. 412. The incorporation of the partners for a similar business may perhaps work a dissolution as by consent. See Pars. Part. § 285. Dissolution need not be under seal, even though the partnership articles were under seal; Pars. Part. § 284. See PARTNERS.

A partner, who, within the time stipulated in the articles of partnership for its continuance, undertakes to dissolve the partnership and takes exclusive possession of its property and business, is liable to account to his co-partner for profits according to the partnership agreement; 168 U. S. 328.

2. By the act of God: as, by the death of one of the partners; and this operates from the time of the death; 3 Mer. 619; 6 Cow. 441; 6 Conn. 184; 2 How. 560; 7 Ala. N. S. 19; 7 Pet. 594; 17 Pick. 519; 5 Gill. 1; 40 Mich. 343. As to the effect of a provision in the partnership articles to the contrary, see supra.

A partnership dissolved by the death of one of the partners is dissolved as to the whole firm; 7 Pet. 586, 594; 31 Minn. 186; and the reason given for this rule is applicable not only to dissolution by death, but to every species of dissolution; Story, Part. § 317.

3. By the act of law: as by the bankruptcy of one of the partners; Cowp. 443; 6 Ves. 126; 5 Maule & S. 340; 45 Miss. 703; 59 Ala. 597; or by the bankruptcy of the firm; id.; such dissolution takes place when bankruptcy is legally declared, and then relates back to the act of bankruptcy; 11 Ves. 78.

4. By a valid assignment of all the partnership effects for the benefit of creditors, either under insolvent acts; Colly. Part. 6th ed. § 102; or otherwise; 41 Me. 373; but this is only prima facie evidence of dissolution which other circumstances may rebut; 1 Dall. 380; by a sale of the partnership effects under a separate execution against one partner; 2 V. & B. 300; 3 Kent 59. It is said that this does not constitute a dissolution but inevitably leads to it; 24 Pick. 89; 53 Tex. 540. The mere insolvency of one or all of the members of a partnership, without a suspension or judicial process, etc., does not of itself operate a dissolution; 24 Pick. 89.

5. By the civil death of one of the partners; Pothier, Part. n. 147. But the absconding of a party from the state does not of itself operate a dissolution; 24 Pick. 89. See Story, Part. § 298.

6. By the breaking out of war between two states in which the partners are domiciled and carrying on trade; 16 Johns. 493; 3 Bland, Ch. 674; 50 N. Y. 166; 91 U. S. 7. See WAR.

7. By the marriage of a feme sole partner; 4 Russ. 260; 3 Kent 55. This would now, in view of the recent married women acts, depend upon the laws of the state; 81 Tex. 437. The marriage of a male and female partner would work a dissolution; 52 Mich. 3.

8. By the extinction of the subject-matter of the joint business or undertaking; 16 Johns. 401; and by the completion of the business or adventure for which the partnership was formed; Story, Part. § 280.

9. By the termination of the period for which a partnership for a certain time was formed; Colly. Part. § 105.

10. By the assignment of the whole of one partner's interest either to his co-partner or to a stranger; 4 B. & Ad. 175; 17 Johns. 525; 1 Freem. Ch. 231; 8 W. & S. 262; 45 Ill. App. 469; 28 Fla. 680; where it does not appear that the assignee acts in the concern after the assignment; 17 Johns. 525; 8 Wend. 442; 5 Dana 213; 1 Whart. 381; 2 Dev. Eq. 481. But in England this can occur only in partnerships at will. See 135 U. S. 632. It has been held that a sale by one partner of his interest in the firm's property to the other does not necessarily work a dissolution of the firm; 93 Mich. 569. In partnerships for a term, assignment is a ground for dissolution by remaining co-partners, but probably not by the transferee. In America, the transferee always has a right to an account; Ewell's Lind. Part. *363; 60 Ala. 226; 50 Cal. 615. But see 14 Pick. 322, where it was held that such an assignment would not ipso facto work a dissolution. See 55 N. J. L. 437. "If a member of an ordinary partnership assigns where the partnership is at will, the assignment dissolves it, and if the partnership is not at will, the assignment may be treated by the other members of the concern as a cause of dissolution. The assignee of one partner cannot be made a member of the partnership against the will of the other partners, but the absolute right to have the affairs of the firm at once wound up, when the specified duration of the partnership has not yet expired, may be subject to modification according to circumstances." 135 U. S. 632.

11. By the award of arbitrators appointed under a clause in the partnership articles to that effect. See 1 W. Bla. 475; 4 B. & Ad. 172; 5 Wend. 268.

The addition of a member to a firm creates a new firm and operates as a dissolution of the old one, even though the business be continued under the old firm name, and so does the retirement of a member; 96 Mo. 591.

A partnership for a term may be dissolved before the expiration of the term, by the decree of a court of equity founded on the wilful fraud or other gross misconduct of one of the partners; Pars. Part. § 270, § 357; 4 Beav. 502; 2 V. & B. 299; 5 Ark. 270; 145 U. S. 578; so on his gross carelessness and waste in the administration of the partnership, and his exclusion of the other partners from their just share of the management; 1 J. & W. 592; 5 Ark. 278; 79 Mich. 290; or persistent violation of partnership articles; 41 Fed. Rep. 841; or the loss of health by a partner; Pars. Part. § 360; or the pecuniary inability of a partner to fulfil his engagement with the others; id.; so on the existence of violent and lasting dissension between the partners; 1 Ia. 537; where these are of such a character as to prevent the business from being conducted upon the stipulated terms; 3 Kent 60, 61; and to destroy the mutual confidence of the partners in each other; 21 Beav. 493; 20 N. J. Eq. 172. Equity will not act on slight grounds; 58 Pa. 168. A partner cannot, by misconducting himself and rendering it impossible for his co-partners to act in harmony with him, obtain a dissolution on the ground of the impossibility so created by himself; 21 Beav. 493; 3 Hare 387; 84 Ill. 121. A partnership may be dissolved by decree when its business is in a hopeless state, its continuance impracticable, and its property liable to be wasted and lost; 3 Kent 60; 16 Johns. 491; 3 K. & J. 78; 18 Sim. 495; 8 Oreg. 84; 41 Fed. Rep. 841; or where there was fraud in inducing a partner to enter into the partnership; id.

The confirmed lunacy of an active partner is sufficient to induce a court of equity to decree a dissolution, not only for the purpose of protecting the lunatic, but also to relieve his co-partners from the difficult position in which the lunacy places them. See 1 Cox, Ch. 107; 1 Swanst. 514; 2 My. & K. 125; 6 Beav. 324; 2 Kay & J. 441; 3 Y. & C. 184; 128 Ill. 256. The same may be said of every other inveterate infirmity, which has seized upon one of the partners and rendered him incompetent to act where his personal labor and skill were contracted for; 3 Kent 62. But lunacy does not itself dissolve the firm, nor do other infirmities; 3 Kent 53; Story, Part. § 295; this is said to be supported by the current of authorities; Pars. Part. § 362. It is, however, contended by Mr. Justice Story and by Parker, C. J., that a clear case of insanity ought to effect that result; Story, Part. § 295; 10 N. H. 101. An inquisition of lunacy found against a member dissolves the firm; 6 Humph. 85. The court does not decree a dissolution on the ground of lunacy except upon clear evidence that the malady exists and is incurable; 3 Y. & C. 184; 2 K. & J. 441. A temporary illness is not sufficient; 2 Ves. Sen. 34; 1 Cox 107. A dissolution by the court on the ground of insanity dates from the decree and not from a prior day; 1 Phill. 172; 1 K. & J. 765.

Actual notice of dissolution must be brought home to persons who have been in the habit of dealing with the firm; but as to all persons who have had no previous dealings with the firm, notice fairly given in the public newspapers is deemed sufficient; Colly. Part. 6th ed. 163, n. See 159 Pa. 105; 99 Ala. 47; 148 Mass. 496. This notice is necessary to terminate the agency of each partner, and, consequently, his powers and liabilities as a member; 68 N. Y. 314; 25 Gratt. 321; 47 Wisc. 261; 67 Ill. 106; 53 Pa. 143; 7 Price 193; 1 Camp. 402. If there is no notice of the dissolution and the retiring partner permits the use of his name, he is liable for the acts of the continuing partner; 48 Mo. App. 518. It is said that notice of dissolution need not be given to one who has sold goods to the firm for cash; 17 Kan. 287; 12 N. Y. 283; or to one who, without the knowledge of the firm, has discounted its commercial paper; 20 N. Y. 241.

It is not necessary to give notice of the retirement of a dormant partner from the firm, if the fact of his being a partner be unknown to all the creditors of the firm; if it be known to some, notice to those must be given, but that will be sufficient; 1 Metc. Mass. 19; 1 B. & Ad. 11; 5 B. Monr. 170; 36 Pa. 325; 37 Ill. 76. See 35 Ala. 242; 87 Ill. 281; 3 N. Y. 168; 87 Ky. 525. But where there were an active and two dormant partners, and the firm retained a solicitor in pending litigation, and the dormant partners retired, the solicitor never having known that they were partners and having no notice of dissolution, the dormant partners were held liable for the solicitor's costs incurred after dissolution; [1897] 2 Q. B. 397.

Notice of the dissolution is not necessary, in case of the death of one of the partners, to free the estate of the deceased partner from further liability; 3 Kent 63; 3 Mer. 614; 17 Pick. 519; 25 Gratt. 321; nor is notice, in fact, necessary in any case where the dissolution takes place by operation of law; 3 Kent 63, 67; 15 Johns. 57; Cowp. 445; 9 Exch. 145. Bankruptcy of a member, after dissolution, is notice of dissolution; 146 Mass. 413.

One partner may obtain an injunction to restrain his co-partner from violating his rights under the partnership articles, even when the dissolution of the partnership articles is not asked; 54 Fed. Rep. 439.

If a retiring partner leaves a firm and the remaining partners agree to pay the debts and indemnify the outgoing partner, the creditors who know these facts and raise no objections are bound to treat the outgoing partner merely as surety for the debts; [1894] A. C. 556.

Effect of dissolution. The effect of dissolution, as between the partners, is to terminate all transactions between them as partners, except for the purpose of taking a general account and winding up the concern: 1 Pa. 274; 3 Kent 69. As to third persons, the effect of a dissolution, with notice as stated supra, is to abrogate the partners from all liability for future transactions; but not for past transactions of the firm: 33 Miss. 280; 51 Cal. 530; 61 Ind. 235; 57 Ill. 315; 3 Cush. 175; 3 M'Cord 378; 4 Munf. 315; 5 Mas. 56; Harp. 470; 4 Johns. 324; 41 Me. 376.

It is said that a firm, notwithstanding its dissolution, continues to exist so far as may be necessary for the winding up of its business: 11 Ves. 5; 18 id. 57; 2 Russ. 242; Ewell's Lind. Part. §217. See 35 N. J. L. 427. The power of the partners subsists for many purposes after dissolution: among these are—first, the completion of all the unfinished engagements of the partnership; second, the conversion of all the property, means, and assets of the partnership existing at the time of the dissolution, for the benefit of those who were partners, according to their respective shares; third, the application of the partnership funds to the payment of the partnership debts; Story, Part. §326; 3 Kent 57; 17 Pick. 519. See 135 U. S. 621. But although, for the purposes of winding up the concern and fulfilling engagements that could not be fulfilled during its existence, the power of the partners certainly subsists even after dissolution, yet, legally and strictly speaking, it subsists for those purposes only; 5 M. & G. 504; 4 M. & W. 461; 10 Hare 453; 61 N. Y. 222; 49 La. 177; 45 Pa. 49. The surviving members of a co-partnership have the legal title to the firm property, and the right to dispose of its assets, only for the purpose of closing the business, not to continue it; 66 Hun 638.

Whether a dissolution of a partnership is per se a breach of a contract by the firm to employ a person in their service is questionable; 3 H. & N. 931. A contract of employment for a year by a firm terminates on the dissolution of the firm during the year by the death of a partner; 4 Misc. Rep. 99.

See CLUB; NON-TRADING PARTNERSHIP; SECRET PARTNERSHIP; TRADING PARTNERSHIP.

PARTNERSHIP PROPERTY. Apart from statute, the legal title to land cannot be vested in a partnership as such, it not being recognized as a person at law, and consequently, though the property is intended to belong to the firm, the legal title must be vested in some individual or individuals; and so far as the rights of the members of the firm, as such, or of the firm creditors, are concerned, it is immaterial whether the legal title is in one or more of the partners, or in a stranger. (Parsons, Partnership, §265). In whosoever the legal title may be, such person or persons are regarded in equity as holding it in trust for firm purposes, that is, for the payment of the firm debts and the adjustment of equities between the partners. 1 Tiffany, Real Prop. 2nd Ed., §60; 135 U. S. 621. See CO-OWNERSHIP; JOINT TENANCY; TENANCY IN COMMON, etc.

PARTURITION. The act of giving birth to a child. See BIRTH.

PARTUS (Lat.). The child just before it is born, or immediately after its birth. Offspring. See MAXIMS, Partus sequitur, etc.

PARTY. See PARTIES.

PARTY AGGRIEVED. The phrase is not technical. They are ordinary English words and are to be construed in the ordinary meaning put upon them. 7 Q. B. D. 470.

One whose interest is adversely affected by a judgment. English.

PARTY TO BE CHARGED. A phrase used in the seventeenth section of the Statute of Frauds, under which, in the case of certain sales, a note or memorandum of the contract must be in writing, "signed by the parties to be charged by such contract." In the fourth section the language is "by the party to be charged." It is held to be sufficient if the signature is only by the party against whom the contract is sought to be enforced; 6 Gray 31; 90 Cal. 307; 43 N. Y. 498; and if a written offer be made though accepted by parol; L. R. 1 Exoh. 343; contra, 58 Mich. 574. The signature may be by mark, or by initials, or printed, if the printed name be shown to have been adopted; Tiff. Sales 75. If the name be shown to have been signed to the writing to authenticate it, it is immaterial in what part of the writing it is placed; L. R. 2 H. L. 127. An agent may be authorized to sign by parol and a subsequent ratification proved; 24 W. Va. 643; 114 Ind. 311. An auctioneer at a public sale may sign for either party; 7 East 558; 35 N. J. L. 338; and so, ordinarily may a broker; 16 Gray 436; and his memorandum need not be signed. Within the meaning of a statute of frauds, the words "the party to be charged" mean the vendor, in a sale of land; and unless the vendor sign, he may not maintain an action upon the writing, even though the vendee has signed it. 157 Ky. 607, 163 S. W. 741.

See FRAUDS, STATUTE OF; NOTE OR MEMORANDUM.

PARTY IN INTEREST. One scheduled by a bankrupt as a creditor is prima facie a "party in interest" and entitled to oppose the granting of a discharge although he has not proved his claim. 206 Fed. 266.

PARTY-JURY. A jury de mediocritate lingue. See JURY.

PARTY OR PARTIES. The words "party" or "parties" are commonly employed interchangeably in deeds, regardless of whether their antecedents are singular or plural. 129 Ky. 132, 110 S. W. 412.

PARTY-WALL. A wall erected on the line between two adjoining pieces of land belonging to different persons, for the use of both properties. 2 Washb. R. P. 385. A structure for the common benefit and convenience of both the tenements which it separates. 118 Ill. 17.

The phrase ordinarily means a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common. Emden, Building Leases 285. But it does not as a matter of law necessarily imply a solid structure; 129 N. Y. 61.

It is a wall built by one owner partly on the land of another for the common benefit of both. The adjoining owners are not joint tenants or tenants in common of the party wall. Each is possessed in severalty of his own soil up to the dividing line, and of that portion of the wall which rests upon it; but the soil of each, with the wall belonging to him, is burdened with an easement or servitude in favor of the other, to the end that it may afford a support to the wall and buildings of such other; 57 Miss. 746; 33 Pac. Rep. (Or.) 661.

"The words party wall appear to me to express a meaning rather popular than legal, and they may, I think, be used in four different senses. They may mean, first, a wall of which the two adjoining owners are tenants in common, which is the most common and the primary meaning of the term. In the next place the term may be used to signify a wall divided longitudinally into two strips, one belonging to each of the neighboring owners. Then, thirdly, the term may mean a wall which belongs entirely to one of the adjoining owners, but is subject to an easement or right in the other to have it maintained as a dividing wall between the two tenements. The term is so used in some of the building acts. Lastly, the term may designate a wall divided longitudinally into two moieties, each moiety being subject to a cross-easement in favor of the owner of the other moiety." 14 Ch. Div. 192.

A brick wall which is used in common, as the wall of two adjacent properties in a city, is a party-wall, if erected partly on the soil of each, and so used for many years without question or complaint by either; 43 La. Ann. 1157.

Party-walls are generally regulated by statute. The principles of these acts generally are that the wall shall be built equally on the lands of the adjoining owners, at their joint expense, but when only one owner wishes to use such wall, it is built at his expense, and when the other wishes to make use of it he pays one-half of its value. Each owner has a right to place his joists in it and use it for the support of his roof. See 4 Sandf. 480; 24 Mo. 69; 12 La. An. 785. When the party-wall has been built, and the adjoining owner is desirous of having a deeper foundation, he has a right to undermine such wall, using due care and diligence to prevent any injury to his neighbor; and, having done so, he is not answerable for any consequential damages which may ensue; 17 Johns. 92; 12 Mass. 220; 2 N. H. 534. See 1 Dall. 346; 5 S. & R. 1. An adjoining owner of a party wall has a right to increase its height, but in doing so is liable for any injury to the adjoining building, even though the addition is being built by a contractor and the damages result from a windstorm which causes the wall to fall; 50 N. Y. 659; 68 Hun 298. See 14 Daly 450.

When such a wall exists between two buildings, belonging to different persons, and one of them takes it down with his buildings, he is required to erect another in its place in a reasonable time and with the least inconvenience; the other owner must contribute to the expense, if the wall required repairs, but such expense will be limited to the costs of the old wall; 3 Kent 436; 6 Den. 717. See 41 La. Ann. 194. When the wall is taken down, it must be done with care; but it is not the duty of the person taking it down to shore up or prop the house of his neighbor to prevent it from falling. If, however, the work be done with negligence, by which injury accrues to the neighboring house, an action will lie; 1 M. & M. 382; 15 N. Y. 801. If one tenant in common of a party-wall excludes the other from the use of it by placing obstacles in it, the only remedy is to remove the obstacles; 14 Ch. Div. 192.

Where the owner of two contiguous lots erects a brick messuage, with a division wall, and sells to different purchasers, the wall is not a party-wall; 2 Miles 247; contra, 6 Duer 17. The right to use a party-wall is not lost by lapse of time, even seventy-five years; 1 Phila. 366. It can be acquired by prescription after a sufficient period; 80 N. Y. 614. A party-wall must be built without openings; 61 Pa. 118; 51 Tex. 480; s. c. 32 Am. Rep. 627; 6 Mackey 580; 71 Hun 295; 159 Mass. 427. A party-wall can only be built for mutual support; painting a sign on it is unlawful; 2 W. N. C. Pa. 333. The principle of party-walls is based upon mutual benefit, and does not extend to the interior of lots where the adjoining owner cannot be expected to build; 2 Pears. 324. Where one built a party-wall, which was defective and fell over, injuring the adjoining premises, he was held liable to the owner of the premises; 125 Mass. 232; s. c. 28 Am. Rep. 224. Where a building having a party-wall is destroyed by fire, leaving the wall standing, the easement in the wall ceases; 57 Miss. 746; and so where the wall becomes unfit either from age or accident; 24 Or. 18.

An agreement between adjoining owners in relation to a party-wall erected on the division lines of their lots is binding on the parties and those who purchase subject to such agreement, and creates cross easements upon the lots; 33 Neb. 437; 135 N. Y. 312; but see 9 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 205. It creates a covenant running with the land; 88 Mo. 524; s. c. 1 L. R. A. 3. But an agreement to pay half the cost is merely a personal covenant; 115 Ill. 190.

By statute in Iowa, Mississippi, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina, and in the District of Columbia, one adjacent owner may build over his neighbor's line, without compensating him, except that the latter may, when he pleases, use the wall so built, upon paying for it. The cases should be read with a view to the statutes. The regulation of party walls is a very ancient form of exercise of the police power, and came to Pennsylvania from the customs of London, like so many other parts of our early law. Those interested will find the subject discussed in a note in 7 Amer. L. Reg. N. S. 10. But such regulation, as it exists in Pennsylvania and some other states, is an interference with the rights and enjoyment of property, sustainable only on the police power, and therefore to be governed and measured by the strict extent of the statutory grant; 148 Pa. 636. The provincial act of 1892 in Massachusetts, similar to the Pennsylvania act, was held void as contrary to the bill of rights; 139 Mass. 29, a case cited by counsel, but not followed, in 16 W. N. C. Pa. 83. But it has also been said that there can be no available objection to the principle upon which the law of party-walls is based. It has constituted a part of the law of France for ages. The principle is no invasion of the absolute right of property. Per Lowrie, J., in 23 Pa. 36.

See LATERAL SUPPORT.

PARVA SERJEANTIA. Petty serjeanty. See SERJEANTY.

PARVISE. A legal disputation or moot among students at law. English.

PARVUM CAPE. See PETIT CAPE.

PASS. A certificate given to a slave, by his master or mistress, in which it is stated that he is permitted to leave his home with their authority. The paper on which such certificate is written.

In Practice. To be given or entered: as, let the judgment pass for the plaintiff.

To become transferred: thus, the title to goods passes by the sale whenever the parties have agreed upon the sale and the price, and nothing remains to be done to complete the agreement; 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 939.

To decide upon. When a jury decide upon the rights of the parties, which are in issue, they are said to pass upon them.

The constitution of various states forbid the issue of free passes on railroads, except in certain cases, as does the Interstate Commerce Act. See INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

PASS AND REPASS. The phrase has been held to mean going and returning over the road once only. 34 J. P. 823.

PASS-BOOK. In Mercantile Law. A book used by merchants with their customers, in which an entry of goods sold and delivered to a customer is made.

It is kept by the buyer, and sent to the merchant whenever he wishes to purchase any article. It ought to be a counterpart of the merchant's books, as far as regards the customer's account.

The term pass-book is given to a small book made up from time to time from the banker's ledger and forwarded to the customer: this is not considered as a statement of account between the parties: yet when the customer neglects for a long time to make any objection to the correctness of the entries, he will be bound by them; 2 Atk. 252; 2 D. & C. 534; 2 M. & W. 2.

A depositor in a bank, who sends his pass-book to be written up and receives it back with entries of credits and debits and his paid checks as vouchers for the latter, is bound to examine with due diligence the pass-book and vouchers, and to report to the bank without any unreasonable delay any errors which may be discovered in them; and if he fails to do so and the bank is thereby misled to its prejudice, he cannot afterwards discredit the balance as shown by the pass-book. If a depositor delegates the examination to a clerk without proper supervision he will not be protected from loss if it turns out that without his knowledge the clerk had committed forgery in raising the amounts of some of the checks, and thereby misled the bank to its prejudice, in spite of due care on the part of its officers; 117 U. S. 96.

PASSAGE. Properly a way over water. Where a seaman shipped for a voyage to foreign parts, and at the termination of the voyage was provided with a passage to a port within the United Kingdom, but not the one from which he originally shipped, he was held to have been provided with a passage home, within the meaning of the Merchant Shipping Act; [1897] 1 Q. B. 712.

In Legal Use. Passage is spoken, chiefly, of laws; and is nearly equivalent to enactment. Spoken of a law, "prior to the passage" means prior to the going into effect. Abbott; 1 Iowa, 435. The time of a passage of a statute is when the act has gone through all the constitutional forms, including the approval of the governor. Id.; 33 Pa. St. 202. "Forty days from its passage," referring to a statute, means forty days from the signature by the governor, or passage over his veto, or expiration of time for its return, if neither signed nor vetoed. Id.; 3 Heisk. 442.

The easement of passing over a piece of private water, analogous to a right of way over land. R. & L. Dict. Yeiv. 163. Also, a voyage upon a ship or other vessel navigating the sea, or some large lake or river. Id. See FINAL PASSAGE.

PASSAGE COURT. An ancient court of record in Liverpool, once called the "mayor's court of paysage," but now usually called the "court of the passage of the borough of Liverpool." M. & W.

Up to 1835 it was also called the Borough Court of Liverpool. It was formerly held before the mayor and bailiffs of the borough; but the Court of Passage Act, 1834 provided that the court should not sit without a legal assessor, and that the attendance of the mayor and bailiffs was unnecessary; and now, under the act of 1893, the assessor is the presiding judge, and has the powers of a judge of the High Court sitting at Nisi Prius or in chambers. He must be a barrister of not less than seven years' standing.

The court has jurisdiction in personal actions to any amount where any defendant resides or carries on business within the jurisdiction or, by leave of the court, when any part of the cause of action arose therein; but no action under £20 can be commenced in the court if the County Court has jurisdiction. The High Court has power to order certain actions of contract to be tried in the Passage Court, and may in certain cases remit to it actions of tort. The court has jurisdiction in Admiralty similar to and co-extensive with that of the County Court of Lancaster at Liverpool.

This court is a remarkable instance of the adaptation to the needs of a great modern city of a court with an antiquated procedure which in remote times had served the needs of a village such as Liverpool was. Byrne.

PASSAGE-MONEY. The sum claimable for the conveyance of a person, with or without luggage, on the water.

The difference between freight and passage-money is this, that the former is claimable for the carriage of goods, and the latter for the carriage of the person. The same rules which govern the claim for freight affect that for passage-money; 3 Chitty, Com. Law 424; 1 Pet. Adm. 126; 3 Johns. 385. See COMMON CARRIERS OF PASSENGERS.

PASSAGIO. An ancient writ addressed to the keepers of the ports to permit a man who had the king's leave to pass over sea. Reg. Orig. 183.

PASSAGIUM REGIS. A voyage or expedition to the Holy Land made by the kings of England in person. Cowell.

PASSATOR. He who has the interest or command of the passage of a river; or a lord to whom a duty is paid for passage. Wharton.

PASSENGER. One who has taken a place in a public conveyance, by virtue of a contract, for the purpose of being transported from one place to another, on the payment of fare or its equivalent. 132 Pa. 1. See 96 id. 267.

The purchase of a ticket and the entry by a person on the premises or accommodations of the carrier creates the relation of passenger and carrier with all its rights, duties, and obligations; 104 Ill. 296; 9 Am. & Eng. A carrier is not liable to one who rides by stealth; 83 Ill. 427; or who is a trespasser; 91 Mo. 339; although invited to ride by an employee of the carrier; 76 Tex. 174. Express messengers and mail clerks are passengers; 15 N. Y. 444; 96 Pa. 256; but not a voluntary assistant to an express messenger or mail clerk; 12 Am. Rep. 475; or a newboy permitted to ride free; 69 Pa. 210; 60 Mo. 418; or an employee of the carrier who rides free between his home and place of employment; 30 Kan. 699.

One who travels free; 14 How. 466; on an annual pass; 17 So. Rep. (La.) 503; or on a drover's pass; 51 Pa. 316; is entitled to the same care as the holder of a regular ticket; even if he expressly assumes the risk of accident; 176 Pa. 45; but an employee travelling on a free pass containing a stipulation that the company will not be liable cannot recover for injuries; 34 N. J. L. 513.

A passenger voluntarily riding in a baggage car, or other dangerous place, even by permission of the conductor, cannot recover for injuries; 14 Allen 429; 92 Pa. 21; 55 Tex. 88; but it has been held that the permission of the conductor justifies such conduct in the passenger; 20 Minn. 135; 1 Duer 571; so of permitting a passenger to ride on a freight train; 115 Ind. 435.

A passenger is bound by the reasonable rules of a carrier; 55 Ill. 185; 11 Fed. Rep. 683; 41 Am. Dec. 472; which do not violate the obligation of the contract; 142 Mass. 40; 26 Am. & Eng. R. R. PASSENGER SHIP. "Every description of sea-going vessel carrying one or more passenger or passengers on any voyage from any place in Her Majesty's Dominions to any place whatever." 52 & 53 Vict. c. 28.

This means for the purposes of the English Merchant Shipping Acts, every ship propelled by mechanical power carrying passengers to, from or between any places in the United Kingdom except steam ferries working in chains. Byrne.

PASSIVE TRUST. See NAKED TRUST; TRUST.

PASSPORT (Fr. passer, to pass, port, harbor or gate). In Maritime Law. A paper containing a permission from a neutral state to the captain or master of a ship or vessel to proceed on the voyage proposed. It usually contains his name and residence, the name, property, description, tonnage, and destination of the ship, the nature and quantity of the cargo, the place from whence it comes, and its destination, with such other matters as the practice of the place requires.

It is also called a sea-brief, or sea-letter (q.v.). But Marshall distinguishes sea-letter from passport, which latter, he says, is pretended to protect the ship, while the former relates to the cargo, destination, etc. See Jacobs, Sea-Laws 66, note.

This document is indispensably necessary in time of war for the safety of every neutral vessel; Marsh. Ins. 317, 406 b.

In most countries of continental Europe passports are given to travellers. These are intended to protect them on their journey from all molestation while they are obedient to the laws. The secretary of state may issue, or cause to be issued in foreign countries by such diplomatic or consular officers of the United States, and under such rules as the president may prescribe, passports; but only to citizens of the United States; R. S. §§ 4075-4076. See SAFE CONDUCT.

PASTURES. Lands upon which beasts feed themselves. By a grant of pastures the land itself passes. 1 Thomas, Co. Litt. 202.

PATENT. A grant of some privilege, property, or authority, made by the government or sovereign of a country to one or more individuals. Phillips, Pat. 1.

As the term was originally used in England, it signified certain written instruments emanating from the king and sealed with the great seal. These instruments conferred grants of lands, honors, or franchises; they were called letters patent, from being delivered open, and by way of contradistinction from instruments like the French lettres de cachet, which went out sealed.

In the United States, the word patent is sometimes understood to mean the title-deed by which a government, either state or federal, conveys its lands. But in its more usual acceptation it is understood as referring to those instruments by which the United States secures to inventors for a limited time the exclusive right to their own inventions.

The granting of exclusive privileges by means of letters patent was a power which for a long time was greatly abused by the sovereigns of England. The sole right of dealing in certain commodities was in that manner conferred upon particular individuals, either as a matter of royal favor or as a means of replenishing the royal treasury. These exclusive privileges, which were termed monopolies, became extremely odious, and, at an early date, met with the most determined resistance. One of the provisions of Magna Charta was intended to prevent the granting of monopolies of this character; and subsequent prohibitions and restrictions were enacted by parliament even under the most energetic and absolute of their monarchs. See Hallam, Const. Hist. 153, 205.

Still, the unregulated and despotic power of the crown, which reached its height in Elizabeth's reign, proved, in many instances, superior to the law, until the reign of James I., 1623, when an act was passed, known as the Statute of Monopolies, 21 Jac. 1, ch. 3, which entirely prohibited all grants of that nature, and abolished existing monopolies. But the king was permitted to secure by letters patent to the inventor of any new manufacture, the sole right to make and vend the same for a term not exceeding fourteen years. Since that time the power of the monarch has been so far controlled by the law that the prohibition contained in the Statute of Monopolies has been fully observed, and under that statute has grown up the present system of British patent law, from which ours has to a great extent being derived. See Rob. Pat. §§ 1-8. See 12 Law Quart. Rev. 141, as to the earliest grants of privileges in England and the early history of patent law.

The constitution of the United States confers upon congress the power to pass laws "to promote the progress of science and useful arts, by securing for limited times to authors and inventors the exclusive right to their respective writings and discoveries;" U. S. Const. art. 1, s. 6, cl. 8. This right can, accordingly, be conferred only upon the authors and inventors themselves; but it rests with congress to determine the length of time during which it shall continue. Congress at an early day availed itself of the power. The first act passed was that which established the patent office, on the 10th of April, 1790. There were several supplements and modifications to this law, namely, the acts passed February 7, 1793, June 7, 1794, April 17, 1800, July 3, 1832, July 13, 1832. These were all repealed, by an act passed July 4, 1836, and a new system was established. Subsequently other changes were made by the acts of March 3, 1837, March 3, 1839, August 29, 1842, May 27, 1848, March 3, 1849, February 18, 1861, March 2, 1861, July 16, 1862, March 3, 1863, June 25, 1864, and March 3, 1865. The act of July 8, 1870, repealed all existing acts. See acts of March 3, 1883 (patents to United States officers); Feb'y 4, 1887 (pirating patented designs); Feb'y 9, 1898 (act establishing court of appeals in D. C.); March 3, 1897 (various amendments); March 3, 1897 (jurisdiction over infringers).

Letters patent for inventions are granted for a term of seventeen years.

The present law does not furnish any guarantee of the validity of the title conferred upon the patentee. The patent is, nevertheless, prima facie evidence of its own validity; 1 Stor. 396; 14 Pet. 458; 2 Blatchf. 229; as also for a defendant as tending to show non-infringement, in some cases. See 15 How. 252.

The exclusive right of the patentee did not exist at common law; it is created by acts of congress; and no rights can be acquired unless authorized by the statute and in the manner it prescribes; 10 How. 494; 19 id. 195; 137 U. S. 41. The power granted by the patent is domestic in its character, and confined within the limits of the United States; consequently it does not extend to a foreign vessel lawfully entering one of our ports, where the patented improvement was placed upon her in a foreign port and authorized by the laws of the country to which she belongs; 19 How. 188.

Of the subject-matter of a patent. The act of July 8, 1870, sec. 24, provides for the granting of a patent to the first inventor or discoverer of any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or any new and useful improvement thereof, not known or used by others in this country, and not patented, or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country before his invention or discovery thereof, and not in public use or on sale for more than two years prior to his application, unless the same is proved to have been abandoned. By act of March 8, 1897 (to go into effect January 1, 1898), amending this section, the patenting or publication of an invention in a foreign country, if more than two years before the application in this country bars a patent. There are four classes of inventions which may be the subjects of patents: first, an art; second, a machine; third, a manufacture; and, fourth, a composition of matter. In Great Britain, as we have seen, letters patent granting exclusive privileges can be issued only to the inventors of a "new manufacture." But the courts in defining the meaning of the term, have construed the word "manufacture" to be coextensive in signification with the whole of the four classes of inventions thus recognized by our law. An art or process, a machine, and a composition of matter are all regarded there as manufactures. The field of invention in Great Britain is, therefore, coincident with that provided by our law, and the legal subject-matter of patents is the same in each country; 2 B. & Ald. 349; 2 M. & W. 544. But, inasmuch as we have three other classes of inventions, the term "manufacture" has a more limited signification here than it receives in Great Britain. See infra.

A process is an art or method by which any particular result is produced. Where a result or effect is produced by chemical action, by the operation or application of some element or power of nature, or of one substance to another, such modes, methods, or operations are called processes. A new process is usually the result of discovery; a machine, of invention. The arts of tanning, dyeing, vulcanizing india-rubber, smelting ores, etc., are usually carried on by processes, as distinguished from machines. But the term process is often employed more vaguely in a secondary sense in which it cannot be the subject of a patent. Thus, we say that a board is undergoing the process of being planed, grain of being ground, iron of being hammered or rolled. Here the term is used subjectively or passively, as applied to the material operated on, and not to the method or mode of producing that operation, which is by mechanical means, or the use of a machine as distinguished from a process. In this use of the term it represents the function of a machine, or the effect produced by it on the material subjected to the action of the machine, and does not constitute a patentable subject-matter, because there cannot be a valid patent for the function or abstract effect of a machine, but only for the machine which produces it. 15 How. 267.

"A process is a mode of treatment of certain materials to produce a given result. It is an act, or series of acts, performed upon the subject-matter, to be transferred and reduced to a different state or thing. . . . In the language of the patent law, it is an 'art.' The machinery pointed out as suitable to perform the process may or may not be new or patentable; whilst the process itself may be entirely new, and produce an altogether new result. The process requires that certain things should be done with certain substances, and in a certain order; but the tools to be used in doing this may be of secondary consequence." 94 U. S. 788. The term process is not used in the patent statutes, but it has been uniformly held that there may be a patent for a process; 102 U. S. 727. A process may be new though the apparatus is old; 122 U. S. 413; 21 Fed. Rep. 811. The process by which an article is produced and the product are two different inventions; 7 Fed. Rep. 213. The new combination of old processes constitutes a new process; 13 Fed. Rep. 172; 7 E. & B. 725.

Letters patent for a process irrespective of the particular mode or form of apparatus for carrying it into effect are granted under the laws of the United States. Whoever discovers that a certain useful result will be produced in any art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, by the use of certain means, is entitled to a patent for it, provided he specifies the means he uses in a manner so full and exact that any one skilled in the science to which it appertains can, by using the means he specifies, without any addition to or subtraction from them, produce precisely the result he discovers; 102 U. S. 727.

Processes of manufacture which involve chemical or other similarly elementary action are patentable, though mechanism may be necessary in carrying out the process, while those which consist solely in the operation of a machine are not, and where such mechanism is subsidiary to the chemical action, the fact that the patentee may be entitled to a patent upon the mechanism, does not impair his right to the patent for the process. A valid patent cannot be obtained for a process which involves nothing more than the operation of a piece of mechanism, that is to say, for the function of a machine; 158 U. S. 88.

To procure a patent for a process the inventor must describe his invention with sufficient clearness to enable those skilled in the matter to understand what the process is, and must point out some practicable way of putting it into operation; but he need not bring the art to the highest degree of perfection; 126 U. S. 1. It must first be reduced to practice; Rob. Pat. § 171; 30 Fed. Rep. 63.

Where a patent clearly shows and describes the functions of a certain process, no other person can afterwards patent that process; 21 Fed. Rep. 580. Where the process is described with the method of operation of a machine, the machine alone is patentable; 32 Fed. Rep. 221; the product, unless itself new, is not patentable; id.

A machine is any contrivance which is used to regulate or modify the relations between force, motion, and weight.

"The term machine includes every mechanical device or combination of mechanical powers and devices to perform some function and produce a certain effect or result;" 15 How. 267; but when the effect is produced by chemical action, or by the application of some element or power of nature, or of one substance to another, such methods or operations are called processes; 4 Fish. Pat. Cas. 175.

A machine is an instrument composed of one or more of the mechanical powers, and capable, when set in motion, of producing, by its own operation, certain predetermined physical effects. Rob. Pat. § 173. A machine differs from an art in that the act or series of acts which constitute the art become, in the machine, inseparably connected with a specific physical feature. The art is the primary conception, the machine the secondary. A machine differs from all other mechanical instruments in that its rule of action resides within itself. The structural law of a machine is its one enduring and essential characteristic. Rob. Pat. § 175; 1 Fish. 44. See 23 O. G. 1827.

What are sometimes called the simple machines are six in number: the lever, the pulley, the wheel and axle, the wedge, the screw, and the inclined plane. These are sometimes known as the mechanical powers, though neither these nor any other machinery can ever constitute or create power; they can only control, direct, and render it useful.

Machines, as generally seen and understood, are compounded of these simple machines in some of their shapes and modification. Such a combination as, when in operation, will produce some specific final result, is regarded as an entire machine.

It is so treated in the patent law; for although a new machine, or a new improvement of a machine, is an invention, and although only one invention can be included in a single patent, still several different contrivances, each of which is in one sense a machine, may all be separately claimed in a single patent, provided they all contribute to improve or to constitute one machine, and are intended to produce a single ultimate result; and a new combination of machines is patentable whether the machines themselves be new or old; 3 Wash. C. C. 69; 1 Sto. 273, 568; 3 Wheat. 454; 2 Fish. Pat. Cas. 600.

Inventions pertaining to machines may be divided into four classes: 1. Where the invention embraces the entire machine; 2. Where it embraces one or more of the elements of the machine only, as the coupler of a plough; 3. Where the invention embraces both a new element and a new combination of elements previously used and well known; 4. Where all the elements of the machine are old and the invention consists in a new combination. Almost all of the modern machines are of the fourth class; 3 Cliff. 689.

The combination of two existing machines is patentable; 18 Pa. 465.

It has been said that a machine becomes entitled to protection by a patent only when embodied in an operative instrument. The expression of the idea in language, drawings, or a model, does not fulfil the legal requirements. It must be constructed of sufficient size, etc., to accomplish its purpose; Rob. Pat. § 180. But this is probably not a correct statement.

A manufacture is a term which is used to denote whatever is made directly by the hand of man, or indirectly through the instrumentality of any machinery which is controlled by human power. A commodity may be regarded as being in itself a manufacture, or as being produced by manufacture.

The term is used in its widest sense in the patent law of Great Britain. See supra. It has been defined there to be "anything made by the hand of man." 8 Term 99.

A manufacture is an instrument created by the exercise of mechanical forces and designed for the production of mechanical effects, but not capable, when set in motion, of attaining, by its own operation, to any predetermined results. It receives its rule of action from the external source which furnishes its motive power. A manufacture requires the constant guidance and control of some separate intelligent agent; a machine operates under the direction of that intelligence with which it was endowed by its inventor when he imposed on it its structural law. The parts of a machine, considered separately from the machine itself, all kinds of tools and fabrics, and every other vendible substance, which is neither a complete machine nor produced by the mere union of ingredients, is included under the title "manufacture"; Rob. Pat. § 182. An article of ornament may be a manufacture; 20 Blatch. 413; and a bond and coupon register in the form of a book; 3 Fed. Rep. 335; and a wooden pavement; 2 Webst. 126. The parts of a machine are not patentable upon the ground that it makes a known article more perfectly than it has been made before; 11 Blatch. 215. A manufacture, if new in itself, may be patentable whether the process or apparatus by which it is produced be new or not; 6 Holmes 206. A manufacture may be an invention distinct from the mode of producing it; 21 Blatch. 226. Making an article by a new process or apparatus is not making a new manufacture; 8 Fed. Rep. 710; a new process producing a new manufacture may involve two separate inventive acts; 7 Fed. Rep. 213. A new form of an old article may be a new manufacture; 25 O. G. 601; but to perceive a hitherto unknown quality in an existing substance is not the invention of a new substance; 32 Fed. Rep. 81. Although a new process for producing an article is patentable, the product itself cannot be patented, if it is old; 111 U. S. 298.

Invention, what constitutes. The general rule is that, wherever invention has been exercised, there will be found the subject-matter of a patent; 1 McAll. 48; 5 Blatch. 46.

An invention differs from a discovery, inasmuch as this latter term is used to signify the finding out of something that existed before. Thus, we speak of the discovery of the properties of steam, or of electricity; but the first contrivance of any machinery by which those discoveries were applied to practical use was an invention: the former always existed, though not before known; the latter did not previously exist.

Although the word "discovery" is used in our statute as entitling the discoverer to a patent, still, every discovery is not a patentable invention. The discoverer of a mere philosophical principle, or abstract theory, or elementary truth of science, cannot obtain a patent for the same, unless he applies it to some directly useful purpose. The patent can only be for such a principle, theory, or truth reduced to practice and embodied in a particular structure or combination of parts; 1 Sto. 285; 1 Mas. 187; 140 U. S. 491; nor can there be a patent for a function or for an effect only, but for an effect produced in a given manner or by given means; 1 Holmes 20; 2 Fish. 229; or by a particular operation; 1 Mas. 476; 1 Sto. 270; 1 Pet. C. C. 394; 15 How. 62; 4 Fish. 466; but a patent covers the means employed to effect results; 151 U. S. 186. While the end or purpose sought to be accomplished by the device is not the subject of a patent, the device or mechanical means by which the desired result is to be secured, is; 150 U. S. 221. An idea is not patentable; a patent is valid only for the practical application of an idea; 3 Blatch. 535; 20 Wall. 498. A principle denotes the physical force employed by an invention. It is some natural power or energy which operates with uniformity under given circumstances, and may thus be contemplated as obedient to law. It is a necessary factor in every means which produce physical effects, whether such means be natural or artificial; Rob. Pat. § 185.

To be entitled to a patent, a person must have invented and discovered some new and useful art, machine, manufacture, or composition of matter, or some new and useful improvement thereof; and it is not enough that a thing is new, in the sense that in the shape or form in which it is produced, it has not been known, and that it is useful, but it must amount to an invention or discovery; 183 U. S. 319; 182 id. 693.

An invention, to be patentable, must not only be new, but must also be useful. But by this it is not meant that it must be more useful than anything of the kind previously known, but that it is capable of use for a beneficial purpose. The word "useful" is also to be understood in contradistinction to "pernicious" or "frivolous." A contrivance directly and mainly calculated to aid the counterfeiter, the pickpocket, or the assassin, or which would in any way be directly calculated to be injurious to the morals, the health, or the good order of society, would not be patentable. Neither would a new contrivance which was of too trivial a character to be worthy of serious consideration; 1 Paine 203; 1 Blatch. 872, 488; 13 N. H. 311; 5 Fish. 396; 1 Biss. 362; 8 Fish. 218, 536.

The patent itself is prima facie evidence of utility; 9 Blatch. 77; s. c. 5 Fish. 48; 1 Bond 212; and its use by the defendant and others is evidence of utility; 1 Holmes 340.

In the trial of an action for infringement, evidence of the comparative utility of the plaintiff's machine and the defendant's is inadmissible, except for the purpose of showing a substantial difference between the two machines; 1 Stor. 836.

A mere application of an old device or process to the manufacture of an article is held to constitute only a "double use," and not to be patentable. There must be some new process or machinery used to produce the effect; 2 Sto. 190, 408; 3 Curt. 340; 13 Blatch. 101; 91 U. S. 37, 150. See 134 U. S. 388; 135 id. 237; 138 id. 124; 147 id. 633; 148 id. 547. A combination of old elements does not constitute a patentable invention, where they are all found, some in one and some in another of earlier devices for the same purpose, in which each element performs the same function that it has in the new combination; 137 U. S. 433; 150 id. 221; 133 id. 349.

A mere carrying forward of the original thought, a change only in form, proportions, or degree, doing the same thing in the same way, by substantially the same means, with better results, is not such an invention as will sustain a patent; 132 U. S. 100; 148 id. 547; 144 id. 11; 138 id. 124; 137 id. 433; 133 id. 349; and something more is required to support one than a slight advance over what has preceded it, or mere superiority in workmanship or finish; 140 U. S. 55.

Inventive skill has been defined as "that intuitive faculty of the mind put forth in the search for new results, or new methods, creating what had not before existed, or bringing to light what lay hidden from vision; it differs from a 'suggestion of that common experience which arose spontaneously and by a necessity of human reasoning in the minds of those who had become acquainted with the circumstances with which they had to deal.'" 113 U. S. 72.

"Not every improvement is invention; but to entitle a thing to protection it must be the product of some exercise of the inventive faculties, and it must involve something more than what is obvious to persons skilled in the art to which it relates." 32 Fed. Rep. 841.

"An invention, in the sense of the patent law, means the finding out—the contriving, the creating of something which did not exist, and was not known before, and which can be made useful and advantageous in the pursuits of life, or which can add to the enjoyment of mankind." 4 Fish. 12.

"It was never the object of those [patent] laws to grant a monopoly for every trifling device, every shadow of a shade of an idea, which would naturally and spontaneously occur to any skilled mechanic or operator in the ordinary progress of manufactures." 107 U. S. 200, Bradley, J.

"The law gives no monopoly to industry, to wise judgment, or to mere mechanical skill in the use of known means, nor to the product of either if it be not new. . . . It is invention of what is new, and not comparative superiority or greater excellence in what was before known, which the law protects as exclusive property, and it is that alone which is secured by patent." 1 O. G. 331.

"Originality is the test of invention. If that is successfully exercised, its product is protected; and it is immaterial whether it is displayed in a greater or less degree, or whether the new idea revealed itself to the inventor by a sudden flash of thought or dawned on his mind after groping his way through many and dubious experiments." 6 Blatch. 195. Whenever a change or device is new, and accomplishes beneficial results, courts look with favor upon it. The law, in such cases, has no nice standard by which to gauge the degree of mental power or inventive genius brought into play in originating the new device. A lucky casual thought, involving a comparatively trifling change, often produces decided and useful results, and, though the result of a small amount of inventive skill, the law extends to it the same protection as if it were the product of a lifetime of profound thought and most ingenious experiment; 3 Fish. 141. The patentee must be an inventor and he must have made a discovery. It is not enough that a thing shall be new and that it shall be useful, but it must amount to an invention or discovery; 114 U. S. 11.

The unsuccessful effort of others in the same art, to accomplish the same result, indicates that the means by which the patentee has produced it are the result of inventive skill; 28 Fed. Rep. 195; 20 id. 248. In The Barbed Wire Patent, 143 U. S. 375, it appeared that the sales of the earlier article had been but tentative and slight, and those of the patented article enormous. In sustaining the patent in suit, Brown, J., said: "Under such circumstances courts have not been reluctant to sustain a patent to the man who has taken the final step which has turned a failure into a success. In the law of patents it is the last step that wins. . . . It may be laid down as a general rule, though perhaps not an invariable one, that if a new combination and arrangement of known elements produces a new and beneficial result, never attained before, it is evidence of invention."

The degree of invention is not prescribed by the statute; 69 Fed. Rep. 958; nor is it material; 4 Fed. Rep. 900; each case must stand on its own facts, but if the patented structure is at the head of the evolution in its particular art and is a marked improvement on what preceded it, the court should surely be predisposed in its favor; 70 Fed. Rep. 1006. Courts give a liberal construction to the law, so as to protect every contrivance which can be called new, and which proves at all useful. The inventor, therefore, has the benefit of the doubt. But it is obvious that there is a limit beyond which mere changes cannot and ought not to receive this protection; 3 Fish. 265.

Where the question of patentable novelty in a device was by no means free from doubt, the court, in view of the extensive use to which the patent had been put by manufacturers of wagons, resolved the doubt in favor of the patentee and sustained the patent; 145 U. S. 156. While the utility of a contrivance, as shown by the general public demand for it when made known, is not conclusive evidence of novelty and invention, it is nevertheless highly persuasive in that direction, and in the absence of pretty conclusive evidence to the contrary, will generally exercise controlling influence; 27 Fed. Rep. 560; see 4 id. 900; 36 id. 193; in case of doubt it will turn the scale; 148 U. S. 556; it is better evidence of invention than the opinion of an expert or the intuition of a judge; 34 Fed. Rep. 336; but not where public acceptance is the plain result of successful business methods in creating a market for the article. And not when the popularity is not due to any patentable feature. The fact that a patented device went into immediate use, and supplanted all others, cannot be attributed to artful advertising, in the case of an article such as an electric heater for railway cars, which is sold, not to the public, but to mechanics of skill in their art; 82 Fed. Rep. 993. But extensive use has been said to be an unsafe criterion of patentability; 141 U. S. 419. When, in a class of machines widely used, it appears that at last, after repeated and futile attempts, a machine has been contrived which accomplishes the result desired, and when a patent has been granted to the successful inventor, the courts should not be ready to adopt a narrow or astute construction, fatal to the grant; 151 U. S. 139.

Simplicity in the device is itself a merit; 2 Webst. Pat. Cas. 113. Mere suggestions from others do not negative the existence of patentable invention, unless they cover the entire invention; 5 Ct. of Cl. 1. The suggestion by others of a part of a device does not show the absence of inventive skill as to the whole; 11 Fed. Rep. 505. Where inventive skill was necessary in addition to suggestions of others, the inventor is entitled to a patent; 15 Blatch. 160; 1 Sto. 336; 15 How. 62. To suggest that a certain result may be obtained, but without indicating how, is not an invention; 7 Biss. 490. Mere experiment is not invention; 1 Fish. 17.

The simplicity of a device and its apparent obviousness after the event, ought not to detract from its meritousness. That it had never been suggested or thought of before, and effectually supplied the one thing necessary to bring success, when before there had been nothing but failure, is sufficient within the meaning of the patent law; 61 Fed. Rep. 102. "The apparent simplicity of a new device often leads an inexperienced person to think that it would have occurred to any one familiar with the subject; but the decisive answer is that with dozens and perhaps hundreds of others laboring in the same field, it had never occurred to any one before. The practised eye of an ordinary mechanic may be safely trusted to see what ought to be apparent to every one." 153 U. S. 587.

A "double use" may involve invention if the second use is an art remote from the former use; otherwise, if the new use is such that it would occur to a person of ordinary mechanical skill; much depends upon the nature of the changes required to adapt the device to its new use; id.

Study, effort, and experiment are not alone enough to constitute inventive skill; 27 Fed. Rep. 219. Nor is the exercise of good judgment; 109 U. S. 633. Nor the exercise of the reasoning process; 23 Fed. Rep. 443. Inventive skill requires thought, while mechanical skill does not; 24 Blatch. 163. Small discoveries may involve inventive skill; 27 Fed. Rep. 656.

The exercise of mechanical skill must be considered as it existed at the date of the invention; 31 Fed. Rep. 224.

It is said by an able writer: These two requirements of novelty and utility are clearly susceptible of proof by evidence; and it is deducible from the earlier decisions and those which have followed in the same line, that a change which involves those requirements is an invention within the meaning of the patent law with certain well defined exceptions. The exceptions are that a change, even when new and useful, does not amount to invention when it is a mere change of form, or in size, or degree, or in proportions, or of material, or of location, or of arrangement. A mere application of an old thing to a new purpose or a double use of an old thing is an exception. Also a mere application of an old thing to perform its usual functions with its usual mode of operation, or movement. A mere substitution of one old device for another, or a duplication of old devices, or a change of direction of movement of a moving device, or discovery of a new property of matter are exceptions. But there are changes in each of the above respects which are not mere changes, but are substantial, and amount to invention when the changes are new and useful; Renwick, Pat. Inv. 4.

The doctrine of equivalents is treated under novelty as a part of Patentable Invention; Rob. Pat. § 245. It is there said that equivalent "signifies the interchangeability of agencies which are known in the arts to be capable of serving the same purpose as integral parts of some particular invention. It must be capable of performing the same office in the invention as the act or substance whose place it supplies; it must relate to the form of embodiment alone and not affect in any degree the idea of means; and it must have been known in the arts at the date of the patent, as endowed with this capability, or have subsequently become so known without the further exercise of inventive skill." Id. § 246. See 27 Fed. Rep. 691; 15 Wall. 187; 3 Bann. & Ard. 598.

A mechanical equivalent exists where one device may be adopted instead of another by a person skilled in the art, from his knowledge of the art; 1 Fish. 351. Equivalents have been said to be "obvious and customary" interchanges; 1 Fish. 64. It is a question of fact depending on the opinion of experts and on an inspection of the machine; 2 Fish. 31. It is a question of use, not of name; 5 Fish. 1. Equivalents may differ in shape; 11 Fed. Rep. 148; a substitute in a combination does not cease to be an equivalent because, in addition, it does something more and better; 3 B. & Ard. 161. Only those things can be considered equivalents for the elements of a manufacture which perform the same function in substantially the same way; 102 U. S. 232. Where no inventive skill is shown in the substitute, it is an equivalent; 103 U. S. 797; 96 id. 549.

Successive patents. "No patent can issue for an invention actually covered by a former patent, especially to the same patentee, although the terms of the claims may differ. The second patent, in such case, although containing a claim broader and more generic in its character than the specific claims contained in the prior patent, is also void. But where the second patent covers matters described in the prior patent, essentially distinct and separable, and distinct from the invention covered thereby, and claims made thereunder, its validity may be sustained." 151 U. S. 186. See also 69 Fed. Rep. 257; 83 id. 1014.

An improvement is an addition to or alteration in some existing means, which increases its efficiency without destroying its identity. It includes two necessary ideas: the idea of a complete and practical operative art or instrument and the idea of some change in such art or instrument not affecting its essential character but enabling it to produce its appropriate results in a more perfect or economical manner; Rob. Pat. § 210.

No patent can be granted in the United States for the mere importation of an invention brought from abroad; although it is otherwise in England. The constitution, as we have seen, only authorizes congress to grant these exclusive privileges to the inventors themselves. The mere fact of an inventor having obtained a patent for a device in a foreign country will not prevent his obtaining a patent for the same thing here, provided he applies for a patent here within seven months from the date of the foreign patent (Act of March 3, 1897). When the foreign patent issues before the United States patent issues, the latter expires at the same time as the former, or, if there be more than one, with the former patent having the shortest term; but in no case will the term exceed seventeen years; 157 U. S. 1.

Of caveats. See CAVEAT.

The caveat can prevent the grant of any interfering patent, on any application filed within one year from the day when the caveat was lodged in the patent office, without his being notified of the application and having an opportunity of contesting the priority of invention of the applicant, by means of an "interference," which will be treated of hereafter. In this way an inventor can obtain a year to perfect his invention, without the risk of having the patent to which he believes he is entitled granted to another in the mean time.

Upon application within one year by any other person for a patent covering the same invention, it is the duty of the commissioner of patents to give notice of such application to the person filing the caveat, who shall within three months file his description, etc. The caveat is filed in the secret archives of the office. See 1 Bond 212; 4 Blatch. 362. A caveat is evidence of the date of the invention, but it does not necessarily show that the invention was then completed. It is not assignable. The caveat is not concluded by his description of the invention, but may proceed with his experiments; Rob. Pat. § 438 et seq.

Of the application for a patent. When the invention is complete, and the inventor desires to apply for a patent, he causes a specification to be prepared, setting forth in clear and intelligible terms the exact nature of his invention, describing its different parts and the principle and mode in which they operate, and stating precisely what he claims as new, in contradistinction from those parts and combinations which were previously in use. This should be accompanied by a petition to the commissioner of patents, stating the general nature of his invention and the object of his application. One copy of drawings should be attached to the specification, where the nature of the case admits of drawings; and, where the invention is for a composition of matter, specimens of the ingredients and of the composition of matter should be furnished. The specification as well as the drawings, must be signed by the applicant and attested by two witnesses; the drawings may be signed by an attorney in fact; and appended to the specification must be an affidavit of the applicant (or in case of his death, of his personal representatives), stating that he verily believes himself to be the original and first inventor of that for which he asks a patent, and that he does not know and does not believe that the same was ever before known or used, and, also, of what country he is a citizen. It may be sworn to before any person in the United States authorized to administer oaths, and, in foreign countries, before certain officials designated in the act. The whole is then filed in the patent office.

A substituted specification covering a different invention fixes the date of the application; 27 Fed. Rep. 450.

Of the examination. As has been already observed, the act provides for an examination whenever an application is completed in the prescribed manner. And if on such examination it appears that the claim of the applicant is invalid and would not be sustained by the courts, the application is rejected.

As a general rule, an invention is considered patentable whenever the applicant is shown to be the original and first inventor; and his own affidavit appended to the application is sufficient to raise a presumption that he is the first inventor, until the contrary is shown. But if it is ascertained by the office that the same thing had been invented by any other person in this country, or that it had been patented or described in any printed publication in this or any foreign country, prior to its invention by the applicant, a patent will be denied him. But a mere prior invention of the same thing in a foreign country, if not patented or described in some printed publication, will not affect his right to a patent here. Under the act of March 3, 1897 (taking effect Jan. 1, 1899), the patenting or publication of an invention in any foreign country, for more than two years before the application in this country, or its patenting in a foreign country by the applicant for more than seven months before his application, bars a patent here.

The rule that the applicant is entitled to a patent whenever he is shown to be the original and first inventor is subject to one important exception. If he has, either actually or constructively, abandoned his invention to the public, he can never afterwards recall it and resume his right of ownership.

Abandonment may be by conduct from which an intention to abandon will be inferred, or by public use or sale. In the former class, it may be before the application; by the application; or after application. Abandonment before application may be shown by any conduct from which can be inferred an intention to give the invention to the public; as, by throwing it aside and not using it; disclaiming any right in it, or giving it expressly to the public; and by public use of the device for even less than two years, taken in connection with circumstances tending to show that the inventor did not intend to secure a monopoly; Rob. Pat. § 349. It is a question of intention; 2 Blatch. 240; and of fact; 10 id. 140.

An applicant, either by express words in his specification, or by a failure to claim all of his invention or by unreasonable delay in applying for a revision, may abandon the whole or a part of his invention; and after application he can abandon his invention by withdrawing his application.

Public use or sale of the invention for more than two years before the application works an abandonment; 123 U. S. 267; 26 Fed. Rep. 262; this is a conclusive presumption; 9 Blatch. 185; and a single use is enough; 104 U. S. 333. But this rule does not apply to a strictly experimental use; 22 Fed. Rep. 780; 19 Fed. Rep. 785; 12 id. 721; no matter how long it had continued; 97 U. S. 126. A mere temporary use by a few persons as an act of kindness, for a limited period, or a use where the party using it is bound to secrecy, or is actually under the control of the inventor, or a use by the inventor in private is not within the rule; 1 Sto. 273. See 1 Fish. 1. Such public use, with or without the consent of the subsequent patentee, renders the patent invalid; 123 U. S. 267.

The sale which works an abandonment in this connection must be a sale in the usual course of business; 2 Fed. Rep. 78; and of the completed invention; id.; and merely placing the device on sale is not sufficient; 14 Fed. Rep. 919. A sale on trial, to test the invention, is not an abandonment, even though warranted; 11 Fed. Rep. 859.

Use by the inventor for the purpose of testing the machine, in order to devise means for perfecting its operation, is admissible where, as incident to such use, the product of its operation is disposed of by sale; such use does not change its character; but where the use is mainly for the purposes of trade and profit and the experiment is merely incidental to that, the principle, and not the incident, must give character to the use. The thing implied as excepted out of the prohibition may be characterized as substantially the purpose of experiment; 123 U. S. 249.

Where an invention was complete and capable of producing the result sought to be accomplished, and the construction and mode of operation and use of the mechanism were necessarily known to the workmen who put it into safes, which were the articles in question, where it was hidden from view after the safes were completed and no attempt was made to expose the mechanism and thus prove whether or not it was efficient, it was held that it was not an experimental use; 107 U. S. 90. If an inventor, after having made his device, gives or sells it to another to be used by the donee or vendee without limitation or restriction or injunction of secrecy, and it is so used, such use is public even though confined to one person; 104 U. S. 333. Where the inventor of a connecting tie for rails used the device in constructing a cable road and reserved no future control over it, and had no expectation of making any material changes in it, and never examined it to see whether it was defective or could be improved, it was held that it was a public use so as to defeat the patent; 140 U. S. 210. But where the inventor of a wooden pavement himself constructed an experimental pavement which was used for six years before the patent was applied for, and it appeared that he built it at his own expense and went to see the effect of traffic upon it and its durability, and examined it almost daily, it was held that this was an experimental use; 97 U. S. 126. Where the invention is a machine, such as a grist mill, its experimental use does not cease to be so because its products have been sold. But if the inventor allows his machine to be used by other persons generally, with or without compensation, or if it by his consent put on sale for such use, then it will be in public use and on public sale, within the act; 146 U. S. 223. Where there is no evidence of use or sale of the invention, which was a method of driven wells, by the applicant before his application, or by others with his consent, except putting down a single well, it was held that the use was merely experimental; 123 U. S. 71.

The abandonment extends only to the exact invention publicly used or sold; 2 Fed. Rep. 78.

An inventor whose application for a patent has been rejected by the patent office and withdrawn by him, and who, without substantial reason or excuse, omits for eight years to reinstate or renew it, during which time many patents embodying the substance of the invention are granted to other persons, must be held to have abandoned the invention; 118 U. S. 83.

A delay of 13 years in the patent office, was held, under the circumstances, not to invalidate a patent; 167 U. S. 235.

By the act of March 3, 1897, it is provided that the failure to apply for a patent in this country for more than seven months after the inventor's application in a foreign country, bars the patent. And, by the same act, a failure to complete an application and prepare it for examination within one year after its filing, and a failure to prosecute the same within one year after action in the office, of which notice shall have been given, works an abandonment, unless the commissioner be satisfied that the delay was unavoidable; but these provisions do not apply to patents granted or applications filed prior to January 1, 1898.

If the application or any claim is rejected, the specification or the claim may be amended and a second examination requested. If again rejected, an appeal may be taken to the examiners-in-chief. If rejected by them, an appeal lies to the commissioner; and if rejected by him, an appeal may be taken to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia, upon notice to the commissioner, and filing the reasons of appeal in writing. If all this proves ineffectual, the applicant may still file a bill in equity in the circuit court to compel the allowance of his patent.

All the proceedings before the patent office connected with the application for a patent are ex parte, and are kept secret, except in cases of conflicting claims, which will be referred to below.

Of the date of the patent. The patent usually takes date on the day it issues; every patent shall bear date as of a day not later than six months from its allowance and notice to the applicant.

The date of the application and not the date of the patent, controls in determining the legal effect to be given to two patents issued at different dates to the same inventor, and the order in which they are to be considered; 143 U. S. 275.

The conception of an invention consists in the complete performance of the mental part of the inventive act. While this in theory necessarily precedes the physical reduction to practice, it in fact also embraces whatever of thought and skill the inventor may have exercised in bringing the invention to that point where reduction to practice can begin; Rob. Pat. § 376; and the date of the conception is the date when the idea of means, including all the essential attributes of the invention, becomes so clearly defined in the mind of the inventor as to be capable of exterior expression; Rob. Pat. § 80. The true date of invention is at the point where the work of the inventor ceases and the work of the mechanic begins; 18 O. G. 520.

Whoever first perfects a machine and makes it capable of useful operation is entitled to a patent; an imperfect and incomplete invention resting in theory or intellectual motion and uncertain experiments, not actually reduced to practice and embodied in some machine, etc., is not patentable; 2 Cliff. 224.

The one who first conceives the invention, and is diligent to reduce it to practice is entitled to a patent in preference to one who conceives it subsequently, although the latter may have been the first to render the invention available for public use; Rob. Pat. § 383. See 1 Sto. 590.

Of interferences. When an application is filed which interferes with another pending application or with an unexpired patent, an investigation is ordered for the purpose of determining who was the prior inventor, and a patent is directed to be issued or not accordingly. When the controversy is between two applications a patent will be finally granted to him who is shown to be the first inventor, and will be denied to the other applicant so far as the point thus controverted is concerned. But if the interference is between an application and an actual patent, as there is no power in the patent office to cancel the existing patent, all that can be done is to grant or withhold from the applicant the patent he asks. If the patent is granted to him there will be two patents for the same thing. The two parties will stand upon a footing of equality, and must settle their rights by a resort to the courts.

The parties to an interference are required to put their claims into proper shape, and the question of the patentability of the device for which the application is filed is then determined by the examiner. The issues are then defined by the examiner and the parties notified. Each party is then required to file a concise written statement under oath of the date of the conception of his invention, its reduction to practice, etc. If a party to an interference fail to file such a statement, he cannot show an earlier date for his invention than the date of his application. The averments of fact in the preliminary statement are conclusive upon the party who files it. If, in an interference between two applications, the date fixed in the preliminary statement is not earlier than the date of filing the previous application, the priority is awarded to the earliest application. Testimony is taken in contested cases and the question of priority passed upon. An appeal lies to the Examiners-in-Chief and from them to the Commissioner. Priority of inventive act consists in the prior conception of the idea of means and the prior embodiment of this idea in some practically operative art or instrument, or reasonable diligence in perfecting such embodiment, and must be established by a clear preponderance of evidence; Rob. Pat. § 600. Conception of the invention may be shown by verbal descriptions, sketches, models, etc., but these have little weight in proving a reduction to practice. The testimony cannot carry the date of conception back of the statement filed. An applicant can terminate interference proceedings by disclaiming the matter in contest, whereupon judgment goes against him on the interference. A judgment in an interference has been held to be binding only on the parties to the record, and only in respect of further proceedings on the same question in the patent office, and not on the courts on the question of novelty or priority; 1 Bann. & A. 894; though the courts will consider it on a motion for a preliminary injunction against the defeated party; 24 Fed. Rep. 375; but the supreme court has recently held that where the question decided in the patent office is one between contesting parties as to priority of invention, the decision there must be accepted as controlling upon that question of fact in any subsequent suit between the same parties, unless the contrary is established by testimony, which in character and amount carries thorough conviction; 153 U. S. 125. The opinion of the patent office on claims or earlier patents do not affect the applicant, except so far as they lead him to abandon or modify some of his claims; 84 Fed. Rep. 659.

The question of interference is determined by the claims and not by the general appearance and functions of the machine shown, but not claimed; 56 Fed. Rep. 714.

An appeal lies from the Commissioner of Patents in an interference case to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia; Act of Feb. 9, 1898.

Whenever there are interfering patents, any person interested in any one of such patents may have relief against the interfering patent by suit in equity against its owners; the court may thereupon adjudge either patent void in whole or in part, etc., but such judgment shall affect none but parties to the suit and those deriving title under them subsequently to the judgment.

Of the specification. The specification is required to describe the invention in such full, clear, concise, and exact terms as to enable any person skilled in the art or science to which it relates, to make, construct, or use it. In the trial of an action for infringement, it is a question of fact for the jury whether this requirement has been complied with. See 2 Brock. 298; 1 Mas. 182; 2 Sto. 432; 1 W. & M. 53. At the same time, the interpretation of the specification, and the ascertainment of the subject-matter of the invention from the language of the specification and claims and from the drawings are a matter of law exclusively for the court; 5 How. 1; 3 McLean 250, 432; 2 Fish. 62; 4 Blatch. 61; 1 Fish. 44, 289, 351. The specification will be liberally construed by the court, in order to sustain the invention; 1 Sumn. 482; 1 Sto. 270; 5 Fish. 153; 2 Bond 189; 15 How. 341; 4 Blatch. 238; 1 Wall. 491; but it must, nevertheless, identify with reasonable clearness and accuracy the invention claimed, and describe the manner of its construction and use so that the public from the specification alone may be enabled to practise it; and if the court cannot satisfactorily ascertain the meaning of the patent from its face, it will be void for ambiguity; 2 Blatch. 1; 2 Brock. 303; 1 Sumn. 482; 1 Mas. 182, 447. It will be construed in view of the state of the art; 2 Fish. 477; 14 Blatch. 79; 1 Biss. 87; 124 U. S. 1; 139 id. 349. A specification in letters patent is sufficiently clear and descriptive, when expressed in terms intelligible to a person skilled in the art to which it relates; 152 id. 561.

It is required to distinguish between what is new and what is old, and not mix them together without disclosing distinctly that for which the patent is granted; 1 Sto. 273, 475; 1 Sumn. 482; 3 Wheat. 534. If the invention consists of an improvement, the patent should be confined thereto, and should clearly distinguish the improvement from the prior device, so as to show that the former only is claimed; 1 Gall. 438, 478; 1 Mas. 447; 3 McLean 250. Ambiguous terms should be avoided; nothing material to the use of the invention should be omitted; and the necessity of trials and experiments should not be thrown upon the public.

Of the claim. The claim is the statutory requirement prescribed for the purpose of making a patentee define what the invention is. It is to be read in the light of the description contained in the specification, and its literal terms may be enlarged or narrowed accordingly, but not to an extent inconsistent with their meaning; 38 U. S. App. 55. If an invention is not covered by the claim, it will not be protected by the patent; 148 U. S. 54. A mere reference in a claim to a letter on the drawing does not in itself limit the claim to the precise geometrical shape shown in the drawing; 20 U. S. App. 14.

The claim is the measure of a patentee's right to relief; and where the specification may be referred to, to limit the claim, it can never be made available to expand it; 141 U. S. 419.

The inventor need not describe all the functions to be performed by his machine if they are evident in its practical operation; 37 U. S. App. 239.

The terms of the claims are carefully scrutinized in the patent office. It defines and determines what the applicant is entitled to. The scope of the patent should be limited to the invention covered by the claim; although the claim may be illustrated, it cannot be enlarged by the language used in other parts of the specification; 104 U. S. 112. The whole patent, including specifications and drawings, is to be taken into consideration, though the court looks to them only for the purpose of placing a proper construction upon the claims; 2 Fish. 10. The scope of the patent is given by the claims; 117 U. S. 555; though it be less than the real invention; 9 Blatch. 77; parts which may be indispensable to the invention are not covered by the patent unless mentioned in the claims; 1 Fed. Rep. 722; and where a feature is inserted in the claims which is not essential, its materiality cannot be afterwards denied; 13 Fed. Rep. 86. The patentee, in a suit brought on his patent, is bound by his claims; 95 U. S. 274;

9 Blatch. 363; the court will not enlarge the claims by the specification; 117 U. S. 554. Words in a claim such as "substantially as described" refer back to the descriptive parts of the specification and are implied in a claim whether inserted or not; 19 Wall. 287; they relate only to the material features of the invention; 9 Blatch. 77. See 86 Fed. Rep. 315. "Substantially as set forth" are technical words and are equivalent to saying "by the means described in the text of the inventor's application for letters patent as illustrated by the drawings, diagrams, and model which accompany the application;" 25 U. S. App. 473.

A patentee cannot hold under his patent anything excluded therefrom by him or with his acquiescence during the stages of his application therefor; 28 U. S. App. 525.

Where one originates a generic invention and also several specific inventions and presents the same for patent contemporaneously, he cannot enlarge each invention by use of general terms so as to obtain overlapping patents; 1 U. S. App. 320. An inventor is required to explain the principle of his machine and the best mode of applying the principle, so as to distinguish it from other inventions; but he is not necessarily limited to the one mode shown. A pioneer inventor is entitled to a generic claim, which will include every species within the genus, and may also insert in the same application specific claims for one or more of the species; 80 Fed. Rep. 121.

A claim must be interpreted with reference to the rejected claims and to the prior state of the art, and cannot be so construed as to cover either what was rejected by the patent office or disclosed by prior devices; 150 U. S. 221.

A claim for a function is bad; 4 Fed. Rep. 635; though it will, if possible, be construed as a claim for means of performing the function; 28 Fed. Rep. 850; thus a claim for doing an act is treated as a claim for the means of doing it; 94 U. S. 288.

While the law does not limit the number of claims, their multiplication is disapproved; 21 Fed. Rep. 316.

A drawing must be filed whenever the nature of the invention permits; 16 O. G. 809; a model is not required until called for by the patent office.

Of re-issues. It often happens that errors, defects, and mistakes occur in the specification of a patent, by which it is rendered wholly or partially inoperative, or perhaps invalid. Sec. 53 of the act of 1870 provides that when such errors or defects are the result of inadvertence, accident, or mistake, without any fraudulent or deceptive intention, the patent may be surrendered by the patentee, his executors, administrators, or assigns, and a new patent issued in proper shape to secure the real invention intended to have been patented originally. Rob. Pat. § 658. The identity between the invention described in the re-issue and that in the original patent is a question of fact for the jury; 4 How. 380; 27 Pa. 517; 1 Wall. 531. A patentee cannot secure in a re-issue claims covering what has been previously rejected upon his original application; 150 U. S. 38.

A re-issued patent has the same effect and operation in law, on the trial of all actions for causes subsequently arising, as though the patent had been originally issued in such corrected form. From this it appears that after a re-issue no action can be brought for a past infringement of the patent. But, as the bare use of a patented machine is (if unauthorized) an infringement of the rights of the patentee, a machine constructed and lawfully used prior to the re-issue may be an infringement of the patent if used afterwards. The re-issued patent will expire when the original patent would have expired.

All matters of fact relating to a re-issue are finally settled by the decision of the commissioner, granting the re-issue; but it may be shown that the commissioner has exceeded his authority in granting a re-issue for an invention different from the one embraced in the original patent; 11

Wall. 516; 9 id. 796; 8 Blatch. 513. See 123 U. S. 87. Where a re-issue is sought on the ground of inadvertent errors, rendering the patent inoperative, the decision of the commissioner upon the questions of fact relating to inoperativeness and inadvertence will not be re-examined by the courts; 82 Fed. Rep. 916.

Where the only mistake suggested is that the claim is not so broad as it might have been, the mistake was apparent on the first inspection of the patent, and any correction desired should have been applied for immediately; the right to a correction may be lost by unreasonable delay. The claim of a specific device, and the omission to claim other devices apparent on the face of the patent, are in law a dedication to the public of that which was not claimed, and the legal effect of the patent cannot be revoked unless the patentee surrenders it and proves that the specification was so framed by real inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and this should be done with due diligence and before adverse rights have accrued. It was not the special purpose of the legislation to authorize re-issues with broader claims, though such a re-issue may be made when it clearly appears that there has been a bona fide mistake, such as chancery in cases within its ordinary jurisdiction would correct. The specifications cannot be substantially changed, either by the addition of new matter or the omission of important particulars, so as to enlarge the invention as intended to be originally claimed; 129 U. S. 294; 119 id. 664. The re-issue is an amendment and cannot be allowed unless the imperfections in the original patent arose without fraud, and from inadvertence, accident, or mistake; 137 U. S. 258. The re-issued patent is not a new patent; and an existing contract concerning the patent before its surrender applies equally to it after the surrender and re-issue; 11 Cush. 569.

A re-issue can cover only what an examination of the original shows the original was intended to embrace; 127 U. S. 563; 123 id. 87; and not that which the original did not describe or claim; 40 Fed. Rep. 667. It can enlarge a claim by omitting an element previously claimed as essential; 124 U. S. 347. Claims cannot be enlarged so as to cover matter already in public use after unreasonable delay; 127 U. S. 563. If not for the same invention, the re-issue is void; 145 U. S. 226.

A claim restricted by the patent office in the first re-issue cannot be enlarged by subsequent re-issues; 125 U. S. 427. A re-issue which brings in a claim originally rejected by the patent office with the acquiescence of the applicant, is void; 35 Fed. Rep. 329; but a re-issue may correct errors occasioned by the mistaken ideas raised in the patent office; 33 Fed. Rep. 502. Both the specification and the claims may be corrected by a re-issue; 16 Fed. Rep. 240.

Laches in applying for a re-issue is fatal to the re-issue and may be taken advantage of by a demurrer; 39 Fed. Rep. 273; 83 id. 840. What is reasonable delay is a question for the court and the decision of the patent office on that point is not conclusive; 125 U. S. 217. The plaintiff must explain the delay in applying for a re-issue; 125 U. S. 217. The inadvertence must be in reference to the application and not to the invention. See a review of the cases in 123 U. S. 69. A delay of three years is held to invalidate a re-issue; 76 Fed. Rep. 816; but where a patent, dated in 1892, was held void in 1894 and a re-issue was granted five months later, it was held valid; 86 Fed. Rep. 124; where, on an application for a re-issue, the primary examiner rejects certain claims, and the applicant abandons his application, the claims disallowed are not invalidated; 169 U. S. 606.

No action lies on the original patent after its surrender for re-issue; 85 Fed. Rep. 835. A patentee, imposing words of limitation upon himself in his claim in taking out a re-issue, is bound thereby in subsequent suits on the re-issued patent; 123 U. S. 589.

A patent cannot be re-issued to enlarge a claim unless there has been a clear mistake in the wording of the claim, and an application is made within a reasonably short period after the original patent was granted; 123 U. S. 87; 125 id. 217; 148 id. 270.

The application for a re-issue must be sworn to by the inventor, if living, and not by the assignee, if any.

A re-issue of a patent for an invention, after the expiration of foreign patents for the same invention is invalid; 135 U. S. 176.

Until an amended patent issues, the original stands as if the re-issue had never been applied for; 171 U. S.—Not reported.

Of patents for designs. The act of 1870 permits any person to obtain a patent for a design, which shall continue in force for three and a-half, seven, or fourteen years, at the option of the applicant, upon the payment of a fee of ten, fifteen, or thirty dollars, according to the duration of the patent obtained. These patents are granted wherever the applicant, by his own industry, genius, efforts, and expense, has invented or produced any new and original design for a manufacture, alto-relievo, or bas-relief, or any new and original design for the printing of woollen, silk, cotton, or other fabrics; any new and original impression, ornament, pattern, print, or picture, to be printed, painted, cast, or otherwise placed on or worked into any article of manufacture, or any new and original shape or configuration of any article of manufacture, not known or used by others before his invention or production thereof, or patented or described in any printed publication.

A design is an instrument created by the imposition upon a physical substance of some peculiar shape or ornamentation which produces a particular impression upon the human eye, and through the eye, upon the mind. Its creation involves a change in the substance itself and not merely in the mode of presenting it for sale; and affects, not its abstract qualities, nor those on which its practical utility depends, but those only which determine its appearance to the sight; Rob. Pat. § 200. The acts of congress were plainly intended to give encouragement to the decorative arts; they contemplate not so much utility as appearance; 14 Wall. 511. A design is patentable though not more beautiful than former ones; 105 U. S. 94. Design patents require as high a degree or exercise of the inventive or origination faculty as utility patents; 18 Fed. Rep. 321. Where scroll-work is used there must be something peculiar to sustain a patent; 84 Fed. Rep. 182.

A design patent cannot be enlarged in its scope from the specifications; 84 Fed. Rep. 170.

The general method of making the application is the same as has been hereinbefore described, and the patent issues in a similar form.

The use of a design or colorable imitation thereof on any article of manufacture or the sale of any article to which the same shall have been applied, knowing that it has been so applied, renders the party liable to pay $250 or the profits in excess of that amount, and this may be recovered at law or in equity.

Of disclaimers. R. S. § 4922 provides that the plaintiff in a suit for infringement may disclaim so much of his patent as is in excess of his real invention and thus recover damages for the injury he has really sustained. Sec. 4917 provides for the filing in the patent office of a disclaimer of either a separate claim or some distinct and separate matter which can be excised without mutilating or changing what is left. These two sections are part of one law having one general purpose and both relate to a case in which a patentee, through inadvertence, accident, or mistake, and without any fraudulent intention, has included in his claim and in his patent, inventions to which he is not entitled, and which are clearly distinguishable from those to which he is entitled. The purpose of § 4917 is to authorize him to file a disclaimer to the part to which he is not entitled and of § 4933 is to legalize the suit on the patent mentioned in the section, and to the extent to which the patentee can rightfully claim the patented invention: 133 U. S. 332.

Delay in a disclaimer under § 4917 goes only to the question of costs: 145 U. S. 29.

No person can avail himself of the benefits of this provision who has unreasonably neglected or delayed to enter his disclaimer. The act of 1870 follows substantially the act of 1837 in this respect.

A disclaimer by one owner will not affect the interest of any other owner.

A disclaimer cannot be used to change the character of the invention: 123 U. S. 532; 130 id. 56.

After an action in equity for the infringement of letters patent has been heard and decided upon its merits, the plaintiff cannot file a disclaimer in court, or introduce new evidence upon that or any other subject, except at a rehearing granted by the court upon such terms as it thinks fit to impose: 133 U. S. 103.

Of the extension of a patent. See EXTENSION OF PATENTS.

Of the repeal of letters patent. The United States may sue in equity for the repeal of a patent obtained by fraud: 128 U. S. 315; and a bill in equity to repeal two patents for the same subject-matter and to the same party is not multifarious: 128 U. S. 315.

R. S. § 4918 provides that any person interested in one or more interfering patents may bring his bill in equity against the owner of the adverse patent, upon which the court may declare either of the patents void in whole or part, or inoperative, or invalid in any particular part of the United States. The judgment rendered affects only the parties or those taking under them.

Suits may be maintained by the government in its own courts to set aside one of its own patents, not only when it has a proprietary and pecuniary interest in the result, but also when it is necessary in order to enable it to discharge its obligations to the public, and sometimes when the purpose and effect are merely to enforce the rights of an individual. In a suit between individuals to set aside an instrument for a fraud, the testimony must be clear, unequivocal, and convincing and more than a bare preponderance of evidence is required. This is much more so when the government attempts to set aside its solemn patent. In establishing the patent office, congress created a tribunal to pass upon all questions of novelty and utility, giving it exclusive jurisdiction in the first instance, with provisions for review. Its determination of facts should therefore be held conclusive upon the government subject to the same limitations as apply in suits between individuals: 167 U. S. 224.

Of the assignment of patents. Every patent or an interest therein is assignable in law, by an instrument in writing; such assignments, etc., are void as against any purchaser or mortgagee for a valuable consideration, without notice, unless recorded in the patent office within three months. But an unrecorded assignment is valid as against a subsequent party who has had actual notice: Holmes 152; 2 St. 609.

The right may be successively assigned without limit: 9 Fed. Rep. 390. Any person may take under an assignment, a married woman, an infant, etc.: 17 Fed. Rep. 841. An invention may be assigned before it is perfected: 26 Fed. Rep. 249; 92 U. S. 724; but an agreement for the future assignment of a patent not yet granted is not a recordable instrument: 32 Fed. Rep. 793.

A deed conveying "all the inventor's property and estate whatsoever" carries rights in unpatented inventions: 10 Wall. 367.

An assignment is the transfer of the entire interest in a patented invention or of an undivided portion of such entire interest as to every section of the United States; Rob. Pat. § 762; it differs from grant in relation to the territorial area to which they relate. A grant is the transfer of the exclusive right in a specific part of the United States. It is an exclusive sectional right. A license is a transfer of a less or different interest than either the interest in a whole patent or an undivided part of such whole interest or an exclusive sectional interest: 4 Blatch. 206. See 3 Fed. Rep. 143; 21 Wall. 205. Any transfer of an interest in a patented invention, which cannot operate as an assignment or grant, is a license; Rob. Pat. § 806. See 4 Blatch. 206. A license is distinguished from an assignment and a grant in that the latter transfers the monopoly as well as the invention, while a license transfers only the invention and does not affect the monopoly otherwise than by estopping the licensor from exercising his prohibitory powers in derogation of the privileges conferred by him upon the licensee: Rob. Pat. § 806. See 5 Fish. 411; 138 U. S. 252; 144 id. 248. A license is said to be merely the right not to be sued: 7 Hun 146. It need not be recorded: 2 St. 69. It may be by parol: 153 U. S. 332. The right of a patent owner to license the use of his patent is not a creature of statute, but of the common law: 39 Fed. Rep. 17.

No particular form is required for an assignment: 32 Fed. Rep. 790; to comply with the act it must be in writing: 104 U. S. 521; Holmes 152; 5 Fish. 528. It may be made either before or after the patent issues: 94 U. S. 225.

A grant of the exclusive right to make, use, and sell a patented article throughout the United States for the full term of the patent, is an assignment: 41 Fed. Rep. 792; where the intention of a writing is to transfer all rights under the patent, it is an assignment: 32 Fed. Rep. 790.

One owning a patent with several claims cannot assign a single claim so as to pass the legal title; such a transfer is a mere license: 144 U. S. 233. A joint owner may give a license: 61 Fed. Rep. 401.

A licensee cannot dispute the validity of the patent: 41 Fed. Rep. 48; but where a license does not recite the validity of the patent, a licensee who abandons the patent may set up the defence of invalidity in an action for royalties alleged to be payable by him after his repudiation: 55 Fed. Rep. 645; and a licensee is not estopped to question the validity of a patent in vindication of acts done after his license expired: 37 Fed. Rep. 686. A patentee cannot question the validity of his own patent as against his assignee: 31 Fed. Rep. 918; 60 id. 283.

An oral agreement for the sale and assignment of the right to obtain a patent, is not within the statute of frauds, nor within R. S. § 4893, requiring assignments of patents to be in writing, and may be specifically enforced in equity, upon sufficient proof thereof: 149 U. S. 315.

The right to damages for past infringements does not pass by a mere assignment: 18 Fed. Rep. 688; 80 id. 241, 444; but see 30 id. 250; 32 id. 629, 700; 34 id. 327.

Acts in pais will sometimes justify the presumption of a license: 1 How. 203; 17 Fed. Rep. 380. As to a verbal license, see 1 Bond 194; s. c. 1 Fish. 380. A license to use an invention implied from circumstances is not transferable: 119 U. S. 226; and a licensee cannot divide the territory in which he is licensed among third parties although the license is to him and his assigns: 53 Fed. Rep. 945. A verbal assignment of an interest in a patent has no force against a subsequent assignee under a written transfer, without notice: 153 U. S. 332; but it has been held that a license to use a patent, not exclusive of others, need not be recorded and may be by parol; and a subsequent assignee of the patent takes title subject to such license, of which he must inform himself as best he may; but the verbal license will be strictly construed, and must show the consideration and alleged payment of royalties: 53 Fed. Rep. 1006.

An assignment may be made prior to the granting of a patent. And when duly made and recorded, the patent may be issued to the assignee. This, however, only applies to cases of assignments proper, as contradistinguished from grants or licenses. The application must, however, in such cases be made and the specification sworn to by the inventor. See 5 McLean 131; 4 Wash. C. C. 71; 1 Blatch. 306. The assignment transfers the right to the assignee, although the patent should be afterwards issued to the assignor: 10 How. 477. The assignee of the entire right in a patent has the exclusive right to sue either at law or in equity for its subsequent infringement: 138 U. S. 255; and may sue in his own name, and so may the assignee of the entire interest for some particular territory: 2 Blatch. 20; but see 14 Fed. Rep. 297.

A license to use includes the right to make for use: 43 Fed. Rep. 847.

The title to a patent passes to the assignee in bankruptcy of the patentee, subject to the assignee's election not to accept it if in his opinion it is worthless or would prove to be burdensome and unprofitable; and he is entitled to a reasonable time to elect whether he will accept it or not: 145 U. S. 29. Upon the death of the owner of a patent, intestate, it passes to his administrator: 19 Fed. Rep. 918; who can sue thereon in another state without taking out ancillary letters of administration therein: 1 Dill. 104. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

It has been held that any breach of the condition of a license by the licensee works a forfeiture: 1 Blatch. 165.

Licenses containing express stipulations for their forfeiture are not ipso facto forfeited upon condition broken, but remain inoperative and pleadable until rescinded by a court of equity: Rob. Pat. § 822; 3 Fed. Rep. 223. The question of forfeiture depends upon the ordinary principles of equity; therefore a court will not rescind a license for non-payment of money at the time fixed therein, if payment has been subsequently tendered or justice can be done by a judgment for the amount already due: Rob. Pat. § 822; 5 Bann. & A. 572. A refusal to pay royalties coupled with an abandonment of the license and a defence on other grounds, are sufficient for annulment: 1 Fish. 380. If the contract contain no power of revocation, the licensor can only proceed at law for any breach: 41 Fed. Rep. 475; 32 id. 544; 26 id. 814.

Where an assignment, grant, or conveyance of a patent has been acknowledged before a notary public or United States commissioner, or any secretary of legation or consular officer authorized to administer oaths under R. S. § 1750, the certificate of such acknowledgment under the hand and seal of such officer is prima facie evidence of the execution of the instrument: Act of March 3, 1897.

A certified copy of an assignment of a patent has been held sufficient, prima facie, to show title in the assignee: 58 Fed. Rep. 149; but see 26 id. 763; 60 id. 1016.

Of joint inventors. The patent must in all cases issue to the inventor, if alive and if he has not assigned his interest. And if the invention is made jointly by two inventors, the patent must issue to them both. This is equally the case where one makes a portion of the invention at one time and another at another time.

It is not necessary that exactly the same idea should have occurred to each at the same time. If an idea is suggested to one and he even goes so far as to construct a machine embodying this invention, but it is not a completed working machine and another person takes hold of it and by their joint labor a perfect machine is made, a joint patent may be properly issued to them. But if each person invented a distinct part of a machine, each should obtain a patent for his invention: 11 Fed. Rep. 503.

Of executors and administrators. Where an inventor dies before obtaining a patent, his executor or administrator may apply for and obtain such patent, holding it in trust for the heirs at law or devisees, accordingly as the inventor died intestate or testate. Nothing is said as to its being appropriated to the payment of debts; but, having once gone into the hands of the executors or administrators, it would perhaps become assets, and be used like other personal property: In England, a patent will pass as assets to assignees in bankruptcy; 3 B. & P. 565.

The right to make a surrender and receive a re-issue of a patent also vests by law in the executor or administrator. The law further provides that the executor or administrator may make the oath necessary to obtain the patent, differing in this respect from the case of an assignment, where, although the patent issues to the assignee, the inventor must make the oath.

The liability of a patent to be levied upon for debt. The better opinion is that letters patent cannot be levied upon and sold by a common-law execution. The grant of privilege to the patentee would, from its incorporeal nature, seem to be incapable of manual seizure and of sale. Even if such a sale were made, there does not appear to be any provision in the acts of congress which contemplates the recording of a sheriff's deed; and without a valid record, the patentee might nevertheless make a subsequent transfer to a bona fide purchaser without notice, which would be valid.

But this peculiar species of property may be subjected to the payment of debts through the instrumentality of a bill in equity. The chancellor can act upon the person. He can direct the patent to be sold, and by attachment can compel the patentee to execute a conveyance to the purchaser; 105 U. S. 126; see where it was further held that the court might compel the holder of the patent to assign it, or appoint a trustee for that purpose. The right of a patentee will pass to his assignees in bankruptcy; 3 B. & P. 777; 145 U. S. 29; but not to a trustee in insolvency, in Massachusetts; 1 Holmes 152. The legal title to a patent does not pass to a receiver of an insolvent owner; but the receiver may maintain a bill to compel the owner to transfer it to him; 45 Fed. Rep. 479.

How far a patent is retroactive. By the earlier law on this subject in the United States, a patent, when granted, operated retroactively; so that a machine covered by the terms of the patent, though constructed with the inventor's knowledge, or consent, or purchased from him, previously to the date of that instrument, could not be used after the issuing of the patent without subjecting the party so using it to an action for infringement. The use of the machine previously to the date of the patent has been held not infringement; 128 U. S. 605. See, also, 163 U. S. 49.

The 37th section of the act of 1870, following substantially the act of 1837, provides "that every person who may have purchased of the inventor, or with his knowledge and consent may have constructed any newly-invented or discovered machine, or other patentable article, prior to the application by the inventor or discoverer for a patent, or sold or used one so constructed, shall have the right to use, and vend to others, to be used, the specific thing so made or purchased, without liability therefor."

At present, therefore, property rightfully acquired in a specific machine, etc., cannot be affected by a patent subsequently obtained by the patentee. It has been held, however, that, under the general grant contained in the constitution, congress has power to pass a special act which shall operate retrospectively so as to give a patent for an invention already in public use; 3 Wheat. 454; 2 Stor. 164; 3 Sumn. 535.

On the question of anticipation by a prior device, the patentee's invention will be considered as relating back to the original conception; 4 Wash. C. C. 68, 703.

Marking patented articles. Sec. 38 of the act of 1870 declares that in all cases where an article is made or vendible by any person under the protection of letters patent, it shall be the duty of such person to give sufficient notice to the public that said article is so patented, either by fixing thereon the word "patented," together with the day and year the patent was granted, or when, from the character of the article patented, that may be impracticable, by enveloping one or more of the said articles, and affixing a label to the package, or otherwise attaching thereto a label containing a like notice; on failure of which, in any suit for the infringement of letters patent by the party failing so to mark, no damage shall be recovered by the plaintiff, except on proof that the defendant was duly notified of the infringement, and continued after such notice, to make, use, or vend the article patented. The burden of proof is on the plaintiff, in a suit for infringement, to allege and prove actual or constructive notice of the patent; 155 U. S. 584; 152 id. 244.

Penalties provided in certain cases. The act of 1870 provides a penalty of not less than $100 and costs for every person who shall mark, etc., any article for which he has not obtained a patent, with the name or imitation of the name of any person who has a patent thereupon, without his consent, etc., or who shall so mark the word "patent" or any word of similar import with intent to counterfeit the mark or device of the patentee, without consent; or who shall in any manner mark upon an unpatented article the word "patent," etc., for the purpose of deceiving the people. This penalty may be recovered in the district court where the offence was committed; one half goes to the person who sues for the penalty and the other to the United States.

A similar statute—that of 5 & 6 Will. IV. c. 83—exists in England, for observations upon which see Hindm. Pat. 366. It has been decided under that statute that where there has been an unauthorized use of the word "patent," it must be proved that the word was used with a view of imitating or counterfeiting the stamp of the patentee, and that it is no defence that the patented article imitated was not a new manufacture, the grant of the patent being conclusive on the defendant; 3 H. & N. 902. See 1 Fish. 647; 3 Fish. 72, 374; 5 id. 384; 5 Blatch. 494; 6 id. 33.

Defences. In any action for infringement the defendant may plead the general issue and having given thirty days notice previous to trial, may prove: 1. That for the purpose of deceiving the public the specification contained less than the whole truth relative to the invention or more than necessary to produce the desired effect; 2. That the patentee had surreptitiously or unjustly obtained the patent for that which was in fact invented by another, who was using reasonable diligence in adapting and perfecting the same; 3. That it had been patented or described in some printed publication prior to his supposed invention thereof [or more than two years prior to the application]; 4. That the patentee was not the original and first inventor of any material and substantial part of the thing patented; 5. That it had been in public use or on sale in this country more than two years before the application or had been abandoned to the public. R. S. § 4920, as amended.

The portions above in [ ] were inserted in § 4920 by the act of March 3, 1897, and do not apply to patents previously granted.

Special notice must be given at law or must be set up in the answer in equity; notice of previous invention, knowledge, or use must state the names of the patentees and when granted and the names and residences of the persons alleged to have invented or to have had a prior knowledge of the thing patented and where and by whom it had been used.

Numerous other defences can be set up at law or in equity, such as the want of invention, novelty, or utility; absence of title in the plaintiff; non-infringement; estoppel; title in the defendant; a release, etc. See Rob. Pat. All of these, and also the above statutory defences, can be proved at law under a general issue plea; those not statutory do not require notice of special matter, unless under special practice in the particular court. The statute of limitations must be pleaded specially.

Prior use must be proved beyond reasonable doubt; 36 Fed. Rep. 183; it must antedate the patentee's invention and not merely his application; 80 Fed. Rep. 121.

A prior use of a device, in order to defeat a patent, must be something which was identical with the patented invention; 4 Blatch. 307. It is not enough to show older devices having part of the elements in one machine, part in a second, and part in a third, and then say that the patented device is anticipated; 17 Fed. Rep. 520. A prior use of all the elements of a device does not anticipate their combination; 4 Cliff. 424; a prior invention must have been complete and operative; 14 Fed. Rep. 457. A mere written description or drawing does not constitute a prior use; 9 Fed. Rep. 293; nor does the construction of a model; 16 Blatch. 78. But there may be circumstances under which a complete model will suffice; 19 Blatch. 473; 18 Wall. 120. A patent, though a mere paper one, may constitute anticipation if it discloses the principle of a subsequent invention; 82 Fed. Rep. 228.

If the prior use was embryotic or inchoate it is not enough. If the device was a machine, it must have been clothed in a substantial form, sufficient to demonstrate at once its practical efficacy and utility; 18 Wall. 120.

Trade magazines, copyrighted, and found in public and scientific libraries are "publications"; 87 Fed. Rep. 470.

Abandoned experiments do not constitute a prior use; 23 Fed. Rep. 327; 23 Wall. 181; 26 Fed. Rep. 329. But throwing aside an invention does not necessarily show that it was an unsuccessful experiment; 20 Fed. Rep. 826. It has been said that where an invention once in use has become a lost art, one who has reinvented it may obtain a patent therefor; Webst. Pat. 720.

Evidence as to the state of the art before the date of the conception of the invention is always admissible to show what was then known, to distinguish the new features from the old and to enable the court to perceive the precise limits of the inventive act; Rob. Pat. § 1020. No previous notice of this evidence is necessary; 91 U. S. 337.

If letters patent be manifestly invalid upon their face, the question of their validity may be raised on demurrer; 158 U. S. 299; 83 Fed. Rep. 170; but only in an unusual case; 84 id. 189.

The doctrine of laches has been said to apply to a case where a patentee has slept on his rights for sixteen years while infringement was open and notorious; 62 Fed. Rep. 96; but on the other hand it is held that mere delay will not bar a right unless it act as an estoppel; 69 id. 838.

The failure of a patentee for some years to manufacture his device does not defeat his right to his patented invention; 59 Fed. Rep. 613.

Utility is said to be absence of frivolity and mischievousness, and utility for some beneficial purpose; Rob. Pat. § 339; and the degree of utility is not material; 19 Fed. Rep. 323. But there is no utility if the invention can be used only to commit a fraud with; 19 Wall. 433; or for some immoral purpose; 1 Mas. 183; or can be used only for gambling purposes in saloons; 83 Fed. Rep. 448; or if the invention is dangerous in its use; 19 Wall. 287.

Of infringements. The criterion of infringement is substantial identity of construction or operation. Mere changes of form, proportion, or position, or substitution of mechanical equivalents, will still be infringements, unless they involve a substantial difference of construction, operation, or effect; 3 McLean 350, 439; 1 Wash. C. C. 108; 15 How. 69; 1 Curt. 379; 1 McAll. 43. As a general rule, whenever the defendant has incorporated in his structure the substance of what the plaintiff has invented and properly claimed, he is responsible to the latter; 1 Wall. 581.

Where the patent is for a new combination of machines to produce certain effects, it is no infringement to use any of the machines separately, if the whole combination is not used; 1 Mas. 447; 3 id. 112; 1 Pet. C. C. 323; 1 Sto. 568; 16 Pet. 336; 3 McLean 437; 14 How. 219; 1 Black 427; 1 Wall. 78. But it is an infringement to use one of several improvements claimed, or to use a substantial part of the invention, although with some modification or even improvement of form or apparatus; 2 Mas. 113; 1 Sto. 373. Where the patent describes and claims a machine, it cannot be construed to be for a process or function, so as to make all other machines infringements which perform the same function; and no infringement will in such case take place where the practical manner of giving effect to the principle is by a different mechanical structure and mechanical action; 15 How. 352. If the patentee is the inventor of a device, he may treat as infringers all who make a similar device operating on the same principle and performing the same functions by analogous means or equivalent combinations, although the infringing machine may be an improvement of the original and patentable as such. But if the invention claimed is itself but an improvement on a known machine, by a mere change of form or combination of parts, it will not be an infringement to improve the original machine by the use of a different form or combination of parts performing the same functions. The doctrine of equivalents does not in such case apply, unless the subsequent improvements are mere colorable invasions of the first; 20 How. 405. A pioneer in the art of making a practical device, who has invented a principle which has gone into almost universal use in this country, is entitled to a liberal construction of his claim; and another device containing all the elements of his combination should be held an infringement, though there are superficial dissimilarities in their construction; 145 U. S. 29. A pioneer means one covering a function never before performed; a wholly novel device marking a distinct step in the progress of the art; 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 707. The new application of a patented device to another use, which does not involve the exercise of the inventive faculty, is an infringement as much as though the new machine were an exact copy of the old; 139 U. S. 601. The mere fact that one who uses a patented process finds it applicable to more extended use than has been perceived by the patentee is not a defence to a charge of infringement; 147 U. S. 623.

A sale of the thing patented to an agent of the patentee, employed by him to make the purchase on account of the patentee, is not per se an infringement, although, accompanied by other circumstances, it may be evidence of infringement; 1 Curt. 280.

The making of a patented machine for philosophical experiment only, and not for use or sale, has been held to be no infringement; 1 Gall. 429, 485; but a use with a view to an experiment to test its value is an infringement; 4 Wash. 580. The sale of the articles produced by a patented machine or process is not an infringement; 3 McLean 295; 4 How. 709; 94 U. S. 568; nor is the bona fide purchase of patented articles from an infringing manufacturer; 10 Wheat. 359; nor a sale of materials by a sheriff; 1 Gall. 485; 1 Robb 47. Selling the parts of a patented machine may be an infringement; 1 Holmes 88. As to infringement by a railroad corporation, where its road was worked and its stock owned by a connecting road, see 17 How. 30. Ignorance by the infringer of the existence of the patent infringed is no defence, but may mitigate damages; 11 How. 587. See INFRINGEMENT.

The purchaser of a car load of beds covered by a patent from the owner of the territorial rights of Michigan, for the express purpose of selling them in Massachusetts, had the right to sell them anywhere within the United States, even within the territory already assigned to another person; 157 U. S. 659 (Brown J., dissenting); 149 id. 355; but one cannot buy a patented article in a foreign country from a person authorized to sell it there and then sell it in the United States; 84 Fed. Rep. 192.

The owners of letters patent cannot sue the United States in the court of claims for infringement of his patent; 155 U. S. 163.

The United States has no right to use a patented invention without a license from the patentee or making compensation to him. No suit can be maintained, or injunction granted, against the United States, unless expressly permitted by act of congress. Officers or agents of the United States, although acting under order of the United States, are personally liable to be sued for their own infringement of a patent. Upon a suit in equity by the patentee of an improvement in caisson gates against officers of the United States, using in their official capacity a caisson gate made and used by the United States, in infringement of his patent, the plaintiff is not entitled to an injunction. Nor can he recover profits, if the only profit proved is a saving to the United States in the cost of the gate; 161 U. S. 10.

Of damages for infringement. Damages may be recovered in any circuit court of the United States, in the name of the party interested either as patentee, assignee, or grantee, and in case of a verdict for the plaintiff the court may enter judgment thereon for any sum above the amount found by the verdict as the actual damages sustained, according to the circumstances of the case, not exceeding three times the amount of such verdict, together with costs. A court of equity may award damages for infringement and increase the same in a similar manner. R. S. § 4921, as amended March 3, 1897, provides that upon a decree in equity for infringement the complainant shall be entitled to recover, in addition to profits, the damages he has sustained, which shall be assessed by the court, and the court has the same power to increase the damages as is given to the court to increase the damages found by verdict, even though the infringer made no profit; 97 U. S. 348. See 13 Am. L. Rev. 1. At law a plaintiff is entitled to recover what he has lost although it exceed defendant's profits; in equity only the profits the defendant has actually made; 151 U. S. 139; 155 id. 565; 161 id. 10.

The actual damage is all that can be allowed by a jury, as contradistinguished from exemplary, vindictive, or punitive damages. The amount of defendant's profits from the unlawful user is, in general, the measure of the plaintiff's damages; and this may be determined by the plaintiff's price for a license; 11 How. 607; 16 id. 480; 20 id. 198; 1 Blatch. 244, 405; 2 id. 132, 184, 229, 476; but no interest is allowed on the profits until their amount is judicially ascertained; 125 U. S. 136. The rule of damages is different where a patent is only for an improvement on a machine and where it is for an entire machine; 16 How. 480. If there be a mere making and no user proved, the damages should be nominal; 1 Gall. 476; and where there is in the evidence no basis for a computation of the damages, only nominal damages can be given; 181 U. S. 159. Where a royalty was proved on a device covering two claims and one only was sustained, only nominal damages were allowed; 4 Fed. Rep. 415; but it has been held that in an action at law, if there is no established royalty, the jury may consider what would be a reasonable royalty; and, in so doing, may consider the utility and advantage of the invention, and take into account defendant's profits; 81 Fed. Rep. 1019.

In equity, a plaintiff, though he has an established license fee, is not limited to the amount thereof as damages; but may instead of damages recover the profits the defendants have made; 125 U. S. 136.

The plaintiff may recover in equity as profits the advantages which the defendants have gained by using the invention, and a definite saving shown to have been made in the cost of manufacture; 125 U. S. 136. The expense of using the new process is to be ascertained from the manner in which the defendants have used it and not in the manner in which they might have used it; id.

A plaintiff cannot recover a defendant's entire profits unless the whole market value of defendant's article is shown to be due to the invention; 24 Blatch. 275. But if the entire saleability of the article is the result of the introduction of the patented feature, the plaintiff is entitled to all the profits made; 39 Fed. Rep. 466; 130 U. S. 456. Where the invention apparently gave the device its value, the defendant must show the extent to which his own improvements were the cause of the profits which he had made; 39 Fed. Rep. 468. The profits are what the defendant made or saved; 36 Fed. Rep. 878. Nominal damages only are allowed where it is not shown what definite profits were due to the invention; 24 Blatch. 396, 463; 39 Fed. Rep. 613; or where plaintiff shows no established license fee, no market price, and no other use of the invention than by the defendant; 81 Fed. Rep. 863.

Where the owner of a patent has a fixed license fee, this is the measure of damages for an invention; 2 Fed. Rep. 677; 27 Fed. Rep. 691; this must be the license fee existing at the date of infringement; 25 Fed. Rep. 274; one established afterwards may be considered, though it is not conclusive; 28 Fed. Rep. 274; it is immaterial whether in such case the use of the invention has been profitable to the defendant. A single instance is not sufficient to establish a license fee; 35 Fed. Rep. 597; but two instances may be; 37 Fed. Rep. 654; it is not enough to show foreign license fees; 14 Blatch. 265. And a license fee must be shown by actual payment and not merely by promises to pay; 28 Fed. Rep. 360; nor by amount paid in settlement of a claim; 43 Fed. Rep. 478.

In the absence of an established license fee, damages must be shown by general evidence; 3 Wall. 315; and there is a difference between infringement by sale and those by use. The measure of recovery in a suit in equity for infringement of patent is the gains and profits made by the infringer and such further damage as the proof shows that the complainant sustained in addition; but in an action at law the damages are measured only by the extent of the plaintiff's loss, as proved by the evidence, and when the evidence discloses the existence of no license fee, no impairment of the plaintiff's market, no damages of any kind, only nominal damages can be recovered; 155 U. S. 565.

Where the defendant's acts compelled the plaintiff to reduce his price, such loss is an item of damage; 43 Fed. Rep. 72.

It is said that any attempt to classify the reported cases on damages would be futile; Rob. Pat. § 1061.

The statute of limitation is six years prior to the filing of the bill of complaint or the issuing of a writ at law; Act of March 3, 1897 (in effect January 1, 1898).

It is the province of the court to define the patented invention, as indicated by the language of the claims; and of the jury to determine whether, as so defined, it covers the defendant's article; 155 U. S. 565.

If one is employed to devise or perfect an instrument or a means for accomplishing a prescribed result, he cannot, after successfully accomplishing the work for which he was employed, plead title thereto as against his employer. What he accomplishes becomes the property of the employer. He has sold it in advance to him. So when one is in the employ of another in a certain line of work and devises an improved instrument for that work and uses the property of his employer and the services of other employees to develop and put in practical form his invention, a jury or court is warranted in finding that the benefits resulting from his use of the property and the assistance of the co-employees of his employer have given to such employer an irrevocable license to use the invention; 180 U. S. 342; 150 id. 430; 1 How. 202; 160 U. S. 426. But a railroad company is not entitled to the use of an invention of its master mechanic, when none of the company's material or labor entered into the perfecting of the invention or was devoted to its construction until after the patent had issued; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 322.

Patents can be granted to United States officers, except those in the patent office, without any fee, when the invention is used or to be used in the public service, but the patentee must file a stipulation, which must be inserted in the patent, that the invention may be used by the government and its officers in public work or by any other person in the United States; Act of March 3, 1883.

In patent cases, costs will not be awarded to complainant, where some of the claims sued on are withdrawn at the argument, and others are adjudged not infringed, although the decree is in favor as to others still; 71 Fed. Rep. 886.

Jurisdiction of cases under the patent laws. The act of 1870, § 55, gives original jurisdiction to circuit courts of the United States and to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, or of any territory, in all cases arising under the laws of the United States granting exclusive privileges to inventors. This act was amended by giving this jurisdiction to the court of appeals of the District of Columbia and abolishing that of the supreme court of the District. This jurisdiction extends both to law and equity, and is irrespective of the citizenship of the parties or the amount in controversy. The jurisdiction of the federal courts is exclusive of that of the state courts; 3 N. Y. 9; 40 Me. 430. But this is to be understood of cases arising directly under the acts of congress, and not of those where the patent comes collaterally in question: as, for instance, where it is the subject-matter of a contract or the consideration of a promissory note; 3 McLean 525; 1 W. & M. 84; 16 Conn. 409. Hence a bill to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale of a patent-right is not such a case arising under the patent laws as gives jurisdiction to the federal courts; 10 How. 477; 140 U. S. 344. A contract relating to a patent does not necessarily involve a federal question; 125 U. S. 46, 54; 140 id. 344. For the requirements of a bill on a patent, see 121 U. S. 484. If a bill is filed so near the expiration of a patent that, under the rules, there could be no injunction, it will be dismissed; but if one could be obtained, though only three days before the expiration, the court may retain jurisdiction and proceed, with or without an injunction; 119 U. S. 322.

The expiration of a patent pending a suit for infringement does not defeat the jurisdiction of a court of equity, although it is a reason for denying an injunction which was the basis of equity jurisdiction; 122 U. S. 71; 119 id. 322. A bill is not maintainable when filed only a few days before the patent expired; 84 Fed. Rep. 344.

Patent-right, note given for a. In many of the states, laws have been passed making void all notes given in consideration of a patent-right unless the words "given for a patent-right" are prominently written on the face of the note. These laws have been decided to be unconstitutional in 37 Mich. 809; 70 Ill. 109; 23 Minn. 24; 25 Fed. Rep. 394; 2 Biss. 311; 2 Flipp. 83; 14 Neb. 134; contra, 109 N. Y. 127; 106 Ind. 385. The property in inventions exists by virtue of the laws of congress, and no state has a right to interfere with its enjoyment or annex conditions to the grant; 2 Biss. 314; 4 Bush 311. In Pennsylvania, however, a distinction has been made, the statute of April 12, 1872, requiring the insertion of the words "given for a patent-right," merely having the effect of making the note or instrument in the hands of a purchaser subject to the same defence as if in the hands of the original owner or holder. By necessary implication, notes without such words inserted in them remain on the same footing as before the act, and innocent holders, who take such notes without notice, take them clear of all equities existing between the original parties. And in several cases these acts have been sustained as constitutional; 36 Ohio St. 370; 116 Ind. 118, 502; 109 N. Y. 127; 93 Pa. 373.

As between the original parties to a note given for a patent-right, it is well settled that it is a good defence to show that the alleged patent was void, and therefore there was no consideration; 18 Pa. 465. All who take with notice of the consideration, take subject to same defence; id.; 93 Pa. 373. Sharswood, J., held that there was nothing in this view which interfered with any just right of the holder of a valid patent under the acts of congress, nor in permitting the maker to show, against a holder with such notice, that the note was obtained by fraudulent misrepresentation; 86 Pa. 173. An innocent purchaser of a note is not affected by the act; 93 Pa. 373; 118 Ind. 588; 83 Tenn. 705. If the patent is void; 124 Mass. 523; or the patented article is useless; 42 Nev. 97; 40 Ind. 1; the note is void.

To secure the insertion of the words, some acts make it a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both, for any person "knowing the consideration of a note" to be the sale of a patent-right, to sell or transfer it without the words "given for a patent-right" inserted, as provided by the act; 26 Am. Rep. 514; 23 Minn. 24; 53 Ind. 454; 54 id. 270.

On the expiration of patents on the "Singer" sewing-machine, under which name it came to indicate a type of machine made by that company, the right to make the patented article and use the generic name passed to the public, but one using the name in selling such type of machines may be compelled to indicate that the articles made by him are his product and not the product of the owners of the extinct patent; 163 U. S. 169.

See CAVEAT; EXPERT; EXTENSION OF PATENTS; INFRINGEMENT; LIBEL. NEW. VEND AND VENDING.

PATENT AMBIGUITY. An ambiguity which appears upon the face of an instrument.

An uncertainty or question between two meanings of language which arises on bare inspection of the words themselves. Abbott. See AMBIGUITY. It is a settled rule that extrinsic evidence is not admissible to explain such an ambiguity. The general rule on the subject is thus stated in 2 Eng. Rul. Cas. 707: "Where a legal relation is sought to be established by means of a written instrument, if an uncertainty of intention appear by the expression of the instrument itself, the true intention cannot be ascertained by the aid of extrinsic evidence. For, as said by Lord Bacon (Maxims, Reg. 23), 'ambiguitas patens cannot be holpen by averment.'" 5 Bing. N. C. 425; s. c. 8 L. J. C. P. 227. LATENT AMBIGUITY.

PATENT MEDICINE. The word "patent" as used in connection with medicines does not mean that the article is patented but that it is proprietary; and there is no fraud on the public in using the word in that sense, although the article has been patented. 221 U. S. 263.

PATENT OFFICE. The office through which applications for letters patent for inventions, etc., are made, and from which those letters patent emanate. Some provision for the purpose of issuing patents is, of course, found in every country where the system of granting patents for inventions prevails; but nowhere else is there an establishment which is organized in all respects on the same scale as the United States Patent Office.

By the act of 1790, the duty of transacting this business was devolved upon the secretary of state, the secretary of war, and the attorney-general. In the provision for a board for this purpose found in the act of 1798 the secretary of war is omitted. From that time during a period of more than forty years all the business connected with the granting of patents was transacted by a clerk in the office of the secretary of state, the duties of the secretary in this respect being little more than nominal, and the attorney-general acting only as a legal adviser.

The act of July 14, 1836, reorganized the office and gave it a new and higher position. A commissioner of patents was constituted. Provision was made for a library, which has since become one of the finest of the kind in the country.

The act of 1870 provides for the appointment by the President of one commissioner, one assistant commissioner and three examiners-in-chief. Other officers are appointed by the secretary of the interior, in whose department the patent office is, upon the nomination of the commissioner.

The patent office is an office of record, in which assignments of patents are recordable, and the record is notice to all the world of the facts to be found on record. Under section 4 of the act of 1793, an assignment was not valid unless recorded in the office of the secretary of state; 4 Blackf. 183. See PATENT.

PATENT OFFICE, EXAMINERS IN. Officials in the United States Patent Office, whose duty it is to determine whether the subject-matter of applications for letters patent is such as to entitle the applicant to the grant of such letters. See PATENT OFFICE.

PATENT WRIT. A writ not closed or sealed up. Jacob, Law Dict.; Co. Litt. 289; 7 Co. 20.

PATENTEE. He to whom a patent has been granted. The term is usually applied to one who has obtained letters patent for an invention. See PATENT.

PATENTES BREVIA. Open, or patent writs. Taylor. See PATENT WRIT, APERTA BREVIA.

PATER (Lat.). Father. The term is frequently used in genealogical tables.

PATER-FAMILIAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who was sui juris, and not subject to the paternal power.

In order to give a correct idea of what was understood in the Roman law by this term, it is proper to refer briefly to the artificial organization of the Roman family,—the greatest moral phenomenon in the history of the human race. The comprehensive term familia embraced both persons and property: money, lands, houses, slaves, children, all constituted part of this artificial family, this juridical entity, this legal patrimony, the title to which was exclusively vested in the chief or pater-familias, who alone was capax domini, and who belonged to himself, sui juris.

The word pater-familias is by no means equivalent to the modern expression father of a family, but means proprietor in the strongest sense of that term: it is he qui in domo dominium habet, in whom were centred all property, all power, all authority: he was, in a word, the lord and master, whose authority was unlimited. No one but he who was sui juris, who was pater-familias, was capable of exercising any right of property, or wielding any superiority or power over anything; for nothing could belong to him who was himself, as well as those of slaves, of the children of the filius familias, alieni juris. Hence the children of the filius familias, alieni juris. In the same manner, everything that was acquired by the sons or slaves formed a part of the familia, and, consequently, belonged to the chief. This absolute property and power of the pater-familias, only ceased with his life, unless he voluntarily parted with them, by a sale; for the alienation by sale is invariably the symbol resorted to for the purpose of dissolving the stern dominion of the paterfamilias over those belonging to the familia. Thus, both emancipation and adoption are the results of imaginary sales, per imaginarias venditiones. As to the daughter, remaining in the family of her father, grandfather, or great-grandfather, as the case might be, notwithstanding her marriage, it followed as a necessary consequence that the child never belonged to the same family as its mother; there is no civil relationship between them; they are not civil agnates, agnati, but they are not legally related to each other, agnati, and therefore the child never inherits from its mother, nor the mother from her child. There was, however, a means by which the wife might enter into the family and subject herself to the power of her husband, in manu mariti, and thereby establish a legal relationship between herself and her husband. This marital power of the husband over the wife was generally acquired either coemptively, by the purchase of the wife by the husband from the paterfamilias, or usu, by the prescription based on the possession of one year, the same by which the title to movable property was acquired according to the principles governing the usucapio (law, usucapere, to obtain by use). Another mode of obtaining the same result was the confarreatio, a sacred ceremony performed by the breaking and eating of a small cake, farreum, by the married couple. It was supposed that by an observance of this ceremony the marital power was produced by the use of high words, and the solemnity of the ceremony, celebrating marriages was peculiar to the patrician families. By means of these fictions and ceremonies the wife became in the eye of the law the daughter of her husband, and the sister of the children to whom she gave birth, who would otherwise have been strangers to her. Well might Gaius say: Fere nulli ulli sunt homines qui talem in liberis habeant potestatem qualem nos habemus.

There is some similarity between the agnatio, or civil relationship of the Romans, and the transmission of the name of the father, under the modern law, to all his descendants in the male line. The Roman law says of the children, patris, non matris, familiam sequuntur; we say, patris, non matris, nomen sequuntur. At the moment of the family who, with us, bear the same name, were under that law agnates, or constituted the agnatio, or civil family. Those children only belonged to the family, and were subject to the paternal power, who had been conceived in justa nuptia, or been adopted. Nuptiae, or matrimonium, was a marriage celebrated in conformity with the peculiar rules of the civil law. There existed a second kind of marriage, called concubinatus, a valid union and a real marriage, which has been often improperly confounded, even by high authority, with concubinatus. This confusion of ideas is attributable to a superficial examination of the subject; for the illicit intercourse between a man and a woman which we call concubinatus was stigmatized by the opprobrious term stuprum by the Romans, and is spoken of in the strictest terms of reprohibition. Concubinatus was the natural marriage, and the only one which those who did not enjoy the jus connubii were permitted to contract. The Roman law recognized two species of marriage, the one civil, and the other natural, in the same manner as there were two kinds of relationship, the agnatio and cognatio. The justa nuptiae or justum matrimonium, or civil marriage, could only be contracted by Roman citizens and by those to whom the jus connubii had been conceded; this kind of marriage alone produced the paternal power, the right of inheritance, etc.

But the rapid rise and extraordinary greatness of the city attracted immense crowds of strangers, who, not possessing the jus connubii, could form no other union than the concubinatus, which, though authorized by law, did not give rise to those legal effects which flowed from the justa nuptiae. By adoption, the person adopted was transferred from one family to another; he passed from the paternal power of his paterfamilias to that of another; consequently no one who was sui juris could be adopted in the strict sense of that word. But there was another species of adoption, called adrogatio, by which a person sui juris entered into another family, and subjected himself to the paternal power of its chief. The effect of the adrogatio was not confined to the person adrogated alone, but extended over his family and property. 1 Marcade 75.

This extraordinary organization of the Roman family, and the unlimited powers and authority vested in the paterfamilias, continued until the reign of Justinian, who by his 118th Novel, enacted on the 9th of August, 544, abolished the distinction between the agnatio and cognatio, and established the order of inheritance which, with some modifications, continues to exist at the present day in all countries whose jurisprudence is based on the civil law. See Malin, Anc. L. Ch. 5; Gens; PATERNA POTESTAS.

PATERNA PATERNIS (Lat. the father's to the father's). In French Law. An expression used to signify that, in a succession, the property coming from the father of the deceased descends to his paternal relations.

PATERNAL. That which belongs to the father or comes from him: as paternal power, paternal relation, paternal estate, paternal line. See LINE.

PATERNAL POWER. The authority lawfully exercised by parents over their children. See FATHER.

PATERNAL PROPERTY. That which descends or comes from the father and other ascendants or collaterals of the paternal stock. Domat, Liv. Prel. tit. 8, s. 2, n. 11.

PATERNITY. The state or condition of a father.

The husband is prima facie presumed to be the father of his wife's children born during coverture or within a competent time afterwards; pater est quem nuptiae demonstrant; 7 Mart. La. N. s. 558. So if the child is en ventre sa mere at time of marriage; Co. Litt. 128; 8 East 192. In civil law the presumption holds in case of a child born before marriage as well as after; 1 Bla. Com. 446, 454; Fleta, lib. 1, c. 6. In cases of marriage of a widow within ten months after decease of husband, the paternity is to be decided by circumstances; Hargrave, note to Co. Litt. § 188. Marriage within ten months after decease of husband was forbidden by Roman, Danish, and Saxon law and English law before the Conquest; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 481; Brooke, Abr. Bastardy, pl. 18; Palm. 10; 1 Bla. Com. 456.

The presumption of paternity may always be rebutted by showing circumstances which render it impossible that the husband can be the father; 6 Binn. 283; 8 East 198; Stra. 51, 940; 2 Myl. & K. 349; 8 Paige, Ch. 139; 1 S. & S. 150; T. & R. 138.

The declarations of one or both of the spouses, however, cannot affect the condition of a child born during the marriage; 7 Mart. La. N. s. 553; 3 Paige, Ch. 139. See ACCESS; BASTARD; BASTARDY; LEGITIMACY; PREGNANCY.

PATHOLOGY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The science or doctrine of diseases. In cases of homicides, abortions, and the like, it is of great consequence to the legal practitioner to be acquainted in some degree with pathology. 2 Chitty, Pr. 42, n.

PATIBULUM. A gallows or gibbet. Fleta, l. 2, c. 3, § 8.

PATRIA (Lat.). The country; the men of the neighborhood competent to serve on a jury; a jury. This word is nearly synonymous with pais, which see.

PATRIA POTESTAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The paternal power; the authority which the law vests in the father over the persons and property of his legitimate children.

One of the effects of marriage is the paternal authority over the children born in wedlock. In the early period of the Roman history, the paternal authority was unlimited; the father had the absolute control over his children, and might even, as the domestic magistrate of his family, condemn them to death. They could acquire nothing except for the benefit of the paterfamilias; and they were even liable to be sold and reduced to slavery by the father of their existence. But in the progress of civilization this stern rule was gradually relaxed.

There are several instances given in which the emperors interfered to moderate the severity of fathers, and the power to kill the child was restricted and finally abolished during the empire. The father could originally abandon his male child to relieve himself of responsibility for it, but this was forbidden by the institutions. Inst. 4, 8, 7. Over the property of the child the rights of the father were as absolute as over that of the slave; but this power was also moderated under the emperors until in the time of Justinian it was practically destroyed. The power of the paterfamilias extended to all descendants in the male line, and it was not lost even over those who held the highest offices in the state or became victorious generals.

The children of a daughter were not subject to the paternal authority of her own father but entered into the family of her husband. The paternal power was never exercised by a woman even if she were herself sui juris. It is for this reason, Ulpian observes, that the family of which a woman, sui juris, was the head, mater familias, commenced and ended with her: mater autem familie sua et caput et finis est. 1 Ortolan 191.

See PATER FAMILIAS.

The modern civil law has hardly preserved any features of the old Roman jurisprudence concerning the paternal power.

The Louisiana code provides that a child owes honor, respect, and obedience to the parents, but even the power of correction ceases with the age of puberty, and boys at fourteen and girls at twelve years of age may leave the paternal roof in opposition to the will of their parents. By modern law the paternal authority is vested in both parents, but usually exercised by the father alone. During the marriage the parents are entitled to the property of the minor children, subject to the obligation of support and education, paying taxes, repairs, etc.

The paternal power ceases with the death of one spouse and is succeeded by tutelage, which, however, usually devolves upon the surviving parent, who can also at death appoint a testamentary tutor.

PATRICIDE. One guilty of killing his father. See PARRICIDE.

PATRIMONIAL. A thing which comes from the father, and, by extension, from the mother or other ancestor.

PATRIMONIUM. In Civil Law. That which is capable of being inherited.

Things capable of being possessed by a single person exclusively of all others, in the Roman or civil law, said to be in patrimonium; when incapable of being so possessed, they are extra patrimonium.

Most things may be inherited; but there are some which are said to be extra patrimonium, or which are not in commerce. These are such as are common, as the light of heaven, the air, the sea, and the like; things public, as rivers, harbors, roads, creeks, ports, arms of the sea, the sea-shore, highways, bridges, and the like; things which belong to cities and municipal corporations, as public squares, streets, market-houses, and the like. See 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 421.

PATRIMONY. Any kind of property. Such estate as has descended in the same family; estates which have descended or been devised in a direct line from the father, and, by extension, from the mother or other ancestor. It has been held that the word is not necessarily restricted to property inherited directly from the father. 5 Ir. Ch. Rep. 625.

PATRINUS (Lat.). A godfather.

PATRON. In Ecclesiastical Law. He who has the disposition and gift of an ecclesiastical benefice.

In Roman Law. The former master of a freedman. Dig. 2, 4, 8, 1.

PATRONAGE. The right of appointing to office; as, the patronage of the President of the United States, if abused, may endanger the liberties of the people.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The right of presentation to a church or ecclesiastical benefice. 2 Bla. Com. 21.

PATRONIZE. To act as patron towards. The occupants of a house cannot be said to patronize it; 9 Bradw. 344. See 48 N. Y. 472.

PATRONUS (Lat.). In Roman Law. A modification of the Latin word pater, father. A denomination applied by Romulus to the first senators of Rome, and which they always afterwards bore.

Romulus at first appointed a hundred of them. Seven years afterward, in consequence of the association of Tatius to the Roman throne, more were appointed, chosen from the Sabines. Tarquinius Priscus increased the number to three hundred. Those appointed by Romulus and Tatius were called pater majorum gentium, and the others were called pater minorum gentium. Tatius and their descendants constituted the nobility of Rome. The rest of the people were called plebeians, every one of whom was obliged to choose one of these fathers as his patron. The relation thus constituted involved important consequences. The plebeian, who was called cliens (a client), was obliged to furnish the means of maintenance to his chosen patron, to furnish a portion for his patron's daughters, to ransom him and his sons if captured by an enemy, and pay all sums recovered against him by judgment of the courts. The patron, on the other hand, was obliged to watch over the interests of his client, whether present or absent, to protect his person and property, and especially to defend him in all actions brought against him for any cause. Neither could accuse or bear testimony against the other, or give contrary votes, etc. The contract was of a sacred nature; the violation of it was a sort of treason, and punishable as such. According to Cicero (De Repub. ii. 9), this relation formed an integral part of the governmental system. Et habuit plebem in clientum principum descriptum, which he affirms was eminently useful. Blackstone traces the system of vassalage to this ancient relation of patron and client. It was, in fact, of the same nature as the feudal institutions of the middle ages, designed to maintain order in a rising state by a combination of the opposing interests of the aristocracy and of the common people, upon the principle of reciprocal bonds for mutual interests. Ultimately, by force of radical changes in the institution, the word patronus came to signify nothing more than an advocate.

PATROON. In New York. The lord of a manor. See MANOR.

PATRUELIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. A cousin-german by the father's side; the son or daughter of a father's brother. Dig. 38, 10, 1.

PATRUUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An uncle by the father's side; a father's brother. Dig. 88. 10. 10. Patruus magnus is a grandfather's brother, grand-uncle. Patruus major is a great-grandfather's brother. Patruus maximus is a great-grandfather's father's brother.

PAUPER (Lat. poor). One so poor that he must be supported at the public expense.

A laboring man, who has always been able to make a living, and who, until his last sickness, has never had occasion to ask or receive charity, is not a pauper, although without money or property with which to pay the expense of that sickness; 21 Nev. 415. See 16 Viner, Abr. 259; Botta's Poor-Laws; Woodf. Landl. & T. 201.

Before a person can be admitted to sue or defend as a pauper, proof must be given that he is not worth £25, his wearing apparel and the subject-matter of the cause or matter only excepted. He is exempt from court fees. Counsel may be assigned to him, and no fees can be taken from him. Brett, Comm. 681. See POOR; IMMOBILITY.

PAUPERIES (Lat.). In Civil Law. Poverty. In a technical sense, Dammum absque injuria: i. e. a damage done without wrong on the part of the doer: e. g. damage done by an irrational being, as an animal. L. 1, § 3, D. si quod paup. fec.; Calvinus, Lex.

PAVE. To cover with stone, brick, concrete, or any other substantial matter, making a smooth and level surface. 60 N. Y. 22.

To lay or cover with stone, brick, or other material, so as to make a firm, level, or convenient surface for horses, carriages, or persons on foot to travel on. It means as well to cover with asphalt or concrete, as to lay or cover with stone; 110 Mo. 502.

The laying of a cross walk comes within the general designation of paving; 62 N. Y. 224; paving includes flagging, as well as other modes of making a smooth surface for streets and sidewalks; 76 N. Y. 181; 66 Hun 179. A footway made up with gravel, but not paved with stone or flags is a pavement; 15 Q. B. D. 652; 54 L. J. M. C. 147. To pave a street has been held not to include curbing and sidewalks; 9 Wash. 272.

Power to pave a street may include, as not unusual, macadamizing and making gutters; Id., 31 Iowa 36. Also, raising and lowering parts of the street. Id.; 20 How. 147. But an order to grade a street does not authorize macadamizing it. Id.; 33 Minn. 164.

PAVIAGE. A contribution or tax for paving streets or highways.

PAWN. A pledge. A pledge includes, in Louisiana, a pawn and an antichresis; but sometimes pawn is used as the general word, including pledge and antichresis. La. Civ. Code, art. 3101; Hennen, Dig. Pledge. See PLEDGE.

PAWNBROKER. One whose business it is to lend money, usually in small sums, upon pawn or pledge. An ordinance requiring pawnbrokers to keep a book in which shall be entered a description of all property left in pawn, with the name and description of the pledgor and to submit such book to the inspection of the mayor or any police officer on demand, is a valid police regulation; 81 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 101; 111 Ill. 291. And one forbidding them to purchase certain specified articles is not unreasonable as imposing upon pawnbrokers a penalty for doing that which is lawful for other persons to do, as a city may not only regulate their business, but suppress and prohibit it; 30 Ill. App. 208.

An ordinance requiring pawnbrokers to take out a license is not authorized by a statute empowering city councils to make by-laws and ordinances not inconsistent with the laws of the state and necessary to carry out the object of the corporation;

127 Ind. 109. See 78 Ga. 773; 24 S. E. Rep. (N. C.) 526; LICENSE; ORDINANCE; POLICE POWER.

PAWNEE. He who receives a pawn or pledge. See PLEDGE.

PAWNOR. One who, being liable to an engagement, gives to the person to whom he is liable a thing to be held as a security for the payment of his debt or the fulfillment of his liability. 2 Kent 577. See PLEDGE.

PAX REGIS (Lat.). That peace or security for life and goods which the king promises to all persons under his protection. Bract. lib. 3, c. 11. See PEACE.

In ancient times there were certain limits which were known by this name. The pax regis, or verge of the court, as it was afterwards called, extended from the palace-gate to the distance of three miles, three furlongs, three acres, nine feet, nine palms, and nine barleycorns; Crabb. C. L. 41; or from the four sides of the king's residence, four miles, three furlongs, nine acres in breadth, nine feet, nine barleycorns, etc.; LL. Edw. Conf. c. 12, et LL. Hen. I.

PAY. To discharge a debt, to deliver a creditor the value of a debt, either in money or in goods, to his acceptance, by which the debt is discharged. 36 N. Y. 527. See 1 Cush. 76.

To pay, as usually understood, means to deliver money, this is, however, not necessarily involved. The word does, however, imply a delivery of value, and that it is the value called for by the engagement to be discharged. For, when that engagement calls for something else than a simple delivery of value, performance is the proper term; and when something else than what it calls for is delivered and accepted, this is a compromise, or a discharge, but "pay" does not apply. Abbott.

To pay is to deliver a creditor the value of a debt, either in money or in goods, to his acceptance, by which the debt is discharged. Id.; 36 N. Y. 522. The word implies an indebtedness. Id.; 15 Barb. 274. The word does not necessarily import a discharge of the obligation by money. To pay is to discharge an obligation by a performance according to its terms or requirements: if the obligation be for money, the payment is made in money; if for merchandise or labor, a delivery of the merchandise or a performance of the labor is payment; or if for the erection of a building, performance according to the terms of the contract is payment. The assent of insurers to an indorsement upon a policy of the words, "pay the loss to T." does not impair their right, if the policy so allows, to discharge their obligation by replacing the property insured, instead of paying its value. Id.; 1 Cush. 73.

As Used in a Will. The words "to pay" have been construed to be effective words to give an immediate interest in the estate. 110 Ky. 889, 62 S. W. 1036.

See ALL BACK PAY AND EMOLUMENTS.

PAY. A fixed and definite amount given by law to persons in military service in consideration of and as compensation for their personal services. 1d Ct. Cl. 496. See LONGEVITY PAY.

Payable in trade. Payable in such article as the promisor deals in. 114 Mass. 84.

Payable as convenient. A phrase which can be construed only as an extension of credit. 120 Mass. 171.

PAYABLE. Dischargeable by delivery of an equivalent in value, usually in money; also, due in present time; matured. Anderson.

PAYEE. The person in whose favor a bill of exchange is made payable. See BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

PAYMENT. The fulfillment of a promise, or the performance of an agreement. The discharge in money of a sum due.

It implies the existence of a debt, of a party to whom it is owed, and of a satisfaction of the debt to that party; 58 Conn. 176.

The word payment is not a technical term: it has been imported into legal proceedings from the exchange, and not from law treatises. When payment is pleaded as a defence, the defendant must prove the payment of money, or something accepted in its stead, made to the plaintiff or to some person authorized in his behalf to receive it; 2 Greenl. Ev. 309.

Payment, in its most general acceptance, is the accomplishment of every obligation, whether it consists in giving or in doing; solutio est præstatio ejus quod in obligatione est.

It follows, therefore, that every act which, while it extinguishes the obligation, has also for its object the release of the debtor and his exemption from liability, is not payment. Payment is doing precisely what the payer has agreed to do. Solvitur dictum cum qui fecit quod facere promisi.

However, practically, the name of payment is often given to methods of release which are not accompanied by the performance of the thing promised. Restitutio in solutio ad compensationem, ad novationem, ad delegationem, et ad numerationem.

In a more restricted sense, payment is the discharge in money of a sum due. Numeratio est nummaria solutio. 5 Mass. Droit commercial 228. That a payment may extinguish a debt, it must be made by a person who has a right to make it, to a person who is entitled to receive it, in something proper to be received both as to kind and quality, and at the appointed place and time.

In the civil law, it is said, where payment is something to be done, it must be done by the debtor himself. If I hire a mechanic to build a steam engine for me, he cannot against my will substitute in his stead another workman. Where it is something to be given, the general rule is that it can be paid by any one, whether a co-obligor, or surety, or even a third person who has no interest; except that in this last case subrogation will prevent the extinction of the debt as to the debtor, unless the payer at the time of payment act in the name of the debtor, or in his own name to release the debtor. See SUBROGATION.

What constitutes payment. According to Comyns, payment by merchants must be made in money or by bill; Com. Dig. Merchant (F).

It is now the law that payment must be made in money, unless the obligation is, by the terms of the instrument creating it, to be discharged by other means. In the United States, congress has, by the constitution, power to decide what shall be a legal tender; that is, in what form the creditor may demand his payment or must receive it if offered; and congress has determined this by statutes. The same power is exercised by the government of all civilized countries. As to the medium of payment in the United States, see LEGAL TENDER.

In England, Bank of England notes are legal tender. But the creditors may waive this right, and anything which he has accepted as satisfaction for the debt will be considered as payment. What the parties agree shall constitute payment, the law will adjust to be payment; 115 Ind. 525.

A debt contracted in a foreign country is payable in the currency of that country, and therefore, where the creditor sues in the United States, he is entitled to recover such sum in the money of the United States as equals the debt in the foreign country where it was payable; 34 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 78. Where rent is payable in coin, its value is to be estimated at the market price of the coin at the time and place of payment; 153 Ill. 207. See GOLD.

Upon a plea of payment, the defendant may prove a discharge in bank-notes, negotiable notes of individuals, or a debt already due from the payee, delivered and accepted or discounted as payment; Phil. Ev. Cowen & H. ed. n. 387. Bank-notes, in conformity to usage and common understanding, are regarded as cash; 1 Burr. 452; 9 Johns. 120; 6 Md. 37; unless objected to; 1 Metc. Mass. 356; 8 Ohio 169; 10 Me. 475; 2 Cr. & J. 16, n.; 5 Yerg. 199; 3 Humphr. 162; 6 Ala. n. s. 226. Treasury notes are not cash; 3 Conn. 534. Giving a check is not considered as payment; the holder may treat it as a nullity if he derives no benefit from it, provided he has not been guilty of negligence so as to cause injury to the drawer; 2 B. & P. 518; 4 Ad. & E. 953; 4 Johns. 296; 80 N. H. 256; 78 Cal. 15. See 17 R. 1. 746; 8 Misc. Rep. 535; 4 Tex. Civ. App. 535; 89 Minn. 340; 101 N. C. 589; 59 Mo. App. 610. But see 14 How. 240. Giving a check is a conditional payment, and the debt is discharged only when the check is paid, unless it was agreed that the check should be received in satisfaction of the debt; 76 Hun 194.

Payment in forged bills is generally a nullity, both in England and this country; 10 Wheat. 333; 3 Johns. 465; 6 Hill. N. Y. 340; 7 Leigh 617; 3 Hawks 568; 4 Gill & J. 463; 11 Ill. 187; 3 Pa. 330; 5 Conn. 71. So also of counterfeit coin; but an agreement to sell goods and accept specific money is good, and payment in these coins is valid even though they be counterfeit; 1 Term 325; 14 S. & R. 51. The forged notes must be returned in a reasonable time, to throw the loss upon the debtor; 7 Leigh 617; 11 Ill. 187. Payment to a bank in its own notes which are received and afterwards discovered to be forged is a good payment; 2 Parsons, Contr. 623, n. A forged check received as cash and passed to the credit of the customer is good payment; 4 Dall. 284; 10 Vt. 141. Payment in bills of an insolvent bank, where both parties were innocent, has been held no payment; 7 Term 64; 13 Wend. 101; 11 Vt. 576; 9 N. H. 365; 22 Me. 85. On the other hand, it has been held good payment in 1 W. & S. 92; 6 Mass. 185; 12 Ala. 380; 3 Yerg. 175. See 121 U. S. 37. The point is still unsettled, and it is said to be a question of intention rather than of law; Story, Pr. Notes 125*, 477*, 641. The payment of bonds, secured by a mortgage, made in Confederate money during the Civil War is held to have been received in good faith, and if accepted and acquiesced in for a long time, a court of equity will not interfere; 145 U. S. 214.

If a bill of exchange or promissory note be given to a creditor and accepted as payment, it shall be a good payment; Benj. Sales 726; Com. Dig. Merchant (F); 30 N. H. 540; 37 Ala. n. s. 254; 18 Ill. 161; 2 Du. 133; 14 Ark. 267; 4 Rich. 600; 34 Me. 324. But regularly a bill of exchange or note given to a creditor shall not be a discharge of the debt till payment of the bill, unless so accepted; 1 Salk. 124.

If the debtor gives his own promissory note, it is held in England and the United States generally not to be payment, unless it be shown that it was so intended; 10 Pet. 567; 4 Mas. 336; 27 N. H. 244; 15 Johns. 347; 9 Conn. 23; 26 E. L. & E. 56.

And if payment be made in the note of a factor or agent employed to purchase goods, or intrusted with the money to be paid for them, if the note be received as payment it will be good in favor of the principal; 1 B. & Ald. 14; 7 B. & C. 17; but not if received conditionally; and this is a question of fact for the jury; 6 Cow. 181; 10 Wend. 271.

It is said that an agreement to receive the debtor's own note in payment must be expressed; 1 Cow. 359; 1 Wash. C. C. 328; 47 Minn. 207; 7 Ind. App. 1; and when so expressed it extinguishes the debt; 5 Wend. 85; 49 Ark. 508; 77 Ga. 463; but if such be not the express agreement of the parties, it only operates to extend the period of the payment of the debt; 131 U. S. 287. Whether there was such an agreement is a question for the jury; 9 Johns. 310; 131 U. S. 287. Acceptance of an indorsed note of a debtor in payment for goods sold, merges and extinguishes the original debt; 6 Misc. Rep. 77. See 115 Ind. 512. But the giving of a void note for an indebtedness does not pay it; 29 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 406.

A bill of exchange drawn on a third person and accepted discharges the debt as to the drawer; 10 Mod. 37; and in an action to recover the price of goods, in England, payment by a bill not dishonored has been held a good defence; 4 Esp. Cas. 46; 1 M. & M. 28; 4 Bingh. 454; 5 Maule & S. 62.

Retaining a draft on a third party an unreasonable length of time will operate as payment if loss be occasioned thereby; 13 S. & R. 318; 2 Wash. C. C. 191; Ans. Contr. 359. The receipt of a draft, in the absence of an express agreement, does not constitute a payment of the debt for which the draft is drawn; 92 Ga. 511. See 62 Hun 576.

In the sale of a chattel, if the note of a third person be accepted for the price, it is good payment; 8 Cow. 272; 1 D. & B. 201. Not so, however, if the note be the promise of one of the partners in payment of a partnership debt; 4 Dev. 91, 460.

In Maine and Massachusetts, the presumption where a negotiable note is taken, whether it be the debtor's promise or that of a third person, is that it is intended as payment; 6 Mass. 143; 8 Me. 296; 37 id. 419. The fact that a note was usurious and void was allowed to overcome this presumption; 11 Mass. 361. Generally, the question will depend upon the fact whether the payment was to have been made in notes or the receiving them was a mere accommodation to the purchaser; 17 Mass. 1. And the presumption never attaches where non-negotiable notes are given; 15 Me. 340.

Payment may be made through the intervention of a third party who acts as the agent of both parties; as, for example, a stakeholder. If the money be deposited with him to abide the event of a legal wager, neither party can claim it until the wager is determined, and then he is bound to pay it to the winner; 4 Campb. 37. If the wager is illegal, the depositor may reclaim the money at any time before it is paid over; 8 B. & C. 221; 29 E. L. & E. 424. And at any time after notice given in such case he may hold the stakeholder responsible, even though he may have paid it over; see 2 Pars. Contr. 138.

An auctioneer is often a stakeholder, as in case of money deposited to be made over to the vendor if a good title is made out. In such case the purchaser cannot reclaim except on default in receiving a clear title. But if the contract has been rescinded by the parties there need be no notice to the stakeholder in case of a failure to perform the condition; 2 M. & W. 244; 1 M. & R. 614.

A payment of a debt by a stranger without the debtor's request, if accepted as such by the creditor, discharges the debt so far as the creditor is concerned, and also as to the debtor, if he ratify it; 38 W. Va. 390.

A transfer of funds, called by the civil-law phrase a payment by delegation, is payment only when completely effected; 2 Pars. Contr. 137; and an actual transfer of claim or credit assented to by all the parties is a good payment; 2 id.; 5 B. & Ald. 228; 7 N. H. 345, 397; 17 Mass. 400. This seems to be very similar to payment by drawing and acceptance of a bill of exchange.

Where a purchaser contracts to pay a certain amount in printing, the seller cannot enforce the collection of such amount in cash, as a profit presumably attaches to the printing; 7 Wash. 316; unless, of course, the party declines to pay in printing.

Foreclosure of a mortgage given to secure a debt operates as payment made when the foreclosure is complete; but if the property mortgaged does not produce a sum equal in value to the amount of the debt then due, it is payment pro tanto only; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 324; 3 Mass. 562; 2 Gall. 152; 3 Mass. 474; 10 Pick. 396; 11 Wend. 106. A transfer of a worthless mortgage in payment of a debt, does not discharge the debt where neither party at the time of the transfer knew that the mortgage was worthless; 75 Hun 445. A legacy also is payment, if the intention of the testator that it should be so considered can be shown, and if the debt was liquidated at the death of the testator; 1 Esp. 187; 12 Mass. 391; 5 Cow. 368; 61 Vt. 110. See LEGACY.

When money is sent by letter, even though the money is lost, it is good payment, and the debtor is discharged, if he was expressly authorized or directed by the creditor so to send it, or if such authority can be presumed from the course of trade; Benj. Sales 727; 11 M. & W. 238; and in the case of an insurance premium, such premium is paid when the letter containing it is deposited in the postoffice, addressed to the company; 77 Hun 556. But, even if the authority be given or inferred, at least ordinary diligence must be used by the debtor to have the money safely conveyed. See 3 Mass. 249; Ry. & M. 149; 1 Exch. 477.

Payment must be of the whole sum; and even where a receipt in full has been given for a payment of part of an ascertained sum, it has been held not to be an extinction of the debt; 5 Co. 117; 2 B. & C. 477; 3 N. H. 518; 11 Vt. 90; 37 Me. 361; 10 Ad. & E. 121; 4 Gill & J. 806; 9 Johns. 388; 11 How. 100.

But payment of part may be left to the jury as evidence that the whole has been paid; 5 Cra. 11; 8 N. H. 518; and payment of a part at a different time; 2 Metc. Mass. 283; or place; 3 Hawks 580; or in any way more beneficial to the creditor than that prescribed by the contract, is good; 15 M. & W. 23. Giving a chattel, though of less value than the debt, is a discharge; Dy. 75 a; 2 Litt. 49; 3 Barb. Ch. 621; or rendering certain services, with the consent of the creditor; 5 Day 359; or assigning certain property; 5 Johns. 386; 13 Mass. 424. So if a stranger pay a part, or give his note for a part, and this is accepted, it is a good payment of the debt; 4 B. & C. 500; 13 Ala. n. s. 353; 14 Wend. 116; 2 Metc. Mass. 283; 53 Minn. 88. And where a creditor by process of law compels the payment of a part of his claim, by a suit for that part only, this is generally a discharge of the whole; 11 S. & R. 78; 16 Johns. 121. See ACCORD.

The payment must have been accepted knowingly. Many instances are given in the older writers to illustrate acceptance; thus if the money is counted out, and the payee takes a part and puts it in a bag, this is a good payment, and if any be lost it is the payee's loss; 5 Mod. 898. Where A paid B £100 in redemption of a mortgage, and B bade C put it in his closet, and C did so, and A demanded his papers, which B refused to deliver, and A demanded back his money, and B directed C to give it to him, and C did, it was held to be a payment of the mortgage; Viner, Abr. Payment (E). When interest coupons on railroad bonds have been presented and paid at the usual place of payment, with money furnished by a third party, a private arrangement between such third party and the mortgagor that the transaction shall constitute a purchase of the coupons and not payment, will not be enforced against the bondholders; 138 Pa. 494. One who lends money to a company to take up its coupons, is not entitled to be paid out of funds in the hands of the receiver; 12 Bush 673.

Generally, there can be but little doubt as to acceptance or non-acceptance, and the question is one of fact for the jury to determine under the circumstances of each particular case. Of course where notes or bank-bills are given in payment of a debt, the evidence that they were so given is to be the same as evidence of any other fact relating to payment.

Evidence of payment. Evidence that any thing has been done and accepted as payment is evidence of payment.

A receipt is prima facie evidence of payment; but a receipt acknowledging the payment of ten dollars and acquitting and releasing from all obligations would be a receipt for ten dollars only; 5 B. & Ald. 696; 18 Pick. 325; 1 Edw. Ch. 341. And a receipt is only prima facie evidence of payment; 2 Taunt. 241; 7 Cow. 334; 4 Ohio 346; 18 Colo. 538. For cases explaining this rule, see, also, 2 Mas. 141; 11 Mass. 27; 9 Johns. 310; 4 H. & M. H. 219; 96 Ala. 496; 46 Ill. App. 121. And it may be shown that the particular sum stated in the receipt was not paid, and, also, that no payment has been made; 2 Term 366; 26 N. H. 12; 9 Conn. 401; 10 Humphr. 188; 13 Pa. 46. As against strangers thereto, a receipt is incompetent evidence of the payment thereby acknowledged; 41 Neb. 98. See RECEIPT.

Payment may be presumed by the jury in the absence of direct evidence; thus, possession by the debtor of a security after the day of payment, which security is usually given upon payment of the debt, is prima facie evidence of payment by the debtor; 1 Stark. 374; 9 S. & R. 385; 88 Tex. 385; 86 Neb. 741. See 87 Ill. App. 564.

If an acceptor produce a bill of exchange, this is said to afford in England no presumption of payment unless it is shown to have been in circulation after he accepted it; 2 Campb. 439. See, also, 14 M. & W. 379. But in the United States such possession is prima facie evidence of payment; 7 S. & R. 116; 4 Johns. 296; 2 Pick. 204. Payment is conclusively presumed from lapse of time. After twenty years' non-demand, unexplained, the court will presume a payment without the aid of a jury; 1 Campb. 27; 14 S. & R. 15; 6 Cow. 401; 2 Cra. 180; 112 Mo. 300; 152 Pa. 102; 65 Fed. Rep. 910. Facts which destroy the reason of this rule may rebut the presumption; 1 Pick. 60; 2 La. 481; 84 Me. 107; 23 Or. 313. See 34 S. C. 289; 50 Ark. 485; 73 Hun 177. And a jury may infer payment from a shorter lapse of time, especially if there be attendant circumstances favoring the presumption; 7 S. & R. 410. As to presumptions against the existence of the debt, see 5 Barb. 63. The statute of limitations does not apply to an action by a legatee to collect a legacy which is a charge on land, and no presumption of payment arises from the lapse of twenty years; 82 Wis. 393. Where an indebtedness is shown, it is presumed to remain unpaid until the contrary is shown; 56 Mo. App. 535.

In a suit to enforce a vendor's lien the acknowledgment of payment contained in the deed is only prima facie evidence of payment; 150 Ill. 212.

A presumption may rise from the course of dealing between the parties, or the regular course of trade; Tayl. Ev. 194. Thus, after two years it was presumed that a workman had been paid, as it was shown that the employer paid his workmen every Saturday night, and this man had been seen waiting among others; 1 Esp. 296. See, also, 3 Camp. 10.

A receipt for the last year's or quarter's rent is prima facie evidence of the payment of all the rents previously due; 2 Pick. 204. If the last instalment on a bond is paid in due form, it is evidence that the others have been paid; if paid in a different form, that the parties are acting under a new agreement.

Where receipts had been regularly given for the same amount, but for a sum smaller than was due by the agreement, it was held evidence of full payment; 4 Mart. La. 698.

Who may make payment. Payment may be made by the primary debtor, and by other persons from whom the creditor has a right to demand it.

An agent may make payment for his principal. An attorney may discharge the debt against his client; 5 Bingh. 506. One of any number of joint and several obligors, or one of several joint obligors, may discharge the debt; Viner, Abr. Payment (B). Payment may be made by a third person, a stranger to the contract.

It may be stated, generally, that any act done by any person in discharge of the debt, if accepted by the creditor, will operate as payment. In the civil law there are many exceptions to this rule, introduced by the operation of the principle of subrogation. Most of these have no application in the common law, but have been adopted, in some instances, as a part of the law merchant. See SUBROGATION; CONTRIBUTION.

To whom payment may be made. Payment is to be made to the creditor. But it may be made to an authorized agent. And if made in the ordinary course of business, without notice requiring the payment to be made to himself, it is binding upon the principal; 6 M. & G. 166; 4 B. & Ald. 895; 41 La. Ann. 1. Payment to a third person by appointment of the principal will be substantially payment to the principal; 1 Phill. Ev. 200. Payment to an agent who made the contract with the payee (without prohibition) is payment to the principal; 16 Johns. 86; 2 Gall. 565; 10 B. & C. 755. But payment may be made to the principal after authority given to an agent to receive; 6 Maule & S. 156. Payments made to an agent after the death of the principal do not discharge the debtor's obligation, even if made in ignorance of the principal's death; 150 U. S. 520. Payment to a broker or factor who sells for a principal not named is good; 11 East 36. Payment to an agent, when he is known to be such, will be good, if made upon the terms authorized; 11 East 36; if there be no notice not to pay to him; 3 B. & P. 485; 15 East 65; and even after notice, if the factor had a lien on the money when paid; 5 B. & Ald. 27. If the broker sells goods as his own, payment is good though the mode varies from that agreed on; 1 Maule & S. 147; 2 C. & P. 49. Bankers are not agents of the owner to receive payment of the notes by reason simply of the fact that the notes were made payable at their bank; and moneys left with them to be used as payment are not thereby the moneys of the owner of the notes; 134 U. S. 68.

Payment to an attorney is as effectual as payment to the principal himself; 2 Pars. Contr. 727; 102 Mich. 488. So, also, to a solicitor in chancery after a decree; 2 Ch. Cas. 38. The attorney of record may give a receipt and discharge the judgment; 1 Call 147; 1 Cox & 214; 1 Pick. 347; 10 Johns. 220; 2 Bibb 382; if made within one year; 1 Me. 257. Not so of an agent appointed by the attorney to collect the debt; 2 Dougl. 623. Payment by an officer to an attorney whose power has been revoked before the officer received the execution did not discharge the officer; 13 Mass. 465. See, also, 1 Des. Ch. 461. Payment to one of two co-partners discharges the debt; 8 Wend. 542; 2 Blackf. 371; 1 Ill. 107; 6 Maule & S. 156; 1 Wash. C. C. 77; even after dissolution; 4 C. & P. 108. And see 7 N. H. 566. So payment to one of two joint creditors is good, though they are not partners; 4 J. J. Marsh. 387. But payment by a banker to one of several joint depositors without the assent of the others was held a void payment; 1 M. & R. 145; 4 E. L. & E. 342.

Payment to the wife of the creditor is not a discharge of the debt, unless she is expressly or impliedly his agent; 2 Scott N. R. 372; 2 Freem. 178; 22 Me. 335; as to payment to the husband, see 66 Hun 633. One who purchases the property of a married woman through the agency of her husband, must pay for it precisely as if he had purchased through an agent who sustained no such relation; 116 Ind. 164. An auctioneer employed to sell real estate has no authority to receive the purchase-money by virtue of that appointment merely; 1 M. & R. 326. Usually, the terms of sale authorize him to receive the purchase-money; 5 M. & W. 645. Payment was made to a person sitting in the creditor's counting-room and apparently doing his business, and it was held good; 1 M. & M. 200; 5 Taunt. 307; but payment to an apprentice so situated was held not to be good; 2 Cr. & M. 304. Payment to a person other than the legal owner of the claim must be shown to have been made to one entitled to receive the money; 114 N. Y. 491. Generally, payment to the agent must be made in money, to bind the principal; 10 B. & C. 760; 61 Vt. 534; 40 Kan. 395. Power to receive money does not authorize an agent to commute; 1 Wash. C. C. 454; 1 Pick. 347; nor to submit to arbitration; 5 How. 891. See, also, Story, Ag. § 99.

An agent authorized to receive money cannot bind his principal by receiving goods; 4 C. & P. 501; or a note; 5 M. & W. 645; but a subsequent ratification would remedy any such departure from authority; and it is said that slight acts of acquiescence will be deemed ratification. Payment to one of several joint creditors of his part will not alter the nature of the debt so as to enable the others to sue separately; 4 Tyrwh. 498. Payment to one of several executors has been held sufficient; 3 Atk. 695. Payment to a trustee generally concludes the cestui que trust in law; 5 B. & Ad. 96. Payment of a debt to a marshal or sheriff having custody of the person of the debtor does not satisfy the plaintiff; 4 B. & C. 32. Interest may be paid to a scrivener holding the mortgage deed or bond, and also the principal, if he deliver up the bond; otherwise of a mortgage-deed as to the principal, for there must be a re-conveyance; 1 Salk. 157. It would seem, then, that in those states where no re-conveyance is needed, a payment of the principal to a person holding the security would be good, at least prima facie.

Subsequent ratification of the agent's acts is equivalent to precedent authority to receive money; Pothier, Obl. n. 528.

When to be made. Payment must be made at the exact time agreed upon. This rule is held very strictly in law; but in equity payment will be allowed at a time subsequent, generally when damages can be estimated and allowed by way of interest; 8 East 208; 3 Pick. 414; 5 Id. 106, 187. Where payment is to be made at a future day, of course nothing can be demanded till the time of payment, and, if there be a condition precedent to the liability, not until the condition has been performed. And where goods had been sold "at six or nine months' credit," the debtor was allowed the option; 5 Taunt. 338.

Where no time of payment is specified, the money is to be paid immediately on demand; 1 Pet. 455; 4 Rand. 346. When payment is to be made at a certain time, it may be made at a different time if the plaintiff will accept; Viner, Abr. Payment (H); and it seems that the debtor cannot compel the creditor to receive payment before the debt is due. The time of payment of a pecuniary obligation is a material provision in the contract, and a creditor cannot be compelled by statute to accept payment in advance; 111 N. Y. 1.

Where to be made. Payment must be made at the place agreed upon, unless both the parties consent to a change. If no place of payment is mentioned, the payer must seek out the payee; 2 Pars. Part. 751; Moore, P. C. 274; Shepp. Touchst. 378; 2 M. & W. 223; 20 E. L. & E. 498. Refusal to receive payment offered at a place other than the stipulated place of payment, except upon certain conditions, is an implied waiver of the right to have the payment made in the place agreed on; 37 Fed. Rep. 286. Where there is a covenant for the payment of rent, the tenant must seek the landlord; 8 Exch. 689. A lessor must demand the rent upon the land on the day when it becomes due at a convenient time before sunset, in order to re-enter for breach of condition upon non-payment; 47 Conn. 366; 63 Ind. 415. It has been held that a licensor of a patent must apply to the licensee for an account and payment; 6 Fed. Rep. 493.

So, too, the creditor is entitled to call for payment of the whole of his claim at one time, unless the parties have stipulated for payment otherwise.

Questions often arise in regard to the payment of debts and legacies by executors and administrators. These questions are generally settled by statute regulations.

As a general rule, debts are to be paid first, then specific legacies. The personal property is made liable for the testator's debts, and, after that is exhausted, the real estate, under restrictions varying in the different states.

See DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; EXECUTOR; ADMINISTRATOR; LEGACY.

In the payment of mortgages, if the mortgage was made by the deceased, the personal estate is liable to discharge the mortgage debts; 2 Cruise, Dig. 147. But where the deceased acquired the land subject to the mortgage, the mortgaged estate must pay the debt; 3 Johns. Ch. 252; 2 Bro. C. C. 57; 24 Pa. 208. See MORTGAGE.

Effect of Payment. The effect of payment is—first, to discharge the obligation; and it may happen that one payment will discharge several obligations by means of a transfer of the evidence of obligations; Pothier, Obl. 554, n. Payment by one who is primarily liable to one entitled to collect the debt is an extinguishment of the debt and all liability thereunder, and however held, transferred, or assigned, it is ever afterwards a mere nullity; 84 Va. 808. Second, payment does not prevent a recovery back when made under mistake of fact. The general rule is that a mistake or ignorance of law furnishes no ground to reclaim money paid voluntarily under a claim of right; 2 Kent 491; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 138; 44 Mo. App. 249; 27 Ct. Cls. 547; 29 id. 115; 99 Cal. 607. But acts done under a mistake or ignorance of an essential fact are voidable and relievable both in law and equity; Poll. Cont. 439; 84 Fla. 471. Laws of a foreign country are matters of fact; Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1304; 9 Pick. 112; and the several United States are foreign to each other in this respect. See CONFLICT OF LAWS; FOREIGN LAWS. In Kentucky and Connecticut there is a power of recovery equally in cases of mistake of law and of fact; 19 Conn. 548; 8 B. Monr. 510. In Ohio it may be remedied in equity; 11 Ohio 233. In New York a distinction is taken between ignorance of the law and mistakes of law, giving relief in the latter case; 18 Wend. 423; 2 Barb. Ch. 508. In England, money paid under a mistake of law cannot be recovered back; 4 Ad. & E. 358. The payment of a note for the purchase price of land, after the discovery of a mistake in computing the price, is no bar to an action to recover an overpayment resulting from such mistake; 158 Mass. 352. See IGNORANCE; MISTAKE. A payment under protest is nevertheless voluntary, unless there was duress or coercion; 3 N. Dak. 160; 136 N. Y. 363. Third, part payment of a note will have the effect of waiver of notice of protest. Fourth, payment of part of the debt will bar the application of the Statute of Limitations as to the residue; 22 N. H. 219; 6 Md. 201; 8 Mass. 134; 28 E. L. & E. 454; even though made in goods and chattels; 4 Ad. & E. 71. But it must be shown conclusively that the payment was made as part of a larger debt; 6 M. & W. 824; 20 Miss. 663; 9 Ark. 455; 11 Barb. 554; 24 Vt. 216. See, also, 3 Pars. Contr. 8th ed., 74; EARNEST; PROTEST; PAYMENT UNDER.

The Burden of Proof, on a plea of payment, is on the party pleading it; 7 Misc. Rep. 668; 91 Ga. 791; 33 Neb. 519; 1 Mo. App. Rep. 235. As to appropriation of payments, see that title. One English and one American case reported since its publication may be here cited as stating the general principles. When a debtor pays money on account and makes no appropriation, the creditor has the right to make it and may exercise it up to the last moment by action or otherwise; [1897] A. C. 286, reversing the court of appeal. The right of appropriation of payments belongs exclusively to the debtor and creditor and no third party can demand a change in appropriations assented to by them; 10 U. S. App. 415.

See NOVATION.

In Contemplation of Insolvency. A payment by an insolvent debtor in the usual course of his business to maintain his credit, preserve his estate, and carry on his business, without any intent to prefer one creditor to another, is not a "payment in contemplation of insolvency," and with a design to prefer a creditor within Kentucky Statutes, § 1910, 139 Ky. 284, 129 S. W. 828.

See VOLUNTARY PAYMENT.

In Pleading. The name of a plea by which the defendant alleges that he has paid the debt claimed in the declaration; this plea must conclude to the country. See Chitty, Plead. In Pennsylvania a plea of payment, with leave, etc., is in common use; under it a defendant may give in evidence anything tending to show that, of right, the plaintiff cannot recover.

PAYMENT INTO COURT. In Practice. Depositing a sum of money with the proper officer of the court by the defendant in a suit, for the benefit of the plaintiff and in answer to his claim.

It may be made in some states under statutory provisions; 18 Ala. 298; 7 Ill. 671; 1 Barb. 21; 5 Harring. 17; 24 Ga. 211; 16 Tex. 461; 11 Ind. 692; and see 3 E. L. & E. 186; and in most by a rule of court made for the purpose; 2 Bail. 28; 7 Ired. 100; 1 Swan 93; in which case notice of an intention to apply must, in general, have been previously given.

The effect is to divest the defendant of all right to withdraw the money; 1 Wend. 191; 8 Watts 348; except by leave of court; 1 Cox 298; and to admit conclusively every fact which the plaintiff would be obliged to prove in order to recover it; 1 B. & C. 3; 6 M. & W. 9; 1 Dougl. Mich. 330; 24 Vt. 140; 66 Pa. 27; as, that the amount tendered is due; 1 Campb. 559; 5 Mass. 365; 2 Wend. 431; for the cause laid in the declaration; 5 Bingh. 28, 32; 2 B. & P. 550; 5 Pick. 285; to the plaintiff in the character in which he sues; 2 Campb. 441; the jurisdiction of the court; 5 Esp. 19; that the contract was made; 3 Campb. 52; and broken as alleged; 1 B. & C. 3; but only in reference to the amount paid in; 7 Johns. 815; 3 E. L. & E. 548; and nothing beyond such facts; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 206.

Generally, it relieves the defendant from the payment of further costs unless judgment is recovered for a sum larger than that paid in; 1 Wash. 10; 8 Wend. 326; 3 Miles 65; 2 Rich. 64; 24 Vt. 140; 33 Fed. Rep. 816. As to the capacity in which the officer receiving the money acts, see 1 Cox 298; 2 Bail. 28; 17 Ala. 298.

Payment of money into court, when the declaration is on a special contract, is an acknowledgment of the right of action to the amount of the sum brought in, and no more; 1 Tidd's Pr. 624. It does not waive the benefit of a defence, though that be to the whole claim; 66 Pa. 27; 100 U. S. 673. But no defence can deprive the plaintiff of the right to the money in court. See TEN-DER.

PAYMENT OF MONEY. Delivery by the debtor to the creditor of the amount due. 7 Wall. (U. S.) 250.

PAYS. Country. Trial per pays, trial by jury (the country). See IN PAIS; PAIS.

PEACE. The concord or final agreement in a fine of land. 18 Edw. I. modus levandi finis.

The tranquillity enjoyed by a political society, internally by the good order which reigns among its members, and externally by the good understanding it has with all other nations. Applied to the internal regulations of a nation, peace imports, in a technical sense, not merely a state of repose and security as opposed to one of violence or warfare, but likewise a state of public order and decorum; Hamm. N. P. 139; 12 Mod. 566; 98 Mich. 175.

The term peace in English and American law is used in a general way to express that condition which is violated by the commission of crime. In modern times it is expressed in English by the phrase king's peace, and in this country peace of the state or commonwealth. But originally the phrase king's peace had no such broad meaning, but was used only in connection with crimes committed against persons, or in places, or at times and seasons, which were under the special protection of the king. See Pax Regis. "Breach of the king's peace was an act of personal disobedience, and a much graver matter than an ordinary breach of public order; it made the wrong-doer the king's enemy. The notion of the king's peace appears to have had two distinct origins. These were, first, the special sanctity of the king's house, which may be regarded as differing only in degree from that which Germanic usage attached everywhere to the home-stead of a free man; and, secondly, the special protection of the king's attendants and servants, and other persons whom he thought fit to place on the same footing. . . . The rapid extension of the king's peace till it becomes, after the Norman Conquest, the normal and general safeguard of public order, seems peculiarly English. On the continent the king appears to have been recognized as protector of the general peace, besides having power to grant special protection or peace of a higher order, from a much earlier time." 1 Poll. & Maitl. 451.

There was the peace of the church, both that of the parish and the minister; so there was the peace of the sheriff, and of each lord, and indeed of every household, for the breach of which atonement could be exacted. In writing of the criminal law of England in the twelfth century it is said, "The time has not yet come when the king's peace will be eternal and cover the whole land. Still we have here an elastic notion; if the king can bestow his peace on a privileged person by a writ of protection, can he not put all men under his peace by proclamation." 3 Poll. & Maitl. 451-3. The phrase peace of the king was in that period used to express the idea that the crime which was alleged to be in breach of the "peace of God and of our lord the king," was one of those reserved as specially punishable in behalf of the king himself. These crimes were the original pleas of the crown but the king's peace by an easy process extended itself "until it had become an all-embracing atmosphere;" id. 462. That general peace which is now denominated the peace of the king or of the state, as the case may be, was in the early days protected only by the hundred court and the tithingman. It is possible that mediæval usage which applied to an inferior court the phrase the peace of the lord who held it, dates from the earliest period of the administration of justice. There is said to be some evidence that in the tenth century the phrase peace of the witan, was used, but no authority for the use of the term folk-peace; 1 Poll. & Maitl. 38. See also Pollock, The King's Peace, Oxford Lectures; Underwick, The King's Peace.

The Lord Chancellor and the judges of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court are conservators of the peace at common law; they have all the common-law powers for the preservation of the peace which are possessed by other conservators, such as sheriffs and justices of the peace; they may command all men, whether private citizens, soldiers, or constables, to assist in the suppression of unlawful assemblies, and may arrest peace-breakers, by command, on view of the breach, or by their warrants.

PEACE, ARMED. The state of a country whose military force is kept on a war basis during peace. English.

PEACE OF GOD. The words, "in the peace of God and the said commonwealth, then and there being," as used in indictments for homicide and in the definition of murder, mean merely that it is not murder to kill an alien enemy in time of war, provided such killing occur in the actual exercise of war; Whart. Cr. Law § 810; 13 Minn. 341.

PEACE OF GOD AND THE CHURCH. The freedom from suits at law between the terms. Spelman, Gloss; Jacob, Law Dict. See PEACE.

PEACE, IN TIME OF. Not a mere cessation of hostilities, but peace in the complete sense, officially proclaimed. 255 U. S. 9, 10; 102 U. S. 438.

PEACEABLE ASSEMBLY. See ASSEMBLY; LIBERTY OF SPEECH.

PECK. A measure of capacity, equal to two gallons. See MEASURE.

PECULATION. The unlawful appropriation by a depository of public funds, of the property of the government intrusted to his care, to his own use or that of others. Domat, Suppl. au Droit Public, l. 1, tit. 5. See EMBEZZLEMENT.

PECULIARS. In Ecclesiastical Law. A parish in England which has jurisdiction of ecclesiastical matters within itself and independent of the ordinary.

They may be either—

Royal, which includes the sovereign's free chapels;

Of the archbishops, excluding the jurisdiction of the bishops and archdeacons;

Of the bishops, excluding the jurisdiction of the bishop of the diocese in which they are situated;

Of the bishops in their own diocese, excluding archdeaconal jurisdiction;

Of deans, deans and chapters, prebendaries, and the like, excluding the bishop's jurisdiction in consequence of ancient compositions.

PECULIUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. Private property.

The most ancient kind of peculium was the peculium profectitium of the Roman law, which signified that portion of the property acquired by a son or slave which the father or master allowed him, to be managed as he saw fit. In modern civil law there are other kinds of peculium, viz.: peculium castrense, which includes all movable property given to a son by relatives and friends on his going on a campaign, all the presents of comrades, and his military pay and the things bought with it; peculium quasi-castrense, which includes all acquired by a son by performing the duties of a public or spiritual officer or of an advocate, and also gifts from the reigning prince: peculium adventitium, which includes the property of a son's mother and relatives on that side of the house, and all which comes to him on a second marriage of his parents, and, in general, all his acquisitions which do not come from his father's property and do not come under causae or quasi-causae peculium.

The peculium profectum remains the property of the father. The peculium castrense and quasi-castrense are entirely the property of the son. The peculium adventitium belongs to the son; but he cannot alien it nor dispose of it by will; nor can the father, unless under peculiar circumstances, alien it without the consent of the emperor. Civ. Law, § 557; Inst. 2. 9. 1.; Dig. 15. 1. 5. 3; Pothier, ad Fand. 16. 11. 17. c. 2, art. 3.

A master is not entitled to the extraordinary earnings of his apprentices which do not interfere with his services so as to affect the master's profits. An apprentice was therefore decreed to be entitled to salvage, in opposition to his master's claim for it. 2 Cra. 270. See MANUS MARRIAGE.

PECUNIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Property, real or personal, corporeal or incorporeal. Things in general (omnes res).

The law of the Twelve Tables said, uti quisque pater familia legasset super pecunia tutelae rei suae ita ius esto: in whatever manner a father of a family may have disposed of his property or of the tutelage of his things, let this disposition be law. 1 Leona Elem. du Dr. Civ. Rom. 288. But Faulstich, in l. 5. D. de servit. § 1, says it is narrower sense than res, which he says means what is not included within patrimony, pecunia what is. Vicat. Voc. Jur. In a still narrower sense, it means those things only which have measure, weight, and number, and most usually strictly money. Id. The general sense of property occurs, also, in the old English law. Lex. Edw. Confess.

Flocks were the first riches of the ancients; and it is from pecus that the words pecunia, peculium, peculatus, are derived. In old English law pecunia often retains the force of pecus. So often in Domesday: postura ibidem pecunie vilite, i. e. pasture for cattle of the village. So vires pecunie, litterae atque leges Edw. Confess. c. 10; Emendat. Willielm. Primi ad Leges Edw. Confess.; Cowell.

PECUNIA NUMERATA (Lat.). Money given in payment of a debt.

Properly used of the creditor, who is properly said to number, i. e. count out, the money to the debtor which he must pay, and improperly of the debtor, who is said to number or count out the money to the creditor, i. e. to pay it. Vicat. Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.

PECUNIA NON-NUMERATA (Lat.). Money not paid or numbered.

The exceptio non-numerata pecunie (plea of money not paid) is allowed to the principal or surety by the creditor. Calvinus, Lex.

PECUNIA TRAJECTITIA (Lat.). A loan of money which, either itself or in the shape of goods bought with it, is to be carried over the sea, the lender to take the risk from the commencement of the voyage till arrival at the port of destination, and on that account to have higher interest; which interest is not essential to the contract, but, if reserved, is called foenus nauticum. Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 996b. The term foenus nauticum is sometimes applied to the transaction as well as the interest, making it coextensive with pecunia trajectitia.

PECUNIARY. That which relates to money. A pecuniary provision does not apply to a provision in an agreement for alimony specifically dividing personal property of the parties; 81 Me. 395. The exemption from registration of annuities without regard to pecuniary consideration was held to include the case of a grantee's giving up his business to the grantor; 4 Term 790; 5 id. 639. Bank notes; 3 id. 554; 1 B. & P. 208; checks; 8 Term 328; and a verbal promise to pay a debt in full; 6 Gray 327; are pecuniary considerations. But the assignment of a leasehold interest is not; 2 B. & P. 702; or a transfer of stock; 8 B. & A. 602; or a surrender of a life interest in a sum of money and of a contingent interest in the corpus; 2 El. & Bl. 874; 2 B. & C. 875.

PECUNIARY CAUSES. Causes in ecclesiastical courts where satisfaction is sought for withholding ecclesiastical dues or the doing or neglecting some act connected with the church. 8 Bla. Com. 88. As to what causes are ecclesiastical, see 3 Burn., Eccles. Law 89.

PECUNIARY LEGACY. See LEGACY.

PECUNIARY LOSS. A loss of money, or of something by which money or something of money value may be acquired. 32 Barb. 33.

PECUNIARY PROFIT. An academy is not a corporation for pecuniary profit. 116 Ill. 876.

PEDAGIUM (Lat. pes, foot). Money paid for passing by foot or horse through any forest or country. Cassan de Coutum. Burgund. p. 118; Rot. Vasc. 22 Edw. III. m. 84.

PEDAULUS (Lat. pes, foot). In Civil Law. A judge who sat at the foot of the tribunal, i. e. on the lowest seats, ready to try matters of little moment at command of the prætor. Calvinus, Lex.; Vicat. Voc. Jur.

PEDDLER. Persons who travel about the country with merchandise for the purpose of selling it.

An itinerant trader, who carries goods about in order to sell them, and who actually sells them, to purchasers, in contradistinction to a trader who has goods for sale, and sells them, at a fixed place of business. A petty chapman, or other trading person going from town to town, or to other men's houses, and travelling either on foot or with horses, or otherwise, carrying to sell or expose to sale, any goods, wares, or merchandise. 107 Ind. 502; 12 Cush. 493; 63 Hun 123. Any person carrying a wagon, cart, or buggy for the purpose of exhibiting or delivering any wares or merchandise. N. C. Act 1895, c. 116.

An itinerant individual, ordinarily without local habitation or place of business, who travels about the country carrying commodities for sale. 75 la. 74.

The distinctive feature has been held not to consist in the mode of transportation, though one of the statutory modes is essential to constitute a peddler, but in the fact that the peddler goes from house to house or place to place carrying his merchandise with him and concurrently sells and delivers it; 87 Ala. 144; 140 N. Y. 187. One who, having a place of business in another town, goes about delivering goods at the houses of his customers, in pursuance of orders previously taken, and takes orders for future delivery, is not a peddler; 140 N. Y. 187; 140 Pa. 158; 113 N. C. 681; but one who manufactures and deals in proprietary medicines who, although having a permanent manufactory and residence, yet attends county fairs and publicly recommends his medicines as a cure for certain ailments, is held a peddler; 85 la. 21.

The driver of a delivery wagon who takes orders for goods and subsequently delivers them is not a peddler; 55 N. J. L. 522; nor is one who merely delivers goods previously sold by another; 88 la. 191; or a canvasser; 135 Ill. 36; or one who exhibits samples of cloth and takes orders for clothing to be made therefrom; 28 Wkly. L. Bul. 107.

But one who goes from house to house with merchandise, selling the same on the instalment plan is held a peddler; 64 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 338; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 315.

A state may impose a tax upon itinerant peddlers and require them to take out a license to practice their trade; 166 U. S. 296; but it may not discriminate between its own citizens and non-residents; 12 Wall. 418; 108 U. S. 844; 64 N. H. 48; 84 Ga. 754; nor charge a higher price to the latter for a license than it imposes on the former; 64 N. H. 508. See COMMERCE; LICENSE.

An oil company, which fills tanks of regular customers every week under a standing order, is not a "peddler." 129 Ky. 744, 112 S. W. 902.

A traveling agent who takes orders and transmits them to be accepted or rejected by his principal and who delivers nothing is not a "peddler." 150 Ky. 634, 150 S. W. 814.

All itinerant persons vending lightning rods, goods, wares, merchandise, clocks, watches, jewelry, gold, silver or plated ware, spectacles, drugs, nostrums, perfumery, and any other thing not hereinafter specially exempt, shall be deemed "peddlers." Kentucky Statutes, § 4216. See PEDDLER'S NOTES. COMMERCIAL TRAVELER.

PEDDLER'S NOTES. "Peddler's notes" includes notes given for the exclusive right to sell a certain article in a certain county, or territory. 104 S. W. 287.

A traveling agent, taking orders for goods, and taking notes for the things sold, is not a peddler, nor are the notes so taken "peddler's notes." 150 Ky. 634, 150 S. W. 814.

PEDIGREE. A succession of degrees from the origin: it is the state of the family as far as regards the relationship of the different members, their births, marriages, and deaths. This term is applied to persons or families who trace their origin or descent.

On account of the difficulty of proving in the ordinary manner, by living witnesses, facts which occurred in remote times, hearsay evidence has been admitted to prove a pedigree: As declarations of deceased persons who were related by blood or marriage may be given in evidence in matters of pedigree; 117 U. S. 397. See Rawle, Covenants § 17 N. 1; Warr. Abs. of Title 33, 313. See DECLARATION; HEARSAY.

PEDIS POSITIO (Lat.) a planting or placing of the foot). A term used to denote an actual corporal possession. Possessio est quasi pedis positio: possession is as it were a planting of the foot. 8 Co. 42; 8 Johns. per Kent, C. J.; 5 Pa. 308; 2 N. & McC. 343. See PEDIS POSSESSIO.

PEDIS POSSESSIO (Lat.). A foot-hold; an actual possession. To constitute adverse possession, there must be pedis possessio, or a substantial inclosure. 2 N. & McC. 343.

PEERESS. The wife or the unmarried widow of a peer or a woman upon whom a peerage has been conferred, or a woman holding a peerage descendible to the heirs general of the original grantee. A peeress in her own right cannot sit in the House of Lords: but she is entitled to be tried by that House if charged with treason or felony. Byrne.

PEERS (Lat. pares). The vassals of a lord; the freeholders of a neighborhood, before whom livery of seisin was to be made, and before whom, as the jury of the county, trials were had. 2 Bla. Com. 316. These vassals were called pares curie, which title see. 1 Washb. R. P. 5th ed. *23.

Trial by a man's peers or equals is one of the rights reserved by Magna Charta. 4 Bla. Com. 349.

The nobility of England, though of different ranks, viz., dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, and barons, are equal in their privileges of sitting and voting in the house of lords; hence they are called peers of the realm.

They are created by writ summoning them to attend the house of lords by the title intended to be given, or by letters patent directly conferring the dignity. The former is the more ancient way; but the grant by patent is more certain. See Sullivan, Lect. 19 a; 1 Wood. Lect. 37.

Peers are tried by other peers in cases of treason, felony, and misprision of the same. In cases of treason, felony, and breach of the peace, they have no privilege from arrest; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 401*, n. 11.

Bishops who sit in parliament are peers; but the word spiritual is generally added; e. g. "lords temporal and spiritual." 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 401*, n. 12.

The titles of all temporal peers are now hereditary; May, Law of Parl. 14; except certain peers holding judicial office, whose peerage is a life peerage only.

Scotch and Irish peers are not entitled to sit in the lords, but sixteen representative Scotch peers are elected to each parliament, and twenty-eight Irish peers are elected to sit in the lords for life.

A peerage is not transferable, except with consent of parliament; id. Succession to the title is destroyed by attainder; see 1 Bla. Com. 413*. When an English peer has been adjudicated a bankrupt, he cannot sit in the house of lords; he loses no other privilege thereby. When the bankruptcy is determined he may resume his seat. If he obtains his discharge with a certificate that bankruptcy was the result of misfortune, the disqualification may be removed. But in the case of Scotch or Irish representative peers in the house of lords, the bankruptcy not determined within a year vacates their seat.

A member of the House of Commons, when he becomes a member of the English peerage, ceases thereby to have a right to sit in the Commons.

As to the trial of peers, see tit. Lord High Steward, in 8 Encyc. Laws of Eng.

PEINE FORTE ET DURE (L. Fr.). In English Law. A punishment formerly inflicted in England on a person who, being arraigned of felony, refused to plead and put himself on his trial, and stubbornly stood mute.

A jury was empanelled to try whether he stood "mute of malice," or "mute by the visitation of God," and if the latter the trial proceeded; but if the former the prisoner was solemnly warned by the judges of the terrible consequences described by Lord Coke, in the trial of Sir Richard Weston in 1615 for the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury, by the words—overe, frigore, et fame. Time was given for reflection and often the unfortunate was subjected to entreaties of friends and others, but if he remained obdurate he was adjudged to suffer peine forte et dure. The judgment was that he return from whence he came, to a low dungeon into which no light could enter; he was to be laid down, naked, on his back, on the ground, his feet and head and loins covered, his arms and legs drawn apart by cords tied to posts, a sharp stone under his back, and as much weight of iron or stone as he could bear, or more than he could bear, placed on his chest. He was to have the next day three morsels of barley bread, without drink; the next, three draughts, as much each time as he could drink, of the nearest stagnant water to the prison, without bread; and such was to be his diet on alternate days, till he died. This punishment was vulgarly called pressing to death; 2 Reeve, Hist. Eng. Law 134; 4 Bla. Com. 324; Cowell; Britton c. 4, fol. 11*.

This punishment as above described dates back to a period between 31 Edw. III. and 8 Hen. IV.; 4 Bla. Com. 324; Year B. 8 Hen. IV. 1. It did not at first include the pressing. Originally when asked how he would be tried the accused must choose between a trial "by God" (by ordeal) and "by my country" (by jury). After the former method of trial was abolished about 1215 the other method remained a privilege to be claimed and in those days the idea did not occur to any one of trying a prisoner by jury without his consent. By standing mute a prisoner put the court in difficulty, and at first he was put to death for not consenting to be tried "according to the law and custom of the realm." This was thought too severe and in the Parliament of Westminster under Edward I. there was provided for notorious felons confinement in prison forte et dure; which included all possible harsh features except death. Then to conquer obduracy starvation was resorted to; but this being too slow, under Henry IV. the peine was substituted for the prison. It continued until 1772 although occasionally something stronger than exhortation was resorted to, as tying up by the thumbs in the presence of the court, at the Old Bailey in 1734. It only ended when standing mute, by statute, in England, became equivalent to a confession or ver-diction of guilty; 12 Geo. III. c. 20; but in 1827 it was enacted by 7 and 8 Geo. IV., c. 28 "that in such cases a plea of not guilty should be entered for the accused."

The obvious effect of standing mute was to avoid the forfeiture of goods consequent upon conviction of felony and the results of corruption of blood, by an attainder, in case of capital felony. Often, indeed usually, in treason cases certainly, conviction was sure and the fortitude required to endure this death by torture would save his children or other heirs from disinheritance. Great numbers did in fact undergo the punishment which was recorded by the clerk's entry or record, "mortuus en pen' fort' et dur'." The number in rural Middlesex alone in 1609-1618 was thirty-two, of whom three were women, and peers were not protected from it by their privilege. A case is recorded in the last year of George I. and one at least in the reign of George II.

The only instance in which this punishment has ever been inflicted in this country is that of Giles Cory, of Salem, who refused to plead when arraigned for witchcraft; Washb. Jud. Hist. 142; 1 Chandl. Cr. Tr. 123.

PELLS, CLERK OF THE; CLERICUS PELLIS. An officer of the Exchequer whose duty it was to enter all moneys received from the tellers in a parchment roll called the Pellis receptorum, and to enter all payments in another roll called the Pellis exitum. Long after the days of parchment rolls the Clerk of the Pells continued to be an officer of the Exchequer. His office was abolished only in 1834. Byrne.

PENAL. Enacting punishment. Imposing a punishment or penalty.

PENAL ACTION. An action for recovery of statute penalty. 3 Steph. Com. 535. See Hawk. Pl. Cr. Informatio. It is distinguished from a popular or qui tam action, in which the action is brought by the informer, to whom part of the penalty goes. A penal action or information is brought by an officer, and the penalty goes to the king; 1 Chitty, Gen. Pr. 25; 2 Archb. Pr. 188.

PENAL BILL. The old name for a bond with condition by which a person is bound to pay a certain sum of money or do a certain act, or, in default thereof, pay a certain sum of money by way of penalty. Jacob, Law Dict. Bill.

PENAL CLAUSE. That particular clause or subdivision of a statute which fixes the penalty for a violation of previous provisions. See STATUTE; PENAL STATUTES.

A secondary obligation entered into for the purpose of enforcing the performance of a primary obligation. La. Civ. Code, art. 2117.

PENAL LAWS. See PENAL STATUTES.

PENAL SERVITUDE. A punishment which consists in keeping an offender in confinement and compelling him to labor.

The only distinction between penal servitude and "imprisonment with hard labor" seems to be that the latter is carried out within the walls of a goal, and cannot be inflicted for more than a comparatively short term of years, while penal servitude is carried out in any place appointed for the purpose by the proper authority, and may be for life, or any period not less than five years. R. & L. Dict.

PENAL STATUTES. Those which inflict a penalty for the violation of some of their provisions. Strictly and properly, they are those laws imposing punishment for an offence committed against the state, which the executive has power to pardon, and the expression does not include statutes which give a private action against a wrong-doer. 146 U. S. 657.

It is a rule of law that such statutes must be construed strictly; 1 Bla. Com. 88; Cro. Jac. 415; 1 Com. Dig. 444; 5 id. 860; 1 Kent 467; Whart. Cr. L. 28. They cannot, therefore, be extended by their spirit or equity to other offences than those clearly described and provided for; 1 Paine 32; 6 Cra. 171. But they are not to be so strictly construed as to defeat the obvious intention of the legislature; 134 U. S. 624. See 120 id. 678; CONSTRUCTION; INTERPRETATION.

PENALTY. A clause in an agreement, by which the obligor agrees to pay a certain sum of money if he shall fail to fulfill the contract contained in another clause of the same agreement.

A penal obligation differs from an alternative obligation, for the latter is but one in its essence; while a penalty always includes two distinct engagements, and when the first is fulfilled the second is void. When a breach has taken place, the obligor has his option to require the fulfillment of the first obligation, or the payment of the penalty, in those cases which cannot be relieved in equity, when the penalty is considered as liquidated damages. Dalloz, Dict. Obligation avec Clause penale.

A distinction is made in courts of equity between penalties and forfeitures. In cases of forfeiture for the breach of any covenant other than a covenant to pay rent, relief will not be granted in equity, unless upon the ground of accident, fraud, mistake, or surprise, when the breach is capable of compensation; Eden, Int. 22; 3 Ves. 692; 16 id. 403; 18 id. 58.

For the distinction between a penalty and liquidated damages, see LIQUIDATED DAMAGES.

The penalty remains unaffected, although the condition may have been partially performed; as, in a case where the penalty was one thousand dollars, and the condition was to pay an annuity of one hundred dollars, which had been paid for ten years, the penalty was still valid; 5 Vt. 355.

The punishment inflicted by a law for its violation. The term is mostly applied to a pecuniary punishment; see 6 Pet. 404; 7 Wheat. 13; 1 Wash. C. C. 1; 1 Paine 681; 1 Gall. 26; 1 Mas. 243; 7 Johns. 72; 1 Pick. 451; 1 Saund. 58, n.; 16 Viner, Abr. 301; 62 Hun 407; 23 Fed. Rep. 74; 124 U. S. 571; although not restricted to it; 16 Ind. App. 357.

The words penal and penalty in their strict and primary sense, denote a punishment, whether corporal or pecuniary, imposed and enforced by the state for a crime or offence against its laws; 146 U. S. 657.

The term "penalty" involves the idea of punishment for infraction of the law and includes any extraordinary liability to which the law subjects a wrongdoer in favor of the person wronged, not limited to the damages suffered; while in a civil suit the amount of recovery for such damages is determined by the extent of the injury received and the elements constituting it. 233 U. S. 319.

PENANCE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An ecclesiastical punishment inflicted by an ecclesiastical court for some spiritual offence. Aylliffe, Parerg. 420.

PENCIL. An instrument made of plumbago, red chalk, or other suitable substance, for writing without ink.

It has been held that a will written with a pencil is valid; 1 Phill. Eccl. 1; 2 id. 173; Beach, Wills § 23. See WILL.

PENDENTE LITE (Lat.). Pending the continuance of an action; while litigation continues.

An administrator is appointed pendente lite, when a will is contested. See ADMINISTRATOR; LIS PENDENS.

PENDENTES (Lat.). In Civil Law. The fruits of the earth not yet separated from the ground; the fruits hanging by the roots. Erskine, Inst. b. 2, tit. 2, s. 4.

PENDING. See LIS PENDENS.

PENDING SUIT. See AUTER ACTION PENDANT; UNITED STATES COURTS.

PENES (Lat.). In the possession; in one's possession or power; under one's control.

PENETRATION. See KAPE.

PENITENTIALS. Books formerly used by Roman Catholic priests hearing confessions containing rules for the imposition of penances. Webster.

PENITENTIARY. A prison for the punishment of convicts.

A prison or place of punishment. The place of punishment in which convicts, sentenced to confinement and hard labor, are confined by the authority of the law. 2 Kan. 174; 48 Kan. 723.

There are two systems of penitentiaries in the United States, each of which is claimed to be the best by its partisans,—the Pennsylvania system and the New York system. By the former, convicts are lodged in separate, well-lighted, and well-ventilated cells, where they are required to work during stated hours. During the whole time of their confinement they are never permitted to see or speak with each other. Their usual employments are shoe-making, weaving, winding yarn, picking wool, and such like business. The only punishments to which convicts are subject are the privation of food for short periods, and confinement without labor in dark but well-aired cells: this discipline has been found sufficient to keep perfect order; the whip and all other corporal punishments are prohibited. The advantages of the plan are numerous. Men cannot long remain in solitude without labor; convicts, when deprived of it, ask it as a favor, and, in order to retain it, use, generally, their best exertions to do their work well; being entirely secluded, they are of course unknown to their fellow-prisoners, and can form no combination to escape while in prison, or associations to prey upon society when they are out; being treated with kindness, and afforded books for their instruction and amusement, they become satisfied that society does not make war upon them, and more disposed to return to it, which they are not prevented from doing by the exposure of their fellow-prisoners when in a strange place; the labor of the convicts tends greatly to defray the expenses of the prison. The disadvantages which were anticipated have been found to be groundless. Among these were that the prisoners would be unhealthy; experience has proved the contrary: that they would become insane; this has also been found to be otherwise: that solitude is incompatible with the performance of business: that obedience to the discipline of the prison could not be enforced. These, and all other objections to this system, are by its friends believed to be without force.

The New York system, adopted at Auburn, which was probably copied from the penitentiary at Ghent, in the Netherlands, called La Maison de Force, is founded on the system of isolation and separation, as well as that of Pennsylvania, but with this difference, that in the former the prisoners are confined to their separate cells during the night only; during the working-hours in the daytime they labor together in workshops appropriated to their use. They eat their meals together, but in such a manner as not to be able to speak with each other. Silence is also imposed upon them at their labor. They perform the labor of carpenters, blacksmiths, weavers, shoemakers, tailors, coopers, gardeners, woodworkers, etc. The discipline of the prison is enforced by stripes inflicted by the assistant keepers, on the backs of the prisoners; though this punishment is rarely exercised. The advantages of this plan are that the convicts are in solitary confinement during the night: that their labor, by being joint, is more productive; that, inasmuch as a clergyman is employed to preach to the prisoners, the system affords an opportunity for mental and moral improvements. Among the objections made to it are that the prisoners have opportunities of communicating with each other and of forming plans of escape, and, when they are out of prison, of associating together in consequence of their previous acquaintance, to the detriment of those who wish to return to virtue, and to the danger of the public; that the discipline is degrading, and that it engenders bitter resentment in the mind of the convict.

PENNED AND CORRALLED. Confined in a small enclosure or narrow space, either by means of an artificial structure or through some other agency without such structure. 105 Cal. 636.

PENNSYLVANIA. One of the thirteen original states of the United States of America.

It received its name from a royal charter granted March 4, 1681, by Charles II. to William Penn. By that charter, Penn was constituted the proprietary and governor of the province, and vested with power to enact laws, with the consent of the freemen, to execute the laws, to appoint judges and other officers, incorporate towns, establish ports, levy customs, import and export goods, sell lands creating a tenure, levy troops, make war, and exercise other attributes of sovereign power. Appeals in judicial matters lay to the crown, and all laws could be annulled by the Crown within five years after their passage.

The first frame of government was adopted and promulgated on April 23, 1682. The government was to be by the governor and freemen in a provincial council and general assembly. Both of the latter were chosen annually by the people. All laws were to originate with the council. A governor, judges, and other officers were to be appointed, during good behavior, by the governor from a double list presented by the council or assembly.

On April 2, 1683, a new frame was adopted, reducing the numbers both of the council and assembly. In 1683 the proprietary was deprived of his government and the province placed under the government of New York. But in 1694 Penn was duly reinstated.

A new frame of government adopted on October 26, 1696, made some material alterations in the existing order of things. The power of originating laws was thereby first conferred on the assembly.

The charter of privileges granted by the proprietary and accepted by the assembly on October 28, 1701, confirming the foregoing provisions and making numerous others, continued the supreme law of the province during the residue of the proprietary government.

In 1776, after the declaration of American independence, a constitution was formed adapted to the altered circumstances of the country, which continued in force until 1790, when a new one was substituted. This was amended in 1897 by the introduction of some very radical changes. Other amendments were made in 1880, in 1837, and in 1864. In 1874 a new constitution was adopted.

PENNY. The name of an English coin, of the value of one-twelfth part of a shilling.

The weight of a penny is approximately, 1-8 oz. avoird.; of a half penny, 1-5 oz.; of a farthing, 1-10 oz. A half penny is one inch in diameter. Whitaker's Alm.

While the United States were colonies, each adopted a monetary system composed of pounds, shillings, and pence. The penny varied in value in the different colonies.

PENNYWEIGHT. A troy weight of twenty-four grains, or one-twentieth part of an ounce. See WEIGHTS.

PENSION. A stated and certain allowance granted by the government to an individual, or those who represent him, for valuable services performed by him for the country.

The act of August 26, 1776, of the old congress promised pensions to soldiers and seamen who might be disabled in the war; and the act of May 15, 1778, promised half pay for seven years after the end of the war to all commissioned officers who should serve until the end of the war. The earliest act of the United States congress was that of September 29, 1789, which directed that pensions that had been paid by the states should be paid by the United States. The act of July 4, 1838, was the foundation of pensions to widows and orphans. In 1866 and 1868 "old war" pensioners were put upon the same footing with widows and orphans of the War of the Rebellion. Originally the secretary of war was directed to make out the list of pensioners. The law of May 15, 1838, was executed at the treasury department, but by resolution of June 28, 1832, all duties devolved on that department were transferred to the war department. On March 2, 1833, an independent pension bureau was established in the war department. For a time navy pension laws were executed in the navy department, but on March 4, 1840, this was transferred to the pension bureau. The act of March 3, 1849, created the interior department and transferred the pension business to that department, where it has since been.

Pensions have been divided into "invalid pension," "gratuitous or service pensions" and "land bounties."

"No pensioner has a vested legal right to his pension. Pensions are the bounties of the government, which congress has the right to give, distribute, or recall at its discretion." 107 U. S. 68. But by an act of December 21, 1893, payment of a pension cannot be withheld or suspended without notice to the grantee of not less than thirty days.

Invalid pensions were granted to volunteers and the militia in suppressing Indian depredations in Florida; and pensions were granted to the widows and children under sixteen years of age of those engaged in various Indian wars since 1790 who remained in the service at the date of their death, or who had received an honorable discharge and died, or should thereafter die of injuries received or disease contracted in the service. In 1892, service pensions were granted to survivors who had served for thirty days in certain Indian wars from 1832 to 1842, and were honorably discharged and to those personally named in any resolution of congress though they may have served less than thirty days, and to their surviving widows, if not remarried. This act does not apply to persons who are not citizens of the United States.

Invalid pensions were granted to regulars and volunteers, disabled by injury received or disease contracted in the Mexican war if they received an honorable discharge; R. S. § 4790; and in case of their death, to their widows, or if the latter die or remarry, to the children under sixteen. By act of January 29, 1887, service pensions were granted to survivors of the Mexican war who served sixty days or were actually engaged in a battle or were personally named in any resolution of congress for specific service in the war.

By R. S. § 4728, invalid navy pensions are granted to any person in the navy or marine service disabled in the service prior to March 4, 1861; and in case of death from injury received or disease contracted in the service, a pension is granted to the widow, and, in case of her death or remarriage, to the children under sixteen years; R. S. §§ 4728, 4729. By R. S. § 4741, officers and men on revenue cutters co-operating with the navy are placed on the navy pension list. Special acts provide for a navy pension fund and a privateer pension fund and the pensioners thereon.

No person can draw a pension as an invalid and the pay of his rank for any period, unless his disability caused his employment in a lower grade or in the civil branch of the service; R. S. § 4724; and no person can draw two pensions; R. S. § 4715. No pension shall be paid to any person or to the widow or children or heirs of any deceased person who voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the rebellion; R. S. § 4716; unless such person afterwards voluntarily enlisted in the army or navy and incurred disability therein; act of March 3, 1877, amended August 1, 1892.

Pensions are not liable to attachment in any way; R. S. § 4747.

If any one entitled under R. S. § 4693, supra, has died since March 4, 1861, or dies after this act, by reason of any wound, etc., which under said section would have entitled him to an invalid pension, had he been disabled, his widow, or if none, or in case of her death without the payment to her of any part of the pension mentioned in the act, his child or children under sixteen years, shall receive the same pension as the husband or father would have been entitled to, to continue from the death of the husband or father, to continue to the widow during widowhood and to the children until they attain sixteen years (longer if permanently helpless); in case of the widow's marriage the children draw the pension from her marriage, etc. R. S. § 4703, as amended August 7, 1883. Pensions of widows are increased by two dollars a month for each child under sixteen years; R. S. § 4703.

By act of March 19, 1886, widows' pensions are raised to twelve dollars a month (with allowance of two dollars a month for each child under sixteen years); but the act applies only to widows married prior to that date, and those who may marry prior to and during the husband's service.

If a widow entitled to a pension abandon a child under sixteen or is an unsuitable person, by reason of immoral conduct, to have the custody of it, no pension is allowed the widow till the child attains sixteen years, but the child shall be pensioned as if no widow had survived, the pension being payable to the guardian; R. S. § 4706. Children born before marriage, if acknowledged by the father before or after marriage, are deemed legitimate; R. S. § 4704. On remarriage of a widow entitled to a pension, her pension ceases; R. S. § 4708; and no pension shall be granted to a widow for the same period that her husband received one; R. S. § 4735.

Dependent relations of one entitled under R. S. § 4793, supra, in case of his death since March 4, 1861, or after the act, leaving neither widow nor legitimate children, are entitled to the same pension as such person would have been entitled to, in the following order of precedence:—the mother; the father; orphan brothers and sisters under sixteen (jointly); R. S. § 4707. See act of March 19, 1886. They take in substance, successively; but are entitled only so long as the pension shall be necessary as a means of adequate subsistence; R. S. § 4707; and the rate is raised to twelve dollars a month; act of March 19, 1886. The marriage of a dependent mother or sister terminates the pension.

Arrears of pensions granted in consequence of death which originated from a cause occurring in the service since March 4, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, commence on the death or discharge of the person, if the disability occurred prior to discharge; if after discharge, then from disability, or from the termination of the right of the person having the prior right to such pension; provided the application was filed prior to July 1, 1890, otherwise the pension begins at the filing of the application; but this limitation does not apply to widows, insane persons, or children under sixteen; acts of January 25, 1879; March 8, 1879; June 7, 1888. Where death or disability occurred prior to March 4, 1861, and an application was not filed in three years from discharge or death or from the termination of a previously granted pension, the pension commences from the date of filing the application; but no claim allowed prior to June 6, 1886, is affected by this section; R. S. § 4713. In pensions payable to dependent parents, it is enough to show that the parents have no means of support except their own manual labor or the contributions of others, not legally bound to support them; the pension continues only so long as the dependence; act June 27, 1890.

All persons who served ninety days or more in the rebellion, and were honorably discharged, and are or may be suffering from a mental or physical disability of a permanent character, not the result of their own vicious habits, which incapacitates them from support by manual labor, shall receive not more than twelve nor less than six dollars a month, proportioned to the degree of inability, beginning with the date of filing the application after June 27, 1890; and the widow, if without means of support other than her daily labor, or the children under sixteen are placed on the pension list from the date of the application, on proof of the husband's death, but without proving his death to have been the result of army service.

An offence against the act of June 27, 1890, is committed when a sum greater than ten dollars has been taken, regardless of the fact whether the pension has or has not been received, and it is not necessary to aver a demand for the return of the money wrongfully taken; 157 U. S. 160. Where one fraudulently obtained pension money from a client he is not guilty of wrongfully withholding money from the pensioner under R. S. § 4786; it applies to money before it reaches the hands of the pensioner; 180 U. S. 187. See MILITARY BOUNTY LANDS.

A reasonable appropriation of municipal funds for a police pension is for a strictly municipal use and is valid; 182 Pa. 373.

PENSIONARY PARLIAMENT. See LONG PARLIAMENT.

PENSIONER. One who is supported by an allowance at the will of another. It is more usually applied to him who receives an annuity or pension from the government.

PENT ROAD. A road shut up or closed at its terminal points. 40 Vt. 41.

PEON. A peon is one who is compelled to work for his creditor until his debt is paid. 219 U. S. 242.

PEONAGE. A status or condition of compulsory service, based upon the indebtedness of the peon (q. v.) to the master. The basal fact is indebtedness. 197 U. S. 215. Peonage is sometimes classified as voluntary or involuntary, but this implies simply a difference in the mode of origin, but none in the character of the servitude. The one exists where the debtor voluntarily contracts to enter the service of his creditor. The other is forced upon the debtor by some provision of law. But peonage, however created, is compulsory service, involuntary servitude. The peon can release himself therefrom, it is true, by the payment of the debt, but otherwise the service is enforced. Id.

A clear distinction exists between peonage and the voluntary performance of labor or rendering of services in payment of a debt. In the latter case the debtor, though contracting to pay his indebtedness by labor or service, and subject like any other contractor to an action for damages for breach of that contract, can elect at any time to break it, and no law or force compels performance or a continuance of the service. Id.; 215, 216.

A term descriptive of a condition which has existed in Spanish America, and especially in Mexico. The essence of the thing is compulsory service in payment of a debt. 219 U. S. 242. See INVOLUNTARY SERVITUDE.

PEOPLE. A state: as, the people of the state of New York. A nation in its collective and political capacity. 4 Term 788. See 6 Pet. 467.

When the term the people is made use of in constitutional law or discussions, it is often the case that those only are intended who have a share in the government through being clothed with the elective franchise. Thus, the people elect delegates to a constitutional convention; the people choose the officers under the constitution, and so on. For these and similar purposes, the electors, though constituting but a small minority of the whole body of the community, nevertheless act for all, and, as being for the time the representatives of sovereignty, they are considered and spoken of as the sovereign people. But in all the enumerations and guaranties of rights the whole people are intended, because the rights of all are equal, and are meant to be equally protected; Cooley, Const. 2d ed. 40, 207; Cooley, Const. L. 278.

In a policy of insurance, "detainments of all kings, princes, and people," the word does not include insurance against any promiscuous or lawless rabble which may be guilty of attacking or detaining a ship; 2 Marsh. Ins. 508. See INSURGENTS; NATION.

The term people of the United States is synonymous with citizens; both describe the political body, who, according to our republican institutions, form the sovereignty, and who hold the power and conduct the government through their representatives.

Sovereign people. Every citizen is one of this people, and a constituent member of the sovereignty; 19 How. 393; 143 U. S. 135; it includes registered voters as well as tax payers. 19 R. I. 610.

This kind of sale was used in the emancipation of a son or slave, and in making a will. Calvinus. Lex. Mancipatio. See MANCIPATORY WILL.

Applied to a sale not by measure or weight, but for a single price for the whole in gross; e. g. a sale of all the wine of a vineyard for a certain price. Vocab. Jur. Utr. Averio. Some derive the meaning of the phrase from a turning away of the risk of a deficiency in the quantity from the seller to the buyer; others, from turning away the head, i. e. negligence in the sale; others think aversio is for adversio. Calvinus, Lex.; 2 Kent 640; 4 id. 517.

PER CAPITA (Lat. by the head or polls). When descendants take as individuals, and not by right of representation (per stirpes), they are said to take per capita. A replication to a plea where something has been pleaded which would be a discharge if it had been honestly pleaded that such a thing has been obtained by fraud; for example, where, on debt on a statute, the defendant pleads a prior action depending, if such action has been commenced by fraud, the plaintiff may reply per fraudem. 2 Chitty, Pl. *675.

PER INCURIAM. Through want of care; through inadvertence. 35 E. L. & Eq. 302.

Com. 140; Cro. Jac. 501.

PER QUOD SERVITIUM AMISIT (Lat. by which he lost her or his service). Where a servant has been so beaten or injured that his or her services are lost to the master, the master has an action of trespass vi et armis, per quod servitium amisit, in which he must allege and prove the special damage he has sustained. 3 Bla. Com. 142. This action is commonly brought by the father for the seduction of his daughter, in which case very slight evidence of the relation of master and servant is necessary; but still some loss of service, or some expense, must be shown: 5 East 45; 5 B. & P. 468; 5 Price 641; 11 Ga. 608; 15 Barb. 279; 8 N. PEREMPTORIUS (Lat. from perire, to destroy). In Civil Law. That which takes away or destroys forever: hence, exceptio peremptoria, a plea which is a perpetual bar. See PEREMPTORY. Bract. lib. 4, c. 20; Fleta, lib. 6, c. 36, § 3; Calvinus, Lex.

PEREMPTORY. Absolute; positive. A final determination to act, without hope of renewing or altering. Joined to a substantive, this word is frequently used in law: as, peremptory action; Fitch. N. B. 35, 38, 104, 108; peremptory nonsuit; id. 5, 11; peremptory exception; Bract. lib. 4, c. 20; peremptory undertaking; 3 Chitty, Pr. 112, 793; peremptory challenge of jurors; Inst. 4, 13, 9; Code 7, 50, 2; 8, 36, 8; Dig. 5, 1, 70, 73.

PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE. See CHALLENGE.

PEREMPTORY DAY. A day assigned for a hearing without further postponement. Anderson. A precise time when certain business by rule of court ought to be spoken to; but if it cannot be spoken to then, the court, at the prayer of the party concerned, will give a further day without prejudice to him. R. & L. Dict.

PEREMPTORY DEFENCE. A defence which insists that the plaintiff never had the right to institute the suit, or that, if he had, the original right is extinguished or determined. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4206.

PEREMPTORY EXCEPTION. Any defence which denies entirely the ground of action. 1 White, Rec. 283. So of a demurrer; 1 Tex. 364.

PEREMPTORY MANDAMUS. A mandamus requiring a thing to be done absolutely. It is usually granted after failure to show satisfactory cause on an alternative mandamus. No other return will be permitted but absolute obedience; 3 Bla. Com. *110; Tapp. Mand. 400. See MANDAMUS.

PEREMPTORY PAPER. A court paper containing a list of all motions.

A list of the causes which are enlarged at the request of the parties, or which stand over from press of business in court. In the courts of common pleas and exchequer, when a rule moved for in one term was drawn up to show cause in the next term, or was enlarged till the following term, it was the custom to place it in a paper called the peremptory paper. Certain days were allotted in these courts for taking the peremptory paper, usually the first five or six days in each term. Regularly, it was necessary for the party who desired to support or to show cause against the rule, to do so by counsel on the very day allotted to the rule in the peremptory paper; and, if he neglected to do so, the court would not, in favor of a mere technical objection, afterwards permit the rule to be opened and discussed. Abbott; 3 Chitty Gen. Pract. 477.

PEREMPTORY PLEA. A plea which goes to destroy the right of action itself; a plea in bar or to the action. 3 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 541; 3 Woodd. Lect. 57; 2 Saund. Pl. & Ev. 645.

PEREMPTORY RULE. An order which is to be observed promptly and fully, without argument contra. Anderson.

In former English practice, when a plaintiff in an action was not ready to declare within the time limited, and the defendant wished to compel him to do so, defendant might procure what was termed a peremptory rule to declare, which was in the nature of an order from the court, compelling the plaintiff to declare, under pain of judgment of non pros. being signed against him. By the common-law procedure act, a notice to declare was substituted for this rule of court. Abbott.

PERFECT. Complete. The word implies either physical, moral, or mechanical perfection. 17 C. B. N. s. 601. A guaranty that goods are perfect is construed to mean that they are perfect for the use intended; 41 Wis. 380.

The term is applied to obligations in order to distinguish those which may be enforced by law, which are called perfect, 37 Ga. 128, from those which cannot be so enforced, which are said to be imperfect. A perfect title is one which is good both at law and in equity. 21 Conn. 449.

PERFECT TAXING SYSTEM. See TAXING SYSTEM, PERFECT.

PERFIDY. The act of one who has engaged his faith to do a thing, and does not do it, but does the contrary. Wolff § 390.

PERFORMANCE. The act of doing something. It is synonymous with fulfilling. 81 Ind. 87.

The thing done: as, Paul is exonerated from the obligation of his contract by its performance.

When a contract has been made by parol, which under the statute of frauds could not be enforced, because it was not in writing, and the party seeking to avoid it has received the whole or a part performance of such agreement, he cannot afterwards avoid it: 1 Johns. Ch. 278; L. R. 1 Ch. 35; 40 U. S. App. 579; and such part performance will enable the other party to prove it alunde; 1 Pet. C. C. 380; 1 Rand. 165; 1 Blackf. 58; 2 Day 255; 1 Des. 350; 1 Binn. 218; 3 Paige, Ch. 545.

The statute of frauds does not apply to a contract which has been fully performed by one party and partially, at least, by the other; 35 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 579. An agreement for constructing a party wall is so performed as to take it out of the statute when built by one owner and used by the other; 7 Ohio Dec. 428. Part performance of a verbal contract for the sale of land is not sufficient to avoid the statute; 73 Miss. 665; though in some cases it is; 89 Me. 506; as where the land was selected and a conveyance made; 15 Ind. App. 432; and where there has been an entry into possession under a parol promise and a deed has been tendered, it is sufficient part performance to sustain an action for the purchase money, though it would not have been for compelling specific performance; 48 Neb. 659.

The question what is sufficient delivery to operate as part performance to avoid the statute is one of frequent occurrence, and must usually be determined upon the circumstances of each case and is not a subject upon which it is easy to generalize. For cases in which the question has arisen see 59 Minn. 285; 64 Vt. 147; 114 N. C. 530; 84 Md. 426; 88 Neb. 339; 15 Ind. App. 84; 10 Utah 31.

The question of performance becomes important where it is necessary to determine whether the non-performance of one party according to the exact terms of the contract will prevent a recovery upon it, or in case that is not permitted, upon a quantum meruit. As to the effect of a contract for services, where the employee is discharged for good cause before the termination of his contract, the authorities conflict. See 24 L. R. A. 231, where the authorities are collected. See also MASTER AND SERVANT. Where there is a contract for permanent employment, a substantial performance by the employer would have the effect of releasing him from liability upon his contract to an employee who refused to comply with the terms of the contract; 42 Neb. 631.

The non-performance of a building contract is not excused by inevitable accident; 88 Mo. 285; 25 Conn. 530; 2 Wall. 1; 25 N. Y. 272; nor by the acceptance of the buildings when not finished in due time; 23 How. 220; but it may be by acts of the other party which delay completion, even if acquiesced in by the contractor; 11 id. 481; 102 N. Y. 205. The prevention of performance by the destruction of a building before completion, if the contract is entire, will prevent recovery for any part; L. R. 2 C. P. 651; but where there is a provision for payment from time to time, it is otherwise; 4 M. & W. 699. There may be waiver of strict performance as to time; 102 N. Y. 228; and a recovery for work actually done; 91 U. S. 640; a vendor who has waived performance at the time specified cannot rescind without reasonable notice to the vendee; 8 Paige 423; 36 Minn. 317; 4 Mich. 573. Nothing can be recovered for part performance of a contract unless full performance was waived or prevented; 26 N. Y. 217; 39 Wis. 553; 87 Me. 449; but see 81 N. Y. 341. See 2 Benj. Sales § 1032. It is said that substantial performance of a building contract is all that is required; 88 N. Y. 648; but one who invokes that doctrine must himself have faithfully endeavored to perform; 123 Pa. 119. See 5 L. R. A. 270; 9 id. 52.

Whether a contract is entire or severable with respect to its performance depends generally upon the consideration, and not the subject matter; 110 Pa. 236; if the latter is apportioned, either expressly or impliedly, the contract is severable; 77 id. 228; so also where it provides for the performance of different things at different times; 143 Mass. 11; or where the price is apportioned to different items to be separately performed; 11 N. Y. 35; 5 B. & Ald. 642. See 1 L. R. A. 826.

Where no time is fixed for performance, a reasonable time will be presumed to have been intended; 45 Ill. App. 624; 79 Mich. 47; 10 Vt. 274; 4 Q. B. D. 133; 39 N. Y. 481; 27 Fla. 482; 11 L. R. A. 526. What is a reasonable time will depend upon the circumstances of the case; 24 Me. 131; L. R. 1 C. P. 385; 30 Vt. 633; 14 W. Va. 1; and is a question for the jury; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1809. Where no time has been fixed, or where performance at an appointed time has been waived, either party may limit a reasonable period within which it must be performed, giving notice thereof to the other party; Hoffm. Ch. 125; 16 Beav. 59; 239 L. R. 10 Eq. 281.

A contract for the delivery of a number of personal chattels of the same kind is severable in its nature, and if a part is accepted and appropriated to the use of the vendee, he must pay the stipulated price for such part, less damages sustained by reason of the failure to make complete delivery; 86 Fed. Rep. 225.

Where the contract is silent as to the mode of performance, it should be according to the usage of the place where it is made; 11 Ex. 645; but it must be substantial and bona fide, conforming to the true intent and meaning, and not merely the letter, of the agreement; 4 id. 128. Conditions precedent must be performed; 3 Addison, Contr. 8th ed. [1189]. See CONDITION.

The question of performance also becomes important with respect to the effect of non-performance as a rescission, so as to give a right of action to the other party. The refusal or inability of one party to a contract to perform his part of it, discharges the other, who is ready and willing to perform his part, from further responsibility, and entitles him to sue at once for a breach. If before the time of the performance, one party announces to the other that he does not intend to perform his promise, the latter may treat the contract as broken and bring suit at once; 158 Pa. 107.

The leading case for this rule is Hochster v. De La Tour, 22 L. J. Q. B. 455, which was followed in Frost v. Knight, L. R. 7 Ex. 111; but in Johnston v. Milling, 16 Q. B. D. 460, it was doubted whether the doctrine extended to a contract containing various stipulations, where the whole cannot be treated as put an end to upon the wrongful repudiation of one of the stipulations. The rule has generally been followed in England and in this country; 11 C. B. N. S. 152; 13 id. 825; 102 N. Y. 10; 108 Ill. 170; 36 Md. 567; contra, 114 Mass. 530.

The principle has been applied to sustain an action for breach of promise of marriage where the defendant, before the time fixed for fulfilling his promise, has married another person; L. R. 7 Ex. 111; 32 Ia. 409; 42 N. Y. 246.

The refusal of performance must be treated as a breach; the plaintiff cannot maintain his action if he persists in seeking performance; 6 El. & Bl. 953; 2 C. B. N. S. 563.

The refusal to perform must be distinct, unequivocal, and absolute; 15 Wall. 36; and acted on by the other party; Benj. Sales § 568. In 117 U. S. 502, the court considered the cases, but declined to decide whether or not the rule should be maintained as applicable to the class of cases to which the one then before it belonged; and said it has been called in England a "novel doctrine" and has never been applied in that court.

The cases in 8 C. C. A. 14 (59 Fed. Rep. 87) and 19 C. C. A. 599 (73 Fed. Rep. 603) followed Hochster v. De la Tour. In 84 Fed. Rep. 569, Dallas, J., was of opinion that the question was an open one, so far as the supreme court was concerned, and followed the ruling of Judge Lowell in 11 Fed. Rep. 372, supported by the two federal cases last above mentioned. He considered that Judge Lowell had answered the argument of the court in 114 Mass. 530, and concurred with him in thinking that the cases which follow the English rule are "founded in good sense, and rest on strong grounds of convenience, however difficult it may be to reconcile them with the strictest logic."

Wallace, C. J., in 85 Fed. Rep. 853, considered that Dingley v. Oler, 117 U. S. 490, was a dictum, and that there was an overwhelming preponderance of adjudication in favor of the doctrine of Hochster v. De la Tour. He cited also 137 N. Y. 471; 60 Minn. 284; 41 W. Va. 717. See 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 576; ELECTION OF RIGHTS OR REMEDIES.

PERFORMED. To carry through, execute, accomplish, to make complete, to perfect (Webster). 150 Ky. 250, 150 S. W. 367.

PERIL. The risk, contingency, or cause of loss insured against, in a policy of insurance. See RISK; INSURANCE.

PERIL OF DEATH. A term used to denote that condition of apprehension of death in which it is necessary that the donor should be, in order to make a valid gift causa mortis.

In the cases on this subject there is found a great lack of precision of definition. The result of a critical examination of the authorities is thus stated by Bates, Ch., in Robeson v. Robeson's Adm., 3 Del. Ch. 51, 63: "I have labored to obtain from the authorities a clear view of what is implied in these terms, peril of death, in other words, what is that precise condition of disability in consideration of which it is that the law gives effect to a gift causa mortis. Thus much is certain, that the gift, to be valid, in the first instance must be made under apprehension of death, as likely to result from some present peril, usually that of sickness. It is further certain that to render the gift finally effectual death must in fact ensue from the sickness or other peril under which it was made. But on another question I am unable to derive from the text books and decisions any settled conclusion: That question is, whether the apprehension of death must be an apprehension of death as presently imminent, the donor being, as it is said, in extremis; or, whether it is sufficient for the validity of the gift if death be contemplated as the probable result of the sickness, a result likely or even certain to occur but after an indefinite interval, it may be of weeks or months; as in the case of chronic diseases generally." After adverting to the difference of view to be found in the leading English cases, the chancellor continues: "The question is uncontrolled by any decisions known to me in our own courts; and as between the English cases I confess a strong preference for the narrower construction of these terms 'peril of death,' the one which seems to have been at first held. It is consistent with the original object of admitting these gifts into the English law; it guards the policy of the statute of wills; and prevents frauds and uncertainties of title." This view of the proper construction of the phrase "peril of death," was founded upon the theory that gifts causa mortis were testamentary in their nature. But Gibson, C. J., in Nicholas v. Adams, 2 Whart. 17, held to the contrary, "that these gifts are not testamentary, but, as he describes them, are gifts executed in the first instance by delivery of the thing, though defeasible by reclamation, the contingency of survivorship or deliverance from the peril." By way of comment on the last cited case it has been suggested that, "that able judge (and this is said with great deference) seems to have been misled by a consideration of gifts causa mortis under the civil law. Under that law these gifts formed quite an expanded system. They embraced all cases of gifts made in consideration of mortality, whether made in present danger or not." 3 Del. Ch. 66. See also Prec. in Ch. 269; 2 Ves. Sr. 437; 1 Bligh 533; DONATIO CAUSA MORTIS.

PERILS OF THE SEA. All marine casualties resulting from the violent action of the elements, as distinguished from their natural, silent influence upon the fabric of the vessel. 74 Fed. Rep. 413.

A phrase contained in bills of lading, and a class of dangers to goods carried, the effects of which the carriers do not undertake to insure against in virtue of their general undertaking.

Bills of lading generally contain an exception that the carrier shall not be liable for "perils of the sea." What is the precise import of this phrase is not, perhaps, very exactly settled. In a strict sense, the words perils of the sea denote the natural accidents peculiar to the sea; but in more than one instance they have been held to extend to events not attributable to natural causes.

Perils of the sea denote natural accidents peculiar to that element, which do not happen by the intervention of man, nor are to be prevented by human prudence. It is a loss happening in spite of all human effort and sagacity; 2 Kent 597, approved in 166 U. S. 386. It is said to have a broader signification than the act of God and includes calamities not caused by violence or a convulsion of nature, such as lightning, flood, or tempest; 20 U. S. App. 503, on appeal in 166 U. S. 386, where Fuller, C. J., said that this might be the case, but did not decide the exact point.

The damage must be due to an accident, of a kind peculiar to the sea, directly and exclusively, without any negligence on the part of the ship-owner or his servants, and must not be due to unseaworthiness of the ship when she started on the voyage; Pollock, Bill of Lading Excep. 40. "There must be some casualty, something which could not be foreseen as one of the necessary incidents of the adventure;" 12 App. Cas. 509.

Perils of the sea include a capture by pirates; 9 Allan 810; loss by fire; 26 Conn. 128; 10 N. Y. 431; hidden obstructions in a river, recently brought there by the current; 53 Barb. 499; but see 6 Gratt. 199; loss due to motion of the sea; 41 Fed. Rep. 62; but not by the natural and inevitable action of winds and waves; 12 App. Cas. 509; by a tidal wave and flood of unusual violence; 41 Fed. Rep. 106. Also the following, if the immediate damage is caused by salt water; rolling and pitching of the ship in rough weather; 32 L. T. 847; running ashore in a fog; L. R. 9 Ex. 339; foundering in a collision; 12 App. Cas. 509; rats eating a hole in a ship and letting water in; 12 App. Cas. 527; the destruction of goods at sea by rats has been held a peril of the sea, the carrier not being in default; 1 Binn. 592.

It includes striking on a sunken rock not on the chart, or a rock from which the light has been removed, or an iceberg, or a vessel without lights; 12 App. 514; or a sword fish making a hole in the ship; id. 525.

Where the vessel's main shaft was broken by a cause coming within perils of the sea and by the necessary delays for repairs the cargo was destroyed, and the plaintiff lost the entire freight, it was held that this was a claim consequent on the disabling of the vessel by peril of the sea; 75 L. T. Rep. 155. Where a cargo was damaged by sea water, which, during the voyage, was caused by the giving way of a bolt used to fasten a stanchion, and it appeared that the ship had encountered very heavy weather, but the evidence showed that the stanchion had withstood with much heavier cargo on a former voyage, and there was no fault in the original construction shown, it was held that the loss came within the exemption clause; 14 U. S. App. 628.

The stranding of a steamer by reason of the negligence of a local pilot, by which the anchor dragged and a portion of her cargo was damaged, is a sea peril and the steamer is not responsible for the negligence of the pilot; 38 U. S. App. 50.

It does not include: Restraint of princes and rulers; 100 Mass. 301; 10 Q. B. 517; 22 How. 502; loss by rats; 5 Blatch. 335; 17 Q. B. Div. 670; destruction by vermin in certain seas, where such injury is to be expected; 2 Mass. 429; 12 App. Cas. 524; by worms; 48 Fed. Rep. 463; confiscation of cargo as contraband by a foreign court; 10 Q. B. 517; damage caused by an accident to machinery that would equally have occurred on land under similar condition; 12 App. Cas. 592; retardation of the voyage by which meats are spoiled; L. R. 4 C. P. 206; encountering heavy seas; 42 Fed. Rep. 861.

Where a cargo was damaged by water which reached it through a pipe which had been gnawed by rats, it was held that the ship was responsible for the whole damage to the cargo, less such portion as could be shown affirmatively to have been done by sea peril; 38 U. S. App. 1.

Where the loss might not have occurred but for the unseaworthiness of the ship or the negligence or breach of contract of the owner or master, it would seem that the owner is not exonerated by the fact that the proximate cause of the loss was a peril of the sea; 9 Wall. 684; 14 C. B. N. S. 59.

The mere fact of a collision at sea is not proof that it occurred in such a way as to be a peril of the sea; 11 P. D. 170. The burden of proof is on the shipowner; 56 Fed. Rep. 243; 1 U. S. App. 251; if goods are lost, the presumption is that it was the fault of the carrier; 41 Fed. Rep. 62.

The exception in a charter-party as to dangers of the seas and navigation, is not applicable to the perils which arise from a breach of the ship-owner's obligation; 11 U. S. App. 648. Where the ship-owner, prima facie, appears to have been negligent, it is not enough for him to prove that his ship was seaworthy at the commencement of the voyage; 78 Fed. Rep. 155.

The mere fact that goods are damaged by sea water entering the ship does not create a presumption of damage by peril of the sea even when aided by the presumption of seaworthiness, for the water may still have got in through negligence; 75 Fed. Rep. 74. But where sea perils have been encountered adequate to cause damage to a seaworthy ship and there is general proof of seaworthiness, the damage is presumptively due to such perils; 79 Fed. Rep. 371.

See ACT OF GOD; FORTUITOUS EVENT; PILOT; RESTRAINT OF RULERS; SEAWORTHY.

PERINDE VALERE. A writ of dispensation granted by the pope to a clerk admitted to a benefice, although incapable. Gibs. 87; 3 Burn, Eccl. L. 111.

PERIOD. A stated and recurring interval of time, a round or series of years, by which time is measured. 67 N. Y. 538.

When used to designate an act to be done or to be begun, though its completion may take an uncertain time, as for instance, the act of exportation, it must mean the day on which the exportation commences. 20 How. 579. See TIME.

Any portion of complete time. Anderson. The word has its etymological meaning, but it also has a distinctive signification according to the subject with which it may be used in connection. It may mean any portion of complete time, from a thousand years, or less, to the period of a day.

PERIODICAL. See PERIODICAL PUBLICATION.

PERIODICAL PAYMENTS. Payments occurring periodically, that is, at fixed times from some antecedent obligation and not at variable periods at the discretion of individuals. 42 L. J. Ch. 337.

PERIODICAL PUBLICATIONS. A periodical is a publication appearing at stated intervals, each number of which contains a variety of original articles by different authors, devoted either to general literature of some special branch of learning or to a special class of subjects. Ordinarily each number is incomplete in itself, and indicates a relation with prior or subsequent numbers of the same series. It implies a continuity of literary character, a connection between the different numbers of the series in the nature of the articles appearing in them, whether they be successive chapters of the same story or novel or essays upon subjects pertaining to general literature. If, for instance, one number were devoted to law, another to medicine, another to religion, etc., the publication could not be considered as a periodical as there is no connection between the subjects and no literary continuity. 194 U. S. 97.

A book is readily distinguishable from a periodical, not only because it usually has a more substantial binding, (although this is by no means essential), but in the fact that it ordinarily contains a story, essay or poem, or a collection of such, by the same author, although even this is by no means universal, as books frequently contain articles by different authors. Books are not often issued periodically, and, if so, their periodicity is not an element of their character. The fact that a publication is issued at stated intervals, under a collective name, does not necessarily make it a periodical. Id.; 97, 98.

The noun periodical, according to the nice shade of meaning given to it by popular speech, conveys at least a suggestion if not a promise of matter on a variety of topics, and certainly implies that no single number is contemplated as forming a book by itself. 226 U. S. 59.

Generally a printed publication is a book when its contents are complete in themselves, deal with a single subject, betray no need of continuation, and, perhaps, have an appreciable size. Id.

PERIODICAL WORK. Within the copyright act, 5 & 6 Vict., one that comes out from time to time and is miscellaneous in its articles; 16 L. J. Ch. 142; but a newspaper has been held not a periodical within that act; 39 L. J. Ch. 182; L. R. 9 Eq. 324; contra, 50 L. J. Ch. 621; 17 Ch. D. 708.

PERIPHRAISIS. Circumlocution; the use of other words to express the sense of one.

Some words are so technical in their meaning that in charging offences in indictments they must be used or the indictment will not be sustained; for example, an indictment for treason must contain the word traitorously; an indictment for burglary, burglariously; and feloniously must be introduced into every indictment for felony; 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 242; Co. 3d Inst. 15; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 172; 4 Bla. Com. 307; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); Com. Dig. Indictment (G 6); Cro. Car. c. 37.

PERISH. To come to an end; to cease to be; to die.

What has never existed cannot be said to have perished.

When two or more persons die by the same accident, as a shipwreck, no presumption arises that one perished before the other.

PERISHABLE. Subject to speedy decay. 31 Conn. 498.

PERISHABLE GOODS. Goods which are lessened in value and become worse by being kept.

Losses due to the natural decay, deterioration, and waste of perishable goods in the hands of a carrier are excusable. Reference must always be had, however, to the nature and inherent qualities of the articles in question, their unavoidable exposure at the time and place, and under the general circumstances, while in the charge of a carrier of ordinary prudence, and their condition when entrusted to him; Schoul. Bail. 397; 31 Am. Rep. 567.

In admiralty practice, property in its nature perishable, or liable to deterioration, injury, or decay, may be sold pending suit and the proceeds brought into court to abide the event of the suit; or the court may order it appraised and deliver it to the claimant, upon his paying into court such sum of money, or giving such bond as the court may direct; Bened. Adm. § 444; Adm. Rule 10; 1 Gall. 448, 476.

There is a similar practice in equity and in most of the states such property when taken in execution or under attachment, on petition may be ordered sold, pending suit; in which case the proceeds of sale are held in place of the property. See COMMON CARRIERS.

In order to authorize the court to order property levied upon under a warrant of attachment, to be sold as being perishable, it must appear that such property is inherently liable to deterioration and decay and it is not sufficient to show that it will depreciate in value because of changes in fashion; 25 Hun 367. Fattened cattle are perishable property; 3 Munf. 288; also potatoes; 16 Me. 208; skins and furs; 7 Cow. 202; kid gloves; 25 Hun 367; but not merchantable corn; 54 Ill. 67. The doctrine applies to real estate in litigation and liable to deteriorate; 26 N. J. Eq. 269.

PERJURY. In Criminal Law. The wilful assertion as to a matter of fact, opinion, belief, or knowledge, made by a witness in a judicial proceeding as part of his evidence, either upon oath or in any form allowed by law to be substituted for an oath, whether such evidence is given in open court, or in an affidavit, or otherwise, such assertion being known to such witness to be false, and being intended by him to mislead the court, jury, or person holding the proceeding. 2 Whart. C. L. § 1244.

The wilful giving, under oath, in a judicial proceeding or course of justice, of false testimony material to the issue or point of inquiry. 2 Bish. N. Cr. Law § 1015.

It consists in swearing wilfully and corruptly to some matter which is untrue. 63 Vt. 201.

The intention must be wilful. The oath must be taken and the falsehood asserted with deliberation and a consciousness of the nature of the statement made; for if it has arisen in consequence of inadvertency, surprise, or mistake of the import of the question, there was no corrupt motive;

Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 2; Cro. Eliz. 492; 4 McLean 113; 3 Dav. 114; 7 C. & P. 17; 11 Q. B. 1028; 1 Rob. Va. 729; 3 Ala. N. S. 602; 74 Cal. 806. But one who swears wilfully and deliberately to a matter which he really believes, and which is false, and which he had no probable cause for believing, is guilty of perjury; 6 Binn. 249. See Baldw. 370; 1 Bail. 50; 4 McLean 118. And so is one who swears falsely, though he testifies against his will; 98 Ky. 528. Where a bankrupt, having submitted the facts fairly to his counsel, swore to a schedule wrongly made out on his advice, it was not perjury; 3 McLean 573.

The oath must be false. The party must believe that what he is swearing to is fictitious; and if, intending to deceive, he asserts that which may happen to be done without any knowledge of the fact, he is equally criminal, and the accidental truth of his evidence will not excuse him; Co. 3d Inst. 166; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 6; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 437. See 4 Mo. 47; 4 Zab. 455; 9 Barb. 587; 1 C. & K. 519; 15 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 118. As, if a man swears that C D revoked his will in his presence; if he really had revoked it, but it was unknown to the witness that he had done so, it is perjury; Hetl. 97. Knowledge by a witness that his testimony is false, is tested, like intention generally, by sound mind and discretion, and by all the circumstances; soundness of mind, where nothing to the contrary appears, being assumed; 83 Ga. 521.

The party must be lawfully sworn. The person by whom the oath is administered must have competent authority to receive it; an oath, therefore, taken before a private person, or before an officer having no jurisdiction, will not amount to perjury. "For where the court hath no authority to hold plea of the cause, but it is coram non iudice, there perjury cannot be committed." 1 Ind. 233; 1 Johns. 498; 3 M'Cord 308; 3 C. & P. 419; 4 Hawks 182; 1 N. & M'C. 546; 2 Hayw. 56; 8 Pick. 453; 12 Q. Where a defect in the proceedings is waived, perjury may be committed; 135 Ill. 416. A false affidavit will be perjury where the officer who administered the oath was a minor, in the absence of a statutory disqualification of minors from holding office; 35 Tex. Cr. Rep. 243.

The proceedings must be judicial; 5 Mo. 21; 1 Bail. 595; 11 Metc. 406; 5 Humph. 85; 1 Johns. 49; Wright, Ohio 173; R. & R. 459. Proceedings before those who are in any way intrusted with the administration of justice, in respect of any matter regularly before them, are considered as judicial for this purpose; 2 Russ. Cr. 518; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 69, s. 3. See 9 Pet. 233; 11 Conn. 408; 4 M'Cord 165. Perjury cannot be committed where the matter is not regularly before the court; 4 Hawks 182; 2 Hayw. 56; 8 Pick. 453; 1 N. & M'C. 546; 9 Mo. 824; 18 Barb. 407; 26 Me. 33; 7 Blackf. 25; 5 B. & Ald. 634. An oath not administered pursuant to, or required or authorized by, any law, cannot be made the basis of a charge of perjury; 41 Minn. 59.

The assertion must be absolute. If a man, however, swears that he believes that to be true which he knows to be false, it will be perjury; 10 Q. B. 670; 2 W. Bla. 881; 1 Leach 232; 6 Binn. 249. It is immaterial whether the testimony is given in answer to a question or voluntarily; 3 Zab. 49; 12 Metc. 225. Perjury cannot be assigned upon the valuation, under oath, of a jewel or other thing the value of which consists in estimation; Sid. 146; 1 Kebl. 510. But in some cases a false statement of opinion may become perjury; 10 Q. B. 670; 15 Ill. 357; 3 Ala. N. S. 602; 3 Strobb. 147; 1 Leach. C. C. 325; 9 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 161.

The oath must be material to the question depending; 1 Term 68; 12 Mass. 274; 8 Murph. 128; 4 Mo. 47; 2 Ill. 80; 9 Miss. 140; 6 Pa. 170; 2 Cush. 212; 40 Kan. 681; 98 N. C. 759; 64 Cal. 106. See 23 Neb. 496;

111 Mo. 464; 14 Fed. Rep. 447. Where the facts sworn to are wholly foreign from the purpose and altogether immaterial to the matter in question, the oath does not amount to perjury; 2 Russ. Cr. 521; Co. 3d Inst. 187; 8 Ves. 35; Bac. Abr. Perjury (A); 2 N. & M.C. 18; 2 Mo. 158; 95 Cal. 657. But all false statements wilfully and corruptly made by a witness as to matters which affect his credit are material; [1895] 1 Q. B. 797; and so is every question in cross-examination which goes to the credit of a witness, as, whether he has been before convicted of felony; 3 C. & K. 28; 1 C. & M. 855. And see 10 Mod. 195; 8 Rich. 456; 9 Mo. 824; 12 Metc. 225; 28 Tex. Ap. 301. False evidence, whereby, on the trial of a cause, the judge is induced to admit other material evidence, even though the latter evidence is afterwards withdrawn by counsel, or though it was not legally receivable, is indictable as perjury; 2 Den. C. C. 302; 3 C. & K. 302.

It is perjury where the witness swears falsely in giving evidence legally inadmissible, but which becomes material by being introduced in evidence; 5 Okl. 173.

The materiality of the false oath is for the court and not for the jury; 54 Fed. Rep. 488; 97 Cal. 224; 1 Okl. 336.

A defendant in a criminal prosecution, who testifies in his own behalf and of his own accord, is guilty of perjury if he testifies falsely. He is to be treated the same as any other witness; 115 N. C. 712; 33 Tex. Cr. Rep. 314; id. 67; 57 Kan. 431.

Where one person arranges with another to commit perjury, both are in pari delicto; 135 U. S. 483. An attempt to induce a person to commit perjury on the contemplated trial of an indictment not yet returned, has been held not to be subornation of perjury; 187 Mo. 289.

Punishment of perjury is provided for by statutes in all the states, and also by the United States when it is committed in any proceeding by or under federal laws; U. S. R. S. §§ 5392-5396. For a form of indictment approved as correct in every substantial part, see 159 U. S. 682.

The power of punishing witnesses for testifying falsely in a judicial proceeding belongs peculiarly to the government in whose tribunals that proceeding is had; 134 U. S. 372. In general, it may be observed that a perjury is committed as well by making a false affirmation as a false oath. See OATH.

R. S. § 5392, provides that every person taking an oath before a competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any case in which a law of the United States authorizes an oath to be administered, that he will testify, declare, depose, or certify truly, or that any written testimony, etc., by him subscribed is true, who wilfully, and contrary to such oath, states or subscribes any material matter which he does not believe to be true, is guilty of perjury, punishable by a fine of not more than $2,000 and imprisonment at hard labor for not more than five years, and is rendered incapable of testifying in any court of the United States until the judgment against him is reversed.

It is unnecessary in an indictment for perjury under R. S. § 5396 to set out the affidavit at length; 50 Fed. Rep. 915.

PERMANENT. This word does not always embrace the idea of absolute perpetuity; 8 Barb. 185; or forever or lasting forever, or existing forever; 136 U. S. 393; 3 N. J. Eq. 153; but where the citizens of a locality are induced to give large sums of money for the establishment of an educational institution, it means that the place agreed on shall be the site of the institution so long as it shall endure; 8 Barb. 186.

PERMANENT ABODE. A domicile, a home, which a party is at liberty to leave, as interest or whim may dictate, but without any present intention of changing it. 78 Ill. 181. See NON-RESIDENT; DOMICIL; HOME; ABODE.

PERMANENT EMPLOYMENT. Employment for an indefinite time which may be severed by either party. 81 Cal. 596; 12 Bush 541; 4 C. B. 479.

PERMANENT INABILITY TO LABOR. "Permanent inability to labor" is not the precise equivalent of "permanent reduction in his power to earn money." 121 Ky. 203, 89 S. W. 132.

PERMANENT STRUCTURE. When a structure is of a durable character, evidently intended to last indefinitely, it may be regarded as a "permanent structure." 136 Ky. 323, 124 S. W. 337.

PERMANENT TRESPASS. A trespass consisting of trespasses of one and the same kind, committed on several days, which are, in their nature, capable of renewal or continuation, and are actually renewed or continued from day to day, so that the particular injury done on each particular day cannot be distinguished from what was done on another day. In declaring for such trespasses, they may be laid with a continuando; 8 Bla. Com. 212; Bac. Abr. Trespass (B 2, 12); 1 Saund. 24, n. 1; Poll. Torts 482. See CONTINUANDO; TRESPASS.

PERMISSION. A license to do a thing; an authority to do an act which without such authority would have been unlawful. A permission differs from a law: it is a check upon the operations of the law. A negation of law, arising either from the law's silence, or its express declaration. Ruth. Nat. L. b. 1, c. 1.

Express permissions derogate from something which before was forbidden, and may operate in favor of one or more persons, or for the performance of one or more acts, or for a longer or shorter time.

Implied permissions are those which arise from the fact that the law has not forbidden the act to be done.

PERMISSIVE. Allowed; that which may be done: as, permissive waste, which is the permitting real estate to go to waste. When a tenant is bound to repair, he is punishable for permissive waste. See WASTE.

PERMISSIVE LETTERS. In a note by the secretary of the navy, October 1, 1881, this term was used as indicating an authority something less than a grant of letters of marque. See 2 Hall. Int. L. Baker's ed. 120.

PERMISSIVE WASTE. That kind of waste which is a matter of omission only; as by suffering a house to fall for want of necessary repairs. 2 Bl. Com. 281.

PERMIT. A license or warrant to do something not forbidden by law: as to land goods imported into the United States, after the duties have been paid or secured to be paid. Act of Congr. March 2, 1799, s. 49, cl. 2. See form of such a permit, Gordon Dig. App. II. 46.

It denotes a decided assent; 105 Ill. 558. It may mean suffer; 7 Ch. Div. 145; although it is more positive than allow or suffer; 105 Ill. 558. It implies consent given or leave granted; 4 Bosw. 891. It has been defined to mean allow by not prohibiting. 9 Allen 266. Every definition of suffer or permit includes knowledge of what is to be done under the sufferance or permission and intention that what is done was what was to be done; 17 Blatch. 335.

PERMUTATION. In Civil Law. Exchange; barter.

This contract is formed by the consent of the parties; but delivery is indispensable, for without it it is a mere agreement. Dig. 81. 77. 4; Code 4. 64. 8.

Permutation differs from sale in this, that in the former a delivery of the articles sold must be made, while in the latter it is unnecessary. It agrees with the contract of sale, however, in the following particulars: that he to whom the delivery is made acquires the right or faculty of prescribing; Dig. 41. 8. 4. 17; that the contracting parties are bound to guarantee to each other the title of the things delivered; Code 4. 64. 1; and that they are bound to take back the things delivered when they have latent defects which they have concealed; Dig. 21. 1. 68. See Aso & M. Inst. b. 2, t. 16, c. 1; MUTATION; TRANSFER.

PERMUTATIONE. A writ to an ordinary commanding him to admit a clerk to a benefice upon exchange made with another. Cow.; Moz. & W.

PERNANCY (from Fr. prendre, to take). A taking or receiving.

PERNOR OF PROFITS. He who receives the profits of lands, etc. A cestui qui use, who is legally entitled and actually does receive the profits, is the pernor of profits. Termes de la Ley.

PERPARS. A part of the inheritance. Flota.

PERPETRATOR. Within the meaning of a statute giving an action against the perpetrator of an act, where a servant of a railroad company is killed through the negligence of a fellow-servant, the company itself may be regarded as the perpetrator. 38 Ia. 47.

PERPETUAL. That which is to last without limitation as to time: as, a perpetual statute, which is one without limit as to time, although not expressed to be so.

PERPETUAL CURACY. The office of a curate in a parish where there is no spiritual rector or vicar, but where the curate is appointed to officiate by the impropriator. 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 55.

The church of which the curate is perpetual. 2 Ves. Sen. 425. See 2 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 695; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 55; 9 Ad. & E. 556. As to whether such curate may be removed, see 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 55.

PERPETUAL EDICT. In Roman Law. An edict issued by the praetor on taking office. It was intended to be valid for the whole term of his year of office. Sohm, Rom. L. 51.

PERPETUAL INJUNCTION. Opposed to an injunction ad interim; an injunction which finally disposes of the suit, and is indefinite in point of time. See INJUNCTION.

PERPETUAL SUCCESSION. The continuous existence which enables a corporation to manage its affairs and hold property without the necessity of conveyances for the purpose of transmitting it. By reason of this quality, this ideal and artificial person remains, in its legal entity and personality, the same, though frequent changes may be made of its members; and although all of its members may be changed, and new ones substituted for the old, it still legally remains the same. Field, Corp. § 50; 5 Mo. App. 340.

PERPETUATING TESTIMONY. The act by which testimony is reduced to writing as prescribed by law, so that the same shall be read in evidence in some suit or legal proceedings to be thereafter instituted.

The origin of this practice may be traced to the canon law, cap. 5, X ut lite non contestata, etc. Bookmer, n. 4; 8 Toullier, n. 22. Statutes exist in most of the states for this purpose. Equity also furnishes means, to a limited extent, for the same purpose.

PERPETUITY. Any limitation tending to take the subject of it out of commerce for a longer period than a life or lives in being, and twenty-one years beyond, and, in case of a posthumous child, a few months more, allowing for the term of gestation. Randall, Perp. 48.

Such a limitation of property as renders it inalienable beyond the period allowed by law. Gilbert, Uses, Sugd. ed. 900, n.

"A future limitation, whether executory or by way of remainder, and of real or personal property, which is not to vest till after the expiration of or which will not necessarily vest within, the period prescribed by law for the creation of future estates, and which is not destructible by the person for the time being entitled to the property subject to the future limitation, except with the concurrence of the person interested in the contingent event." Lewis, Perpetuities ch. 12. This was said by Gibson, C. J., to be the nearest approach to a perfect definition of a perpetuity; 10 Pa. 334.

It is suggested that some confusion has arisen in connection with the law of perpetuities because of a certain ambiguity in the legal definition of the term itself. "The original meaning of a perpetuity is an inalienable, indestructible interest. The second artificial meaning is, an interest which will not vest to a remote period. This latter is the meaning which is attached to the term when the rule against perpetuities is spoken of;" Gray, Perp. § 140. The author last cited considers it a matter of regret that the rule should not have been known as the rule against remoteness, rather than the rule as against perpetuities.

The comment was made upon this statement that notwithstanding the declaration quoted from this author, "yet in all his illustrations he shows that interests which were destructible were not perpetuities"; 121 Pa. 205; where it is held that indestructibility of the estate of the person, for the time being entitled to the property, is essential to constitute a perpetuity.

The following is suggested as the true form of the rule: "No interest subject to a condition precedent is good, unless the condition must be fulfilled, if at all, within twenty-one years after some life in being at the creation of the interest;" Gray, Perp. 301. A later work adheres more closely to the familiar phraseology (a course which has great advantages in the discussion of common-law rules of decision), in defining it as a rule which "forbids the postponement of the vesting of real or personal property for an estate in fee-simple, in tail or absolute interest, during a longer period than lives in being and twenty-one years after, an extension being allowed for gestation if gestation exists;" Brett, L. Cas. Mod. Eq. 47. See, also, 7 Cra. 456; 113 U. S. 340; L. R. 44 Ch. D. 85. The rule against perpetuities as distinguished from that against making estates indefinitely inalienable, concerns itself only with the vesting or assignment of estates and not with their termination; 90 Me. 318; and when properly so limited, it is applicable to a gift in trust for charity; id. An interesting case in Colorado holds that notwithstanding statutory adoption, in that state, of the common law prior to 4 James I., English decisions after that year are to be regarded as authority in determining what the common law as to perpetuities was at that time; 23 Colo. 40; s. c. 35 L. R. A. 41.

The rule against perpetuities is one of decision only, and in England is affected only by statute under what is known as the Thelluson Act, the passage of which was occasioned by litigation arising under the will of Peter Thelluson who died in 1797. See Thelluson v. Woodford, 4 Ves. Jr. 227; 11 Ves. 112. For the text of the act see Gray, Perp. Appx. B. note; and for the history of the litigation which led to it, see Hargrave, Thelluson Case ch. 1.

The act was directed against trusts for accumulation. Such a trust which violates the rule against perpetuities is wholly void, but one which is good within the rule might violate the Thelluson Act and be void for the excess; Gray, Perp. § 867. The act prohibits accumulations other than during four distinct periods, the language being: "For any longer term than the life or lives of any such grantor or grantors, settlor or settlers; or the term of twenty-one years from the death of any such grantor, settlor, devisor, or testator; or during the minority or respective minorities of any person or persons who shall be living, or en ventre sa mere at the time of the death of such grantor, devisor, or testator; or during the minority or respective minorities only of any person or persons who, under the uses or trusts of the deed, surrender, will, or other assurances directing such accumulations, would, for the time being, if of full age, be entitled unto the rents, issues and profits, or the interest, dividends, or annual produce so directed to be accumulated." And only one of these periods can be taken; 16 Sim. 391; 25 Ch. D. 739. In Pennsylvania there is a statute of the same kind, Act 1853, Apr. 18, § 9, the text of which will be found in Gray, Perp. Appx. B. In Alabama accumulations are prohibited for more than ten years, or to the termination of minority in case of a minor in being at the date of conveyance or death of the testator.

The legislation in the United States on the subject of perpetuities has been classified as of three kinds: 1. A general provision that perpetuities shall not be allowed. 2. A short and simple statute declaring or modifying the law. 3. An elaborate scheme to be substituted for the common law.

The first class consists mainly of constitutional provisions in Arkansas, North Carolina, Tennessee, Texas, and Vermont. A similar provision existed formerly in Florida, being omitted in the last constitution. The second class includes Georgia, Iowa, and Kentucky, with statutes properly declaratory of the common law; and Alabama, Connecticut, Indiana, Mississippi, Ohio, Pennsylvania, where the common-law rule is somewhat modified. The third class embraces the states which have followed, in the main, the New York statute, providing against, (1) remoteness of interests in land; (2) accumulation of land and profits therefrom; (3) the same as to personal property. Michigan and Minnesota have followed the first and second parts of the New York system, and Indiana substantially the whole of it. The prohibition of this legislation is against a restraint upon the power of alienation for more than two lives in being at the creation of the estate.

But in Indiana, California, and Dakota, where the New York system to a large extent was followed, the restraint was not confined to two existing lives. In Wisconsin, where the New York statute was first followed exactly, in 1887, the period was extended to two lives in being and twenty-one years thereafter. See Gray, Perp. Appx. B. & C.; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 1440. The rule affects both legal and equitable interests and real and personal estate; it is not of feudal origin, but the outgrowth of necessities of modern times; and while strictly applied, regard is had rather to substance than form; Gray, Perp. §§ 202, 203.

Under the common-law rule there is no limit to the number of lives that can be taken; 11 Ves. 148.

In the application of the rule, a child en ventre sa mere is to be considered as born when necessary for its own benefit; 2 H. Bla. 399; but not for that of third persons; 3 De G. J. & S. 666. The principle controlling the allowance of the period of gestation under the rule is, that life begins from conception and it is sufficient if the person entitled to a future interest at majority is begotten though not born within a life in being at its creation; Gray, Perp. § 220. This principle has been extended to allow two periods of gestation; 7 Term 100; and it has been a subject of discussion whether three might be allowed; 8 Yo. & Coll. 328; Lewis, Perp. 726; Gray, Perp. § 223. The time runs only from testator's death; id. § 231; Lewis, Perp. Suppl. 27. Where a future interest is void as against the rule, prior limitations will be treated precisely as if the void limitation had been omitted; 8 Gray 143; 4 Ves. Jr. 427; 88 Wis. 617. See an extended note classifying and analyzing the cases, 20 L. R. A. 509. Subsequent limitations following an interest too remote were held by Sugden, L. C., to fail. The authorities relied upon for this view are, his argument as counsel in Beard v. Westcott, 5 B. & Ald. 801; and his decision as chancellor in Monypenny v. Dering, 2 De G. M. & G.

145. In Beard v. Westcott, the limitation was held good in the common pleas; 5 Taunt. 398; and bad in the king's bench; 5 B. & Ald. 801. The latter view is seriously controverted as not supported by the authorities cited in Sugden's argument; Gray, Perp. §§ 251-257; Lewis, Perp. 421, 661.

A vested interest is not subject to the rule, and therefore it does not affect reversions and vested remainders and analogous equitable interests and interests in personality; Gray, Perp. § 205. Whether contingent remainders are so has been the subject of much discussion involving the mooted question of limiting a possibility upon a possibility. That they are within the rule is contended by many authorities; Gray, Perp. §§ 284-298, where it is earnestly contended that contingent remainders and all future interests should fall within the rule, which conclusion is also supported by Lewis, Perp. c. 16, Suppl. 97. See, also, 20 Ch. D. 562; 1 Jarm. Wills 255, 260; 2 id. 545; Theobald, Wills 424; 46 N. H. 230; 60 L. T. 247; 69 id. 360; 1 Hayes, Conv. 474; contra, Wms. R. P. 6th Am. ed. 294; Chaslin, R. P. 90, 159; 8 Jurist, pt. 2, p. 20, 283; 4 D. & W. 1; s. c. 2 H. L. Cas. 198. See L. R. 43 Ch. D. 246.

The rule applies to personal property; Lewis, Perp. 613; Gray, Perp. § 815; and equitable interests are affected by analogy to legal estates; those vested are subject, and those not vested are not subject to the rule; id. §§ 322, 323. The rule against perpetuities does not affect contracts unless they are such as create rights of property; id. § 329; L. R. 43 Ch. D. 265. The rule is not applicable to a resulting trust which arises on the failure of an estate granted for a particular use which has ceased; 185 U. S. 342; nor to a power to sell, upon the expiration of an estate tail, and divide the proceeds among persons then ascertainable; 166 U. S. 83.

The statutes against perpetuities were directed at private trusts and accumulations and not at public, charitable, or eleemosynary trusts or uses; 107 U. S. 174; 95 id. 303; 3 Pet. 99; 15 How. 367; 6 Paige 639. The rule cannot be invoked to defeat a charitable use; 68 Fed. Rep. 790; but a gift for the encouragement of yacht-racing is not such a use and may therefore be void as a perpetuity; [1895] 2 Ch. 657.

If a gift by will to a class is void as to one of the class because against the rules as to perpetuities, it is void as to all; 124 Pa. 10.

Mr. Justice Powell, in Scattergood v. Edge, 12 Mod. 278, distinguished perpetuities into two sorts, absolute and qualified; meaning thereby, as it is apprehended, a distinction between a plain, direct, and palpable perpetuity, and the case where an estate is limited on a contingency, which might happen within a reasonable compass of time, but where the estate, nevertheless, from the nature of the limitation, might be kept out of commerce longer than was thought agreeable to the policy of the common law. But this distinction would not now lead to a better understanding or explanation of the subject, for whether an estate be so limited that it cannot take effect until a period too much protracted, or whether on a contingency which may happen within a moderate compass of time, it equally falls within the line of perpetuity, and the limitation is therefore void; for it is not sufficient that an estate may vest within the time allowed, but the rule requires that it must; Randall, Perp. 49; 48 Conn. 298; 7 Sim. 173; 10 Allen 1; Schoul. Wills § 21; 124 Pa. 10. See Cruise, Dig. tit. 32, c. 23; 1 Belt, Suppl. to Ves. Jr. 406; 2 Ves. 357; 3 Saund. 398; Com. Dig. Chancery (4 G 1); 8 Ch. Cas. 1; 86 Tenn. 648.

Under statutes of the New York class, a devise which suspends the power of alienation for a specific time, not measured by two lives, but by a term of years, is void; 5 App. Div. 318; 74 Hun 297. That a contingency may arise which will make the estate alienable is immaterial, but the validity of the provision must be determined independently of any possible agreement of parties; 157 Mass. 362; but a power is not rendered void because by its terms an appointment might possibly be made which would not take effect within the required period; 136 Pa. 354.

PERQUISITES. In its most extensive sense, perquisites signifies anything gotten by industry or purchased with money, different from that which descends from a father or ancestor. Bract. l. 2, c. 30, n. 3; l. 4, c. 22. In a more limited sense, it means something gained by a place or office beyond the regular salary or fee.

PERSON. A man considered according to the rank he holds in society, with all the right to which the place he holds entitles him, and the duties which it imposes. 1 Bouv. Inst. n. 137; 134 N. Y. 506.

The term is, however, more extensive than man. It may include artificial beings, as corporations; 2 Ill. 178; 1 Bla. Com. 123; 4 Bingh. 669; 1 Mod. 164; 23 N. Y. 242; 48 Ga. 321; quasi-corporations; Sedgw. Stat. & Const. L. 372; L. R. 5 App. Cas. 857; territorial corporations; 53 Conn. 507; and foreign corporations; 80 N. Y. 259; under statutes, forbidding the taking of property without due process of law and giving to all persons the equal protection of the laws; 169 U. S. 466, citing 118 id. 394; 142 id. 386; 165 id. 150; concerning claimants arising from Indian depredations; 164 U. S. 686; relating to taxation and the revenue laws; 1 Bush 250; 80 N. Y. 254; to attachments; 20 Conn. 416; usurious contracts; 7 How. (Miss.) 508; 13 Conn. 249; applying to limitation of actions; 20 N. Y. 210; 4 Kan. 453; and concerning the admissibility as a witness of a party in his own behalf when the opposite party is a living person; 22 N. Y. 352; 31 Barb. 267. A corporation is also a person under a penal statute; 11 Wheat. 392. See RAILROAD.

It has been held that when the word person is used in a legislative act, natural persons will be intended unless something appear in the context to show that it applies to artificial persons; 2 Ill. 178; 112 Pa. 337; but as a rule corporations will be considered persons within the statutes unless the intention of the legislature is manifestly to exclude them; 5 Rand. (Va.) 132.

A county is a person in a legal sense; 53 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 711; but a sovereignty is not; 52 N. Y. 535; 44 Fed. Rep. 17; 94 U. S. 315; but contra within the meaning of a statute, providing a penalty for the fraudulent alteration of a public record with intent that any "person" be defrauded; 24 Tex. 61; and within the meaning of a covenant for quiet and peaceful possession against all and every person or persons; 19 Mont. 268. B. 109; a dog will not be included in the word in an act which authorizes a person to kill dogs running at large; 34 Mich. 283.

It includes women; 136 Mass. 580; 50 Conn. 181; 16 Col. 441; 25 Ohio St. 21; 76 Mich. 1; 74 Ga. 795; but see 39 Wis. 232; 55 Ill. 535, where the statute was in reference to admission to the bar, and it was held that, while the term was broad enough to include them, such a construction could not be presumed to be the legislative intent.

Where the statute prohibited any person from pursuing his usual vocation on the Lord's Day, it was held to apply to a judge holding court; 49 Ga. 436.

A child en ventre sa mere is not a person;

138 Mass. 14; but an infant is so considered; 131 id. 441.

In the United States Bankruptcy Act of 1898, it is provided that the word "persons" shall include corporations, except where otherwise specified, and officers, partnerships, and women, and, when used with reference to the commission of acts which are therein forbidden, shall include persons who are participants in the forbidden acts, and the agents, officers, and members of the board of directors or trustees, or their

Having Custody or Control. A third person permitted by the officers of election to inspect a ballot, or who by force took a ballot within his control, "is a person having custody or control" of a ballot, within meaning of Statutes, § 1476, making it a felony for any person intrusted with the custody or control of a ballot to mutilate or place distinguishing marks thereon. 137 Ky. 465, 125 S. W. 1083.

See EXTRADITION; WHITE PERSON.

PERSONA (Lat.) In Civil Law. Character, in virtue of which certain rights belong to a man and certain duties are imposed upon him. Thus, one man may unite many characters (personae); as, for example, the characters of father and son, of master and servant; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 117.

In its original signification, a mask; afterwards, a man in reference to his condition or character (status). Vicat, Voc. Jur. It is used metaphorically of things, among which are counted slaves. It is often opposed to res; as, actio in personam and actio in rem.

Power and right belonging to a person in a certain character (pro jure et potestate personae competente). Vicat, Voc. Jur. Its use is not confined to the living, but is extended to the dead and to angels. Id. A statue in a fountain whence water gushes.

PERSONA GRATA. In International Law. A diplomatic representative who is personally acceptable to the sovereign or government to which he is accredited. Opposed to 'persona non grata', one who is not thus acceptable. Stand. Dict.

PERSONA NON GRATA. See PERSONA GRATA.

PERSONA STANDI IN JUDICIO (L. Lat.). Capacity of standing in court or in judgment; capacity to be a party to an action; capacity or ability to sue.

PERSONAL. Belonging to the person. See THINGS PERSONAL.

PERSONAL ACTION. In Practice. In the Civil Law. An action in which one person (the actor) sues another (the reus) in respect of some obligation which he is under to the actor either ex contractu or ex delicto. It will be seen that this includes all actions against a person, without reference to the nature of the property involved. In a limited sense of the word action in the civil law, it includes only personal action, all others being called petitions. See REAL ACTION.

In the Common Law. An action brought for the recovery of personal property, for the enforcement of some contract or to recover damages for its breach, or for the recovery of damages for the commission of an injury to the person or property. Such arise either upon contracts as, account, assumpsit, covenant, debt, and detinue (see these words), or for wrongs, injuries, or torts, as trespass, trespass on the case, replevin, trover (see these words). Other divisions of personal actions are made in the various states; in Vermont and Connecticut an action is in use called the action of book debt. See PERSONAL PROPERTY.

PERSONAL ASSETS. See ASSETS.

PERSONAL CHATTELS. See CHATTELS.

PERSONAL CONTRACT. A contract as to personal property. A covenant (or contract) personal relates only to matters personal as distinguished from real, and is binding on the covenantor (contractor) during his life, and on his personal representatives after his decease, in respect of assets. 3 Co. 22 a.

PERSONAL COVENANT. A covenant which binds only the covenantor and his personal representatives in respect to assets, and can be taken advantage of only by the covenantee.

A covenant which must be performed by the covenantor in person. Fitzh. N. B. 340.

All covenants are either personal or real; but some confusion exists in regard to the division between them. Thus, a covenant may be personal as regards the covenantor, and real as regards the covenantee; and different definitions have been given, according to whether the rights and liabilities of the covenantor or the covenantee have been in consideration. It is apprehended, however, that the prevalent modern usage is to hold a covenant real, if it is real,—that is, runs with the land so as to apply to an assignee, either as regards the covenantor or the covenantee. See Platt, Cov. 61; 4 Bla. Com. 304; 8 N. J. 260; 7 Gray 83. See COVENANT.

PERSONAL EFFECTS. In a will, the words are held not to include personal property in the testator's house, such as furniture and pictures. 173 Pa. 368. See WILL.

PERSONAL ESTATE. The term is sometimes used as synonymous with personal property, but its use should not lead to the supposition that there can be any such thing as an estate in personality, properly so called. Will. Pers. Prop. 8.

But Dicey (Conf. Laws, Moore's ed. 811) considers personal estate and personal property synonymous. They are so used in Acts of Parliament. See REAL ESTATE.

PERSONAL FREIGHT. The "personal freight" of parties means freight owned by them individually. 137 Ky. 216, 125 S. W. 302.

PERSONAL GOODS. That property which passes by hand and property which marriage passed from the wife to the husband. Co. Litt. 185 b. See PERSONAL PROPERTY.

PERSONAL INJURY. Bodily injury. 45 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 803.

PERSONAL LIABILITY. The statutory liability of stockholders of corporations by which they are held individually liable for the debts of the corporation. See STOCKHOLDERS; JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

PERSONAL LIBERTY. Freedom from physical and personal restraint; the right to the pursuit of happiness; freedom to go where one chooses and to pursue such lawful occupations as may seem suitable.

In its broad sense personal liberty would include freedom from unlawful arrest and restraint, from unlawful seizures and searches, from assault and battery, from libel and slander, from general warrants of arrest, from unfair monopolies in trade, and from quartering soldiers in time of peace; and it would include also the right of trial by jury, liberty of conscience.

freedom of the press, the right to travel and emigrate, to bear arms and to petition the government for redress of grievances. But in its stricter sense it includes only freedom to move about as one pleases and to pursue any lawful calling. 94 U. S. 143; 4 Am. St. Rep. 468; 16 Wall. 106; 111 U. S. 757; 99 N. Y. 377; 50 Am. Rep. 636. See CONSTITUTIONAL; POLICE POWER; ASSAULT; CORRECTION; IMPRISONMENT; HABEAS CORPUS; EXPATRIATION; PHYSICAL EXAMINATION; SEARCH; PRELIMINARY EXAMINATIONS; LIBERTY OF CONTRACT; LIBERTY.

PERSONAL MALICE. See PARTICULAR MALICE.

PERSONAL PROPERTY. The right or interest which a man has in things personal.

The right or interest less than a freehold which a man has in realty, or any right or interest which he has in things movable.

Personal property is to be distinguished from things personal. There may be, for example, a personal estate in realty, as chattels real; but the only property which a man can have in things personal must be a personal property. The essential idea of personal property is that of property in a thing movable or separable from the realty, or of perishability or possibility of brief duration of interest as compared with the owner's life, in a thing real, without any action on the part of the owner. See 2 Bla. Com. 14 and notes, 384 and notes.

It includes money, chattels, things in action and evidence of debt; 62 Hun 298; 2 S. Dak. 226; 129 Md. 595; and the right which a vendor has to enforce a contract for the sale of real property; 133 N. Y. 383. It does not include dogs untaxed; 79 Ind. 9.

A crop growing in the ground is personal property so far as not to be considered an interest in land, under the statute of frauds; 12 Me. 337; 5 B. & C. 829; 9 id. 561; 10 Ail. & E. 753; 117 Ind. 56, 58.

It is a general principle of American law that stock in corporations is to be considered as personal property; Walker, Am. Law, 9th ed. Sec. 3; 4 Dane, Abr. 670; 1 Hill, R. P. 18; 76 Cal. 536; though it was held that such stock was real estate; 2 Conn. 567; but the rule was then changed by the legislature.

Title to personal property is acquired—first, by original acquisition by occupancy; as, by capture in war, by finding a lost thing; second, by original acquisition by accession; third, by original acquisition by intellectual labor: as, copyrights and patents for inventions; fourth, by transfer, which is by act of law, by forfeiture, by judgment, by insolvency, by intestacy; fifth, by transfer by act of the party, by gift, by sale. See Graves, Title to Pers. Prop.; FEW; PROPERTY; REAL PROPERTY; POSSESSION.

Possession of personal property is prima facie title thereto; 78 Ga. 299. See 113 N. Y. 52. See MONEYED CAPITAL; PERSONALTY.

PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES. The executors or administrators of the person deceased. 6 Mod. 155; 5 Ves. 402; 1 Madd. 108; 118 Mass. 198. The personal representative of a lessee for years is his assignee. 1 Ld. Raym. 553; 12 Eng. Rul. Cas. 59.

In wills, these words are sometimes construed to mean next of kin; 3 Bro. C. C. 2-4; 2 Jarm. Wills 112; 1 Beav. 46; 1 R. & M. 587; that is, those who would take the personal estate under the statute of distributions. They have been held to mean descendants; 19 Beav. 448. See LEGAL PERSONAL REPRESENTATIVES.

PERSONAL SECURITY. The legal and uninterrupted enjoyment by a man of his life, his body, his health, and his reputation. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 202.

PERSONAL SERVICE. The delivery of a writ to the person therein named in person. Leaving a copy at his place of abode is not personal service; 12 Wis.

PERSONAL STATUTE. A law whose principal, direct, and immediate object is to regulate the condition of persons.

The term is not properly in use in the common law, although Lord Mansfield, in 2 W. Bla. 154, applied it to those legislative acts which respect personal transitory contracts, but it is occasionally used in the sense given to it in civil law and which is adopted as its definition. It is a law, ordinance, regulation, or custom, the disposition of which affects the person and clothes him with a capacity or incapacity which he does not change with his abode. See 2 Kent 613.

PERSONALTY. That which is movable; that which is the subject of personal property and not of a real property.

PERSONALITY. A term used to designate that quality of a law which concerns the condition, state, or capacity of persons.

An action in personality is one brought against the right person, or the person against whom it lies. Fitzh. N. B. 62.

The personality of laws is a phrase used by foreign jurists to designate all laws concerning the condition, state, or capacity of persons, as distinguished from the reality of laws, which means all laws concerning property or things. To express the idea that the operation of a law is universal it is termed a personal statute, and, on the other hand, to express the idea that its operation is confined to the country of its origin it is designated a real statute. Sto. Conf. L. § 16.

Livermore used the words personality and reality, and Henry the words personality and reality; Story preferred the former, as less likely to lead to mistakes, as, in our law, personality and reality are used exclusively to designate personal and real property. Id.

PERSONATE. In Criminal Law. To assume the character of another without lawful authority, and, in such character, do something to his prejudice, or to the prejudice of another, without his will or consent.

The bare fact of personating another for the purpose of fraud is no more than a cheat or misdemeanor at common law, and punishable as such; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 1010; 2 Russ. Cr. 479.

By statute punishment is inflicted in the United States courts for false personation of any person under the naturalization laws, and of any person holding a claim or debt against the government; R. S. §§ 5424, 5436. See, generally, 2 Johns. Cas. 283; 16 Viner, Abr. 386; Comyns, Dig. Action on the Case for a Deceit (A 3).

PERSUADE, PERSUADING. To persuade is to induce to act. Persuading is inducing others to act. Inst. 4. 6. 23; Dig. 11. 3. 1. 5.

In the act of the legislature which declared that "if any person or persons knowingly and willingly shall aid or assist any enemies at open war with this state, etc., by persuading others to enlist for that purpose, etc., he shall be adjudged guilty of high treason," the word persuading thus used means to succeed; and there must be an actual enlistment of the person persuaded in order to bring the defendant within the intention of the clause; 1 Dall. 39; 4 C. & P. 369; 9 id. 79. The attempt to persuade a servant to steal his master's goods, or other person to undertake a larceny or other crime, is an indictable misdemeanor, although the person approached declines the persuasion; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 767.

If one counsels another to suicide, and it is done in his presence, the adviser is as guilty as the principal. Accordingly, where two persons, agreeing to commit suicide together, employ means which take effect on one only, the survivor is a principal in the murder of the other; 8 C. & P. 418; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 652; Whart. Cr.

PERSUASION. The act of influencing by expostulation or request. While the persuasion is confined within those limits which leave the mind free, it may be used to induce another to make his will, or even to make it in his own favor. But if such persuasion should so far operate on the mind of the testator that he would be deprived of a perfectly free will, it would vitiate the instrument; 8 S. & R. 269; 5 id. 207; 13 id. 323.

PERTINENT. (from Lat. pertineo, belong to). That which tends to prove or disprove the allegations of the parties. Willes 319. Matters which have no such tendency are called impertinent; 8 Toullier, n. 22.

PERTINENTS. In Scotch Law. Appurtenances. Ersk. Inst. 2. 6. 6.

PETURBATION. This is a technical word which signifies disturbance or infringement of a right. It is usually applied to the disturbance of pews or seats in a church. In the ecclesiastical courts, actions for these disturbances are technically called "suits for perturbation of seat." 1 Phill. Eccl. 323. See FEW.

PERVERSE VERDICT. A verdict rendered by a jury which choose not to take the law from the judge, but will act on their own erroneous view of the law. In such cases, however, honest the intentions of the jury may be, their verdict is perverse. A. & E. Encyc. 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 532.

PERVISE, PARVISE. The palace yard at Westminster.

A place where counsel used to advise with their clients.

An afternoon exercise or moot for the instruction of students. Cowell; Blount.

PESAGE. In England, a toll charged for weighing avoirdupois goods other than wool. 2 Chitty, Com. Law 16.

PESO. A Spanish dollar; also, an Argentine, Chilian, Colombian, etc., coin, equal to from seventy-five cents to a dollar; also, a pound weight. Webster.

PESQUIDOR. In Spanish Law. A coroner. White, New Recop. b. 1, tit. 1, § 3.

PETENS. A demandant; the plaintiff in a real action. Bract. fol. 102, 106 b.

PETER-PENCE. An ancient levy or tax of a penny on each house throughout England paid to the pope. It was called Peter-pence because collected on the day of St. Peter, ad vincula; by the Saxons it was called Rome-feoh, Rome-scot, and Rome-penny, because collected and sent to Rome; and lastly, it was called hearth money, because every dwelling-house was liable to it, and every religious house, the abbey of St. Albans alone excepted.

It was not intended as a tribute to the pope, but chiefly for the support of the English school or college at Rome; the popes, however, shared it with the college, and at length found means to appropriate it to themselves.

PETIT (sometimes corrupted into petty). A French word signifying little, small. It is frequently used as, petit larceny, petit jury, petit treason (q. v.).

PETIT ASSIZE. A jury to decide on questions of possession. Britton c. 42; Glanv. lib. 2, c. 6, 7. Used in contradistinction to the grand assize, which was a jury to decide on questions of property. See GRAND ASSIZE.

PETIT CAPE. See CAPE; GRAND CAPE.

PETIT JURY or PETTY JURY. The "little" jury, so called to distinguish it from the "grand" (or "large") jury. Brett, Comm. 1162, n.

PETTY LARCENY. See LARCENY.

PETIT SERJEANTY. See SERJEANTY.

PETIT TREASON. In English Law. The killing of a master by his servant, a husband by his wife, a superior by a secular or religious man. In the United States, this is like any other murder. See HIGH TREASON; TREASON.

PETITIO. A count or declaration. Glanv.

PETITION. An instrument of writing or printing, containing a prayer from the person presenting it, called the petitioner, to the body or person to whom it is presented, for the redress of some wrong or the grant of some favor which the latter has the right to give.

By the constitution of the United States, the right "to petition the government for a redress of grievances" is secured to the people. Amend. art. 1.

Petitions are frequently presented to the courts in order to bring some matters before them. It is a general rule in such cases that an affidavit should be made that the facts therein contained are true as far as known to the petitioner, and that those facts which he states as knowing from others he believes to be true. The sufficiency of a petition must be determined by its face, and can neither be aided nor destroyed by the accompanying exhibits, the exhibits being no part of it; 46 Mo. App. 236. See CROSS-PETITION; PLAINTIFF.

PETITION DE DROIT (L. Fr.). In English practice. A petition of right; a form of proceeding to obtain restitution from the crown of either real or personal property. See PETITION OF RIGHT.

PETITION OF RIGHT. In English Law. A proceeding in chancery by which a subject may recover property in the possession of the king.

This is in the nature of an action against a subject, in which the petitioner sets out his right to that which is demanded by him, and prays the king to do him right and justice; and, upon a due and lawful trial of the right, to make him restitution. It is called a petition of right because the king is bound of right to answer it and let the matter therein contained be determined in a legal way, in like manner as causes between subject and subject. The petition is presented to the king, who subscribes it with these words, soit droit fait al partie, and thereupon it is delivered to the chancellor to be executed according to law. Co. 4th Inst. 419, 422 b; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 30, 31; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 22, 23.

The modern practice is regulated by statute 23 and 24 Vict. c. 34, which provides that the petition shall be left with the home secretary for Her Majesty's consideration, who, if she shall think fit, may grant her fiat that right be done, whereupon the fiat having been served on the solicitor of the treasury, an answer, plea, or demurrer shall be made in behalf of the crown, and the subsequent pleadings be assimilated as far as practicable to the course of an ordinary action; Mozl. & W.

The stat. 3 Car. I. was a parliamentary declaration of the liberties of the people. 1 Bla. Com. 128.

PETITORY. That which demands or petitions; that which has the quality of a prayer or petition; a right to demand.

A petitory suit or action is understood to be one in which the mere title to property is to be enforced by means of a demand, petition, or other legal proceeding, as distinguished from a suit where only the right of possession and not the mere right of property is in controversy. 1 Kent 371; 7 How. 846; 10 id. 257. Admiralty suits touching property in ships are either petitory, in which the mere title to the property is litigated, or possessory, to restore the possession to the party entitled thereto.

The American courts of admiralty exercise unquestioned jurisdiction in petitory as well as possessory actions; 23 Fed. Rep. 408, 406; 26 id. 708; 46 id. 204; but admiralty will not enforce a merely equitable title; 135 U. S. 599. In England the courts of law, some time after the restoration in 1660, claimed exclusive cognizance of mere questions of title, until the statute of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65. By that statute the court of admiralty was authorized to decide all questions as to the title to or ownership of any ship or vessel, or the proceeds thereof remaining in the registry in any cause of possession, salvage, damage, wages, or bottomry, instituted in such court after the passing of that act; Ware 239; 18 How. 267; 2 Curt. C. C. 426.

In Scotch Law. Actions in which damages are sought.

This class embraces such actions as assumpsit, debt, covenant, and detinue, at common law. See Patterson, Comp. 1058, n.

PETROLEUM. See OIL.

An unprincipled practitioner of law, whose business is confined to petty cases.

PETTY AVERAGE (called, also, customary average). Several petty charges which are borne partly by the ship and partly by the cargo, such as the expense of tonnage, beaconage, etc. Abb. Sh. 13th ed. 558; 2 Pars. Mar. Law 312; 1 Bell, Com. 567; 2 Magens 277. See AVERAGE.

PETTY CONSTABLE. The ordinary constable, as distinguished from the high constable of the hundred. 1 Bla. Com. 855; Bac. Law Tr. 181, Office of Constable; Willic. Cons. c. 1, § 1. See CONSTABLE.

PETTY SESSIONS. See SESSION.

PEW. A seat in a church, separate from all others, with a convenient place to stand therein.

It is an incorporeal interest in the real property. The pewholder does not own the soil; 32 Barb. 234. And although a man has the exclusive right to it, yet it seems he cannot maintain trespass against a person entering it; 1 Term 430; but case is the proper remedy; 3 B. & Ald. 361; 8 B. & C. 294. See 47 Vt. 262. In 3 Paige, Ch. 206, it was held that the owner of a pew can, if disturbed in its use, maintain trespass, case, or ejectment, according to the circumstances.

The right to pews is limited and usufructuary, and does not interfere with the right of the parish or congregation to pull down and rebuild the church; 4 Ohio 641; Mitch. R. E. & Conv. 60; 5 Cow. 496; 109 Mass. 21; 6 S. & R. 508; 9 Wheat. 445; 9 Cra. 52; 6 Johns. 41; 6 Term 396; 3 How. 74; indemnifying those whose pews are destroyed; 17 Mass. 435. See 2 Bla. Com. 429; 1 Pow. Mortg. 17; 19 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 1; 9 Am. Dec. 161; 24 id. 230. The pewholder's right is only to occupy his pew during public worship; 47 Vt. 262.

His right is subject to the paramount rights of the parish; 59 Me. 250; but it is held that a rule of the Roman Catholic Church forbidding a layman to control his pew will not be regarded by the courts, unless it was part of the contract; 33 Vt. 602 (criticized in 15 Am. L. Reg. 260).

When pews are removed from a church merely as a matter of expediency, the owners are entitled to payment; 100 Mass. 118. See PESTERATION.

A pew may be used only for divine service and for meetings of the congregation held for temporal purposes. The pew-owner must preserve order, while enjoying his pew; 84 N. Y. 149. The owner of a pew does not own the soil under it, nor the space above it; 17 Mass. 435.

Where not otherwise provided by statute the interest is considered as real estate, subject to the incidents of that kind of property; 1 Washb. R. P. 9; 38 Vt. 602;

34 Barb. 104 (see also 2 Edw. Ch. 608); 14 Conn. 279; 23 La. Ann. 9; 21 N. J. L. 325. In Massachusetts and New Hampshire pews are personal property by statute. In Pennsylvania they are held personal property as to devolution, although, strictly speaking, an interest in real estate; 24 Pa. 251. See, generally, 45 N. J. L. 320; 27 Wkly. L. PHARMACY. See DRUGGIST.

PHAROS. A watch-tower, at sea mark, which cannot be erected without lawful warrant and authority. 3 Inst. 204.

PHOTOGRAPH. The mechanical process of photography is judicially recognized as a means of producing true likenesses which are admissible in evidence in the trial of civil and criminal cases. The difference between the images produced upon a photographic plate and upon the human eye does not render a photograph inadmissible in evidence, but bears only upon the effect of such evidence; 1 Greenl. Ev. 92; 2 Rice, Ev. 1169; Tayl. Ev. 1613; 75 Fed. Rep. 373; 52 Mich. 214. A photograph of the subject-matter in controversy is admissible in evidence, when proved to have been fairly taken; 83 N. Y. 464; 31 Wis. 512; 162 Mass. 90; 69 Ga. 42; 47 Am. Rep. 748; 90 Ala. 25; 41 U. S. App. 498; 76 Pa. 340; 81 Cal. 408; 67 Ia. 146; 50 N. H. 159. While the reported cases do not always show that the photograph offered in evidence was first authenticated, yet there is no case which holds that such proof is unnecessary. The following cases show that such proof was assumed to be necessary or was given; 57 Conn. 9; 30 Fla. 256; 52 Ia. 210; 160 Mass. 288; 95 Mich. 586; 54 Minn. 379; 134 Mo. 85; 57 Am. Rep. 766; 125 N. It has been said that photographs are merely secondary evidence; 107 Ill. 113; 2 Woods 680; and where the jury has viewed the premises in question a photograph of them is generally inadmissible; 7 D. R. Pa. 321; 118 Mass. 420; 31 Wis. 512; but where the photographs themselves are the subject of the controversy, or the original subject of the photograph cannot for any reason be produced, it is otherwise; 59 Ala. 193; 49 Ill. App. 398; 5 Wash. 479; 52 Mich. 214; 26 Am. Rep. 319; 2 Woods 680; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 240; 36 Neb. 361; 31 Wis. 512; 46 Hun 32; 81 Cal. 408; 6 L. R. A. 594; 6 Blatch. 137. The discretion of the court in the admission of photographs does not differ from the exercise of that power with reference to other kinds of evidence; 30 Fla. 256; 162 Mass. 414; 26 L. R. A. 430; 106 N. Y. 598; 37 Am. Rep. 588.

Photographs are admissible to show the physical condition, characteristics, and identity of persons and property, in civil and criminal cases; 65 Mich. 306; 88 Tex. 642; 139 N. Y. 73; 38 Am. It is doubtful if they ought to be admitted to show the health, strength, or ability of a person; 160 Mass. 403.

Upon a criminal trial, photographic likenesses taken after death, of persons whom it is material to identify, may be exhibited to witnesses acquainted with such persons in life as aids in the identification; 45 N. Y. 215. Where a mutilated body was found, the witness was allowed to testify that the face resembled a photograph of a person alleged to be the one found, though he had not known the man before death; 76 Pa. 340. The healthy condition of the deceased may be proved by a colored photograph taken a short time before death; 1 W. N. C. Pa. 369; and in an indictment for bigamy a photograph of the first husband may be shown to a witness to the first marriage to prove his identity with the person mentioned in the marriage certificate; 4 F. & F. 103.

See an extended note on the use of photographs as evidence, where the cases are collected and classified; 35 L. R. A. 802.

A photograph made by the cathode or X-ray process will be admitted as secondary evidence; its competency depends upon the science, skill, experience, and intelligence of the person who took the picture and testified with regard to it. Lacking these important qualifications, it should not be admitted, and it is to be weighed like other competent evidence. In an action for personal injuries it was held competent to submit to the jury an X-ray photograph taken by a surgeon, showing the overlapping bones of one of the plaintiff's legs, where it was broken at the time of the accident, and where the surgeon was familiar with the process by which the impression was secured, as well as with fractures, and the surgeon testified that the photograph accurately represented the condition of the leg at the point of the fracture, and that by the aid of the X-rays he was enabled to see the fracture and overlapping bones as if they were uncovered to the sight; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tenn). 445. So in an action for negligence by which the plaintiff's foot was injured, an X-ray photograph was admitted to prove the condition of the injured foot; Hawkins, J., in 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 62.

In a criminal case in New York the prosecution claimed that a bullet struck the victim in the jaw, and split, one piece being deflected into the jaw and the other piece into the back of his head. The defense claimed that the piece lodged in the back of the victim's head was not a fragment but a bullet. To prove this, the defense introduced an X-ray photograph of the head and neck showing the lodgment of the bullet, and the testimony of the physician who took the photograph; 56 Alb. L. J. 309; 15 Med. Leg. J. 246. This question was also recently presented to the District Court of Colorado, wherein Lefevre, J., said:

"During the last decade, at least, no science has made such mighty strides forward as surgery. It is eminently a scientific profession, alike interesting to the learned and the unlearned. It makes use of all science and learning. It has been of inestimable value to mankind. It must not be said of the law that it is wedded to precedent; that it will not lend a helping hand. Rather let the courts throw open the door to all well considered scientific discoveries. Modern science has made it possible to look beneath the tissues of the human body and has aided surgery in telling of the hidden mysteries. We believe it to be our duty in this case to be the first, if you please, to so consider it, in admitting in evidence a process known and acknowledged as a determinate science." 29 Chi. Leg. News 145.

It is a breach of contract and violation of confidence for a photographer to make unauthorized copies of his customer's photograph. A private individual may enjoin the publication of his photograph, but a public character may not, in the absence of a breach of contract or violation of confidence in procuring the likeness from which the publication is made. A statesman, author, artist, or inventor who seeks public recognition, may be said to have surrendered this right to the public; 64 Fed. Rep. 280; 40 Ch. D. 845. See PRIVACY; INJUNCTION.

One who reproduces a copyrighted photograph cannot escape liability as an infringer by merely showing that the copy which he reproduced did not bear the notice of copyright when he purchased it, but he must also show that it bore no notice when it left the custody of the owner of the copyright; 54 Fed. Rep. 890; s. c. 4 C. C. A. 548. Violation of the right in a copyrighted photograph is subject by statute to a penalty. See 77 Fed. Rep. 966.

See COPYRIGHT.

PHOTOGRAPHER. An artist who takes impressions or likenesses of things and persons on prepared plates or surfaces. 11 Lea 517.

PHRENASTHENIA. A morbid condition, also known as the insanity of the degenerates, used to indicate the general mental infirmity of degenerates, or individuals with vices of organization who are insane, but whose insanity presents special characteristics growing out of mental infirmity. It is usually hereditary and congenital. The insanity is a secondary phenomenon, vice of organization being the primary one; 2 Clevenger, Med. Jur. 856.

PHYSICAL EXAMINATION. The question as to whether, and under what circumstances, courts will permit the physical examination of litigants and of persons accused of crime, and also of property in litigation, has been much mooted. A physical examination of a woman under the writ of de ventre inspiciendo was known to the common law under special circumstances. See JURY OF WOMEN. This early practice has been urged as a precedent for permitting a physical examination in certain civil and criminal cases.

In Union Pacific R. Co. v. Bottsford, 141 U. S. 250, the question was the right of a court of the United States to order a surgical examination of the plaintiff, in an action of tort. Mr. Justice Gray referred to the common-law writ of de ventre inspiciendo in capital cases, and also in civil cases involving the rightful succession to property of a decedent against fraudulent claims of bastards, and said that the learning and research of counsel for the plaintiff in error (John F. Dillon) had "failed to produce an instance of its even having been considered in any part of the United States as suited to the habits and conditions of the people." He added that "so far as the books within our reach show, no order to inspect the body in a personal action appears to have been made or even moved for, in any of the English courts of common law, at any period of their history." The ruling of the court below, refusing such an examination, was sustained. See, also, 129 Ind. 401; 129 N. Y. 50; 60 Fed. Rep. 278; 25 C. C. A. 418; 102 Ill. 272.

It appears however that such an order was moved for and made by a judge at chambers, not purporting to be by consent, though in fact unopposed, and of which Cockburn, C. J., said, "the order for such examination was clearly ultra vires;" 46 L. J. 696.

"The right to one's person may be said to be a right of complete immunity,—to be let alone." Cooley, Torts 29.

But while it has been held that the defendant has no absolute right to have a personal physical examination of the plaintiff made, in an action for personal injuries, yet in the discretion of the court such examination may be made, if essential for the ascertainment of truth or to subserve the ends of justice; 3 Am. St. Rep. 549; 95 Mo. 169; 49 Leg. Int. (Pa.) 434; 13 Med. Leg. J. 23; 72 Tex. 95; 90 Ala. 71; 2 Dist. R. (Pa.) 825; 34 L. R. A. 207; 96 Mich. 625; 89 W. Va. 86; 82 Ga. 719; 61 Wis. 536; 46 Ark. 275; 20 Kan. 466.

In 1865, in New York, it was said that in an action for personal injuries the defendant could examine the actual physical condition of the plaintiff before trial, and if the plaintiff refused, the defendant might prove the refusal at the trial; 64 Barb. 299. In 1868, in an action in the same state against a physician for personal injuries resulting from malpractice, it was said that no case involving the right to a physical examination was to be found on the books; but the court permitted the examination, citing as authority proceedings in divorce for impotency, mayhem, and the writ de ventre inspiciendo; 52 How. Pr. 334. The supreme court of that state, in an action against a carrier for injury to a passenger, overruled this view of the law, holding that in such divorce cases a physical examination was necessary to arrive at the truth, and that the other proceedings were obsolete; 29 Hun 154; 129 N. Y. 50. In a note by the reporter in 52 How. Pr. 334, it is said that there were few cases decisive of the right of physical examination, and he cites: Andrew's Trials 41; 45 How. 210; 1 Brews. (Pa.) 561; 71 N. C. 85; 5 Jones (N. C.) 259.

A plaintiff, in an action for personal injuries alleged to have caused the secretion of albumen and sugar, may be required to produce in court, for analysis, specimens of his urine, accompanied by an affidavit that it was voided by him; the privacy of his person not being thereby invaded; 46 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 678; 36 L. R. A. 681.

It is within the discretion of the court to refuse to require the plaintiff to submit to a physical examination which necessitates the administration of anæsthetics; 65 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 616.

In some courts plaintiffs are allowed to exhibit to the jury their injuries, and to perform physical acts showing the nature and extent of their injuries; 47 Ia. 375; 33 Minn. 130; but other courts hold this to be improper, because such evidence cannot be preserved in a bill of exceptions for use in an appellate court; 19 Cent. L. J. 141.

In a trial of an action of trespass for assault and battery, it is not error to permit the jury to examine with their fingers scars on the plaintiff's head caused by a blow from defendant's pistol; 35 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 539.

A court of equity will not, in a patent case, even if it had the power, require the respondent, claiming under an alleged anticipatory patent, to perform experiments in the presence of plaintiff's witnesses, except where so extraordinary a course is necessary; 83 Fed. Rep. 430.

In an action for breach of warranty on a sale of a horse, the court has no power to order that the defendant have the privilege of sending a veterinary surgeon into the plaintiff's stable to examine the horse; 63 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 993; 95 Mich. 266.

In a suit for divorce on the ground of impotence a court has power to compel the parties to submit to a surgical examination when facts essential to a correct decision may thereby be ascertained; 5 Paige 534; 89 Ala. 291; 33 L. J. Mat. 12; in divorce proceeding because of malformation of the wife the court made an order for her inspection, but did not require the husband to submit to inspection; 16 Week. Rep. 943.

The measurement in the presence of the jury of a woman's foot and her leg six inches above the ankle, in a suit for injuries to the foot and ankle, must be permitted by the court when there is a direct conflict as to such measurement by the medical men called by the respective parties,—at least if

The better practice seems to be to apply to the party to be examined, before trial, for permission to make the examination, and upon his refusal, to present a motion for leave, by affidavit, showing the refusal, and also the probability that the examination will result in some material disclosure. The party applying for the order for examination should also offer to pay the expense of such examination; 82 Ga. 719. In practice, some courts order a private physical examination of a party to be made by a physician, who may then testify in regard thereto at the trial of the cause.

A physical examination, if made, must be made by physicians agreed upon by the parties or selected by the court, care being taken to prevent danger to life, pains of body, or any indignity to the person; 47 La. 375; 33 Minn. 137; 37 Ohio St. 104.

Where an order for physical examination is made, the court will enforce it by refusing to try the cause until it is complied with; 7 Co. Ct. Rep. (Pa.) 565; by dismissing the action, or refusing to allow the plaintiff to give evidence to establish his injury; 37 Ohio St. 104; or by striking out and withdrawing from the consideration of the jury the allegations relative to his inquiry, or punishing him for contempt; 47 La. 375; 33 Minn. 130. A refusal to submit to a physical examination, if the court permit him to prosecute his claim will be very strong evidence against the person refusing; 35 Mo. App. 97; and may be considered by the jury as reflecting on his good faith; 141 U. S. 250.

Upon an appeal of mayhem where the issue joined is whether it is mayhem or no mayhem, it will be decided by the court upon inspection with the assistance of surgeons, if desired; 3 Bla. Com. 332.

The Stat. 81 & 32 Vict. c. 119, § 26, expressly authorizes any judge of a court in which an action is pending to recover compensation for a railway accident or any person having power to fix such compensation, to order an examination of the person injured by a duly qualified medical practitioner named in the order, and not being a witness on either side, the costs to be at the discretion of the judge or court making the order. When an examination has been procured by a railway company under this statute the report is privileged and the plaintiff is not entitled to an order for its production; 43 L. J. Rep. Exch. 150.

The act of 1894 in New York provides that, in all actions for personal injuries, the court may, before trial, order the plaintiff to submit to a physical examination "by one or more physicians or surgeons" under such restrictions as the order may impose; the order must require the person to appear before the judge or a referee, for the purpose of taking the examination, at a time and place named therein. A woman is entitled to have the examination made by "surgeons of her own sex."

In criminal proceedings there is no power to undress and medically examine the person of a prisoner, without his consent, although such examination might further the ends of justice; 18 Cox, C. C. 625. It is error for a court to require a person on trial for murder to exhibit his leg at the place where it was amputated, although a certain material fact may be established thereby; 3 Cr. Law Mag. (Ga.) 893; 71 N. C. 85. Where a prisoner refused to make a print of his foot in a pan of soft earth in order that the witnesses for the prosecution might testify as to similarity of such tracks with those found at the scene of the crime, the court said it was optional with the accused, who refused, and upon conviction a new trial was granted; 5 Baxt. 619; contra, 7 Tex. Civ. App. 245. A woman indicted for the murder of her illegitimate child refused to allow physicians selected by the coroner to examine whether she had recently been delivered of a child, and upon being threatened, yielded. The court ruled out the testimony of the physicians, saying that such proceedings violated the spirit of the constitution which declares that no person shall, in any criminal case, be compelled to be a witness against himself; 45 How. Pr. 216.

On the other hand, it has been held not to be error to compel the defendant to exhibit tattoo marks on his body, to the existence of which a witness had testified; 14 Nev. 79; 33 Am. Rep. (S. C.) 530; or to compel the accused to make his footprints in an ash heap, and to allow the prosecution to show that they corresponded with those found at the scene of the crime; 7 Tex. Civ. App. 245; or for an officer to compel the accused to put his foot in print found at the place where the crime was committed and at the trial testify to the result of the comparison; 74 N. C. 646; 67 Ga. 76; 26 N. E. (Ind.) 138.

See JURY OF WOMEN; PRIVACY; VIEW.

PHYSICAL FACT. A fact, the existence of which is perceptible by the senses.

"A fact considered to have its seat in some inanimate being, or, by virtue, not of the qualities by which it is constituted animate, but of those which it has in common with the class of inanimate beings." 1 Benth. Jud. Ev. 45.

PHYSICALLY IMPOSSIBLE. See IMPOSSIBILITY.

PHYSICIAN. A person, who has received the degree of doctor of medicine from an incorporated institution.

One lawfully engaged in the practice of medicine.

As used in a policy of life insurance, the term "family physician" has been held to mean the physician who usually attends, and is consulted by, the members of a family, in the capacity of a physician, whether or not he usually attended on or was consulted by the insured himself; 17 Minn. 497; s. c. 10 Am. Rep. 166. See 58 Mo. 421.

Although the physician is civilly and criminally responsible for his conduct while discharging the duties of his profession, he is in no sense a warrantor or insurer of a favorable result, without an express contract to that effect; Elwell, Malp. 20; 7 C. & P. 81.

Every person who offers his services to the public generally, impliedly contracts with the employer that he is in possession of the necessary ordinary skill and experience which are possessed by those who practise or profess to understand the art or science, and which are generally regarded by those most conversant with the profession as necessary to qualify one to engage in such business successfully. This ordinary skill may differ according to locality and the means of information; Elw. Malp. 22, 201; Story, Bailm. 433; 3 C. & P. 629; 34 La. 286; s. c. 11 Am. Rep. 141, n.; 82 Ill. 379; s. c. 25 Am. Rep. 328; 70 Md. 162; 36 Neb. 794; 27 Abb. N. C. 45; 108 N. C. 187. If the treatment of the patient has been honest and intelligent only ordinary care and skill is required of defendant and errors of judgment will be overlooked; 60 Barb. 485; 75 N. Y. 21. Experimenting with a patient outside of the rules of practice renders the practitioner liable in damages; 4 Ill. 209. Any one who treats patients as a clairvoyant must be held to the same degree of care as a regular practitioner; 59 Me. 181; 72 Wis. 391.

The physician's responsibility is the same when he is negligent as when he lacks ordinary skill, although the measure of indemnity and punishment may be different; Elw. Malp. 27; 3 Maule & S. 14, 15; 5 id. 188; 1 Lew. C. C. 169; Broom, Leg. Max. 168, 169; 4 Denio 464; 19 Wend. 345; 63 How. 621. See 69 Hun 626; 84 Me. 497. Where a physician is charged with manslaughter, resulting from a surgical operation performed by him, it is error to charge that if deceased consented to the performance of the operation, defendant must be acquitted; 8 Wash. 12.

One who holds himself out as a healer of diseases, and accepts employment as such, must be held to the duty of reasonable skill in the exercise of his vocation; failing in this he must be held liable for any damages proximately caused by unskillful treatment of his patient; 73 Wis. 591. Gross negligence may constitute criminal liability; 138 Mass. 165; 38 Ark. 605; and an unlicensed practitioner may be guilty of manslaughter; 1 Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur. 79. See 4 F. & F. 519; 29 Ohio St. 877.

Bad or unskillful practice in a physician or other professional person, whereby the health of the patient is injured, is usually called Malpractice (Mala praxis).

Wilful malpractice takes place when the physician purposely administers medicines or performs an operation which he knows and expects will result in damage or death to the individual under his care; as in the case of criminal abortion; Elw. Malp. 243; 2 Barb. 218.

Negligent malpractice comprehends those cases where there is no criminal or dishonest object, but gross negligence of that attention which the situation of the patient requires; as if a physician should administer medicines while in a state of intoxication, from which injury would arise to his patient.

Ignorant malpractice is the administration of medicines calculated to do injury, which do harm, which a well-educated and scientific medical man would know were not proper in the case; Elw. Malp. 198; 7 B. & C. 493; 6 Mass. 134; 5 C. & P. 333; 1 Mood. & R. 405; 5 Cox, C. C. 587; Whart. & St. Med. Jur. 755.

This offence is a misdemeanor (whether it be occasioned by curiosity and experiment or neglect), because it breaks the trust which the patient has put in the physician, and tends directly to his destruction. See 3 Chitty, Cr. Law 863; 4 Wentw. Pl. 360; 2 Russ. Cr. 277; 6 Mass. 134; 138 id. 165; 38 Ark. 605; 10 Cox, C. C. 525; 8 Mo. 561; 3 C. & P. 629; 4 id. 423.

Besides the public remedy for malpractice, in many cases the party injured may bring a civil action; 9 Conn. 209; 3 Watts 355; 7 N. Y. 397; 39 Vt. 447.

Civil cases of malpractice are of very frequent occurrence on those occasions where surgical operations are rendered necessary, or supposed to be so, by disease or injury, and are so performed as either to shorten a limb or render it stiff, or otherwise prevent the free, natural use of it, by which the party ever after suffers damage. This may embrace almost every kind of surgical operation; but nine-tenths of all such cases arise from amputations, fractures, or dislocations; Elw. Malp. 55.

To the performance of all surgical operations the surgeon is bound to bring at least ordinary skill and knowledge. He must apply without mistake what is settled in his profession. He must possess and practically exercise that degree and amount of knowledge and science which the leading authorities have pronounced as the result of their researches and experience up to the time, or within a reasonable time, before the issue or question to be determined is made; Elwell, Malp. 25; 6 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 774; 36 Neb. 784.

A physician in the treatment of a patient is bound only to use the reasonable degree of skill and care which is ordinarily possessed and exercised; 27 Abb. N. C. 45; the law imposes on a surgeon the duty of being reasonably skilled in his profession, and the exercise of care and prudence in the application of that skill, and if he be wanting in either, to the injury of his patient, he is liable for damages; 62 Hun 621; although there may be no contractual relation between the patient and the physician; 180 N. Y. 35. If one physician, being unable to attend, sends another in his stead, the former is not liable to one who is injured by the unskillfulness of the latter, since the latter, being engaged in a distinct and independent occupation of his own, is not the servant or agent of the former; 33 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 388. See, also, 8 East 347; 2 Wils. 259; 1 H. Bla. 61; Wright, Ohio 466; 23 Pa. 261; 27 N. H. 480; 13 B. Monr. 219; 27 Abb. N. C. 45; 62 Hun 621.

In the Roman civil law and at common law until 1433 the practice of medicine and surgery was free to all. A statute in that year confined it to those who had studied the subject in a university and who were bachelors of science. In the United States statutes regulating the right to practice are constitutional; 139 U. S. 114; 10 N. W. Rep. 323; 11 Colo. 109; 63 Hun 65.

In England, at common law, a physician could not maintain an action for his fees for anything done as physician either while attending to or prescribing for a patient; but a distinction was taken when he acted as a surgeon or in any other capacity than that of physician, and in such cases an action for fees would be sustained; 1 C. & M. 227, 370; 3 Q. B. 928. But now by the act of 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, a physician who is registered under the act may bring an action for his fees, if not precluded by any by-law of the college of physicians; 2 H. & C. 92. It has not been denied in this country; 26 Wend. 451.

In this country, the various states have statutory enactments regulating the collection of fees and the practice of medicine; they will be found in Witth. & Beck. Med. Jur.; an unlicensed physician can not maintain an action for medical attendance and medicines; 4 Den. 60; 91 Tenn. 16; 21 Ala. N. S. 680; contra, 1 Metc. 154.

In a suit for medical services the plaintiff is presumed to have been licensed; 24 Wend. 15. See, also, 24 Ill. App. 43. Sec. 153 of ch. 661 of the laws of New York (1895), as amended by ch. 396, laws of 1895, providing that no person shall practice medicine who has ever been convicted of felony, applies to persons who had been convicted of felony before the passage of the act. As to such persons the statute is not ex post facto; 55 Alb. L. J. 218. Such an act does not conflict with the federal constitution; 170 U. S. 189.

The business of massage does not violate a statute forbidding the practice of medicine without a license; 24 Hun 32; but prescribing patent medicine does; 15 Wend. 395; 4 Ohio 295. The law does not recognize any difference between schools of medicine; 4 E. D. Sm. 1. See 42 N. Y. 161. Contracts for contingent compensation are valid; 71 N. Y. 443; 19 Vt. 54. Where a physician called in a stranger, an unmarried man in a confinement case, it was held that this was a breach of duty, for which both were liable to the patient; 46 Mich. 160.

Where the wife of the defendant, being afflicted with a dangerous disease, was carried by him to a distance from his residence and left under the care of the plaintiff as a surgeon, and after the lapse of some weeks the plaintiff performed an operation, soon after which she died, it was held, in an action by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover compensation for his services, that the performance of the operation was within the scope of the plaintiff's authority, if, in his judgment, it was necessary or expedient, and that it was not incumbent on him to prove that it was necessary or proper under the circumstances, or that before he performed it he gave notice to the defendant, or that it would have been dangerous to the wife to wait until notice could be given to the defendant; 19 Pick. 333.

If physicians attending a woman deem it necessary for the preservation and prolongation of her life, to perform an operation they are justified in doing so if she consents, whether her husband consents or not; 70 Md. 162.

Where one who has received personal injury through the negligence of another uses reasonable and ordinary care in the selection of a physician, the damages awarded him will not be reduced because more skillful medical aid was not secured; 22 Ia. 324; s. c. 7 Am. Rep. 200. In assumption by a physician for his services, the defendant cannot prove the professional reputation of the plaintiff; 8 Hawks 105. Physicians can recover for the services of their students in attendance upon their patients; 4 Wend. 300. Partners in the practice of medicine are within the law merchant, which includes the jus accrescendi between traders; 9 Cow. 631. An agreement between physicians whereby, for a money consideration, one promises to use his influence with his patrons to obtain their patronage for the other, is lawful and not contrary to public policy; 39 Conn. 396; s. c. 13 Am. Rep. 890. If a physician carries contagious disease into a family, on a suit for services this may be shown to reduce his claim; 13 B. Monr. 465. A physician who has been guilty of negligence in the treatment of his patient, resulting in damages to the latter, does not necessarily lose his right to recover any compensation whatever for his services; but the amount of his recovery, if any, depends in the amount of damages suffered because of negligence; 66 N. W. Rep. 896.

A law providing that no person shall be licensed to practise medicine except after examinations by the state board, is not in conflict with the fourteenth amendment of the United States constitution; 4 Wash. St. 434; nor is a statute making it a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment to practise medicine without a certificate from the state board of health that the practitioner is a graduate of a reputable medical college, unconstitutional, as depriving him of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; 129 U. S. 114. See CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; EXPERT; OPINION; EVIDENCE.

PIA FRAUS. A pious fraud; a fraud considered morally justifiable on account of the ends sought to be promoted.

PIACLE. An enormous crime. Obsolete.

PICARON. A robber; a plunderer.

PICKERY. In Scotch Law. Stealing of trifles, punishable arbitrarily. Bell, Dict.; Tait, Inst. Theft.

PICKETING. Picketing by members of a trade union or strikers, consists in posting members at all the approaches to the works struck against for the purpose of reporting the workman going to or coming from the works; and to use such influence as may be in their power to prevent the workman from accepting work there. Dav. Friend. Soc. 212. See LABOR UNION; STRIKE; BOYCOTT.

PICKPOCKET. A thief; one who in a crowd or in other places steals from the pockets or person of another without putting him in fear. This is generally punished as simple larceny.

"Pictures" include all of the paintings, drawings, and sketches on the walls of one's residence or office building. 132 Ky. 589, 116 S. W. 769.

PIE-POUDRE, PIE POWDER. See COURT OF PIE POWDER.

PIER. A wharf. A structure erected for ferry purposes which was simply a ferry rack and bridge was held not a pier. 5 Robt. N. Y. 285. See DOCK; HARBOR; PORT.

PIERAGE. The duty for maintaining piers and harbor.

PIGEON-HOLE TABLE. A "pigeon-hole table" is a table not so wide as a pool table, and longer, but with four legs, and with rubber cushions on the sides and ends, and covered with cloth, and instead of having pockets at each corner and on the sides have a number of holes in the table at one end and certain pegs at or near these holes. The game is played with balls and a cue, and instead of the balls being numbered, as in the other game, the holes or pockets into which the balls roll through the holes are numbered. 153 Ky. 445, 165 S. W. 423.

PIGNORATIO (Lat. from pignore, to pledge). In Civil Law. The obligation of a pledge. L. 9 D. de pignori. Sealing up (obsignatio). A shutting up of an animal caught in one's field and keeping it till the expenses and damage have been paid by its master. New Decis. 1. 34. 18.

PIGNORATIVE CONTRACT. In Civil Law. A contract by which the owner of an estate engages it to another for a sum of money and grants to him and his successors the right to enjoy it until he shall be reimbursed, voluntarily, that sum of money. Pothier, Obl.

PIGNORIS CAPTIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. The name given to one of the legis actiones of the Roman law. It consisted chiefly in the taking of a pledge, and was, in fact, a mode of execution. It was confined to special cases determined by positive law or by custom, such as taxes, duties, rents, etc., and is comparable in some respects to distresses at common law. The proceeding took place in the presence of a praetor.

PIGNUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Pledge, or pawn. The contract of pledge. The right in the thing pledged.

"It is derived," says Gaius, "from pugnare, the fist, because what is delivered in pledge is delivered in hand." Dig. 50. 16. 283. 2. This is one of several instances of the failure of the Roman jurists when they attempted etymological explanations of words. The elements of pignus (pi) are contained in the word pan(g)-o and its cognate forms. See Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq.

Though pledge is distinguished from mortgage (hypotheca), as being something delivered in hand, while mortgage is good without possession, yet a pledge (pignus) may also be good without possession. Domat, Civ. Law b. iii. tit. 1, § 5; Calvinus, Lex. Pignus is properly applied to movables, hypotheca to immovables; but the distinction is not always preserved. Id.

PILA. That side of money which was called pile, because it was the side on which there was an impression of a church built on piles. Fleta, lib. 1, c. 39.

PILFER. To steal. To charge another with pilfering is to charge him with stealing and is slander; 4 Blackf. 499.

PILFERER. One who steals petty things.

PILLAGE. The taking by violence of private property by a victorious army from the citizens or subjects of the enemy. This in modern times is seldom allowed, and then only when authorized by the commanding or chief officer at the place where the pillage is committed. The property thus violently taken belongs, in general, to the common soldiers. It is expressly forbidden under the rules of the Brussels Conference, 1874, which however have never been adopted by the European nations. See Daloz, Dict. Propriété, art. 3, § 5; Wolff § 1201; Booty; PRIZE; WAR.

PILLORY. A wooden machine, in which the neck of the culprit is inserted. This punishment has in most of the states been superseded by the adoption of the penitentiary system. See 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 797. The punishment of standing in the pillory, so far as the same was provided by the laws of the United States, was abolished by the act of congress of February 27, 1839, s. 5. See Barrington, Stat. 48.

PILOT. An officer serving on board of a ship during the course of a voyage, and having charge of the helm and of the ship's route. An officer authorized by law who is taken on board at a particular place for the purpose of conducting a ship through a river, road, or channel, or from or into port.

Pilots of the second description are established by legislative enactments at the principal seaports in this country, and have rights, and are bound to perform duties, agreeably to the provisions of the several laws establishing them.

Pilots have been established in all maritime countries. After due trial and experience of their qualifications, they are licensed to offer themselves as guides in difficult navigation; and they are usually, on the other hand, bound to obey the call of a ship-master to exercise their functions; Abb. Sh. 13th ed. 190; 1 Johns. 305; 4 Dall. 205; 5 B. & P. 82; 5 Rob. Adm. 308; 6 id. 316; Laws of Oleron, art. 23; Molloy, b. 2, c. 9, ss. 3, 7; Wesk. Ins. 395; Act of Congr. of August 7, 1789, s. 4; Pardessus, n. 637.

The master of a vessel may decline the services of a pilot, but in that event he must pay the legal fees; 1 Cliff. 492. A pilot who first offers his services, if rejected, is entitled to his fee; 2 Am. Law Rev. 458; Desty. Shipp. § 849; 102 U. S. 592.

The pilot is to conduct the navigation, regulate the course of the ship and the management of the sails; 7 Moore, P. C. 171, 134. He is not liable for damages to the vessel unless caused by his failure to use ordinary diligence, i. e., the degree of skill commonly possessed by others in the same employment; 57 Fed. Rep. 227. A river pilot is bound to be familiar with the channel of the river, and with the various obstructions to navigation, and is liable for damages occasioned by the want of such knowledge, but not for damages occasioned by an error of judgment on his part; 48 Fed. Rep. 690. Shipowners are responsible to third parties for obedience to the pilot; his orders ordinarily, are to be implicitly obeyed; but the shipowner is not responsible for the acts of the pilot where pilotage is compulsory; 7 Moore, P. C. 171; 7 P. Div. 134; 63 Fed. Rep. 845; 73 L. T. 49; 2 W. Rob. 10; in such case the ship has been held liable; 7 Wall. 53. But the owner remains liable for the ship's management in all things that do not relate to mere navigation; 158 U. S. 186. The compulsory pilotage law applies within the three mile limit; 70 Fed. Rep. 331. See TERRITORIAL WATERS. Where a steamer in need of a pilot disregarded the speaking pilot and it appeared that the speaking pilot was within the three mile limit, the pilot was held entitled to recover his fee; 28 U. S. App. 593. See SEAWORTHINESS; PERILS OF THE SEA.

By acts of Aug. 7, 1789, March 2, 1837, each state has authority over pilotage on its navigable waters, though not exclusive; 9 Fed. Rep. 164. A Delaware pilot may recover for services upon the Delaware River and to Philadelphia, although a Pennsylvania act prohibits any one acting as such without a Pennsylvania license; 12 Fed. Rep. 346. The state of Delaware cannot exclude pilots of other states, on the Delaware River; 14 Fed. Rep. 972. A state law may permit or direct a pilot to tender his services beyond the three mile limit.

The usual signal by which a pilot tenders his services is the Union Jack set at the main truck, by day, and "flare-ups" by night; 19 Fed. Rep. 207.

PILOTAGE. The compensation given to a pilot for conducting a vessel in or out of port. Pothier, Des Avaries, n. 147.

Pilotage is a lien on the ship, when the contract has been made by the master or quasi-master of the ship or some other person lawfully authorized to make it; 1 Mas. 508; see 32 Fed. Rep. 496; 24 id. 397; and the admiralty court has jurisdiction when services have been performed at sea; 10 Wheat. 428; 6 Pet. 682; Bened. Adm. § 289; 10 Fed. Rep. 135. And see 1 Pet. Adm. Dec. 227; 42 Fed. Rep. 798. The statutes of the several states regulating the subject of pilotage are, in view of the numerous acts of congress recognizing and adopting them, to be regarded as constitutionally made, until congress by its own acts supercedes them; 12 How. 812; 18 Wall. 286.

PIMP. One who provides for others the means of gratifying lust; a procurer; a panderer. The word pimp is not a technical one, nor has it acquired any peculiar or appropriate meaning in the law; and is therefore to be construed and understood according to the common and approved usage of the language; 75 Mich. 127, where the court disapproved the action of the judge at nisi prius who defined the term to mean a man who has intercourse with a loose woman, who usually is taking care of him,—supporting him.

The Indiana statutes provide: "Whoever, being a male person, frequents houses of ill-fame or of assignation, or associates with females known or reputed as prostitutes, or frequents gambling-houses with prostitutes, or is engaged in or about a house of prostitution, is a pimp." R. S. (1881) § 2002. See 102 Ind. 156, which was an indictment for being a pimp under that statute.

PIMP-TENURE. A very singular and odious kind of tenure mentioned by old writers, "Wilhelmus Hoppeshort tenet dimidium virgatum terre, per servitium custodiendi sex damisellas, scil. meretrices, ad usum domini regis." 12 Edw. 1.

PIN-MONEY. Money allowed by a man to his wife to spend for her own personal comforts.

It has been conjectured that the term pin-money has been applied to signify the provision for a married woman because anciently there was a tax laid for providing the English queen with pins; Barrington, Stat. 181.

When pin-money is given to but not spent by the wife, on the husband's death it belongs to his estate; 4 Viner, Abr. 133, Baron & Feme (E. a. 8); 2 Eq. Cas. Abr. 156; 2 P. Will. 341; 1 Ves. 190, 287; 1 Madd. 489.

In England it was once adjudged that a promise to a wife, by the purchaser, that if she would not hinder the bargain for the sale of the husband's lands he would give her ten pounds, was valid, and might be enforced by an action of assumpsit instituted by husband and wife; Rolle, Abr. 21.

In the French law, the term epingles, pins, is used to designate the present which is sometimes given by the purchaser of an immovable to the wife or daughters of the seller to induce them to consent to the sale. This present is not considered as a part of the consideration, but a purely voluntary gift. Dict. de Jur. Epingles.

PINT. A liquid measure, containing half a quart or the eighth part of a gallon.

PIOUS USES. See CHARITABLE USES.

PIPE ROLL. In English Law. The name of a roll in the exchequer, otherwise called the Great Roll. A measure, containing two hogheads: one hundred and twenty-six gallons is also called a pipe.

PIPE LINES. A connected series of pipes for the transportation of oil, gas, or water.

A line of pipes running upon or in the earth carrying with it the right to the use of the soil in which it is placed. 36 Cal. 92.

The right to construct a pipe line is a public use, as is also that of laying pipes for a proper purpose in the streets of a city. See EMINENT DOMAIN.

A pipe line company for conveying oil is a common carrier bound to receive and transport for all persons alike, all goods entrusted to its care, and is not in any sense, or at any time, an agent for the person committing oil to its care; 172 Pa. 580.

A pipe line for the transportation of oil is not rendered a nuisance by the mere fact that its presence enhances the rates of insurance in the neighborhood; 29 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 633.

A pipe line is held to create an additional servitude on a country highway but not on city or borough streets; 111 Pa. 85; 160 id. 873. It may remove its pipes and abandon its easement; 164 id. 28.

See Bryan, Nat. Gas; GAS; OIL.

PIRACY. In Criminal Law. A robbery or forcible depredation on the high seas, without lawful authority, done animo furandi, in the spirit and intention of universal hostility. 3 Wheat. 610; 5 id. 153, 163; 3 Wash. C. C. 209. This is the definition of this offence by the law of nations; 1 Kent 183.

"Depredation upon the high seas, without authority from any sovereign." It is not necessary that the motive be plunder or that the depredations be directed against the vessels of all nations indiscriminately. As in robbery upon land, it is only necessary that the spoliation or intended spoliation be felonious, that is, with intent to injure, and without legal authority or lawful excuse; 25 Fed. Rep. 408.

All nations and individuals are warranted in seizing pirates. It has been held by many authorities that insurgents who have not been accorded belligerent rights are pirates, although it may be their intention to prey upon no ships except those of their mother country whom they are resisting. The American colonists in the American Revolution were declared to be pirates by Great Britain, and so were the cruisers of the confederate government by the federal government during the American Civil War; Snow, Lect. Int. Law 52.

Piracy has two aspects: As a violation of the common right of nations, punishable under the common law of nations by the seizure and condemnation of the vessel only, in prize courts. Its liability to punishment criminally by the municipal law of the place where the offenders are tried; Whart. Cr. L. § 2830; 2 Phil. Int. Law 414. Acts hostile in their nature, done for plunder, hatred, revenge, or mischief, or in the wanton exercise of power, are piratical; 2 How. 210, where the subject is elaborately discussed.

Property found on board a pirate ship goes to the Crown, of strict right; but the claim of the original owner is admitted, on application; 1 Hagg. Adm. 142. Vessels recaptured from pirates, after whatever length of time, are always restored to the owner on payment of salvage; 4 C. Rob. 3.

Congress may define and punish piracies and felonies on the high seas, and offences against the law of nations; Const. U. S. art. 1, s. 7, n. 10; 3 Wheat. 336; 5 id. 76, 153, 184. The following laws have been passed:

Every person who on the high seas commits the crime of piracy as defined by the Law of Nations, and is afterward brought into or found in the United States, shall suffer death; § 5368. Every seaman who lays violent hands upon his commander, thereby to hinder and prevent his fighting in the defence of his vessel or the goods entrusted to him, is a pirate and shall suffer death; § 5369. Robbery on the high seas or in any open roadstead, harbor, or bay, where the sea ebbs and flows, committed upon any vessel or ship's company or its lading, is piracy punishable by death; § 5370. Robbery on shore committed by the crew of a piratical vessel is piracy punishable by death. Every person who commits upon the high seas or in any river, harbor, basin, or bay, out of the jurisdiction of any particular state, murder or robbery or any crime which by the laws of a country would be punishable by death, by the laws of the United States, is a pirate, punishable by death. Every citizen who aids in murder or robbery or acts of hostility against the United States or any citizen thereof on the high seas under color of any commission from any foreign prince or state or on pretence of authority from any person, is a pirate punishable by death. Every subject of a foreign state found upon the sea making war upon the United States or cruising against its vessels or citizens contrary to the provisions of any treaty between the United States and the state of which he is a subject, when by such treaty such acts are declared to be piracy, is guilty of piracy, and shall suffer death; § 5371. Every person who knowingly aids, etc., another to commit murder, robbery, or other piracy upon the seas is an accessory before the fact, punishable by death; § 5323. Every person who knowingly receives any vessel or other property feloniously taken by any robber or pirate, against the laws of the United States, and any person who, knowing that said pirate has committed any act of piracy or robbery on the land or sea, receives or conceals him, is accessory after the fact; § 5324. Secs. 5372, 5373 refer to continuing and detaining negroes on board vessels and landing or seizing negroes on foreign shores, and constitute piracy punishable by death. See RECAPTURE.

In Torts. By piracy is understood the plagiarism of a book, engraving, or other work for which a copyright has been taken out; infringement of copyright may be by unfair quotation; by piratical copying; by piratical use other than copying.

Where the violation of the copyright consists of excerpts from plaintiff's book, the court is bound to consider the quantity and quality of the matter appropriated and the extent to which the plaintiff is injured by it and the damage to the defendant by an injunction. It seems that the complainant is not always bound to prove pecuniary damage to entitle him to an injunction. Where the parts of the complainant's book are scattered through the defendant's book and cannot be separated, the whole will be enjoined; 83 Fed. Rep. 494. See Drone, Copyr. 494.

Piratical copying was held to be established in the case of a society directory by proof that out of 2800 names, 39 common errors were found to exist; 30 Fed. Rep. 772; and by proof that out of 60,000 names there were 67 common errors; 66 Fed. Rep. 977. Two common errors in maps were held sufficient to establish the fact that one map had been copied from the other; 18 Fed. Rep. 539; in a mercantile agency book, the existence of 15 common errors was held sufficient to establish the use of the complainant's book by the defendant; 84 Hun 12. It is not necessary to point out many common errors to establish a presumption of piracy; 66 Hun 38. The court does not feel bound to go through the whole of the defendant's book to ascertain the extent of the piracy; 19 L. J. N. S. Ch. 90. In 2 Beav. 6, the court enjoined the defendant who had pirated parts of a topographical dictionary, without waiting until the whole of the pirated parts could be ascertained, and held that if the parts which had been copied could not be separated from those which were original without destroying the use and value of the original matter, the defendant must suffer the consequences.

The majority of copyright infringements that occur, which have been called "literary larceny" lie intermediately between open piracy and fair use; Chamier, Copyr. 108.

In 30 Fed. Rep. 772, it was intimated that the injunction would be modified at the final hearing, if the proofs of the defendant tended to segregate any part of the material which had been made subject to the injunction.

The rule is well settled that although the entire copyrighted work is not copied in the infringement, but only portions, if such portions are so intermingled with the rest of the piratical work that they cannot well be distinguished from it, the entire profits realized by the defendant will be given to the plaintiff; 144 U. S. 488, following 128 id. 617. See 2 Russ. 385; 97 U. S. 126.

It is the unfair appropriation of the compiler's labor in the case of the syllabus of a legal opinion that constitutes infringement. Identity of language will often prove that the offence was committed, but it is not the sole proof. If the subsequent digester has made an unfair use of any part of a syllabus of his predecessor, the burden is on him to show that there were parts of it that he did not use. Where the defendant's editor, in compiling a digest of reports, digested some 13,300 cases from the complainant's pamphlet reports and a partial comparison of the copyrighted syllabi with the digest showed internal evidence of piracy in some 400 instances, it was held that this indicated a general, systematic, and unfair use of the copyrighted work, coupled with an attempt to disguise such use, and made out a prima facie case, which was not rebutted by the simple denial of the defendant's editors that they had made use of the complainant's syllabi. It was held that the whole work, so far as taken from the complainant's pamphlet reports, should be enjoined, with liberty to defendant to show by further proofs what paragraphs were digested by non-offending editors and to move to have them excluded from the injunction; 79 Fed. Rep. 756. See COPYRIGHT; MEMORIZATION.

PIRATE. A sea-robber, who, to enrich himself, by subtlety or open force, setteth upon merchants and others trading by sea, despoiling them of their loading, and sometimes bereaving them of life and sinking their ships. Ridley, View pt. 2, c. 1, s. 3. One guilty of the crime of piracy. Merlin, Répert. See, for the etymology of this word, Bac. Abr. Piracy. See PIRACY.

PIRATICALLY. In Pleading. This is a technical word, essential to charge the crime of piracy in an indictment, which cannot be supplied by another word or any circumlocution. Hawk, Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 37, s. 15; Co. 3d Inst. 112; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. *244.

PISCARY. The right of fishing in the waters of another. Bac. Abr.; 5 Com. Dig. 306. See FISHERY.

PISTAREEN. A small Spanish coin. It is not made current by the laws of the United States. 10 Pet. 618.

PIT. A hole dug in the earth, which was filled with water, and in which women thieves were drowned, instead of being hung. The punishment of the pit was formerly common in Scotland.

PIT AND GALLOWES (Law Lat. fossa et furca). In Scotch Law. A privilege of inflicting capital punishment for theft, given by king Malcolm, by which a woman could be drowned in a pit (fossa) or a man hanged on a gallows (furca). Bell, Dict.; Stair, Inst. 277 § 62.

PLACE. The word is associated with objects which are, in their nature, fixed and territorial. 3 Wheat. 386. See VENUE.

It is applied to any locality, limited by boundaries however large or however small. It may be used to designate a country, state, county, town, or a very small portion of a town. The extent of the locality designated by it must, generally, be determined by the connection in which it is used; 46 Vt. 432.

Any piece of ground appropriated by its owner or occupier for the time being is a place within the English betting houses act; 51 L. J. M. C. 56; but the ground must be so appropriated and must be an ascertained place; 14 Q. B. D. 588. The habitual standing or using a table in Hyde Park does not make it a place for betting; 19 C. B. N. S. 785; as habitual user is not of the essence of place; 10 Q. B. 102; but a piece of ground bounded on one side by a boarding and on two other sides by stays which support the boarding is a place under 18 & 17 Vic. c. 119, relating to betting; [1896] 1 Q. B. 295. See [1897] 1 Q. B. 578.

A private residence may become a public place when it is used for the purpose of public amusement, recreation, business, or religious worship; 45 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 702.

PLACE OF ABODE. See ABODE.

PLACE OF AMUSEMENT. A hall containing a stage whereon a nightly programme of music, vocal and instrumental, is rendered is a place of amusement; 4 D. R. Pa. 37; and a dance hall is a public amusement. 40 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 1043.

PLACE OF BUSINESS. The place where a man usually transacts his affairs or business.

When a man keeps a store, shop, counting-room, or office, independently and distinctly from all other persons, that is deemed his place of business; and when he usually transacts his business at the counting-house, office, and the like, occupied and used by another, that will also be considered his place of business, if he has no independent place of his own. But when he has no particular right to use a place for such private purpose, as in an insurance-office, an exchange-room, a banking-room, a postoffice, and the like, where persons generally resort, these will not be considered as the party's place of business, although he may occasionally or transiently transact business there; 1 Pet. 582; 2 id. 121; 10 Johns. 501; 11 id. 231; 16 Pick. 392; Byles, Bills 296.

It is a general rule that a notice of the non-acceptance or non-payment of a bill, or of the non-payment of a note, may be sent either to the domicile or place of business of the person to be affected by such notice; and the fact that one is in one town and the other in the other will make no difference, and the holder has his election to send to either. A notice to partners may be left at the place of business of the firm or of any one of the partners; Story, Pr. Notes § 312; Dan. Neg. Instr. 4th ed. § 1016. See Notice.

PLACE OF CONTRACT. See LEX LOCI.

PLACE OF DELIVERY. The place where goods sold are to be delivered. If no place is specified in the contract they must, generally, be delivered at the place where they are at the time of the sale. 100 U. S. 134.

PLACER. See MINES AND MINING.

PLACER CLAIM. As used in Rev. Stat. § 2333 means, ground within defined boundaries which contains mineral in its earth, sand or gravel; ground that includes valuable deposits not in place, that is, not fixed in rock, but which are in a loose state, and may in most cases be collected by washing or amalgamation without milling. 128 U. S. 679. Cf. LODE.

PLACITA COMMUNIA (Lat.). Common pleas. All civil actions between subject and subject. 3 Bla. Com. 38, *40; Cowell, Plea. See PLACITUM.

PLACITA CORONÆ (Lat.). Pleas of the crown. All trials for crimes and misdemeanors, wherein the king is plaintiff, on behalf of the people. 3 Bla. Com. 40*; Cowell, Plea.

PLACITA JURIS (Lat.). Arbitrary rules of law. Bac. Law Tr. 73; Bac. Max. Reg. 12.

PLACITUM (Lat. from placere). In Civil Law. Any agreement or bargain. A law; a constitution or rescript of the emperor; the decision of a judge or award of arbitrators. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex; Dupin, Notions sur le Droit.

In Old English Law (Ger. plats, Lat. platea, i. e. fields or streets). An assembly of all degrees of men, where the king presided and they consulted about the great affairs of the kingdom: first held, as the name would show, in the fields or street. Cowell.

So on the continent. Hinc de Ordine Palatii, c. 29; Bertinian, Annals of France in the year 767; Const. Car. Mag. cap. ix.; Hinc. Epist. 197, 227; Laws of the Longobards, passim.

A lord's court. Cowell.

An ordinary court. Placita is the style of the English courts at the beginning of the record at nisi prius; in this sense, placita are divided into pleas of the crown and common pleas, which see. Cowell.

A trial or suit in court. Cowell; Jacobs. A fine. Black Book of Exchequer, lib. 2, tit. 13; 1 Hen. I. cc. 12, 13.

A plea. This word is nomen generalissimum, and refers to all the pleas in the case. 1 Saund. 388, n. 6; Skin. 554; Carth. 334; Yelv. 65. By placitum is also understood the subdivisions in abridgments and other works, where the point decided in a case is set down separately, and, generally, numbered. In citing, it is abbreviated as follows; Viner, Abr. Abatement pl. 8.

Placitum nominatum is the day appointed for a criminal to appear and plead.

Placitum fractum. A day past or lost to the defendant. 1 Hen. I. cc. 59.

PLAGIARISM. The act of appropriating the ideas and language of another and passing them for one's own.

When this amounts to piracy, the party who has been guilty of it will be enjoined when the original author has a copyright. See COPYRIGHT; PIRACY; QUOTATION; Pardessus, Dr. Com. n. 169.

PLAGIARISM, OF NEWS. There are two kinds of use that may be made by one news agency of news taken from the bulletins and newspapers of the other. (1) The bodily appropriation of a statement of fact or a news article, with or without re-writing, but without independent investigation or other expense; (2) the taking of the news of a rival agency as a "tip" to be investigated, and if verified by independent investigation the news thus gathered is sold. 248 U. S. 243.

PLAGIARIUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. He who fraudulently concealed a freeman or slave who belonged to another.

The offence itself was called plagium.

It differed from larceny or theft in this, that larceny always implies that the guilty party intended to make a profit, whereas the plagiarius did not intend to make any profit. Dig. 48. 15. 6; Code 9. 20. 9. 15.

PLAGIUM (Lat.). Man-stealing; kidnapping. This offence is the crimen plagii of the Romans. Alison, Cr. L. 280.

PLAIN STATEMENT. One that can be readily understood not merely by lawyers but by all who are sufficiently acquainted with the language in which it is written. 5 Sandf. 564. See 79 N. C. 574.

PLAIN TYPE. Large or ordinary sized type, not that of very small size. 57 Mo. 255.

PLAINT. In English Law. The exhibiting of any action, real or personal, in writing. The party making his plaint is called the plaintiff.

PLAINTIFF (Fr. pléynte). He who complains. He who, in a personal action, seeks a remedy for an injury to his rights. 3 Bla. Com. 25; Hamm. Part.; 1 Chitty, Pl.; 1 Com. Dig. 36, 203, 308.

The legal plaintiff is he in whom the legal title or cause of action is vested.

The equitable plaintiff is he who, not having the legal title, yet is in equity entitled to the thing sued for. For example: when a suit is brought by B. for the use of A., B. the legal, and A. the equitable, plaintiff. This is the usual manner of bringing suits when the cause of action is not assignable at law but is so in equity.

The word plaintiff occurring alone means the plaintiff on record, not the real or equitable plaintiff. After once naming the plaintiff in pleading, he may be simply called the plaintiff. 1 Chitty, Pl. 266; 9 Paige, Ch. 236; 5 Hill, N. Y. 523, 548; 7 Term 50.

The word "plaintiff" embraces a defendant who demands a set-off or counter-claim; the word "defendant" embraces a plaintiff against whom such demand is made; and the word "petition" embraces an answer or reply in which such demand is made, and also embraces cross-petitions. Section 732, Sub-section 36, Civil Code of Kentucky. See CONDEMNATION PROCEEDINGS; CORPORATION PROCEEDINGS.

PLAINTIFF IN ERROR. A party who sues out a writ of error; and this, whether in the court below he was plaintiff or defendant.

PLAN. The delineation or design of a city, a house or houses, a garden, a vessel, etc., traced on paper or other substance, representing the position and the relative proportions of the different parts.

A plan referred to in a deed describing land as bounded by a way laid down upon a plan may be used as evidence in fixing the locality of such way; 16 Gray 874; and if a plan is referred to in the deed for description, and in it are laid down courses, distances, and other particulars, it is the same as if they were recited in the deed itself; 8 Washb. R. P. 430.

When houses are built by one person agreeably to a plan, and one of them, with windows and doors in it, is sold to a person, the owner of the others cannot shut up those windows, nor has his grantee any greater right; 1 Price 27; 2 Ry. & M. 24; 2 Saund. 114, n. 4; 1 Mood. & M. 386. See 12 Mass. 159; Hamm. N. P. 202; Com. Dig. Action on the Case for a Nuisance (A). ANCIENT LIGHTS; PLAT; MAP; WINDOWS.

PLANT. The fixtures and tools necessary to carry on any trade or mechanical business. 77 Ga. 752. The term does not cover property forming part of a separate business; 77 Fed. Rep. 938. As used in the business of a wharfinger, a horse was held part of the plant; 19 Q. B. D. 647; and a legacy of plant and good will was held to pass the house of business held by lease; 8 W. R. 410.

PLANTATIONS. Colonies; dependencies. 1 Bla. Com. 107.

In England, this word, as it is used in stat. 12 Car. II. c. 18, is never applied to any of the British dominions in Europe, but only to the colonies in the West Indies and America; 1 Marsh. Ins. 69.

In its ordinary use it is nearly synonymous with farm, and includes all the land forming the parcel or parcels under culture as one farm, or even what is worked by one set of hands. 38 Cal. 291; 10 Ired. 131. It has been held that in order to constitute a plantation, the estate should be under the control of one proprietor. 79 Ga. 721. The devise of a plantation passes the stock, implements, utensils, etc., on it; 1 Sim. 435; but plantation stock does not include cotton seed; 4 Jones, Eq. 203.

PLASTERING. Plastering a building includes lathing. 16 Ill. 502; 49 N. Y. 464.

PLAT. A map of a piece of land, on which are marked the courses and distances of the different lines, and the quantity of land it contains.

Such a plat may be given in evidence in ascertaining the position of the land and what is included, and may serve to settle the figure of a survey and correct mistakes; 5 T. B. Monr. 180. See 17 Mass. 311; 5 Me. 219; 7 Id. 61; 4 Wheat. 444; 14 Mass. 149.

PLATE. Vessels and utensils of gold and silver. By the act 29 Geo. 2. c. 14, a tax was laid on all persons possessed of plate; but that act was repealed by the 17 Geo. 3. c. 39. Tomlin.

PLEA. In Equity. A special answer showing or relying upon one or more things as a cause why the suit should be either dismissed, or delayed, or barred. Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 219; Coop. Eq. Pl. 223; Story, Eq. Pl. § 649.

The modes of making defence to a bill in equity are said to be by demurrer, which demands of the court whether from the matter apparent from the bill the defendant shall answer at all; by plea, which resting on the foundation of a new matter offered, demands whether the defendant shall answer further; by answer, which responds generally to the charges of the bill; by disclaimer, which denies any interest in the matters in question; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 18; 2 Stor. 59; Story, Eq. Pl. § 487. Pleas are said to be pure which rely upon foreign matter to discharge or stay the suit, and anomalous or negative which consist mainly of denials of the substantial matters set forth in the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. § 651, 667; 2 Dan. Ch. Pr. 97, 110; Beames, Eq. Pl. 123; Adams, Eq. 236.

Pleas to the jurisdiction assert that the court before which the cause is brought is not the proper court to take cognizance of the matter.

Pleas to the person may be to the person of the plaintiff or defendant. Those of the former class are mainly outlawry, excommunication, popish recusant convict, which are never pleaded in America and very rarely now in England; attainder, which is now seldom pleaded; 2 Atk. 599; alienage, which is not a disability unless the matter respect lands, when the alien may not hold them, or he be an alien enemy not under license; 2 V. & B. 328; infancy, coverture, and idicy, which are pleadable as at law (see ABATEMENT); bankruptcy and insolvency, in which case all the facts necessary to establish the plaintiff as a legally declared bankrupt must be set forth; 3 Mer. 667; though not necessarily as of the defendant's own knowledge; Youngs 331; 4 Beav. 554; 1 Y. & C. 39; want of character in which he sues, as that he is not an administrator; 2 Dick. 510; 1 Cox, Ch. 198; is not heir; 2 V. & B. 159; 2 Bro. C. C. 143; 3 Id. 489; is not a creditor; 2 S. & S. 274; is not a partner; 6 Madd. 61; as he pretends to be; that the plaintiff named is a fictitious person, or was dead at the commencement of the suit; Story, Eq. Pl. § 727. Those to the person of the defendant may show that the defendant is not the person he is alleged to be, or does not sustain the character given by the bill; 6 Madd. 61; Cas. temp. Finch 394; or that he is bankrupt, to require the assignees to be joined; Story, Eq. Pl. § 732. These pleas to the person are pleas in abatement, or, at least, in the nature of pleas in abatement.

Pleas to the bill or the frame of the bill object to the suit as framed, or contend that it is unnecessary. These may be—the pendency of another suit, which is analogous to the same plea at law and is governed in most respects by the same principles; Story, Eq. Pl. § 736; 2 My. & C. 602; 1 Phill. 82; 1 S. & S. 491; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 248; see AUTER ACTION PENDANT; the other suit must be in equity, and not at law; Beames, Eq. Pl. 146; want of proper parties, which goes to both discovery and relief, where both are prayed for; Story, Eq. Pl. § 745; see 3 Y. & C. 447; but not to a bill of discovery merely; 2 Paige, Ch. 280; 3 Cra. 220; a multiplicity of suits; 1 P. Wms. 428; 2 Mas. 190; multifariousness, which should be taken by way of demurrer, when the joining or confession of the distinct matters appears from the face of the bill, as it usually does; Story, Eq. Pl. § 271. A plea to the jurisdiction which sets up matters affecting the validity of the service, matters showing want of proper citizenship, and also the pendency of a prior suit, is bad for duplicity; 68 Fed. Rep. 717.

Pleas in bar rely upon a bar created by statute; as, the Statute of Limitations; 1 S. & S. 4; 3 Sumn. 152; 10 Ves. 466; which is a good plea in equity as well as at law, and with similar exceptions; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 253; see LIMITATION, STATUTE OF; the Statute of Frauds, where its provisions apply; 1 Johns. Ch. 425; 4 Ves. 24, 720; 2 Bro. C. C. 559; or some other public or private statute; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 768; matter of record or as of record in some court, as a common recovery; 1 P. Wms. 754; 1 Vern. 18; a judgment at law; 1 Keen 456; 2 My. & C. Ch. 602; Story, Eq. Pl. § 781, n.; the sentence or judgment of a foreign court or a court not of record; 12 Cl. & F. 368; 14 Sim. 265; especially where its jurisdiction is of a peculiar or exclusive nature; 12 Ves. 307; 2 How. 619; with limitation in case of fraud; 1 Ves. 284; Story, Eq. Pl. § 788; or a decree of the same or another court of equity; Cas. Talb. 217; 7 Johns. Ch. 1; 2 S. & S. 464; 2 Y. & C. 43; matters purely in pais, in which case the pleas may go to discovery, relief, or either, both, or a part of either, of which the principal (though not the only) pleas are: account, stated or settled; 7 Paige, Ch. 573; 1 My. & K. 281; accord and satisfaction; 1 Hare 564; award; 2 V. & B. 764; purchase for valuable consideration; 2 Sumn. 507; 3 Y. & C. 457; release; 3 P. Wms. 315; lapse of time analogous to the Statute of Limitations; 1 Yo. & C. 433, 453; 3 J. & W. 1; 1 Hare 594; 1 Johns. Ch. 46; 10 Wheat. 153; 1 Sch. & L. 721; 3 Paige, Ch. 273; 7 Id. 62; title in the defendant; Story, Eq. Pl. § 812.

The same pleas may be made to bills seeking discovery as to those seeking relief; but matter which constitutes a good plea to a bill for relief does not necessarily to a bill for discovery merely. See Story, Eq. Pl. § 816; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 281. The same kind of pleas may be made to bills not original as to original bills, in many cases, according to their respective natures. Peculiar defences to each may, however, be sometimes urged by plea; Story, Eq. Pl. § 886; Mitf. Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 288.

Effect of a plea. A plea may extend to the whole or a part, and if to a part only must express which part, and an answer over-rides a plea if the two conflict; 3 Yo. & C. 683; 3 Cra. 220. The plea may be accompanied by an answer fortifying it with a protest against waiver of the plea thereby; Story, Eq. Pl. § 695. A plea or argument may be allowed, in which case it is a full bar to so much of the bill as it covers, if true; Mitford, Eq. Pl. Jer. ed. 301; or the benefit of it may be saved to the hearing, which decides it valid so far as then appears, but allows matter to be disclosed in evidence to invalidate it, or it may be ordered to stand for an answer, which decides that it may be a part of a defence; 4 Paige, Ch. 124; but is not a full defence, that the matter has been improperly offered as a plea, or it is not sufficiently fortified by answer, so that the truth is apparent; 3 Paige, Ch. 459.

While a defendant cannot plead merely the facts averred in the bill of complaint, but must present his objection to their sufficiency by demurrer, yet he may present a good plea by averring along with the facts contained in the bill, other and additional facts, provided that both together establish a defence to the bill; 50 Fed. Rep. 151.

A plea which avoids the discovery prayed for is no evidence for defendant, even when under oath and denying a material averment in the bill; 130 U. S. 303.

At Law. The defendant's answer by matter of fact to the plaintiff's declaration, is distinguished from a demurrer, which is an answer by matter of law.

It includes as well the denial of the truth of the allegations on which the plaintiff relies, as the statement of facts on which the defendant relies. In an ancient use it denoted action, and is still used sometimes in that sense; as, "summoned to answer in a plea of trespass;" Steph. Pl. 38; Warren, Law Stud. 272; Oliver, Prec. 97. In a popular, and not legal, sense, the word is used to denote a forensic argument. It was strictly applicable in a kindred sense when the pleadings were conducted orally by the counsel. Steph. Pl. App. n. 1.

Pleas are either dilatory, which tend to defeat the particular action to which they apply on account of its being brought before the wrong court, by or against the wrong person, or in an improper form; or peremptory, which impugn the right of action altogether, which answer the plaintiff's allegations of right conclusively. Pleas are also said to be to the jurisdiction of the court, in suspension of the action, in abatement of the writ, in bar of the action. The first three classes are dilatory, the last peremptory. Steph. Pl. And. ed. 136; 1 Chitty, Pl. 425; Lawes, Pl. 36.

Pleas are of various kinds. In abatement. See ABATEMENT. In avoidance, called also, confession and avoidance, which admits, in words, or in effect, the truth of the matters contained in the declaration, and alleges some new matter to avoid the effect of it and show that the plaintiff is, notwithstanding, not entitled to his action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 540; Lawes, Pl. 122. Every allegation made in the pleadings subsequent to the declaration which does not go in denial of what is before alleged on the other side is an allegation of new matter. See Gould, Pl. § 185; CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE.

Pleas in bar deny that the plaintiff has any cause of action. 1 Chitty, Pl. 407; Co. Lit. 308 b. They either conclude the plaintiff by matter of estoppel, show that he never had any cause of action, or, admitting that he had, insist that it is determined by some subsequent matter. Steph. Pl. And. ed. 443; Britt. 92 § 190. They either deny all or some essential part of the averments in the declaration, in which case they are said to traverse it, or, admitting them to be true, allege new facts which obviate and repel their legal effect, in which case they are said to confess and avoid; Steph. Pl. And. ed. 146. The term is often used in a restricted sense to denote what are with propriety called special pleas in bar. These pleas are of two kinds; the general issue, and special pleas in bar. The general issue denies or takes issue upon all the material allegations of the declaration, thus compelling the plaintiff to prove all of them that are essential to support his action. There is, however, a plea to the action which is not strictly either a general issue or a special plea in bar, and which is called a special issue, which denies only some particular part of the declaration which goes to the gist of the action. It thus, on the one hand, denies less than does the general issue, and, on the other hand, is distinguished from a "special plea in bar" in this,—that the latter universally advances new matter, upon which the defendant relies for his defence, which a special issue never does; it simply denies. Lawes, Pl. 110, 145; Co. Litt. 126 a; Gould, Pl. 5th ed. ch. ii. § 38, ch. vi. § 8. The matter which ought to be so pleaded is now very generally given in evidence under the general issue. 1 Chitty, Pl. 415. A plea which merely amounts to the general issue, though not such in form, is bad; 84 Md. 414.

Special pleas in bar admit the facts alleged in the declaration, but avoid the action by matter which the plaintiff would not be bound to prove or dispute in the first instance on the general issue. Ld. Raym. 88. They are very various, according to the circumstances of the defendant's case; as, in personal action the defendant may plead any special matter in denial, avoidance, discharge, excuse, or justification of the matter alleged in the declaration, which destroys or bars the plaintiff's action; or he may plead any matter which estops or precludes him from averring or insisting on any matter relied upon by the plaintiff in his declaration. The latter sort of pleas are called pleas in estoppel. In real action, the tenant may plead any matter which destroys and bars the demandant's title; as, a general release; Steph. Pl. 115.

The general qualities of a plea in bar are,—first, that it be adapted to the nature and form of the action, and also conformable to the count. Co. Litt. 303 a; 285 b; Bac. Abr. Pleas (I); Rolle 216. Second, that it answers all it assumes to answer, and no more. Co. Litt. 303 a; Com. Dig. Pleader (E 1, 36); 1 Saund. 28; 2 B. & P. 427. Third, in the case of a special plea, that it confess and admit the fact. 3 Term 298; 1 Saund. 28, 14; 10 Johns. 389. Fourth, that it be single. Co. Litt. 307; Bac. Abr. Pleas (K 1, 2); 2 Saund. 49, 50. Fifth, that it be certain. Com. Dig. Pleader (E 5-11, C 41). See CERTAINTY; PLEADING. Sixth, it must be direct, positive, and not argumentative. See 6 Cra. 126; 9 Johns. 813. Seventh, it must be capable of trial. Eighth, it must be true and capable of proof.

The parts of a plea are—first, the title of the court. Second, the title of the term. Third, the names of the parties in the margin. These, however, do not constitute any substantial part of the plea. The surnames only are usually inserted, and that of the defendant precedes the plaintiff's; as, "Roe v. Doe." Fourth, the commencement, which includes the statement of the name of the defendant, the appearance, the defence, see DEFENCE, the action non, see ACTION NON. Fifth, the body, which may contain the inducement, the protestation, see PROTESTATION, ground of defence, quod est eadem, the traverse. Sixth, the conclusion.

Dilatory pleas go to destroy the particular action, but do not affect the right of action in the plaintiff, and hence delay the decision of the cause upon its merits. Gould, Pl. ch. ii. § 38. This class includes pleas to the jurisdiction, to the disability of the parties, and all pleas in abatement. All dilatory pleas must be pleaded with the greatest certainty, must contain a distinct, clear, and positive averment of all material facts, and must in general, enable the plaintiff to correct the deficiency or error pleaded to; And. Steph. Pl. 136. See ABATEMENT; JURISDICTION.

Pleas in discharge admit the demand of the plaintiff, and show that it has been discharged by some matter of fact. Such are pleas of judgment, release, and the like.

Pleas in excuse admit the demand or complaint stated in the declaration, but excuse the non-compliance with the plaintiff's claim, or the commission of the act of which he complains, on account of the defendant's having done all his power to satisfy the former, or not having been the culpable author of the latter. A plea of tender is an example of the former, and a plea of non assaut demesne an instance of the latter.

Foreign pleas go to the jurisdiction; and their effect is to remove the action, from the county in which the venue is originally laid. Carth. 402. Previous to the statute of Anne, an affidavit was required. 5 Mod. 335; Carth. 402; 1 Saund. Pl. 98, n. 1; Viner, Abr. Foreign Pleas; 1 Chitty, Pl. 382; Bacon, Abr. Abatement (R).

Pleas of justification assert that the defendant has purposely done the act of which the plaintiff complains, and in the exercise of his legal rights. 8 Term 78; 3 Wils. 71. No person is bound to justify who is not prima facie a wrong-doer; 1 Leon. 301; 2 id. 83; Cowp. 478; 4 Pick. 126; 13 Johns. 443, 579; 1 Chitty, Pl. 436.

Pleas puis darrein continuance introduce new matter of defence, which has arisen or come to the plaintiff's knowledge since the last continuance. In most of the states, the actual continuance of a cause from one term to another, or from one particular day in term to another day in the same term, is practically done away with, and the prescribed times for pleading are fixed without any reference to terms of court. Still, this right of a defendant to change his plea so as to avail himself of facts arising during the course of the litigation remains unimpaired; and though there be no continuance, the plea is still called a plea puis darrein continuance,—meaning, now, a plea upon facts arising since the last stage of suit. They are either in bar or in abatement. Matter which arises after purchase or issue of the writ, and before issue joined, is properly pleaded in bar of the further maintenance of the suit; 4 East 502; 5 Pet. 224; 4 Me. 582; 12 Gill & J. 358; see 7 Mass. 825; while matter subsequent to issue joined must be pleaded puis darrein continuance; 30 Ala. N. S. 258; Hempst. 16; 40 Me. 582; 7 Gill 415; 10 Ohio 300. Their object is to present matter which has arisen since issue joined, and which the defendant cannot introduce under his pleadings as they exist, for the rights of the parties were at common law to be tried as they existed at the time of bringing the suit, and matters subsequently arising come in as it were by exception and favor. See 7 Johns. 194.

Among other matters, it may be pleaded that the plaintiff has become an alien enemy; 3 Camp. 152; that an award has been made after issue joined; 2 Esp. 504; 29 Ala. N. S. 619; that there has been accord and satisfaction; 5 Johns. 392; 19 Wend. 98; 5 Pet. 231; that the plaintiff has become bankrupt; 1 Dougl. Mich. 267; 15 East 622; that the defendant has obtained a bankrupt certificate, even though obtained before issue joined; 9 East 82; see 2 H. Bla. 553; 3 B. & C. 23; 3 Den. 269; that a feme plaintiff has taken a husband; Bull. N. P. 310; 1 Blackf. 298; that judgment has been obtained for the same cause of action; 9 Johns. 221; 5 Dowl. & R. 175; that payment has been made; 61 Ind. 453; that letters testamentary or of administration have been granted; 1 Saund. 265, n. 2; or revoked; Com. Dig. Abatement (I 4); that the plaintiff has released the defendant; 4 Cal. 381; 8 Sneed 53; 17 Mo. 267. See 38 N. H. 179. But the defendant in ejectment cannot plead release from the lessor of the plaintiff; 4 Maule & S. 800; and the release will be avoided in case of fraud; 4 B. & Ad. 419; 4 J. B. Moo.

P. C. 192; 23 N. H. 535. In ejectment a right to the land obtained by defendant since the commencement of the action, must be set up by a plea pais darrein continuance: 99 Mich. 253.

As a general rule, such matters must be pleaded at the first continuance after they happen or come to the plaintiff's knowledge; 11 Johns. 424; 1 S. & R. 146; though a discharge in insolvency or bankruptcy of the defendant; 2 Johns. 294; 9 id. 255, 392; and coverture of the plaintiff existing at the purchase of the suit, are exceptions; Bull. N. P. 310; in the discretion of the court; 10 Johns. 161; 4 S. & R. 239; 5 Dowl. & R. 521; 2 Mo. 100. Great certainty is required in pleas of this description; Freem. 112; Cro. Jac. 261; 2 Wils. 130; 2 Watts 451. They must state the day of the last continuance, and of the happening of the new matter; Bull. N. P. 309; And. St. ph. Pl. 356, n.; 7 Ill. 252; 75 Me. 551; cannot be awarded after assizes are over; 2 M'Cl. & Y. 350; must be verified on oath before they are allowed; 1 Stra. 493; 1 Const. S. C. 455; and must then be received; 3 Term 554; 1 Marsh. 70, 280; 15 N. H. 410. They stand as a substitute for former pleas; Hob. 81; Hempst. 16; 4 Wisc. 159; 1 Strobb. 17; 73 Me. 465; 14 Wend. 161; and demurrers; 32 E. L. & E. 280; may be pleaded after a plea in bar; 1 Wheat. 215; Freem. 252; and if decided against the defendant, the plaintiff has judgment in chief; 1 Wheat. 215; Al. 67; Freem. 252.

Sham pleas are those which are known to the pleader to be false, and are entered for the purpose of delay. There are certain pleas of this kind which, in consequence of their having been long and frequently used in practice, have obtained toleration from the courts, and, though discouraged, are tacitly allowed: as, for example, the common plea of judgment recovered, that is, that judgment has been already recovered by the plaintiff for the same cause of action; Steph. Pl. 444, 445. See 14 Barb. 393; 2 Den. 195. The later practice of courts in regard to sham pleas is to strike them out on motion, and give final judgment for the plaintiff, or impose terms (in the discretion of the court) on the defendant, as a condition of his being let in to plead anew. The motion is made on the plea itself, or on affidavits in connection with the plea.

Pleas in suspension of the action show some ground for not proceeding in the suit at the present period, and pray that the pleading may be stayed until that ground be removed. The number of these pleas is small. Among them is that which is founded on the nonage of the parties, and termed parol demurrer. Steph. Pl. And. ed. 138.

A plea which avers a legal conclusion is bad, as "that a dam is no higher than the statute authorized;" 13 Wall. 175.

In ecclesiastical courts, a plea is called an allegation. See ALLEGATION.

PLEAD, TO. To answer the indictment or, in a civil action, the declaration of the plaintiff, in a formal manner. To enter the defendant's defence upon record. In a popular use, to make a forensic argument. The word is not so used by the profession. Steph. Pl. App. n. I; Story, Eq. Pl. § 4, n.

PLEADER. A person professionally employed to manage another's cause for him, particularly to plead orally, or argue for him in court.

PLEADING. The written allegation of what is affirmed on the one side, or denied on the other, disclosing to the court or jury having to try the cause, the real matter in dispute between the parties. 1 Minn. 17.

In Chancery Practice. It consists in making the formal written allegations or statements of the respective parties on the record to maintain the suit, or to defeat it, of which, when contested in matters of fact, they propose to offer proofs, and in matters of law to offer arguments to the court. Story, Eq. Pl. § 4. The substantial object of pleading is the same, but the forms and rules of pleading are very different, at law and in equity.

In Civil Practice. The stating in a logical and legal form the facts which constitute the plaintiff's cause of action or the defendant's ground of defence: it is the formal mode of alleging that on the record which constitutes the support or the defence of the party in evidence. 3 Dougl. 278; Com. Dig. Pleader (A); Bac. Abr. Pleas and Pleading. Pleading is used to denote the act of making the pleadings.

The object of pleading is to secure a clear and distinct statement of the claims of each party, so that the controverted points may be exactly known, examined, and decided, and the appropriate remedy or punishment administered. See Cowp. 682; Dougl. 159. The object is to develop the real issue; 28 Pa. 522. A pleading must proceed upon some single definite theory, and it must be good upon the theory on which it proceeds; 118 Ind. 87. Good pleading consists in good matter pleaded in good form, in apt time, and due order. Co. Litt. 308. Good matter includes all facts and circumstances necessary to constitute the cause of complaint or ground of defence, and no more. It does not include arguments or matters of law. But some matters of fact need not be stated, though it be necessary to establish them as facts. Such are, among others, facts of which the courts take notice by virtue of their office; as, the time of accession of the sovereign; 2 Ld. Raym. 794; time and place of holding parliament; 1 Saund. 131; public statutes and the facts they ascertain; 1 Term 45; including ecclesiastical, civil, and marine laws; Ld. Raym. 338; but not private; 2 Dougl. 97; or foreign laws; 2 Carth. 273; 4 R. I. 523; common-law rights, duties, and general customs; Ld. Raym. 1542; Co. Litt. 175; Cro. Car. 561; the almanac, days of the week, public holidays, etc.; Salk. 269; 6 Mod. 81; 4 Dowl. 48; 4 Fla. 158; political divisions; Co. 3d Inst. 557; 4 B. & Ald. 242; 6 Ill. 73; the meaning of English words and terms of art in ordinary acceptance; 1 Rolle, Abr. 68, 525; their own course of proceedings; 2 Lev. 176; 10 Pick. 470; and that of courts of general jurisdiction; 1 Saund. 73; 5 McLean 167; 10 Pick. 470; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 4; see JUDICIAL NOTICE; facts which the law presumes: as, the innocence of a party, illegality of an act, etc.; 4 Maule & S. 105; 1 B. & Ald. 463; 6 Johns. 105; 72 Tex. 272; 6 Conn. 180; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 76; matters which the other party should plead, as being more within his knowledge; 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 293, n.; 2 H. Bla. 530; 2 Johns. 415; 9 Cal. 266; 1 Sandf. 89; mere matters of evidence of facts; 9 Co. 96; 25 Barb. 457; 7 Tex. 603; 6 Blackf. 173; 1 N. Chimp. 293; see 25 Fla. 1; unnecessary matter: as, a second breach of condition, where one is sufficient; 2 Johns. 448; 1 Saund. 58, n. 1; 33 Miss. 474; 4 Ind. 409; 23 N. H. 415; 12 Barb. 37; 2 Green. N. J. 577; see DUPLICITY; or intent to defraud, when the facts alleged constitute fraud; 16 Tex. 335; see 3 Maule & S. 183; irrelevant matter; 1 Chitty, Pl. 209. Such matter may be rejected without damage to the plea, if wholly foreign to the case, or repugnant; 7 Johns. 462; 3 Day 472; 2 Mass. 283; 8 S. & R. 124; 16 Tex. 656; 7 Cal. 848; 28 Conn. 134; 1 Du. 242; 6 Ark. 468; 8 Ala. N. S. 320; but in many cases the matter must be proved as stated, if stated; 7 Johns. 821; 3 Day 283. The matter must be true and susceptible of proof; but legal fictions may be stated as facts; 2 Burr. 667; 4 B. & P. 140. Facts necessarily implied from direct averments will be treated as having been pleaded; 48 Mo. App. 319; 44 Ill. App. 22; and facts and not conclusions should be pleaded; 44 Ill. App. 203. See 90 Ala. 454; 52 Fed. Rep. 898.

The form of statement should be according to the established forms; Co. Litt. 303; 6 East 351; 8 Co. 49 B. This is to be considered as, in general, merely a rule of caution, though it is said the courts disapprove a departure from the well-established forms of pleading; 1 Chitty, Pl. 212. In most of the states of the United States, and in England since 1852, many radical changes have been introduced into the law of pleading; still, it is apprehended that a reasonable regard to the old forms will be profitable, although the names of things may be changed. See 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 301, n.; 3 Cal. 196; 28 Miss. 766; 14 B. Monr. 63. In general, it may be said that the facts should be stated logically, in their natural order, with certainty, that is, clearly and distinctly, so that the party who is to answer, the court, and the jury may readily understand what is meant; 2 B. & P. 267; Co. Litt. 303; 33 Miss. 669; Hempst. 239; with precision; 13 Johns. 437; 19 Ark. 695; 5 Du. 689; and with brevity; 36 N. H. 458; 1 Chitty, Pl. 212. The facts stated must not be insensible or repugnant; 7 Co. 25; 25 Conn. 431; 5 Blackf. 339; 18 Colo. 16; nor ambiguous or doubtful in meaning; 5 Maule & S. 38; 86 Wis. 64; nor argumentative; Co. Litt. 303; 5 Blackf. 557; nor by way of recital; 2 Bulstr. 214; Ld. Raym. 1413; and should be stated according to their legal effect and operation; Steph. Pl. And. ed. 366; 16 Mass. 443.

The time within which pleas must be filed is a matter of local regulation, depending upon the court in which the action is brought. The order of pleading different matters is of importance as affecting the defendant, who may oppose the plaintiff's suit in various ways. The order is as follows:—

First, to the jurisdiction of the court.

Second, to the disability, etc., of the person: first, of the plaintiff; second, of the defendant.

Third, to the count or declaration.

Fourth, to the writ: first, to the form of the writ,—first, matter apparent on the face of it, secondly, matters dehors; second, to the action of the writ.

Fifth, to the action itself in bar.

This is said to be the natural order of pleading, because each subsequent plea admits that there is no foundation for the former; 13 La. An. 147; 41 Me. 102; 7 Gray 38; 5 R. I. 235; 2 Bosw. 267; 1 Grant, Pa. 359; 4 Jones, N. C. 241; 20 Miss. 656. See 16 Tex. 114; 4 Ia. 158. An exception exists where matter is pleaded pais darrein continuance; see PLEA; and where the subject-matter is one over which the court has no jurisdiction, a failure to plead to the pais cannot confer jurisdiction; 10 S. & R. 229; 17 Tex. 52.

The science of pleading, as it existed at common law, has been much modified by statutory changes; but, under whatever names it is done,—whether under rules of court, or of the legislative power, by the parties, the court, or the jury,—it is evident that, in the nature of things, the end of pleading must be attained, namely, the production of one or more points of issue, where a single fact is affirmed by one party and denied by the other. By pleading at the common law, this was done by the parties; in the civil law, by the court.

In England, pleadings in actions are now governed by the provisions of the Judicature Act, ord. xix., which made a number of changes in the old common-law methods. See Wharton, Dict.; JUDICATURE ACTS.

Up to judgment pleadings are construed most strongly against the pleader, and unknown, unrecited facts are not assumed in his favor; 45 La. Ann. 935. See 45 Mo. App. 519; 84 Ky. 380; 17 Or. 308; 79 Ga. 315.

In Criminal Practice the rules of pleading are the same as in civil practice. There is, however, less liberty of amendment of the indictment. The order of the defendant's pleading is as follows:—first, to the jurisdiction; second, in abatement; third, special pleas in bar: as, autrefois acquit, autrefois attain, autrefois convict, pardon; fourth, the general issue.

PLEADING, SPECIAL. By special pleading is meant the allegation of special or new matter, as distinguished from a direct denial of matter previously alleged on the opposite side. Gould, Pl. c. 1, s. 18. See SPECIAL PLEADING.

PLEADINGS. In Chancery Practice. The written allegations of the respective parties in the suit. The pleadings in equity are less formal than those at common law.

The parts of the pleadings are—the bill, which contains the plaintiff's statement of his case, or information, where the suit is brought by a public officer in behalf of the sovereign; the demurrer, by which the defendant demands judgment of the court, whether he shall be compelled to answer the bill or not; the plea, whereby he shows some cause why the suit should be dismissed or barred; the answer, which, controverting the case stated by the bill, confesses and avoids it; or traverses and denies the material allegations in the bill, or, admitting the case made by the bill, submits to the judgment of the court upon it, or relies upon a new case or upon new matter stated in the answer, or upon both; disclaimer, which seeks at once a termination of the suit by the defendants, disclaiming all right and interest in the matter sought by the bill; Story, Eq. Pl. § 546; Mitf. Eq. Pl. by Jer. 13, 106; Cooper, Eq. Pl. 108; 2 Sto. 59.

In Civil Practice. The statements of the parties, in legal and proper manner, of the causes of action and grounds of defence. The result of pleading. They were formerly made by the parties or their counsel, orally, in open court, under the control of the judge. They were then called the parole; 3 Bla. Com. 293; 2 Reeves, Hist. Eng. Law 267.

The parts of the pleadings may be arranged under two heads: the regular, which occur in the ordinary course of a suit; and the irregular or collateral, which are occasioned by errors in the pleadings on the other side.

The regular parts are—the declaration or count; the plea, which is either to the jurisdiction of the court, or suspending the action, as in the case of a parol demurrer, or in abatement, or in bar of the action, or in replevin, an avowry or cognizance; the replication, and, in case of an evasive plea, a new assignment, or, in replevin, the plea in bar to the avowry or cognizance; the rejoinder, or, in replevin, the replication to the plea in bar; the sur-rejoinder, being in replevin the rejoinder; the rebuttal; the sur-rebuttal; Viner, Abr. Pleas and Pleadings (A); Bac. Abr. Pleas and Pleadings (A); Pleas puis darrein continuance, when the matter of defence arises pending the suit.

The irregular or collateral parts of pleading are stated to be—demurrers to any part of the pleadings above mentioned; demurrers to evidence given at trials; bills of exceptions; pleas in scire facias; and pleas in error. Viner, Abr. Pleas and Pleadings (C).

In Admiralty, the proceedings might go on, by turns, as long as the mode of pleadings require it. The successive pleadings, after the replication, were called duplication, triplication, and quadruplication, and so on; but they are now obsolete; Bened. Adm. § 492.

In Criminal Practice, the pleadings are—first, the indictment; second, the plea; and the other pleadings as in civil practice.

PLEAS. See NON-ISSUABLE PLEAS.

PLEAS OF THE CROWN. In English Law. A phrase now employed to signify criminal causes in which the king is a party. Formerly it signified royal causes for offences of a greater magnitude than mere misdemeanors. Pleas of the crown, were so called because the sovereign is supposed by law to be the person injured by every wrong, done to the community. Blackstone vol. 4, p. 2.

These were left to be tried in the courts of the barons; whereas the greater offences, or royal causes, were to be tried in the king's courts, under the appellation of pleas of the crown. 1 Robertson, Hist. Charles V. 48.

PLEAS ROLL. In English Practice. A record which contains the declaration, plea, replication, rejoinder, and other pleadings, and the issue. Eunom. Dial. 2, § 29, p. 111.

PLEBEIAN. One who is classed among the common people, as distinguished from the nobles.

PLEBISCITUM (Lat.). In Roman Law. A law established by the people (plebs), on the proposal of a popular magistrate, as a tribune. Vicat. Voc. Jur.; Calvinus, Lex.; Mackeldey, Civ. Law §§ 27, 57. The term is used in France to express a popular vote (plebiscite).

PLEDGE. A bailment of personal property as security for some debt or engagement.

The word is also applied to the res or personal property forming the subject-matter of the bailment. Pignus was synonymous with pledge at common law, but modern usage tends to restrict these words to the bailment of tangible chattels for money advanced, and has introduced the term collateral security, or simply collateral, to designate the subject-matter of a pledge given as security for an engagement other than a simple borrowing of money, and particularly when the subject-matter consists of incorporeal chattels such as stocks, bonds, or choses in action.

A pledge or pawn (Lat. pignus), according to Story, is a bailment of personal property as security for some debt or engagement; Story, Bailm. § 286; which see for the less comprehensive definitions of Sir Wm. Jones, Lord Holt, Pothier, etc. Domat broadly defines it as an appropriation of the thing given for the security of an engagement. But the term is commonly used as Sir Wm. Jones defines it: to wit, as a bailment of goods by a debtor to his creditor, to be kept till the debt is discharged. Jones, Bailm. 117; 2 Ld. Raym. 809; Pothier, De Naut. art. prelim. 1; Code Civ. 2071; Domat b. 3, tit. 1, § 1; La. Civ. Code 3100; 6 Fred. 309. The pledgee secures his debt by the bailment, and the pledgor obtains credit or other advantage. See 1 Pars. Contr. 591.

In Louisiana there are two kinds of pledges: the pawn and the antichresis. The former relates to movable securities, and the latter to immovables. If a creditor have not a right to enter on the land and reap the fruits, the security is not an antichresis; 3 La. 157. A pledge of negotiable paper is not valid against third parties without transfer from debtor to creditor; 2 La. 387; 96 U. S. 487, 496.

Pledge is distinguished from mortgage because the essential feature of pledge is transfer of possession, while the essential feature of mortgage is transfer of title; 96 U. S. 487 (see MORTGAGE). The same distinction exists at the civil law between pignus and hypotheca; Story, Bailm. § 286. In modern transactions title is often transferred under a pledge, but this arises from the nature of the collateral security, and is not a necessity of the relation. In a mortgage, at common law, the property on non-payment of the debt passes wholly to the mortgagee. In a pledge, the property is sold, and only so much of the proceeds as will pay his debt passes to the pledgee. A mortgage is a conditional conveyance of property, which becomes absolute unless redeemed at a specified time. A pledge is not strictly a conveyance at all, nor need any day of redemption be appointed for it. A mortgagee can sell and deliver the thing mortgaged, subject only to the right of redemption. A pledgee cannot sell and deliver the thing pledged until the debt is due and payment denied (though he can assign his contract, and with it the collateral security, or pledge).

Whether a particular contract be held a pledge or a mortgage is often a question of importance, and the courts hold it to be whichever seems best to effectuate the intention of the parties without regard to the language employed; 9 Wend. 80; 47 Minn. 437; 8 So. Dak. 570; leaning, however, to pledge rather than mortgage as ordinarily more favorable to the debtor; 3 Tex. 119; 2 Cow. 324.

Subject of pledge. Any personal property capable of delivery or transfer may be pledged, except for the peculiar rules of maritime law which are applicable to shipping, and except, also, that on the ground of public policy the common law (apart from statutory prohibitions which are frequent) does not permit the pay and emoluments of officers and soldiers to be pledged; 1 H. Bla. 627; 4 Term 248. Hence, probably, a fishing bounty could not be pledged, nor any form of government pension or bounty given for the personal benefit of the donee.

Not only goods and chattels and money, but also negotiable paper, may be put in pledge; 8 Pa. 381; 25 Minn. 202; 82 Ill. 584; 22 Gratt. 262. So may choses in action, patent rights, coupon bonds, and manuscripts of various sorts; 2 Taunt. 268; 15 Mass. 389, 534; 2 Blackf. 198; 7 Me. 28; 4 Den. 227; 2 N. Y. 443; 1 Stockt. 667. So may bonds secured by a mortgage on personal property and corporate franchises; 60 N. H. 57; and coupon bonds; 104 U. S. 505; 9 N. J. Eq. 667; and chattel mortgages of every description; and policies of life insurance; 4 Colo. 138; 18 Fed. Rep. 803. Even a lease may be taken in pledge; 8 Cal. 145; L. R. 10 Eq. 92; for leases are but chattels real; or a mortgage of real estate, which, before foreclosure, is now to be ranked with personal property; 9 Boew. 322. Incorporeal things could be pledged immediately probably, under the civil law, and so in the Scotch law, or, at all events, by assignment; 1 Domat b. 3, tit. 1, § 1; Pothier, de Naut. n. 6; 2 Bell, Com. 23. In the civil law, property of which the pledgor had neither present possession nor title could be pledged,—though this was rather a contract for pledge, called a hypothecation. The pledge became complete when the property was acquired by the pledgor. The same rule holds in our law, where a hypothecary contract gives a lien which attaches when the property is vested; 1 Hare 549; 13 Pick. 175; 54 N. Y. 18; 21 Me. 86; 16 Conn. 276; 60 id. 463; Davis 199. And it has been held that a pledge may be made to secure an obligation not yet risen into existence; 12 La. An. 529. In an agreement to pledge a vessel not then completed, the intent of the parties governs in determining when the property passes; 8 Pick. 236; 24 E. L. & E. 220.

Buying and selling through a broker on deposit of a "margin" with him is held in New York to create the relation of pledgor and pledgee; so that, on the pledgor's failure to keep his "margin" good, the pledgee or broker cannot sell the stock, except upon the pledge formalities, for repayment of his advances and commissions; 41 N. Y. 235; and the rule has been adopted in other states; 119 Ill. 554; 63 Conn. 198.

Delivery of possession is essential to a pledge. Unless the pledgee take and retain possession there is no pledge; 96 U. S. 407; 183 id. 243; 37 Me. 543; 167 Mass. 322; 86 Md. 392; 30 W. Va. 586; 48 La. Ann. 488. If possession be given to a third person for the pledgee such person must know of the trust and accept the obligation it imposes; 46 La. Ann. 1036. But a constructive delivery is all that is required, that is, such delivery as the nature or situation of the goods admits. Hence goods in transit or in store will pass by transfer of the bill of lading or warehouse receipt; 8 How. U. S. 384; 96 Ky. 176; 132 N. Y. 41; 133 Mass. 154; 13 Wash. 645; 29 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 752; 44 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 572. A change of the location of bulky articles is not in all cases necessary, but it is sufficient if the best means available to give notice of the change of possession are made use of; 147 Pa. 49; such as posting signs on, or marking, the goods; 17 Nev. 401; or appointing an agent to take charge, which agent may be an employee of the pledgor; 12 Pick. 76; 24

Minn. 423. Delivery of a larger quantity than the amount pledged with the right in pledgee to select the pledge, is good; 14 Pick. 497; 2 Gray 195; 2 N. Y. 258; and so where the pledgee is put and kept in possession of a quantity in excess of the pledged amount, allowing the pledgor to add to, or subtract from, the mass, but maintaining the quantity of the pledge, the pledge is good; 81 Fed. Rep. 439. But there cannot be a valid pledge of a portion of a mass, there being no segregation, and the pledgor retaining the whole; 15 Pa. 618; 63 Me. 450. When goods are in the hands of an agent of the pledgor an order on him to hold for the use of the pledgee, accepted by him, constitutes a delivery; 42 W. Va. 156.

In the case of commercial paper, stocks, bonds, and securities, which together constitute by far the most important division of pledges, or collateral securities, and of choses in action, delivery of possession is essential, but to make the delivery effective assignment is necessary, and assignment is transfer of title. As both title and possession are transferred, the distinction between mortgage and pledge ceases to be of much practical importance—the title to the collateral depends not on the principal obligation, but on the mode of transfer; 65 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 643. But there is a distinction between the position of the pledgee in relation to the pledgor and in relation to third persons. His position cannot be described as simply that of a trustee, because he holds the collateral primarily for his own benefit, which affects his relation to the pledge; 174 Pa. 529. So far as the pledgor is concerned the question of the title of the pledgee is determined by the intention of the parties; as to third parties he is practically owner. Thus a pledgee of stock may transfer it to his own name; 82 Tex. 368; though this is not necessary; 43 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 896; and so far as the corporation is concerned he is the owner of it; 149 Pa. 363. The legal title to a pledged note or chose in action is in him; 36 Fla. 619; 96 Ga. 445; 39 So. West. Rep. (Tex.) 1002. He occupies the position of a bona fide holder for value, except when the pledge is for an existing debt; 112 Ala. 228; and though an assignee of a pledgee have notice of equities, he is not bound by them if his assignor, the pledgee, had not; 75 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 433. His title to an accommodation note is good, notwithstanding equities between maker and payee; 15 S. E. Rep. (So. Car.) 430; and he has the rights of a bona fide holder against the corporation, when the collateral is a certificate of stock which proves to have been fraudulently issued; 137 N. Y. 231. See STOCK.

He is bound by anything which should amount to notice that the pledgor is without authority to pledge; 131 N. Y. 595; 185 Pa. 476; 5 Wash. 792; 99 Ala. 130; 52 Fed. Rep. 513; 20 Can. S. C. R. 481. But in dealing with one in possession of the securities and having the apparent right to dispose of them he will be protected, though the pledge be a fraud on the real owner; 113 Ala. 372. Of course if the true owner has been deprived of possession by what amounts to embezzlement he can recover from the pledgee; 168 Mass. 578. And a pledgee from one who has no authority either to sell or pledge acquires no lien on the property as against the true owner; 28 So. East. Rep. (W. Va.) 740. As holder of a note to which there is a valid defence against the payee he is protected, but only to the extent of his interest, i. e. to the amount which he has advanced; 88 Tex. 553. See 41 Neb. 754.

Factors and Agents. A factor cannot, at common law, pledge his principal's goods; and the principal may recover them from the pledgee's hands; 6 Maule & S. 1; 2 Br. & B. 689; 4 B. & C. 5; [1898] 1 Q. B. 62; 1 M'Cord 1; 6 Metc. 69; 20 Johns. 421; 4 Hen. & M. 423; 18 Mo. 147, 191; 11 How. 209, 226; 52 Fed. Rep. 513; and this is so whether entrusted with the goods themselves or with the symbol of them, as a bill of lading; 120 U. S. 20. But the Factors' Acts in England, to remedy the intolerable condition which would exist if an unknown owner were permitted to repudiate transactions of a factor have enacted that a pledge by a factor having a power of sale shall be valid. Similar acts have been passed in many of the States. See AGENTS; FACTOR; FACTORS' ACTS.

Co-Pledgees. A pledgee may hold a pledge for another pledgee also, and it will be a good pledge to both; 43 La. Ann. 1049. If the pledge be not large enough for both debts after sale, and no other arrangement be made, the prior pledgee will have the whole of his debt paid before any part of the proceeds is applied to the subsequent pledge. If there is no priority of time, they will divide ratably. But an agreement between the parties will always determine the right of two or more pledgees; 12 Mass. 321. Where possession is given to one of three pledgees, to hold for all three the other two have a constructive possession, which is equally good, for the purpose of sharing, with an actual possession. Hence the mere manual possession of one pledge will not give a right to discharge the whole debt of the holder and a part only of that of his co-pledgees. So, by the rule of constructive possession, if the holder should lose the pledge by his own negligence, he would be liable to his co-bailees out of actual possession, as well as to his bailor.

Substituted collateral is held on the same terms as that originally pledged, the surrender of that given up being sufficient consideration for the new deposit; 143 Ill. 598; 132 Mo. 492; 67 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 460. Collateral deposited on a demand by the pledgee for additional "margin" would probably be held to be security given for an existing debt. The point does not appear to have been decided. When the pledgee changes the form of the collateral he continues to hold under the terms of the pledge, e. g. where he forecloses a mortgage and buys in the land; 87 Ga. 339. See 114 Cal. 126; 124 Mass. 242; 86 N. Y. 176; 159 Ill. 416.

Other debts. A pledge cannot, in general, be held for any other debt than that which it was given to secure, except on the special agreement and consent of the parties; 6 Ves. 226; 83 Tex. 545; 153 N. Y. 490; 154 Mass. 859; 33 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 370. (The civil and Scotch law are otherwise; 2 Bell, Com. 22.) Unless the intention is clear to the contrary it will be held that this special agreement applies only to subsequent debts; 77 Ind. 438; 52 N. J. Eq. 198; and the court was equally divided where a custom of brokers was set up to justify the application to existing debts; 94 Va. 686. Where a judgment has been paid the parties may lawfully agree that it shall remain as collateral for a new loan made, or to be made; 161 Pa. 469. After his debt is paid the pledgee may continue to hold the pledge as security for another creditor; 47 La. Ann. 800.

The renewal of the note or obligation of pledge does not affect the pledgee's rights in regard to the collaterals, it is a mere prolongation of the original contract; 10 U. S. App. 416; Colebrooke, Collat. Secur. § 14.

Assignment by the pledgee is valid, in the absence of an agreement to the contrary, and carries with it all the collaterals pledged as security. The pledgor is not injured thereby, his right to redeem remaining unimpaired; 99 Mich. 121; 43 Neb. 489; 19 Colo. 149. The pledgor may sell or transfer his right to a third party, who may bring trover against the pledgee if the latter, after tender of the amount of the debt, refuse to deliver the pledge; 9 Cow. 52; 13 M. & W. 480; L. R. 1 Q. B. 686; 78 Pa. 158; 73 Ill. 449.

Conversion. If the pledgee assign the debt without the collateral he loses his lien on the latter, and the pledgor can recover it. If he assign the collateral, except by exercising whatever right of sale he has under the pledge, he is liable to the pledgor, who has an immediate right of action, without tendering the amount due, for the conversion, though the defendant can offset the debt due him; 69 Hun 311. If he hold negotiable paper he has no right to sell it, but should wait until its maturity and then collect it; 25 Minn. 202; 82 Ill. 584; 23 Grat. 262; 16 N. Y. 392; but a court may under certain circumstances order a judicial sale of it; 57 Minn. 341. See 164 Pa. 95; 89 Wis. 444; 55 N. J. L. 290; 70 Md. 41. Treating the pledge as his own property in disregard of his obligation to the pledgor is, of course, a conversion; 41 N. Y. Sup. 451.

Shares of stock have no individuality, no earmarks. The certificates are merely evidence of ownership, muniments of title, like title deeds. Therefore a pledgee of stocks need not preserve a careful separation of certificates connected with each transaction, but complies with his obligation by holding at all times a sufficient number of shares to answer the pledge when called on; 11 Fed. Rep. 115; 82 Tex. 368. The right to re-pledge for his own debt was not enjoyed by a common-law pledgee, but where a custom of brokers justifies re-pledging securities of customers it is not unlawful; 63 Conn. 198; [1893] 2 Ch. Div. 120. No usage will justify such re-pledging of the collateral as to put it out of the power of the pledgee to return it on payment of his debt; that would be to destroy the contract; 78 Md. 475. If a broker re-hypothecate for a larger amount than the pledgor's debt to him, for his own benefit, he is guilty of conversion; 17 App. Div. (N. Y.) 329. See, as to pledges of shares, 12 L. R. A. 781.

Re-delivery to pledgee. Possession is of the very essence of the pledge, and if possession be re-delivered by the pledgee, or with his consent, without more, the pledge is extinguished. The exceptions to the rule are where the pledgor holds as the pledgee's agent, or where the pledge is re-delivered for a temporary purpose only, e. g. for sale, or for collection or suit by the pledgor; 96 U. S. 478; 127 id. 532; [1895] App. Cas. 56; 47 La. Ann. 742; 42 So. West. Rep. (Tenn.) 698; 60 Mo. App. 63; 53 Minn. 327. Such possession by the pledgor will not defeat the pledge.

Property. The pledgee has at common law a special property in the pledge, and is entitled to the exclusive possession of it during the time and for the objects for which it is pledged. If a wrong-doer take the pledge from him, he is not thereby ousted from his right. His special property is enough for him to support replevin or trover against the wrong-doer. He has, moreover, a right of action, because he is responsible to his pledgor for proper custody of the bailment. The pledgor, also, may have his action against the wrong-doer resting it on the ground of his general property. A judgment for either pledgor or pledgee is a bar against a similar action by the other; 3 Bla. Com. 395; 1 B. & Ald. 59; 5 Binn. 457. See 15 Conn. 302; 9 Gill 7; 13 Me. 436; 13 Vt. 504.

The pledgee may bring replevin or trover against the pledgor if the latter remove the pledge before paying the debt and thus injure the pledgee's rights, on the ground that the owner has parted with his absolute right of disposing of the chattel until he has redeemed it from its state of pledge; 2 Taunt. 368; 1 Sandf. 203; 22 N. H. 196; 11 N. Y. 150; 2 M'Cord 126. He recovers only the value of his special property as against the pledgor, or one who derives title from him; 4 Barb. 491; 13 Ill. 465; but the value of the whole property as against a stranger, and the balance beyond the special property, he holds for the owner; 15 Conn. 302. So if the owner brings the action and recovers the whole damages, including those for deprivation of possession, it must be with the consent of the pledgee.

A creditor of the pledgor can only take his interest, and must pay the debt before scouring the pledge. It is now settled that the pledgor's general property in the pledge may be sold on execution, and the purchaser or assignee of the pledgor succeeds to the pledgor's rights and may himself redeem. At common law, a pledge could not be taken in execution: 1 Ves. 378; 3 Watts 558; 17 Pick. 65; 1 Gray 354; 37 Md. 354; 21 N. H. 73. On an extent the king takes a pawn on paying the pawnee's debt: 2 Chit. Prerog. 385.

Where securities have been pledged by assignment and delivery it would seem that the property vests in the pledgee, who in suit upon them can recover their full value: 73 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 873. It has been held, however, that the pledgor does not entirely lose his right to protect his interests and can proceed against the maker of notes transferred by him as collateral: 47 La. Ann. 1330; and that when the pledgee refuses to proceed for collection he can proceed in equity against the pledgee and the maker: 31 So. Rep. (Miss.) 970. A bill which discloses that complainant has pledged the stock for which he sues is not demurrable on the ground that it fails to show payment in full of the debt for which the stock was pledged, because a pledgor always has an interest sufficient to enable him to maintain a suit: 77 Fed. Rep. 779. Where a pledgee of securities has wrongfully re-hypothecated them, and the owner secures them by paying the debt for which they were re-hypothecated, a judgment recovered by the pledgor against the original pledgee for the conversion does not vest the title to the securities in the pledgee: 78 Fed. Rep. 216.

Ordinary care. The pledgee is bound to take ordinary care of the pledge, and is liable only for neglect of such care, the bailment being for the mutual benefit of the parties: 41 Minn. 46; 119 N. Y. 263; 99 Cal. 234. Where he is to do work upon the pledge and incur expenditure he must use reasonable diligence to secure the best net results, and account, showing that expenses for which allowance is claimed were reasonable and necessary: 55 Minn. 14; where he is to sell, paying himself out of the proceeds, he will be liable for carelessness in properly keeping the pledge, and for failing to sell until the market has fallen: 53 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 229. If the pledge is lost, and the pledgee has not failed to exercise ordinary care, he may still recover his debt. Such losses often result from casualty, superior force, or intrinsic defect against which a man of ordinary prudence would not have effectually guarded himself. If a pledgor find it necessary to employ an agent, and exercise ordinary care in the selection, he will not be liable for the latter's neglect or misconduct: 1 La. An. 344; 10 B. Monr. 239; 4 Ind. 425; 8 N. H. 66; 6 Cal. 648; 68 N. W. Rep. (So. Dak.) 735. Loss or depreciation in value of the thing pledged, through negligence of the pledgee, does not operate to extinguish pro tanto the debt secured: 41 Minn. 46; but the pledgee is liable to the pledgor for the depreciation in value of the property pledged after a tender of the amount due and a refusal of the pledgee to deliver: 74 Cal. 250.

Loss by theft is prima facie evidence of a want of ordinary care, and the bailee must rebut the presumption. The facts in each case regulate the liability. Theft is only evidence, in short, and not absolute presumption, of negligence. Perhaps the only safe rule is that, where the pledgee pleads loss by theft as ground for not performing his duty, to excuse himself he must show that the theft could not have been prevented by ordinary care on his part. If the bailor should assert in his declaration that the pledge was lost by the bailee's fault, he would be compelled to prove the charge as laid.

The holder of collateral security, by accepting it, binds himself to use reasonable diligence in protecting it: 71 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 113. Thus, by negligently releasing the indorser he becomes chargeable with the amount of a note: 50 Fed. Rep. 798; if he refuse to sue on a note the pledgor may file a bill to have the note collected and credited on the debt: 21 So. Rep. (Miss.) 970; by failure to use due diligence to collect accounts assigned he becomes responsible for the resulting losses: 37 So. Car. 200; he must account for the real value of an insurance policy surrendered to the company for its cash value without notice to the pledgor: 37 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 8. But as assignee of a policy of life insurance he is not obliged to pay premiums unless he has engaged to do so: 73 Hun 194; though authorized to sell collateral in the event of its depreciation he is not bound to do so, nor liable if he fails: 15 App. Div. (N. Y.) 103; by taking notes secured on property he incurs no obligation to sue for the property, and if he does so, at the request of the pledgor, he incurs no obligation to take charge of it, and advance expenses upon it: 97 Tenn. 308; when only required to collect a sufficient sum on a note to pay the debt, and then to turn it over to the pledgor, after collecting such sum, he is not liable for failure to take prompt steps to collect the residue at maturity: 44 So. West. Rep. (Tenn.) 304. But he is responsible as bailee after, as well as before, the maturity of the debt: 49 Neb. 280.

Pledgee's expenses. Whatever reasonable expense is necessarily incurred by the pledgee in keeping and caring for the property pledged, and protecting it against liens and taxes and assessments, and asserting title to it, or rendering it available, is a fair charge against the property pledged: 147 Ill. 570; 173 Pa. 633; 116 Cal. 9; 67 Fed. Rep. (C. C. A.) 837. For any unusual care he may get compensation from the pledgor, if it were not contemplated by the parties or is implied in the nature of the bailment: Ld. Raym. 909; 3 Salk. 523; 1 Pars. Contr. 393.

Use. The reasonable use of a pledge is allowed to a pledgee, according to Lord Holt, Sir Wm. Jones, and Story, provided it be of no injury or peril to the bailment. The reason given by Story is precise, namely, that where use of the pledge is beneficial to it, or cannot depreciate it, the consent of the pledgor to such use may be fairly presumed; but not otherwise. Still, the word peril is somewhat broad. If the pawn be in its nature a charge upon the pawnee, — as a horse or a cow, — he may use it, moderately, by way of recompense. The pawnee is answerable in damages for an injury happening while he is using the pawn. Still, though he use it tortiously, he is only answerable by action. His pledgee's lien is not thereby forfeited: 4 Watts 414. A pledgee can exercise a horse, but not loan it for hire. The rule is, that if he derive any profits from the pledge they must be applied to the debt: 3 Murph. 111. A sewing machine that is pledged cannot be used: 72 Ill. 358.

Redemption. The pledgor may redeem at any time until his right to do so has been foreclosed by judicial decree, or by sale after notice. He has his whole lifetime in which to redeem, and the right survives to his representatives: 3 Mo. 316; 1 Cal. 290. Failure to pay the debt at maturity works no forfeiture: 10 Utah 3. If the pledgee fail to deliver on tender the pledgor may maintain trover, or if special ground be shown may proceed in equity: 113 Ala. 372.

Remedies of pledgee. The contract of pledge is security for some debt or engagement, that is to say it is a secondary or subordinate contract, and the pledgee may enforce the primary contract, or may proceed upon any one of several collateral securities, or may proceed upon all together, unless restricted by his engagement with the pledgor, though he can have but one satisfaction of the debt. It is a settled principle of equity that a creditor holding collaterals is not bound to apply them before enforcing his direct remedies against the debtor: 92 U. S. 618; 184 Pa. 318; 164 Mass. 818; 37 Abb. N. C. 378; 56 Ark. 105; 76 Fed. Rep. 86; 85 id. (C. C. A.) 536. Even where the pledgee wrongfully claims that he is the owner of the goods, the pledgor cannot recover them without a tender of the debt: 37 L. T. 642; and the levy of an attachment by the pledgee on the pledge in the hands of the pledgee-holder is not a waiver of the pledge: 59 Fed. Rep. 249; 84 So. West. Rep. (Ky.) 282. But one personal obligation cannot constitute collateral security for another obligation of the same debtor, hence if he hold bonds of a corporation as collateral for its note he cannot, if the pledgor become insolvent, claim both on the notes and the bonds: 3 Wyo. 808; 67 Conn. 324.

Formerly on default the pledgee had no power to realize upon his pledge, in the absence of agreement, except by securing a judicial decree: Glanv. lib. x. c. 6; 5 Bligh n. s. 136; 3 Johns. Ch. 100; 8 Ill. 423; 3 Tex. 119; 22 Pick. 40; 2 N. Y. 443. While this might in some cases still be necessary (see 57 Minn. 841), it is now generally conceded that on default the pledgee may sell after demand for payment and reasonable notice to pledgor. The pledge must be sold at public auction, and if it be divisible, only enough must be sold to pay the debt.

Generally an agreement is entered into when the pledge is made which provides what remedies the pledgee shall have in case of default, and the agreement of the parties will be sustained if not fraudulent or contrary to public policy: 3 Cal. 151; 52 Kan. 195; 49 Neb. 280. Thus the pledgor may waive notice: 138 N. Y. 660; or authorize the pledgee to sell at public or private sale without advertisement or notice, at his discretion: 84 Fed. Rep. 537; but the sale must be in good faith: 80 id. 665. The fact that the price realized was small will not affect the purchaser's title: 56 id. 164. But a merely colorable and pretended sale of the pledged property by the pledgee does not affect the rights of the pledgor as against one not standing in the position of a bona fide purchaser: 41 Minn. 146. The pledgee may in anticipation of default make a valid contract to sell the collateral when the default occurs: 162 Mass. 527. But a stipulation for a forfeiture to pledgee in case of default is void: 84 Hun 496; and a court of equity will scrutinize carefully an agreement for transfer of ownership, and set it aside if it appear to have been obtained under a harsh contract, brought about by the position of vantage occupied by the pledgee: 79 Fed. Rep. 522.

In the absence of an agreement permitting it, the pledgee cannot buy the pledge: 84 Mo. 72; 127 U. S. 532; see 81 Fed. Rep. 450; though his purchase is voidable merely, at the election of the pledgor, and not void: 54 Fed. Rep. 759; 85 id. (C. C. A.) 539. But on procuring a decree of foreclosure in a proceeding in equity to which he has made the pledgor a party, he can sell, and buy in, taking an indefeasible title: 145 Ill. 168.

When corporate bonds, pledged to secure claims against the company, are sold at public auction and bought in by the pledgee the latter is entitled to be paid the full value of the bonds, and not merely the amount for which they were pledged: 86 Fed. Rep. 973.

PLEDGE. One to whom a thing is pledged.

PLEDGES. In Pleading. Those persons who became sureties for the plaintiff's prosecution of the suit. Their names were anciently appended at the foot of the declaration. In time it became purely a formal matter, because the plaintiff was no longer liable to be amerced for a false claim, and the fictitious persons John Doe and Richard Roe became the universal pledges, or they might be omitted altogether: 1 Tidd, Fr. 453; Archb. Civ. Pl. 171; or inserted at any time before judgment: 4 Johns. 90; they are now omitted.

PLEDGOR. The party who makes a pledge.

PLEGII DE RETORNO HABENDO. Pledges to return the subject of distress, should the right be determined against the party bringing the action of replevin. 3 Steph. Com. 422, n.

PLEGIS ACQUIETANDIS, WRIT DE. The name of an ancient writ in the English law, which lies where a man becomes pledge or surety for another to pay a certain sum of money at a certain day; after the day, if the debtor does not pay the debt, and the surety be compelled to pay, he shall have this writ to compel the debtor to pay the same. Fitzh. N. B. 321.

PLENA FORISFACTURA. See FORISFACTURA.

PLENA PROBATIO. In Civil Law. A term used to signify full proof, in contradistinction to semi-plena probatio, which is not merely a suspicion, but such evidence as produces a reasonable belief though not complete evidence. Tait, Ev. 273; Code 4. 19. 5. etc.; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 119.

PLENARTY. In Ecclesiastical Law. Signifies that a benefice is full. See AVOIDANCE.

PLENARY. Full; complete. In the courts of admiralty, and in the English ecclesiastical courts, causes or suits in respect of the different course of proceedings in each are termed plenary or summary. Plenary, or full and formal, suits are those in which the proceedings must be full and formal; the term summary is applied to those causes where the proceedings are more succinct and less formal. 2 Chitty, Pr. 481.

PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT (Lat. he has fully administered). In Pleading. A plea in bar entered by an executor or administrator, by which he affirms that he had not in his possession at the time of the commencement of the suit, nor has had any time since, any goods of the deceased to be administered; when the plaintiff replies that the defendant had goods, etc., in his possession at that time, and the parties join issue, the burden of the proof will be on the plaintiff. See 15 Johns. 323; 1 B. & Ald. 254; 1 Viner, Abr. 349; 12 id. 185; 3 Saund. (a) 315, n. 1; 6 Com. Dig. 311.

PLENE ADMINISTRAVIT PRÆTER (Lat. he has fully administered except). In Pleading. A plea by which a defendant executor or administrator admits that there is a residue remaining in his hands unadministered.

PLENE COMPUTAVIT (Lat. he has fully accounted). In Pleading. A plea in an action of account render, by which the defendant avers that he has fully accounted. Bac. Abr. Account (E). This plea does not admit the liability of the defendant to account. 15 S. & R. 153.

PLENIPOTENTIARY. Possessing full powers; as, a minister plenipotentiary is one authorized fully to settle the matters connected with his mission, subject, however, to the ratification of the government by which he is authorized. See MINISTER.

PLENUM DOMINIUM (Lat.). The unlimited right which the owner has to use his property as he deems proper, without accountability to any one.

PLEVIN. A warrant, or assurance.

PLIGHT. An old English word, used sometimes for the estate with the habit and quality of the land. Co. Litt. 221. It extends to a rent-charge and to a possibility of dower. Id.: 1 Rolle, Abr. 447; Littl. § 289.

PLOUGH ALMS. The ancient payment of a penny to the church from every plough land. 1 Mon. Aug. 256.

PLOUGH-BOTE. An allowance made to a rural tenant of wood sufficient for ploughs, harrows, carts, and other instruments of husbandry.

PLOUGH-LAND. In Old English Law. An uncertain quantity of land. According to some opinions, it contains one hundred and twenty acres. Co. Litt. 69 a.

PLOUGH SILVER. Money formerly paid by some tenants in lieu of service to plough the lord's land.

FLOW ALMS. See PLOUGH ALMS.

PLUNDER. The capture of personal property on land by a public enemy, with a view of making it his own. The property so captured is called plunder. See, for a full discussion of the subject, 8 Fed. Rep. 246; 16 Pick. 9; CAPTURE; BOOTY; PRIZE.

PLUNDERAGE. In Maritime Law. The embezzlement of goods on board of a ship.

The rule of the maritime law in such cases is that the whole crew shall be responsible for the property thus embezzled, because there must be some negligence in finding out the depredator; Abb. Ship. 457; 8 Johns. 17; 1 Pet. Adm. 200, 239; 4 B. & P. 347.

PLURIES (Lat. many times). A writ issued subsequently to a first and second (alias) of the same kind, which have proved ineffectual. The name is given to it from the word pluries in the Latin form of the writ: "We command you, as we have often (pluries) commanded you before," which distinguishes it from those which have gone before. Pluries is variously translated, in the modern forms of writs, by "formerly," "more than once," "often." The next writ to the pluries is called the second pluries; and so on. 3 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 283; App. 15; Nat. Brev. 33.

PLURIS PETITIO. In Scotch Law. A demand of more than is due. Bell, Dict.

PLY. A hackney carriage plies for hire if it solicits passengers in a railway station. L. R. 6 Q. B. 351.

POACHING. Unlawfully entering land in night-time, armed, with intent to destroy game. 1 Russ. Crimes 469; 2 Steph. Comm. 11th ed. 20. This offence is punished in England by imprisonment for any period not exceeding three months with hard labor, and at the expiration of such period the party convicted is to be bound over by sureties for good behavior for one year, or in default thereof to be imprisoned for a further period of six months, or until such sureties be found. For a second offence, the offender is liable to an imprisonment of six months and then to be bound in sureties for two years. And for a third, he is guilty of a misdemeanor and liable to penal servitude or imprisonment at hard labor for not more than two years. By 25 & 26 Vict. c. 114, power is given to any constable in the highway to search any person he may have good cause to suspect of coming from any land where he shall have been unlawfully in search of game and to seize such game and to apply to some justice for a summons obliging the offender to appear before two justices, by whom the party may, on conviction, be fined. See GAME LAWS.

POCKET JUDGMENT. A statute-merchant which was enforceable at any time after non-payment on the day assigned, without further proceedings.

POCKET SHERIFF. In English Law. A sheriff appointed by sole authority of the crown, not being one of the three nominated by the judges in the exchequer. 1 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 842.

POENA. Punishment. R. & L. Dict.

POENA CORPORALIS. Corporal punishment.

POENA PILLORALIS. Punishment of the pillory. Fleta, lib. 1, ch. 38, § 11.

POET LAUREATE. See LAUREATE.

POINDING. In Scotch Law. That diligence (process) affecting movable subjects by which their property is carried directly to the creditor. Poinding is real or personal. Erskine, Inst. 8. 6. 11.

POINDING, PERSONAL. Poinding of the goods belonging to the debtor, and of those goods only.

It may have for its warrant either letters of horning, containing a clause for poinding, and then it is executed by messengers; or precepts of poinding, granted by sheriffs, commissaries, etc., which are executed by their proper officers. Erskine, Inst. 8. 6. 11. This process is somewhat similar to distress.

POINDING, REAL. POINDING OF THE GROUND. Though it be properly a diligence, this is generally considered by lawyers as a species of real action, and is so called to distinguish it from personal poinding, which is founded merely on an obligation to pay.

Every debitum fundi, whether legal or conventional, is a foundation for this action. It is, therefore, competent to all creditors in debts which make a real burden on lands. As it proceeds on a real right, it may be directed against all goods that can be found on the lands burdened; but goods brought upon the ground by strangers are not subject to this diligence. Even the goods of a tenant cannot be poinded for more than his term's rent. Erskine, Inst. 4. 1. 3.

POINT. In Practice. A proposition or question arising in a case.

It is the duty of a judge to charge the jury on every point of law properly arising out of the issue which is propounded to him by counsel. But where the conclusion of a point does not necessarily flow from the premise contained in the first part of it, it is not error for the court to refuse to affirm it; 182 Pa. 427.

POINT RESERVED. A point or question of law, which the court, not being fully satisfied how to decide, in the trial of a cause, rules in favor of the plaintiff, but subject to revision on a motion for a new trial. If, after argument, it be found to have been ruled correctly, the verdict is supported; if otherwise, it is set aside. Tr. & H. Pr. § 708. It must be a pure question of law; the facts on which it is based must appear on the record, distinctly stated; and it must be a point which is decisive of the case. The verdict must be in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendant then moves for a new trial and judgment non obstante verdicto. See NON OBSTANTE VEREDICTO.

POINTS. Marks in writing and in print, to denote the stops that ought to be made in reading, and to point out the sense.

Points are not usually put in legislative acts or in deeds; Eunom. Dial. 2, § 33, p. 239; yet in construing such acts or instruments, the courts must read them with such stops as will give effect to the whole; 4 Term 65.

The points are—the comma, the semi-colon, the colon, the full point, the point of interrogation, and the point of exclamation. Barrington, Stat. 294, n. See PUNCTUATION.

Statements of fact and of the law applicable thereto submitted to a trial judge with a request that he so charge the jury. See BRIEF; PAPER BOOK; CHARGE; INSTRUCTION.

POISON. In Medical Jurisprudence. A substance of definite chemical composition, which, when taken into the living organism, is capable of causing impairment or cessation of function. Blyth, Poisons.

The history of poisoning, and many remarkable early instances of a wide-spread use of poisons, are recorded in works on medical jurisprudence. See these, and also, especially, Taylor, Poisons; Archb. Cr. Pract. Waterman's ed. 940; Whart. & Stillé, Med. Jur.; 1 Beekman, Hist. Jur. 74. The classification proposed by Mr. Taylor (Med. Jur. § 71, 74, 76) is as follows:—

IRRITANTS.	MINERAL.	NON-METALLIC.	Acids, Alkalies and their Salts. Metalloids.
NARCOTICS.	METALLIC (Arsenic).	METALLIC (Arsenic).
GASEOUS.	Carbon Monoxide, Chlorine.	Carbon Monoxide, Chlorine.

Irritant poisons, when taken in ordinary doses, occasion speedily violent vomiting and purging, preceded, accompanied, or followed by intense pain in the abdomen, commencing in the region of the stomach. The corrosive poisons, as distinguished from those in a more limited sense termed irritant, generally produce their results more speedily, and give chemical indications; but every corrosive poison acts as an irritant in the sense here adopted.

Narcotic poisons act chiefly on the brain or spinal marrow. Either immediately or some time after the poison has been swallowed, the patient suffers from headache, giddiness, paralysis, stupor, delirium, insensibility, and, in some instances, convulsions.

The effects of one class are, however, sometimes produced by the other,—more commonly as secondary, but sometimes even as primary symptoms.

The evidence of poisoning as derived from symptoms is to be looked for chiefly in the suddenness of their occurrence; this is perhaps the most reliable of all evidence derived from symptoms in cases of criminal poisoning; see Taylor, Pois. 107; Christison, Pois. 42; though none of this class of evidence can be considered as furnishing anything better than a high degree of probability; the regularity of their increase; this feature is not universal, and exists in many diseases; uniformity in their nature; this is true in the case of comparatively few poisons; the symptoms begin soon after a meal; but sleep, the manner of administration, or certain diseases, may affect this rule in the case of some poisons; when several partake at the same time of the same poisoned food, all suffer from similar symptoms; 2 Park. C. C. 335; Taylor, Pois. 118; the symptoms first appearing while the body is in a state of perfect health; Archb. Cr. Pl. Waterman ed. 948.

Appearances which present themselves on post-mortem examinations are of importance in regard to some classes of irritant poisons; see The Hersey Case, Mass. 1861; Palmer's Case, Taylor, Poisons 697; 17 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 145; but many poisons leave no traces which can be so discovered.

Chemical analysis often results in important evidence, by discovering the presence of poison, which must then be accounted for; but a failure to detect it by no means proves that it has not been given. Christison, Poisons 61, 62.

The evidence derived from circumstances differs in nothing in principle from that in case of commission of other crimes.

Homicide by poisoning is generally either accidental, so as not to amount to murder, or deliberate; yet it has been held that there may be a verdict of murder in the second degree under an indictment for poisoning; 19 Conn. 388. The doctrine of principal and accessory is also modified to some extent in its application to cases of poisoning; 2 Mood. Cr. Cas. 120; 9 C. & P. 359; 9 Co. 81. To constitute an administering of poison, it is not necessary that there should be a delivery by hand; 4 C. & P. 356; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 651.

Intent to kill need not be specifically alleged in an indictment for murder by poison; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 246; 3 Cox. C. C. 300; 8 C. & P. 418; 2 Allen 178. Where a wholesale dealer supplied a poisonous drug in place of a harmless drug ordered, he was held liable in damages to the customer who bought it from the retailer and suffered injury from taking it; 6 N. Y. 397.

Many of the states have statutes inflicting severe penalties upon the administering of poisons with a malicious intent. See Archb. Cr. Pr. Waterman's ed. 942; 86 Va.

Practicing physicians, who are graduates of a medical college, are competent to testify as experts on the subject of arsenical poisoning, although it is not shown that they have had actual experience in poison cases; 148 Ill. 571.

Consult Christison, Taylor, Blyth, Poisons; Beek, Taylor, Wharton & Stillé, Witth. & Beek, Clevenger; Med. Jur.; Archbold, Crim. Pract. Waterman's ed.; Russell, Crimes; Wharton, Homicide. See Druggist. As to gas poison, see 15 Med. Leg. J. 276.

POLE. A measure of length, equal to five yards and a half. See MEASURE.

POLES. The extended use of poles on highways in connection with electric railways, telegraph, and telephone companies, has raised many interesting questions in connection with the right to erect and maintain them and the relation thereto of abutting owners and municipal corporations. The erection of such poles in a street or on the sidewalk is an obstruction of the highway, and, like all other obstructions, is only justified when done under authority of law; 31 Hun 596; Keasbey, Electric Wires. Where authorized, they must be erected in such manner as to cause the least interference with public travel and this condition is implied even if it were not expressed in the authority given; id.; in a proper case it is left to the jury to determine the question of damage; 15 N. J. L. J. 50; 38 Fed. Rep. 320; see 77 Wis. 589; but the rule of reasonable care does not require the company to provide against all contingencies of accident or inconvenience; 36 Fed. Rep. 164. It has been justly said that the question of damage arising from the obstruction of a highway by poles, depends largely on the extent of the right of the public which is under the control of the legislature, and subject to the exercise of its discretion in legalizing new uses of the highway; Keasbey, Electric Wires 157.

The question most discussed with respect to poles, has been whether their erection is a legitimate use of the street, and whether it imposes a new servitude on the land of the abutting owner. A recent writer holds the view that the substitution of electricity for horse power is not a change of use; Keasbey, Electric Wires 106; but a different view was taken by the New Jersey supreme court; 15 N. J. L. J. 99, 45.

Poles have been permitted to stand as being a proper use of the street; 3 Ohio C. C. 425; 22 Wkly. L. Bul. 87; 16 R. I. 688; 85 Mich. 634; 47 id. 393; 47 N. J. Eq. 280; 59 N. J. L. 101; 139 Pa. 419; 84 Mich. 634.

The conclusion reached from a detailed examination of the cases by Mr. Keasbey in his work on the subject, is that whilst an electric railway may have some additional elements of damage and obstruction, possibly the solution of the difficulty is to be found in the suggestion of Campbell, C. J., in the case last cited, that compensation should be recoverable for damage actually sustained. In that case poles and wires prevented the extinguishment of a fire, but it was held that the company owning them was not liable to one who had erected buildings alongside of them and permitted a tenant to use one of the wires and had never made any objection to them. The poles are held to be an additional servitude on country roads; 86 Va. 606; 71 Hun 533; 107 Ill. 507; and on a street where the fee was in the abutting owner and there were direct and immediate injuries suffered; 74 Md. 36. In Minnesota the court was evenly divided on the subject; 37 Minn. 347; and in Massachusetts even the owner of the fee was held entitled to no compensation; 186 Mass. 75.

Where the right to erect poles is recognized, the courts will regulate strictly the manner in which the privilege is used. An injunction has been granted against the erection of broken or unsightly poles; 12 Mo. App. 494; so the poles must be set with as little damage as possible and the cutting off trees to clear the way for them will be a ground for recovering damages; 24 L. R. A. 724; 16 Lea 458; 89 La. Ann. 906. See HIGHWAYS; ELECTRIC LIGHT; WIRES; RAILROADS; LICENSE; TELEGRAPH.

POLICE. That species of superintendence by magistrates which has principally for its object the maintenance of public tranquillity among the citizens. The officers who are appointed for this purpose are also called the police. See 9 Cent. L. J. 353.

The word police has three significations. The first relates to the measures which are adopted to keep order, the laws and ordinances on cleanliness, health, the markets, etc. The second has for its object to procure to the authorities the means of detecting even the smallest attempts to commit crime, in order that the guilty may be arrested before their plans are carried into execution and delivered over to the justice of the country. The third comprehends the laws, ordinances, and other measures which require the citizens to exercise their rights in a particular form.

Police has also been divided into administrative police, which has for its object to maintain constantly public order in every part of the general administration; and judiciary police, which is intended principally to prevent crimes by punishing the criminals. Its object is to punish crimes which the administrative police has not been able to prevent.

See PENSION.

POLICE JURY. In Louisiana. A name given to certain officers who collectively exercise jurisdiction in certain cases of police: as, levying taxes, regulating roads, etc.

POLICE POWER. The powers of government inherent in every sovereignty. 5 How. 563.

The power vested in the legislature to make such laws as they shall judge to be for the good of the commonwealth and its subjects. 7 Cush. 814. It is much easier to realize the instances and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries or prescribe limits to its exercise; id.

The power to govern men and things, extending to the protection of the lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property within the state. 27 Vt. 149.

The authority to establish such rules and regulations for the conduct of all persons as may be conducive to the public interest. 109 N. C. 279; 117 N. Y. 14.

The police power of a State embraces regulations designed to promote the public convenience or the general prosperity as well as those to promote public health, morals or safety; it is not confined to the suppression of what is offensive, disorderly or unsanitary, but extends to what is for the greatest welfare of the State. 204 U. S. 311.

The exercise of this power has been left with the individual states; 11 Bush 311; 123 U. S. 823; and embraces the whole system of internal regulation by which the state seeks not only to preserve the public order and to prevent offences against itself, but also to establish for the intercourse of citizens with citizens, those rules of good manners and good neighborhood which are calculated to prevent the conflict of rights and to insure to each the uninterrupted enjoyment of his own, so far as it is reasonably consistent with the right enjoyment of rights by others; Cooley, Const. Lim. 572.

Most of the law on this subject has been the growth of the nineteenth century and the latter half of it. The earliest instances of the exercise of this power were found when houses were destroyed to prevent the spread of fire. The right to take a man's property in such cases was called the law of overruling necessity. There are also some very early instances of sanitary legislation. An act of parliament in 1388 imposed a penalty for throwing animal filth or refuse into rivers, and one of 1489 prohibited the slaughtering of cattle in the cities. Laws regulating wharfingers, millers, common carriers, innkeepers, chimney sweeps, auctioneers, ferry-keepers and drovers have been common for many centuries before the term was used.

Among former exercises of the police power which have become obsolete, may be mentioned laws restraining extravagance in dress, punishing heresy, interfering with the worship of particular churches or sects, and restraining speculation, or combinations to control a product and by withholding it, increase the price thereof; Tiedm. Pol. Pow. § 96 a; although in some of the states there are statutory provisions forbidding the cornering of grain, they are repetitions of old laws as to forestalling and engrossing; id.

This right must be clearly distinguished from the administration of criminal law and from police regulations and police authority, nor should it be confused with eminent domain, as has sometimes been done, or with the power of taxation. It is distinct from both of these. It is more despotic and broader in its action than the right of eminent domain, caring for the public health and morals of the community, restraining individuals from interfering with them, and when it is found necessary to take private property under the police power, no compensation need be given the owner unless expressly provided by statute; 7 Cush. 84; 11 Metc. 55; 81 Pa. 80; 101 U. S. 814; 69 Ga. 320; 78 Mo. 107; 17 Fed. Rep. 109; 50 Tex. 614. It is the application of the personal right or principle of self-preservation of the body politic; 18 N. Y. 478; to its exercises there are no limits except the restrictions contained in the written constitution; 1 Thayer, Const. L. 720.

The confusion of police power with the power of taxation usually arises in cases where the police power has affixed a penalty for a certain act, or required licenses for certain occupations to be taken out and the sum paid therefor. But this is in no sense taxation, but an attempt to levy a tax which might be open to the constitutional objection to lack of equality. Its admitted right to regulate includes the implied power to license or tax; 12 Wheat. 419; 5 Wall. 482; 92 U. S. 214; 109 id. 3; 113 id. 27; 140 id. 545. See LICENSE.

Each law relating to the police power involves the questions: First, is there a threatened danger? Second, does the regulation involve a constitutional right? Third, is the regulation reasonable? 66 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 382. See 144 N. Y. 529; 145 id. 32.

The rights insured to private corporations by their charters and the manner of their exercises are subject to such new regulations as from time to time may be made by the state, but these regulations must not conflict with the charter, nor take from the corporation any of its essential rights and privileges; Cooley, Const. Lim. 718; 61 Mo. 24; 18 Conn. 63; 85 Wis. 425; 181 U. S. 695. A municipal corporation may regulate the speed of railroad trains within its limits; 67 Ill. 113; 79 Pa. 33 (but only in the streets and public grounds of the municipality); 29 N. J. L. 170; require the railroad to fence its tracks; 27 Vt. 156; regulate the grade of the railroad and prescribe how the railroads may cross each other and apportion expenses of making necessary crossings between the corporations owning the roads; 77 Pa. 173; 4 Allen 198; it may require the railroad company to abolish a grade crossing at its own expense; 151 U. S. 556; to repair and maintain a safe viaduct over a street in a populous city; C. B. & Q. R. Co. v. Nebraska, S. C. of U. S., not yet reported; regulate such crossings in a populous city; 170 id. 58; limit the charges by the railroad company; 116 id. 807; prevent extortion on their part by unreasonable charges, favoritism, or discrimination; 128 id. 174; forbid consolidation of competing lines; 181 id. 697; make the company liable for fires; 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 248; require salaries and expenses of a state commission to be borne by the railroad corporations within the state; 143 U. S. 886; require locomotive engineers to be licensed after examination as to competency; 124 id. 265; and the examination of railroad employees for color blindness; 128 id. 96; regulate the speed of trains at highway and other crossings; 73 Ill. 235; require the bell to be rung or the whistle blown before crossing highways at grade, and flagmen to be stationed at dangerous crossings; 67 Ill. 87; impose a penalty on conductors for failing to cause their trains to stop five minutes at every station; 4 Tex. App. 545; require them to stop at county seats; 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 627; direct the printing upon railroad tickets of any condition limiting the liability of a railroad company in type of a specified size, and provide for the redemption by the company of tickets sold but not used; 63 Ind. 552.

It may regulate insurance businesses and forbid unjust and oppressive conditions; 164 Pa. 306; and require returns from insurance companies; 153 U. S. 446; direct companies operating electric conductors to file maps and plans; 145 U. S. 175; forbid the running of freight trains on Sunday; 163 id. 299; require prompt delivery of telegraph messages; 183 U. S. 650. It may regulate the use of public highways and their alterations; Cooley, Const. Lim. 725; require the owners of urban property to construct and keep in repair sidewalks in front of it; 8 Mich. 309; 19 Ohio 418; 4 R. I. 230, 445; 68 Barb. 236; 16 Pick. 504; regulate bicycle riding on highways; 97 N. C. 477; control and regulate the use of navigable waters (subject to the commerce powers of congress); Cooley, Const. Lim. 729; prescribe the maximum charges of a business affected by the public interest; 69 Ill. 80; 94 U. S. 113; 153 U. S. 391; 143 id. 617; 118 Ind. 194, where a telephone company was held to be a business affected with a public interest; 164 U. S. 579; 154 id. 22. It may regulate plumbing; 51 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 136.

In the exercise of its police power, a state may not invade the domain of the national government; 9 Wheat. 1; 7 How. 672; and the states may pass no laws conflicting with existing regulations by the federal government on the subjects intrusted to it; 95 U. S. 465; 138 id. 78; 135 id. 100. The power of congress to regulate commerce was never intended to cut the states off from legislating on all subjects relating to the health, life, and safety of their citizens, though the legislation might indirectly affect the commerce of the country; 161 U. S. 701; but since the range of a state's power comes very near to the field committed by the constitution to congress, it is the duty of courts to guard against any needless intrusion; 95 U. S. 465. All that the federal authority can do is to see that the states do not, under cover of this power, invade the sphere of national sovereignty, obstruct or impede the exercise of any power which the constitution has confided to the nation, or deprive any citizen of rights guaranteed by the federal constitution; Cooley, Const. Lim. 715. See 16 Wall. 36; 7 How. 288.

State quarantine laws, prohibiting the entry of persons or cargoes which might bring contagious diseases, are constitutional; and the national government also has jurisdiction in quarantine to prohibit improper immigrants and injurious traffic between the states; 118 U. S. 464; 107 U. S. 687; 141 U. S. 47. Cattle infected with pleuro-pneumonia, dangerous persons, Chinese, coolies, contract laborers, and rags may be kept out of the country; 118 U. S. 465; 130 id. 581; 140 id. 424; 149 id. 698; 169 id. 613; peach trees may be destroyed, when affected with peach yellows; 56 Conn. 216; adulteration of food prohibited; 84 N. H. 549; 63 Md. 592; 56 Minn. 69; and the manufacture of oleomargarine; 146 Pa. 265, where it was held that the legislature might prohibit, if it saw fit, the manufacture of a wholesome article of food; but see 99 N. Y. 877, where the decision is criticized, and in 40 L. R. A. (Tex.) 201, it is held that the state cannot constitute it a crime to mix wholesome and nutritious articles of food. See OLEOMARGARINE.

The legislature may require all oleomargarine to be stamped as such; 63 Ind. 552; or to be colored pink; 84 Fed. Rep. 155; or prohibit artificially coloring it; 155 U. S. 461; prescribe the price at which bread should be sold; 8 Ala. 140; suppress gambling and opium dens, and lotteries; 101 U. S. 814; and carrying on offensive manufactures; 47 Barb. 64; regulate laundries; 113 U. S. 703; 81 Fed. Rep. 690; 118 U. S. 356; pawn-brokers, hawkers, and peddlers; 133 Pa. 69; and require a license fee, where no discrimination is made between residents or products of the state and those of another state; 156 U. S. 296; enact laws for the preservation of game and fish; 153 U. S. 138; to prevent the waste of natural gas; 97 L. R. A. 294; the sale or manufacture of intoxicating liquors; 123 U. S. 623; 80 Fed. Rep. 785; forbid the sending of threatening letters by a debtor to a creditor; 135 Mo. 450; close cemeteries within the built-up parts of a city; 5 Cow. 538; 68 Pa. 42; and forbid the pollution of streams; 44 N. J. L. 88; the keeping of gunpowder in cities or villages; 1 Gray 27; the erection of wooden buildings in populous cities; 11 Mich. 425; 7 Cow. 352; or the keeping of swine therein; 97 Mass. 231; or of a slaughter house; 109 id. 315; 111 U. S. 746; 39 La. Ann. 247; or a bone boiling factory; 67 Hun 63; or any other business injurious to the public; 35 Wis. 298; the sale of indecent books; 8 Gray 468; 38 N. H. 426; 152 U. S. 133; 135 id. 100; restrain the employment of children at a theatrical exhibition; 54 N. Y. 559; or prohibit their employment altogether when below a specified age. Similarly there seems to be no doubt that the hours of labor of women and children and the wages to be paid them may be controlled through the police power; 94 U. S. 113; 5 Hill, N. Y. 121; 48 Am. Dec. 609, 337; 70 N. Y. 569; 38 Barb. 392; 110 N. Y. 418; 105 Ind. 250; 66 Md. 390; 38 Wis. 428; 160 Mass. 86. Laborers wages may be controlled; 5 Ark. 416; 50 Fed. Rep. 623, 681; and the issuance to them, in payment, of scrip or store orders prohibited; 48 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 512.

The confinement of the insane and their control in asylums, is an exercise of the police power; 40 Mich. 90; and skilled trades and learned professions often come under its control, as where examinations are provided for those who wish to practise law, medicine, or pharmacy. Physicians, dentists, and midwives may be compelled to take out licenses and report births and deaths; 48 Am. Rep. 63; 113 Ind. 514; 129 U. S. 114. Every city has also numerous regulations about the sale of medicines and poisons, ventilation and drainage, etc.

The following are not within police power:—Laws levying taxes upon alien passengers from foreign ports, for the use of hospitals; 7 How. 283. Requiring a bond to be given for alien passengers from foreign ports to indemnify the state against expense for the support of the person named therein; 92 U. S. 259. Prohibiting the driving of foreign cattle into a state within certain dates; 95 U. S. 465. Requiring an inspection before slaughtering of cattle, etc., so far as they apply to foreign meats; 136 U. S. 318. (This offends against inter-state commerce.) Requiring a license under onerous conditions from the agents of foreign express companies; 141 U. S. 47.

"Whether the prohibited act or omission shall be made a criminal offence, punishable under the general laws, or subject to punishment under municipal by-laws, or, on the other hand, the party be deprived of all remedy for any right which, but for the regulation, he might have had against other persons, are questions which the legislature must decide." Cooley, Const. Lim. 745.

The determination by the legislature as to what is a proper exercise of its police power is subject to the supervision of the courts; 123 U. S. 623; 153 U. S. 137.

POLICIES OF INSURANCE, COURT OF. See COURT OF POLICIES OF INSURANCE.

POLICY. In Insurance. The instrument whereby insurance is made by an underwriter in favor of an assured, expressed, implied, or intended, against some risk, peril, or contingency, in reference to some subject.

The written or printed form to which the contract has been reduced, and which evidences the agreement or contract between the parties. It may be either a specialty or simple contract. 1 Joyce, Ins. § 145.

It must show expressly, or by implication, in whose favor it is made. It may be upon a valuable property, interest, or contingency, or be a gaming or wagering policy on a subject in which the assured has no interest, or against risks in respect to which the assured has no interest except what arises from the contract itself.

A blanket policy is an insurance for a gross sum covering several kinds of property in one or more localities and not apportioned among them. Stand. Dict.

Blanket and floating policies are sometimes issued to factors or to warehousemen, intended only to cover margins uninsured by other policies, or to cover nothing more than the limited interest which the factor or warehouseman may have in the property which he has in charge. 93 U. S. 541.

An interest policy is one where the insured has a real, substantial, assignable interest in the thing insured. 37 Wis. 539.

An open policy is one on which the value is not fixed, but is left to be definitely determined in case of loss. 1 Phill. Ins. §§ 4, 6, 7; 101 N. Y. 458; 4 Dal. 430. By an "open policy" is also sometimes meant, in the United States, one in which an aggregate amount is expressed in the body of the policy, and the specific amounts and subjects are to be indorsed from time to time; 12 La. An. 259; 19 N. Y. 305; 6 Gray 214; it may also mean one kept open for new subscriptions, or one on cargo kept open for new subjects of insurance; 1 Joyce, Ins. § 156.

A valued policy is one where a value has been set on the ships or goods insured, and this value inserted in the policy in the nature of liquidated damages. In such a policy the value of the subject is expressly agreed; 33 Md. 109; 3 Rich. S. C. 331; or is, as between the parties, the amount insured. Under an open policy in case of loss, the insured must prove the true value of the property, while under a valued policy, the sum agreed upon is conclusive, except in case of fraud; 8 Camp. 319; 15 Mass. 341; 49 Pa. 372; May, Ins. § 30.

A mixed policy is one which is open as to certain property and valued as to other property. 2 Conn. 368.

A wager policy is a pretended insurance, founded on an ideal risk, where the insured has no interest in the thing insured, and can therefore sustain no loss by the happening of any of the misfortunes insured against. These policies are strongly reprobated; 3 Kent 225; Beach, Ins. § 1142.

A floating policy is one which applies to goods of a class or kind, which, from its fluctuating, changing nature, differs as to specific articles. 32 N. Y. 405.

In the absence of any insurable interest of the beneficiary, the law will presume that a policy was taken out for the purpose of a wager, or speculation; 122 Pa. 324.

The insured must be held to a knowledge of the conditions of his policy, and the fact that he had never seen it does not help him any more than the fact that he had not read it, where there is no adequate reason shown why he could not have seen it had he so desired, and the company had not kept it from him through any fault or fraud; 71 Mich. 414; 69 Tex. 353.

Records and documents expressly referred to in the policy are, in effect, for the purpose of the reference, a part of the contract; 23 Conn. 285; 37 Me. 187; 23 Pa. 50; 38 E. L. & E. 514; 83 N. H. 203; 10 Cush. 387; 70 N. Y. 72; 16 Or. 288; 84 Ky. 663; 188 Ind. 876; 58 Ark. 277; May, Ins. § 158.

All prior negotiations are presumed to be merged in the written contract, and the policy itself, in the absence of fraud, duress, or mistake, must be looked to to ascertain the intent of the parties; 13 Mass. 96. Where the form of the policy is not prescribed by statute, it should contain, either by itself, or by reference to other papers, the exact agreement between the parties, set forth therein in clear, precise, and unambiguous terms, and should embody all the requirements of a valid insurance contract. Where the terms are plain and unambiguous, parol evidence is inadmissible to vary or control them; 42 Mo. 38; 116 N. Y. 317; but if it is ambiguous, extrinsic evidence is admissible, not to contradict or change the contract, but to develop and explain its true meaning; 40 Mo. 33. Conversations had between the parties at the time have been held admissible; 1 Sto. 574; and when parties have, by certain acts of their own, placed a construction on doubtful terms of the contract, this construction will be adopted by the court against them.

The language of the policy must be construed with reference to the subject-matter and the nature of the property to which it is applied, and with a view to the objects and intentions of the parties, as the same may be gathered from the whole instrument; 3 Gill & J. 136; 80 N. Y. 136; 38 Minn. 501; and the whole policy with all its parts should be construed together as one entire contract; 16 Ore. 283. A special clause in a policy which creates an exception to a general clause governs the latter; 27 Mo. 152. When susceptible of more than one interpretation, the contract should be construed in favor of the assured; 116 N. Y. 54; 105 Ind. 212; 111 U. S. 335; 183 Ill. 556. The written part of the policy controls that part which is printed; 4 East 136; 32 Fed. Rep. 47; 84 id. 501; 38 Me. 404; 81 N. Y. 389. A special indorsement exempting from liability for partial loss will control; 97 N. Y. 333. See LEX LOCI.

A policy may take effect on actual or constructive delivery; 1 Phill. Ins. ch. xi. sect. i; 25 Ind. 537; 27 Pa. 268; 42 Me. 259; 25 Conn. 207; 5 Gray 52; and may be retrospective, provided there is no concealment or misrepresentation by either party; Hill, Ins. § 925; 2 Dutch. 268; s. c. 3 id. 645.

Every policy, whether marine, against fire, or on life, specifies or imports parties, and specifies the subject or interest intended to be insured, the premium or other consideration, the amount insured, the risks and perils for which indemnity is stipulated, and the period of the risk or the terminus a quo and ad quem. The subject-matter is usually more minutely described in a separate paper—called an application; Beach, Ins. § 852. See APPLICATION. May, Ins. § 29.

The duration of the risk, under a marine insurance, or one on inland navigation, is either from one geographical terminus to another, called a "Voyage Policy," or from a specified time, called a "Time Policy;" that of a fire policy is for a specified time; one on life is either for life or a term of years, months, etc. It is a leading principle, as to the construction of a policy of insurance, that its distinguishing character as a contract of indemnity is to be favored; which is in conformity with the common maxim, ut res valeat magis quam pereat; 8 N. Y. 351; 18 id. 885; 8 Cush. 398; 17 Pa. 253; 29 E. L. & E. 111, 215; 2 Du. 419, 554; 5 id. 517, 594; 16 Mo. 96; 22 Conn. 235; 18 B. Monr. 311; 11 Ind. 171; 28 N. H. 234; 2 Curt. C. C. 322, 610; 37 Me. 187; 4 Zab. 447; 18 Ill. 553; 4 R. I.

159. See May, Ins. § 7; 94 U. S. 457. Any reasonable doubt as to the meaning of an insurance policy must be resolved in favor of the insured; 85 Minn. 501; 64 Va. 72; 145 Pa. 346; 8 Ind. App. 361; 181 U. S. 453.

In marine insurance the contract has necessarily more implied reference to customs and usages than most other contracts; or, in other words, a larger proportion of the stipulations are not specifically expressed in the instrument; 1 Phill. Ins. § 119; whence it has been thought to be an imperfect, obscure, confused instrument; 5 Cra. 342; 1 Burr. 347. But the difficulty in giving it a practical construction seems to arise more from the complication of the circumstances necessarily involved than from any remediable defects in its provisions and phraseology. New provisions are, however, needed, from time to time, to adapt the contract to new circumstances. A mistake in filling up a policy may be corrected by order of a court of equity; Beach, Ins. § 509; 5 B. & P. 322; 1 Wash. C. C. 415; 2 Cra. 441; 2 Johns. 380; 1 Ark. 545; 2 Curt. C. C. 277. If by accident, inadvertence, or mistake, the terms of the contract are not fully set forth in a policy, it may be reformed so as to express the real agreement; 139 U. S. 287. A marine policy is assignable without the consent of the insurers; May, Ins. § 377; while a fire policy is not; 16 Wend. 385; 2 Pet. 25; 4 Bro. P. C. 481; 18 Ia. 819; 9 L. T. N. s. 688. An outstanding and valid life policy is held to be assignable without the insurer's consent, provided the sale is bona fide and not a device to evade the law; 18 N. Y. 31; 29 Ind. 236; 98 Mass. 381; 26 Pa. 189; 26 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 959. But see, contra, 41 Ind. 116. See, generally, 9 L. R. A. 680; Joyce, Insurance. A pre-existing debt is a sufficient consideration for an assignment of insurance policies after loss of the property insured; 40 Ill. 102. When a policy of insurance expressly stipulates that no assignment shall be valid without the consent of the company, an assignment without such consent is without effect; 45 La. Ann. 736; 161 Mass. 320; and it is avoided by an assignment for the benefit of creditors; 64 N. H. 257; but if made subsequently to the loss, it is valid regardless of the conditions; 32 W. Va. 283; 35 Neb. 214.

For the rules of construction of a policy of credit insurance, see 73 Fed. Rep. 95.

See ABANDONMENT; AVERAGE; INSURABLE INTEREST; INSURANCE; SALVAGE; LOSS; TOTAL LOSS; VOLUNTARY EXPOSURE; RESERVE; PREMIUM.

A standard form of policy is provided by statute in Massachusetts, Maine, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, New Hampshire, New York, New Jersey, North Dakota, North Carolina, Wisconsin, Pennsylvania, South Dakota, Connecticut, and Rhode Island. A statute providing for a standard policy without fixing its terms or conditions and leaving them to be fixed by the insurance commissioner is unconstitutional as a delegation of legislative power; it seems that the legislature could prescribe a form; 166 Pa. 72, reversing 3 D. R. 788; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 738.

A method of gambling by betting as to what numbers will be drawn in a lottery. 60 Conn. 87.

See ENDOWMENT INSURANCE; PUBLIC POLICY; RUNNING POLICY; TIME POLICY; UNVALUED POLICY; VALUED POLICY.

POLICY, PUBLIC. See PUBLIC POLICY; RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

POLITICAL. Pertaining to policy, or the administration of the government. Political rights are those which may be exercised in the formation and administration of the government: they are distinguished from civil rights, which are the rights which a man enjoys as regards other individuals, and not in relation to the government. A political corporation is one which has principally for its object the administration of the government, or to which the powers of government, or a part of such powers, have been delegated. See 37 La.

544; 90 Ill. 568.

POLITICAL OFFENDER. A political offender if accused of what is prima facie an extraditable crime cannot be legally surrendered, if the offence is of a political character, that is if it is incidental to, and forms part of, a political disturbance; [1891] 1 Q. B. 149; [1896] 1 Q. B. 108.

POLITICAL PARTIES. See ELECTION; NOMINATION.

Within the meaning of a Primary Act, is an affiliation or organization of electors representing a political policy and having a constituted authority for its government and regulation, and which, at the last preceding election at which presidential electors were voted for, cast at least twenty per cent. of the total vote cast at said election in this State. 163 Ky. 655, 174 S. W. 753.

Voluntary associations for political purposes. They are governed by their own usages, and establish their own rules. Members of such parties may form them, reorganize them, and dissolve them at their will. The voters constituting such party are, indeed, the only body who can finally determine between contending factions or contending organizations. The question is one essentially political, and not judicial, in its character. It would be alike dangerous to the freedom and liberty of the voters, and to the dignity and respect which should be entertained for judicial tribunals, for the courts to undertake in any case to investigate either the government, usages, rules, or doctrines of a political party, or to determine between conflicting claimants' rights growing out of its government. 109 Ky. 283, 58 S. W. 779.

POLITICAL QUESTION. One which concerns the law-making power as distinguished from the judiciary. English.

POLITICS. Everything that concerns the government of the country. 2 Ves. Sr. 156.

POLL. A head. Hence poll-tax is the name of a tax imposed upon the people at so much a head.

To poll a jury is to require that each juror shall himself declare what is his verdict. This may be done, at the instance of either party, at any time before the verdict is recorded, according to the practice in some states. See 18 Johns. 188; 9 Ill. 336. In some states it lies in the discretion of the judge; 1 M'Cord 24, 525; 22 Ga. 431. A defendant has a right to a poll of the jury to ascertain whether each member concurs in the verdict, but the exact words used by the juror in answering are immaterial, if they indicate clearly the assent of the individual mind to the verdict; 153 Pa. 535. Where a court directs a verdict, a party is not entitled to have the jury polled; 87 Mich. 13.

In Conveyancing. A deed-poll, or single deed, is one made by a single party, whose edges are polled, or shaved even, in distinction from an indenture, whose sides are indented, and which is executed by more than one party. 2 Bla. Com. 296. See DEED POLL.

POLL-TAX. A capitation tax; a tax assessed on every head, i. e. on every male of a certain age, etc., according to statute. Webst. Dict.; Whart. Dict. See TAXATION.

POLLICITATION. In Civil Law. An offer not yet accepted by the person to whom it is made. Langd. Contr. § 1.

It differs from a contract, inasmuch as the latter includes a concurrence of intention in two parties, one of whom promises something to the other, who accepts, on his part, such promise. Grotius 1. 2, c. 2; Pothier, Obl. pt. 1, c. 1, s. 1, art. 1, § 2.

POLLS. The place where electors cast in their votes.

POLLUTION OF WATERS. A riparian proprietor is required to refrain from erecting upon the banks of a water course any works which will pollute the water and thereby create a nuisance; 9 Co. 59; 5 B. & Ald. 1; 4 Mas. 397; 5 C. E. Greene 416; 4 Cush. 345; [1897] Ch. D. 96. See 13 Q. B. 426.

It is the right of the owner of land through which a stream flows, to have the natural flow free from pollution, as also from diversion or obstruction; and for an interference with this right an action will lie; 10 R. I. 106; 14 N. J. Eq. 335. An injury to the purity of the water which affects the riparian owner is considered an injury of the same character as an obstruction or diversion of the water; 122 Mass. 583. So one who pollutes his neighbor's spring is liable therefor; 90 Mass. 582; 89 Ky. 448; 29 Ch. D. 115; and one who deposits filth or noxious matter on his own premises from which it percolates through the soil; 162 Pa. 498; 57 Cal. 412; 29 Ch. D. 115; 102 Ill. 19; 108 Mass. 261; 43 N. J. Eq. 128.

Sources of the pollution of water for which it has been held that an action would lie, are: fouling by the discharge into it of muriatic acid; 7 H. & F. 160; sulphuric acid; 5 Ch. D. 769; vitriol, having a corrosive effect on boilers; 13 Allen 16; dye wares or dye liquors, madder, indigo, potash, etc.; 16 Jur. N. S. 75; heated water, which affects a stream injuriously; 3 Exch. 748; 3 B. & Ad. 304; 2 K. & J. 264; blood from a slaughter-house; 20 N. J. Eq. 296, 415; 57 Md. 1; setting up hog-pens, or lime-pits; 46 Wis. 391; Y. B. Hen. II. b. 6; 11 Mo. 517; the erection of a cess-pool, placing near the water oil or manure; 12 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 937; placing the carcass of a dead animal in the water; 25 Kan. 608.

It is not always actionable to discharge into a stream waste or impure matter, but it is a question for the jury whether such use of it is, under the circumstances, reasonable, and as a general rule the same consideration would control as in case of obstructions of the water generally. It is necessary to take into consideration the character of the stream, its natural uses and the importance of the use proposed to be made of it by the party complained of and the extent and character of the injury to the other party. See Ang. Waterc. § 140 d. A riparian proprietor cannot use the water in such manner as to pollute the atmosphere, and it is no defence to an action for so doing that the injury was public in its character as affecting an entire community and that it was a subject of criminal indictment; 4 Ohio 833; and if such a condition of things cannot be remedied by action, equity will interfere to abate the nuisance; 21 N. J. Eq. 376; in all these cases where the injury is continuous and irreparable so that an action for damages is not an adequate remedy, an injunction will be granted. See INJUNCTION. For a collection of cases in which injunctions have been granted, see Amer. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 648, 658.

The weight of authority is in favor of the doctrine that an action by the lower riparian owner will lie for the pollution of the stream by a discharge into it of refuse water from a mine, and that such action may be enjoined; [1893] App. Cas. 691; 54 N. J. Eq. 65, where it was expressly held that it was no defence, that the pollution was a natural and necessary result of mining operations prosecuted in the ordinary way. In this case the defendant was not a riparian owner. The decree was affirmed by the court of appeals in which Garrison, J., thus stated the conclusion: "A non-riparian mine-owner may not artificially cause the injurious discoloration of a natural water course, if, by the use of practicable means within his knowledge and under his control, he may carry on his mining operations without injury to the right of others,—a paraphrase of the maxim, "Sic utere tuo ut alienum non laedas."

In the English case cited, the general principle as laid down by the House of Lords in a much considered case was thus expressed: "Every riparian proprietor is entitled to have the natural water of the stream transmitted to him, without sensible alteration in its character or quality. Any invasion of this right, causing actual damage or calculated to found a claim which may ripen into an adverse right entitles the party injured to the intervention of the court."

The contrary doctrine was held in Pennsylvania in the case of Penn. Coal Co. v. Sanderson; 118 Pa. 128; a decision which was criticised and expressly disapproved in both the above cases. The Pennsylvania case had been twice decided otherwise; 86 Pa. 401; 94 id. 302; and these decisions were overruled in the third case by a bare majority of the court, Mercer, C. J., Gordon, and Trunkley, JJ., dissenting. Referring to this, Lord Shand, in the English case last cited, says: "This circumstance and the grounds of the judgment seem to me to be sufficient to deprive the case of any real weight." One other case seems in a measure to follow the Pennsylvania case; Barnard v. Shirley, 135 Ind. 537, where it was held that one who sinks an artesian well on his own land, and uses the water to bathe the patients in a sanitarium erected by him on said premises, is not liable to injunction and damages for allowing the water, after such use, to flow into a stream which crosses the land of an adjoining owner, and is the only natural and available outlet." Of this case it is remarked: "There were, however, many features to distinguish this from the Sanderson case, so that the adoption of the language of the latter was unnecessary. In the first place, the pollution was slight; in the second, before the water reached the plaintiff's premises, it was further defiled by passing through a city; either of which would tend to defeat the claim, apart from all other considerations;" 3 Eng. & Am. Dec. in Eq. 652, by Henry Budd.

The same writer draws attention to the fact that "even in Pennsylvania, the doctrine of the Sanderson case is carefully limited to the natural drainage of the mine water; and any other means of getting rid of it will be enjoined;" id., citing 7 Kulp 493. See, also, 8 Atl. Rep. 620.

The right of the lower riparian proprietor to have the use of the stream unimpaired, must be adjusted with due regard to the rights possessed by the upper riparian owner to use the stream for the proper purposes, such as casting sewage or waste therein; 74 N. Y. 341; 108 Mass. 208; 44 N. H. 560; and the necessary result of the legitimate use of a stream for irrigation, manufacturing, and domestic purposes, will have a tendency, with the natural increase of population, to render the stream more impure; see 110 Mass. 221; 118 Pa. 128; and the courts will not interfere by injunction with extensive manufacturing enterprises until satisfied from all the circumstances that there is no adequate remedy at law, and that the failure to interfere will result in irreparable injury; 54 Pa. 164; 57 id. 105. The pollution, by a properly constructed city sewer, of a stream which is the natural drainage of the land on which the city is built, gives no right of action to a lower riparian owner whose mill property, constructed and operated before the building of the city, is injured thereby; 18 Ind. App. 482. A plaintiff was held entitled to recover damages where sewers constructed by a city, polluted a stream and the foul water found its way to the two springs of the plaintiff, and he was unable to obtain pure water by digging wells, the whole underground supply being polluted; 162 Pa. 493. As a general thing the circumstances of each case must be considered by the court and the conflicting interests, carefully and judiciously weighed, and no general rule can be framed which will afford a rule to be applied by the courts in all cases as matter of law. The right to deposit in the stream must be settled as a question of reasonable use in the same way that courts deal with questions of diversion or obstruction; 30 Minn. 249; as to many uses of the water, either by common consent or other obvious considerations, settled rules have been established; Redfield, C. J., in 38 Vt. 459; many of these cases may be found collected in Gould, Waters § 290. See LAND.

Where a municipal corporation was authorized by statute to construct sewers and discharge sewerage into the tide water it was held liable for damages, caused by the sewerage destroying the plaintiff's oysters, although the damage involved no physical taking of property; 23 App. Div. N. Y. 406.

One who had permission to use the water of a canal was held entitled to recover damages from a third person, who fouled the water so that the plaintiff's boilers were injured, the action of the defendant having been without any authority; 2 H. & N. 476; in a case in the Exchequer Chamber, although the judgment was reversed on other grounds, there was no dissent from the doctrine of the court below, "that he had no right to cause dirty water to flow on his neighbors' land without some special right to do so," but it was left doubtful whether the mere permission of the riparian owner to take the water out of the stream was sufficient to authorize the action against the wrong-doer either for diverting or fouling; 3 H. & N. 875.

The pollution of streams has been the subject of extended legislation in England, which is embodied in the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act, 1876, which is of general application, and also various acts of local application, all of which, with notes and decisions are collected in Haworth on Rivers Pollution.

POLYANDRY. The state of a woman who has several husbands.

Polyandry is legalized only in Thibet. It is inconsistent with the law of nature. See LAW OF NATURE.

POLYGAMIST. A man or woman who, having contracted a polygamous marriage, and become the husband or wife, at one time, of two or more wives or husbands, maintains that relation and status. 114 U. S. 16; Act of Mar. 22, 1882. See BIGAMIST; POLYGAMY.

POLYGAMY. The act or state of a person who, knowing that he has two or more wives, or that she has two or more husbands, marries another.

It differs from bigamy. Com. Dig. Justices (S 5); Co. 3d Inst. 88.

But bigamy is now commonly used even where polygamy would be strictly correct; 1 Russ. Cr. 186, n. On the other hand, polygamy is used where bigamy would be strictly correct; Mass. Gen. Stat. 1860, p. 817.

Every person having a husband or wife living, who marries another, whether married or single, in a territory or other place over which the United States has exclusive jurisdiction, is guilty of bigamy, and shall be punished by a fine of not more than five hundred dollars, and by imprisonment for a term of not more than five years; R. S. § 5352; 103 U. S. 304.

An act of congress of March 3, 1887, was passed for the express purpose of the suppression of polygamy in Utah Territory. It expressly annuls the act of territorial legislation which contravenes its purposes and provided for winding up the corporation in the territory, known as the Church of Jesus Christ of the Latter Day Saints, and required the attorney-general to take proceedings for that purpose. The act contains elaborate provisions for adjusting property interests involved in this change, and providing severe penalties for violation of its provisions; U. S. R. S. 1 Supp. 568. This act was held constitutional; 138 U. S. 1; where it was also held that the pretence of religious belief cannot deprive congress of the power to prohibit polygamy and all other open offences against the enlightened sentiment of mankind. See BIGAMY; RELIGION.

POLYGARCHY. A term used to express a government which is shared by several persons.

POND. A body of stagnant water; a pool. See Call. Sew. 103.

Any one has a right to erect a fish-pond; the fish in it are considered as real estate, and pass to the heir, and not to the executor; Ow. 20. Where land bounding on a lake or pond is conveyed, the grant extends only to the water's edge if it is a natural pond (some cases say to low-water mark; 18 Pick. 281); but to the middle of the stream if it is artificial; Ang. Wat. Cours. § 41. See 3 Washb. R. P. 5th ed. * 638.

By the common law, fresh water lakes and ponds, except the great navigable lakes, belong to the owners of the soil adjacent, who own the soil usque ad flum aquæ; 140 U. S. 371. See 133 Mass. 364. See LAKES. WATERS.

PONE. (Lat. ponere, to put). In English Practice. An original writ issuing out of chancery, for the purpose of removing a plaintiff from an inferior court into the superior courts at Westminster. The word signifies "put"; put by gages, etc. The writ is called from the words it contained when in Latin, Pone per vadum et saluos plegios, etc.; put by gage and safe pledges, etc. See Fitzh. N. B. 69, 70 a; Digby, Hist. R. P. 71.

The writ of certiorari is now used in its place.

PONENDIS IN ASSISIS. An old writ directing a sheriff to empanel a jury for an assize or real action. Moz. & W. Law Dict.; Whart. Law Lex.

PONENDUM IN BALLIUM. A writ commanding that a prisoner be bailed in cases bailable. Whart. Law Lex.; Moz. & W. Law Dict.

PONENDUM SIGILLUM. A writ requiring justices to put their seals to a bill of exceptions, according to Stat. West. 2, 13 Ed. I. c. 81. Whart. Law Lex.; Moz. & W. Law Dict.

PONERE (Lat.). To put. The word is used in the old law in various connections, in all of which it can be translated by the English verb "put." See Glanv. lib. 2, c. 8.

PONTI SE (Lat. puts himself). In English Criminal Practice. When the defendant pleads "not guilty," his plea is recorded by the officer of the court, either by writing the words "po se," an abbreviation of the words pont se super patriam (puts himself upon his country), or, as at the central criminal court, non cul. 2 Den. C. C. 892. See ARRAIGNMENT.

PONTAGE. A contribution towards the maintenance, rebuilding, or repairs of a bridge. The toll taken for this purpose also bears this name. Obsolete. Fleta, lib. 4, c. 1, § 16.

PONTIBUS REPARANDIS. An old writ directed to the sheriff commanding him to charge one or more to repair a bridge. Cow.; Reg. Orig. fol. 153.

POOL. A small lake of standing water. By the grant of a pool, it is said, both the land and water will pass; Co. Litt. 5. Undoubtedly the right to fish, and probably the right to use hydraulic works, will be acquired by such grant; 2 N. H. 259; Co. Litt. 5; Bac. Abr. Grants (H 8); Com. Dig. Grant (E 5); 5 Cow. 216; Cro. Jac. 159; 1 Lev. 44; Vaugh. 103. See LAKE.

A combination of stakes, the money derived from which goes to the winner. 146 Mass. 203. See GAMING; HORSE RACE.

A commercial term used to indicate a contract between two competing railroad companies, whereby they agree to divide all their earnings over and above the amounts required for the payment of operating expenses.

They have been held to be illegal; 6 So. Rep. (La.) 888; 61 N. H. 161; 55 id. 531; 26 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 159. See 1 J. & H. 252; 2 id. 89; 8 Ry. & Corp. L. J. 144.

As a business term the word "pool," as used in the phrase "real estate pool," means no more than that certain individuals are engaged in dealing in real estate as a commodity of traffic, 108 U. S. 195. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE. FRENCH POOL.

POOLING AGREEMENT. See RESTRAINT OF TRADE.

POOR. Destitute; helpless and in extreme want; 52 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 444; so completely destitute of property as to require assistance from the public. 14 Kan. 421. A trust for the benefit of the poor does not generally include those receiving parochial relief; 3 Biss. 395; 1 Jarm. 209; but a trust for the benefit of poor boys was held not confined to those who required parish relief; 31 L. J. Ch. 810. See CHARITABLE USES; LEGACY.

POOR DEBTORS. By the constitution of the several states and territories, or by the laws which exist for the relief of poor debtors, it is provided in general terms that there shall be no imprisonment for debt. But this is usually qualified by provisions for the arrest of debtors in certain enumerated cases of fraud. The statutes in the different states are very similar, and as a rule, require the creditor to make affidavit that the debtor is about to remove some of his property out of the jurisdiction of the court with intent to defraud his creditors, or that, for the same reason, he is about to dispose of or has disposed of his property, or that he is fraudulently concealing it; or that the debt, concerning which suit is brought, was fraudulently contracted. Such in general is the law in most of the states and territories.

A classification of the states shows that there are constitutional provisions that there shall be no imprisonment for debt in Indiana, Minnesota, Kansas, Maryland, North Carolina, Missouri, Texas, Oregon, Nevada, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, and Florida; that there shall be none in any civil action on mesne or final process in Ohio, Iowa, Nebraska, Tennessee, Arkansas, California, Oregon, and Arizona; or in any action or judgment founded on contract in New Jersey, Michigan, and Wisconsin. In Vermont, Rhode Island, Pennsylvania, Illinois, Kentucky, and Colorado, the provision is that no person shall be imprisoned for debt in any civil action when he has delivered up his property for the benefit of creditors in the manner prescribed by law; 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 80.

Subject to these constitutional provisions the subject is regulated in most states by general statutes which should be consulted with respect to any particular case.

It may be stated generally that the object of such statutes is to induce the defendant to pay the debt, give security, or take advantage of the insolvent laws or of some enactments made especially for the relief of poor debtors. It follows therefore that in most of the states a person under arrest for debt may obtain his release in any of these ways. A poor debtor is of course usually compelled to resort to one of the two last mentioned, and, although the proceedings differ in the different states, yet as a rule he is released upon delivering his property to a trustee, or taking oath that he has not more than ten or twenty dollars above the amount exempted by statute in the particular state in which he is confined.

In a few states the rule that there shall be no imprisonment for an ordinary contract debt is strictly adhered to. In Tennessee a debtor may be imprisoned in criminal actions, and in Missouri for the non-payment of fines or penalties imposed by law. So he may be imprisoned for fraud in civil or criminal actions in Vermont, Rhode Island, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Iowa, Minnesota, Kansas, Nebraska, North Carolina, Kentucky, Arkansas, California, Oregon, Nevada, Colorado, South Carolina, Florida, and Arizona. In Georgia and Louisiana the legislature has power to provide for the punishment of fraud, and for reaching property of the debtor concealed from his creditors. Debtors may be imprisoned in Oregon if absconding; in Nevada, in cases of libel or slander; in Colorado and California, in actions of tort, and in the latter state also for malicious mischief; in Michigan and Arizona for breach of trust or moneys collected by public officers, or in any professional employment; 1 Stima. Am. Stat. L. § 80.

Women are not subject to arrest as debtors in North Carolina, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Vermont, Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New Hampshire, District of Columbia. See INSOLVENCY; INSOLVENT.

POOR LAW BOARD. A government board appointed by statute 10 & 11 Vict. c. 109, to take the place of poor law commissioners, who had general management of the poor and the funds for their relief. The poor law board is now superseded by the local government board, established under 84 & 85 Vict. c. 70; 3 Steph. Com. 49; Moz. & W.

POOR RATE. A rate levied by church authorities for the relief of the poor.

POPE. The bishop of Rome and head of the Roman Catholic church. He is elected by certain officers called cardinals, and remains in power during life. In the 9th Collation of the Authentics it is declared the bishop of Rome hath the first place of sitting in all assemblies, and the bishop of Constantinople the second. Ridley, Civ. & Eccl. L. pt. 1, c. 3, § 10.

"It does not appear necessary that a Pope be selected either from the ranks of the Cardinals or that he be in Orders." 1 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 104.

The Catholic powers concede the precedence to the Pope as the visible head of the church; but Russia and Turkey and the Protestant states of Europe consider him only as the bishop of Rome, and a sovereign prince, although since September 20, 1870, he has been dispossessed of substantially all his territory. By the Italian decree of May 13, 1871, he is guaranteed his sovereign rights and other immunities by Italy, but he has refused to accept this decree. He maintains diplomatic relations with France and some other Catholic states; id. 118. See PAPACY.

POPULAR ACTION. An action given by statute to any one who will sue for the penalty. A qui tam action. Dig. 47. 23. 1.

POPULAR SENSE. The sense in which a subject is understood by those conversant therewith. 1 Ex. D. 248.

POPULAR USE. The occasional and precarious enjoyment of property by the members of society in their individual capacity, without the power to enforce such enjoyment according to law. 18 Cal. 238.

POPULARITY CONTEST. A scheme commonly called a "popularity contest" whereby it was announced that persons paying for subscriptions to the newspaper, or for advertising therein, were to be given a certain number of votes for each dollar so paid, and the holder of such votes had the privilege of naming a candidate, and of casting these votes for such candidate, or for one already named; and the candidate obtaining the largest number of votes was to receive a prize, is not a lottery. 159 Ky. 83, 166 S. W. 794.

POPULISCITUM (Lat.). An act of the commons; same as plebiscitum. Ainsworth, Dict.

A law passed by the whole people assembled in comitia centuriata, and at the proposal of one of the senate, instead of a tribune, as was the case with a plebiscitum. Tayl. Civ. Law 178; Mackelley, Civ. Law § 26.

PORCH. A portico; a shelter in front of a door. 148 Mass. 584.

PORT. A place to which the officers of the customs are appropriated, and which includes the privileges and aid of all members and creeks which are allotted to them. 1 Chitty, Com. Law 726; Postlewaith, Com. Dict. According to Dalloz, a port is a place within land, protected against the waves and winds and affording to vessels a place of safety. By the Roman law a port is defined to be locus conclusus quo importantur merces et unde exportantur. Dig. 50. 16. 59. See 7 Mart. La. N. 8. 81. In the revenue laws it is synonymous with district, when the limits of the port and district are the same; 3 Mass. 153. As used in the R. S. § 4347 it means any place from which merchandise may be shipped.

A port differs from a haven, and includes something more. First, it is a place at which vessels may arrive and discharge or take in their cargoes. Second, it comprehends a ville, city, or borough, called in Latin caput corpus, for the reception of mariners and merchants, for securing the goods and bringing them to market, and for virtualizing the ships. Third, it is impressed with its legal character by the civil authority. Hale, de Portibus Mar. c. 2; 1 Hargr. Tracts 46. 73; Bac. Abr. Prerogative (D 5); Com. Dig. Navigation (E); Co. 4th inst. 148; Callis, Sew. 56; 2 Chitty, Com. L. 2; Dig. 50. 16. 59; 43. 12. 1. 13; 47. 10. 15. 7; 39. 4. 15.

The exact meaning of the term was much considered by Lord Esher, M. R., in 15 Q. B. D. 590. He held that it was not usually the legal port as defined by acts of Parliament, but, "a place of safety for the ship and goods, whilst the goods are being loaded and unloaded"; that there never would be a port in the ordinary business sense of the word, unless there was some element of safety in it for the ship and goods, and that nothing was more certain to be such a port than a natural port; that a natural port was "a place in which the conformation of the land with regard to the sea is such that, if you get your ship within certain limits, she is in a place of safety for loading and unloading"; that any place at which the loading and unloading took place might safely be inferred to be within "the port," as understood by the parties; that beyond the place of loading and unloading, the port would extend to any further space over which the court authorities were in the habit of exercising "port discipline."

In L. R. 4 Ex. 238, 245, Byles, J., said: "The passage from Lord Hale, de Portibus Maris (ch. 2, p. 46), shows that the limits of a port may depend on the existence of wharves, quays, buildings, and other conveniences. It may accordingly, from time to time, vary and increase with the increase of population and of buildings. Lord Hale further says: 'The port of London anciently extended to Greenwich in the time of Edward I. and Gravesend is a member of it. The extent of a port therefore after a lapse of years may become a question of fact.'"

In the same case below the meaning of "port" generally was considered by Martin, B.; L. R. 3 Ex. 330, 345. See HOMER PORT.

PORT OF DELIVERY. This is sometimes used to distinguish the port of unloading or destination, from any port at which the vessel touches for other purposes. 2 Mas. 319.

PORT OF DEPARTURE. As used in the United States statutes requiring a ship to procure a bill of health from the consular officer at the place of departure, it is not the last port at which the ship stops while bound for the United States, but the port from which she cleared. 61 Fed. Rep. 956.

PORT OF DESTINATION. As used in a time policy, the phrase has been held to mean any foreign port to which the vessel may be destined during the voyage, as well as her home port, and to include any usual stopping place for lading or unloading cargoes. 12 Gray 501.

PORT OF DISCHARGE. The place where the substantial part of the cargo is discharged has been held to be such, although done with the intent to complete the discharge at another basin. 104 Mass. 510. Some cargo must be discharged to make the port of destination the port of discharge; 5 Mas. 414. See, further, 2 Cliff. 4; 1 Sprague 485; 18 Law Rep. 94.

PORT RISK. A risk upon a vessel whilst she is lying in port and before she has taken her departure on another voyage. 71 N. Y. 459.

PORT SANITARY AUTHORITY. See SANITARY AUTHORITIES.

PORT TOLL. The toll paid for bringing goods into a port.

PORTATICA (L. Lat.) In English Law. The generic name for port duties charged to ships. Hargr. Law Tracts 64.

PORTENTA IN LEGE (Lat.). Monstrosities in law; unheard of positions.

PORTER. The name of an ancient English officer who bore or carried a rod before the justices. The door-keeper of the English parliament also bears this name.

One who is employed as a common carrier to carry goods from one place to another in the same town is also called a porter. Such person is, in general, answerable as a common carrier. Story, Bailm. § 496.

See INTOXICATING LIQUOR.

PORTGREVE (from Sax. gerefa, reeve or bailiff, and port). A chief magistrate in certain maritime towns. The chief magistrate of London was anciently so called, as appears from a charter of king William I. Instead of this portgreve of London, the succeeding king appointed two bailiffs, and afterwards a mayor. Camden, Hist. 325.

PORTION. That part of a parent's estate, or the estate of one standing in loco parentis, which is given to a child. 1 Vern. 204. See 8 Com. Dig. 589; 16 Viner, Abr. 432; 1 Belt, Suppl. Ves. 84, 58, 303; 2 id. 48; 108 Pa. 187; 54 Ala. 240.

The part, share, or division, made for a child by the parent. 108 Ill. 541.

PORTION DISPONIBLE. In French Law. The part of a person's estate which he may bequeath to others than his natural heirs. A parent having one legitimate child may dispose of one-half only of his property; leaving two, one-third only; and leaving three or more, one-fourth only; and it matters not whether the disposition is inter vivos, or by will. See LEGITIME.

PORTIONIBUS. Is properly employed to mean a portion of the tithes of one parish claimed by the rector of another parish. 4 Cl. & F. 1.

PORTORIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Duties paid in ports on merchandise. Code 4. 61. 3. Taxes levied in old times at city gates. Tolls for passing over bridges. Vicat, Voc. Jur.; Spelman, Gloss.

PORTRAIT. A picture of a person painted from life or from reasonable materials, if there are such, from which a likeness can be framed; or a picture painted after a man's death and meant to represent him. If there is nothing affording the materials for the portrait, it is completely an ideal one and cannot properly be called a portrait; Lord Lyndhurst, in 14 L. J. Ch. 78.

PORTSALES. Auctions were anciently so called, because they took place in ports.

PORTSOKA, or PORTSOKEN. Any place within the jurisdiction of a city. Cowell.

POSITIONS. When the pleadings were completed, each of the parties, if he wished to examine his adversary, prepared a detailed statement in writing of the facts in support of his own pleadings, so far as he supposed them to be within the knowledge of his adversary. This statement was divided into paragraphs, which were numbered, and each paragraph was called a position (posse), and hence the document as a whole was called positions. It was brought into court and submitted to the judge, and then used by him as the basis of his examination. He framed oral questions upon them, and required the examinee to answer as to every point stated in the positions, but did not require him to go any further, or into any more detail than the positions did. The positions were answered separately, as if they had been a series of interrogatories. The answers were reduced to writing, and when completed, sworn to, and filed, a copy was furnished to the party who had exhibited the positions; and who was thus enabled to learn how much of his case he must prove by witnesses, for he had no occasion to examine witnesses as to anything admitted by his adversary, such admissions being conclusive. Langdell, Pleadings in Ecclesiastical Courts, § 15.

POSITIVE. Express; absolute; not doubtful. This word is frequently used in composition.

POSITIVE CONDITION. One in which the thing which is the subject of it must happen: as, if I marry. It is opposed to a negative condition, which is where the thing which is the subject of it must not happen: as, if I do not marry.

POSITIVE EVIDENCE. That which, if believed, establishes the truth or falsehood of a fact in issue, and does not arise from any presumption. It is distinguished from circumstantial evidence. 8 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3057. See VIOLENT PRESUMPTION.

POSITIVE FRAUD. See FRAUD.

POSITIVE LAW. Law actually ordained or established, under human sanctions, as distinguished from the law of nature or natural law, which comprises those considerations of justice, right, and universal expediency that are announced by the voice of reason or of revelation. Municipal law is chiefly, if not essentially, positive; while the law of nations has been deemed by many of the earlier writers as merely an application of the law of nature. That part of the law of nations which rests on positive law may be considered in a threefold point of view:—1. The universal voluntary law, or those rules which become law by the uniform practice of nations in general, and by the manifest utility of the rules themselves; 2. The customary law, or that which, from motives of convenience, has, by tacit but implied agreement, prevailed, not necessarily among all nations, nor with so permanent a utility as to become a portion of the universal voluntary law, but enough to have acquired a prescriptive obligation among certain states so situated as to be mutually benefited by it. 1 Taunt. 241; 3. The conventional law, or that which is agreed between particular states by express treaty, a law binding on the parties among whom such treaties are in force. 1 Chitty, Com. Law 28. See LAW.

POSITIVI JURIS (L. Lat.). Of positive law. See POSITIVE LAW.

POSSE. This word is used substantively to signify a possibility. For example, such a thing is in posse, that is, such a thing may possibly be. When the thing is in being, the phrase to express it is, in esse.

POSSE COMITATUS (Lat.). The power of the county.

The sheriff, or other peace officer, has authority by the common law, while acting under the authority of the writ of the United States, commonwealth, or people, as the case may be, and for the purpose of preserving the public peace, to call to his aid the posse comitatus; 1 Bla. Com. 848.

But with respect to writs which issue in the first instance to arrest in civil suits, or on mesne process, the sheriff is not bound to take the posse comitatus to assist him in the execution of them; though he may, if he pleases, on anticipated, or actual resistance to the execution of the process; Co.

3d Inst. 193; Co. 3d Inst. 161; 10 Johns. 86; 2 Jones N. C. 339.

Although the sheriff is not bound upon a copias ad respondendum to take the posse comitatus, it has been held to be his duty to do so if he has any reason to anticipate resistance; nor can it be said to be a hardship on the sheriff that he should be bound to provide against resistance; 12 Jurist 1053; Winst. 144. And likewise with reference to a copias ad satisfaciendum; 20 Ga. 598; and he cannot, in an action for escape, plead that the prisoner was rescued; id.

Having the authority to call in the assistance of all citizens, he may equally require that of any individual; but to this general rule there are some exceptions; persons of infirm health, or who lack understanding, minors under the age of fifteen years, women, and perhaps some others, it seems, cannot be required to assist the sheriff, and are, therefore, not considered as a part of the power of the county; Viner, Abr. Sheriff (B).

A refusal on the part of an individual lawfully called upon to assist the officer in putting down a riot is indictable; 1 Carr. & M. 814. In this case will be found the form of an indictment for this offence.

Although the sheriff is acting without authority, yet it would seem that any person who obeys his command, unless aware of that fact, will be protected; 84 Vt. 69.

An individual not called upon by the sheriff to lend his aid does so at his peril; 5 Tex. App. 60. In a case where the defendant assisted a sheriff's officers in executing a writ of replevin without their solicitation, the court held him justified in so doing; 3 Mod. 244; see 78 Me. 873; 19 Am. Dec. 133; Bac. Abr. Sheriff (N); Hamm. N. P. 68; 5 Whart. 437. See SHERIFF; PEACE.

POSSESS. A warehouse cannot be said to "possess" liquor, within the meaning of § 25 of the National Prohibition Act, which holds such liquor in storage for its lawful owner solely and in good faith for the purpose of preserving and protecting it until it shall be consumed by the owner and his family or bona fide guests. 254 U. S. 91.

POSSESSED. This word is applied to the right and enjoyment of a term, or a person having a term, who is said to be possessed, and not seised. Bac. Tr. 335; Poph. 76; Dy. 869. It is sometimes synonymous with "seised"; 89 Ga. 632.

"Possessed" is a variable term in the law, and has different meanings as it is used in different circumstances. It sometimes implies a temporary interest in lands; as we say a man is possessed, in contradistinction to being seised. It sometimes implies the corporal having; as we say a man is seised and possessed. But it sometimes implies no more than that one has a property in a thing; that he has it as owner; that it is his; 44 Mich. 608.

POSSESSIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The detention of a thing: divided into—first, natural, or the naked detention of a thing, without intention to acquire ownership; second, civil, or the detention of a thing to which one has a right, or with intention of acquiring ownership. Hein. Elem. Jur. Civ. § 1288; Mackeldey, Civ. Law § 210.

In Old English Law. Possession; seisin. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; 2 Bla. Com. 237; Bracton, lib. 2, c. 17; Cowell, Possession. But seisin cannot be of an estate less than freehold; possessio can. New England Sheriff 141; 1 Metc. Mass. 450; 6 id. 439.

POSSESSIO FRATRIS (Lat. the brother's possession). A technical phrase applied in the English law relating to decedents, to denote the possession by one in such privity with a person as to be considered the person's own possession.

By the common law, the ancestor from whom the inheritance was taken by descent must have had actual seisin of the lands, either by his own entry, or by the possession of his own or his ancestor's lessee for years, or by being in the receipt of rent from the lessee of the freehold. But there are qualifications as to this rule, one of which arises from the doctrine of possessio fratris. The possession of a tenant for years, guardian, or brother is equivalent to that of the party himself, and is termed in law possessio fratris; Littl. sect. 8; Co. Litt. 15 a; 3 Wills. 516; 7 Term 386.

In Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Massachusetts, New Jersey, New York, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Rhode Island, South Carolina, Virginia, and probably in other states, the real and personal estates of intestates are distributed among the heirs without any reference or regard to the actual seisin of the ancestor; Reeve, Desc. 877; 4 Mass. 467; 3 Day 166; 2 Pet. 59. In Maryland, New Hampshire, North Carolina, and Vermont, the doctrine of possessio fratris, it seems, still exists; 2 Pet. 625; Reeve, Desc. 877; 4 Kent 384.

POSSESSION. The detention or enjoyment of a thing which a man holds or exercises by himself, or by another who keeps or exercises it in his name.

By the possession of a thing we always conceive the condition in which not only one's own dealing with the thing is physically possible, but every other person's dealing with it is capable of being excluded. Thus, the seaman possesses his ship, but not the water in which it moves, although he makes each subserve his purpose.

It expresses the closest relation that can exist between a corporeal thing and the person who possesses it, implying an actual, physical contact, as by sitting or standing upon a thing; 109 N. C. 87.

Actual possession exists where the thing is in the immediate occupancy of the party. 8 Dev. 34.

Constructive possession is that which exists in contemplation of law, without actual personal occupation. 11 Vt. 129. And see 1 McLean 214, 265; 2 Bla. Com. 116.

In order to complete a possession, two things are required: that there be an occupancy, apprehension, or taking; that the taking be with an intent to possess (animus possidendi); hence persons who have no legal wills, as children and idiots, cannot possess or acquire possession; Pothier; Etienne. See 1 Mer. 368; Abb. Sh. 9. But an infant of sufficient understanding may lawfully acquire the possession of a thing; Mitoh. R. E. 259.

Proof of the possession of property is commonly said to be prima facie evidence of title to it; and this is so with respect to land, in which case it has been held that proof of possession is sufficient evidence of title to maintain an action against a powder company for damages caused by an explosion; 58 Fed. Rep. 152. This particular phrase that possession is prima facie evidence of title has been very much criticised by Sir Frederick Pollock, who says that "it would be less intelligible at first sight, but not less correct to say that in the developed system of common-law pleading and procedure as it existed down to the middle of this century, proof of title was evidence only of a right to possess." Poll. Torts 317. Under the common-law forms of action, possession was of the utmost importance and was rather to be considered than ownership. "An owner in possession was protected against disturbance, but the rights of an owner out of possession were obscure and weak. To this day it continues so with regard to chattels. For many purposes the true owner of goods is the person, and the only person, entitled to immediate possession." Poll. Torts 316.

Commenting on the suggestion sometimes made that there is no doctrine of possession in our law, the same author says: "The reason of this appearance, an appearance capable of deceiving even learned persons, is that possession has all but swallowed up ownership; and the rights of a possessor, the one entitled to possess, have all but monopolized the very name of property." Id. 317.

"Legal possession does not necessarily coincide either with actual physical control . . . or with the right to possess (constantly called property in our books), and it need not have a rightful origin." Id. 818. "The common law, when it must choose between denying legal possession to the persons apparently in possession and attributing it to a wrongdoer, generally prefers the latter course. In Roman law there is no such general tendency, though the results are often similar." Id. 819.

Judge Holmes considers possession a conception only less important than contract, and he contends that the English system is far more civilized than the Roman. He seeks to answer the question which presents so much difficulty to German philosophers: "Why is possession protected by the law when the possessor is not also an owner?" His reply is that "possession is to be protected because a man by taking possession of an object has brought it within the sphere of his will; he has extended his personality into or over that object." Holmes, Com. Law 207. "Rights of ownership are substantially the same as those incident to possession. . . . The owner is allowed to exclude all and is accountable to no one; the possessor is allowed to exclude all but one and is accountable to no one but him." Id. 246. See Holmes, Common Law, Lect. 6; Pollock, Torts, 5th ed. ch. 9; F. W. Maitland in 1 Law Quart. Rev. 324; 2 id. 481.

A very high degree of legal protection is accorded to one lawfully in possession and, whether its origin is rightful or not, a stranger cannot be heard in opposition to it. The true owner may be heard, but an intruder never. It is said, however, that the bald proposition that possession is a good title against a wrongdoer is inaccurate, if stated entirely without a qualification, and that the true limits of the bare possessor's right to recover damages for interference with his possession are: 1. If the defendant cannot show who the true owner is, the bare possessor may recover the same measure of damages as if he were the true owner, though he may be liable over to the latter. 2. Where the true owner is shown, the bare possessor cannot recover the value of the goods taken or the diminution in their value, or for injury, unless he is liable. 3. Whether the true owner be shown or not, the possessor may recover damages for the taking or trespass, nominal or substantial, as the taking is or is not attended with aggravation. 7 Law Quart. Rev. 242.

Possession in the Roman law is the subject of an extended discussion by a writer in 3 Law Quart. Rev. 32, who takes issue with Judge Holmes' treatment of that subject, as to which he says, that although the differences between the two systems are very striking, Judge Holmes treats the civilians with scant respect, although "the knowledge he shows of their rights proves that he has himself by no means neglected them and we shall not be far wrong in following his practice rather than his precept."

Failure to take possession is sometimes considered a badge of fraud, in the transfer of personal property. See SALE; MORTGAGE.

Possession of real property will be presumed to accompany ownership until the contrary is proved; and constructive possession consequent upon legal ownership is sufficient as against mere trespassers; 120 U. S. 605. Long continued possession and use of real property creates a presumption of lawful origin; and this presumption need not rest upon belief that a conveyance was in point of fact executed; 120 U. S. 534.

See ADVERSE POSSESSION; LIMITATIONS.

In Louisiana. Civil possession exists when a person ceases to reside in a house or on the land which he occupied, or to detain the movable which he possessed, but without intending to abandon the possession. It is the detention of a thing by virtue of a just title and under the conviction of possessing as owner. La. Civ. Code, art. 3392, 3394.

Natural possession is that by which a man detains a thing corporeal; as, by occupying a house, cultivating ground, or retaining a movable in his possession. Natural possession is also defined to be the corporeal detention of a thing which we possess as belonging to us, without any title to that possession, or with a title which is void. La. Civ. Code, art. 3391, 3393.

Possession applied properly only to corporeal things, movables and immovables. The possession of incorporeal rights, such as servitudes and other rights of that nature, is only a quasi-possession, and is exercised by a species of possession of which these rights are susceptible. Id. art. 3395.

Possession may be enjoyed by the proprietor of the thing or by another for him; thus, the proprietor of a house possesses it by his tenant or farmer.

To acquire possession of a property, two things are requisite: the intention of possessing as owner; the corporeal possession of the thing. Id. art. 3399.

Possession is lost with or without the consent of the possessor. It is lost with his consent—when he transfers this possession to another with the intention to divest himself of it; when he does some act which manifests his intention of abandoning possession: as, when a man throws into the street furniture or clothes of which he no longer chooses to make use. Id. art. 3411. A possessor of an estate loses the possession against his consent—when another expels him from it, whether by force in driving him away, or by usurping possession during his absence, and preventing him from re-entering; when the possessor of an estate allows it to be usurped and held for a year, without during that time having done any act of possession or interfered with the usurper's possession. Id. art. 3412.

In Criminal Law. In some states it is made a criminal offence to have possession of burglars' tools with intent to use them for the purpose for which they were intended. Under such statutes it was held (1) that it is sufficient to allege in the information possession with the intent to break open places of deposit in general and take property, without specifying any particular place or property. (2) That where the defendant was found with the tools concealed about his person while stealing a ride on a railway and he testified that he found the tools, it was proper to refuse to take the case from the jury. (3) Where the only evidence produced by the state was the concealment of the tools on the person, and there was no evidence that the defendant had been convicted of theft, the application to him in argument by the prosecuting attorney of the term thief, followed by a ruling by the court that the assertion was warranted by the evidence, was ground for reversal; 91 Wis. 552.

See RECENT POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY.

In International Law. As indicating political control, a possession means the same as a colony. It was so used in the treaty of 1897, between the United States and Great Britain, which failed to receive the approval of the senate.

Of Land. What will constitute possession of land depends largely upon its character, condition and the use to which it is adapted. It is not necessary to constitute actual possession that there should be an enclosure or any physical or visible occupancy of every part of the land. As said by the Supreme Court of Iowa. 25 Iowa, 177, 181.

"Possession of land is the holding of and exclusive exercise of dominion over it. It is evident that this is not, and cannot be, uniform in every case, and that there may be degrees in the exclusiveness even of the exercise of ownership. The owner can not occupy literally the whole tract,—he cannot have an actual per se possession of all, nor hold it in the grasp of his hands. But this can not always be done, yet he may hold the possession in fact of uninclosed land, by the exercise of such acts of ownership over it as are necessary to enjoy the ordinary use of which it is capable, and acquire the profits it yields in its present condition,—such acts, being continued and uninterrupted, will amount to actual possession, and, if under color of title, or claim of right, will be adverse." 260 U. S. 433.

See ACTUAL POSSESSION; CONSTRUCTIVE POSSESSION.

The word "possession" is more or less ambiguous, and is interchangeably used to describe both actual and constructive possession which often so shade into one another that it is difficult to say where one ends and the other begins. Custody may be in the servant and possession in the master; or title and right of control may be in one and the property within the protection of the house of another. (7 Cush. 487, 489.) So that, as pointed out by Pollock and Wright in their work on the subject, controversies arising out of mixed possession have inevitably led to many subtle refinements in order to determine the rights of conflicting claimants, or to lay the proper charge of ownership in prosecution for larceny of goods belonging to one in the custody of another or found by the defendant. 232 U. S. 67.

POSSESSION MONEY. An allowance to one put in possession of goods taken under writ of feri facias. Holthouse, Dict.

POSSESSION, WRIT OF. See HABERE FACIAS POSSESSIONEM.

POSSESSOR. He who holds, detains, or enjoys a thing, either by himself or his agent, which he claims as his own.

In general, the possessor of personal chattels is presumed to be the owner; and in case of real estate he has a right to receive the profits until a title adverse to his possession has been established, leaving him subject to an action for the mesne profits. See BONA FIDE POSSESSOR.

POSSESSORY. Relating to possession; founded on possession; contemplating or claiming possession.

POSSESSORY ACTION. In Old English Law. A real action, in which the plaintiff, called the demandant, sought to recover the possession of land, tenements, and hereditaments. On account of the great nicety required in its management, and the introduction of more expeditious methods of trying titles by other actions, it has been laid aside. Finch, Laws 257.

In admiralty law the term is still in use. See PETITIONS.

In Louisiana. An action by which one claims to be maintained in the possession of an immovable property, or of a right upon or growing out of it, when he has been disturbed; or to be reinstated to that possession, when he has been divested or evicted. 2 La. 227, 254.

In Scotch Law. An action by which the possession of heritable or movable property may be recovered and tried. An action of molestation is one of them. Paterson, Comp. § 1058, n.

POSSESSORY JUDGMENT. In Scotch Law. A judgment which entitles a person who has uninterruptedly been in possession for seven years, to continue in possession until the question of right be decided in due course of law. Bell, Dict.

POSSIBILITY. An uncertain thing which may happen. Lilly, Reg. A contingent interest in real or personal estate. 1 Madd. 549.

Possibilities are near, as when an estate is limited to one after the death of another; or remote, as that one man shall be married to a woman, and then that she shall die and he be married to another. 1 Fonbl. Eq. n. e.; Viner, Abr.; 3 Co. 51 a.

Possibilities are also divided into—a possibility coupled with an interest. This may, of course, be sold, assigned, transmitted, or devised. Such a possibility occurs in executory devises, and in contingent, springing, or executory uses. See 59 N. C. 81.

A bare possibility, or hope of succession. This is the case of an heir apparent during the life of his ancestor. It is evident that he has no right which he can assign, devise, or even release. See Chal. R. P. 66.

A possibility or mere contingent interest, as, a devise to Paul if he survive Peter. Dane, Abr. c. 1, s. 5, § 2, and the cases there cited. See PERPETUITY IMPOSIBILITY.

POSSIBLE. Liable to happen or come to pass, capable of existing or of being conceived or thought of; capable of being done; not contrary to the nature of things. 38 Kan. 383. It is sometimes equivalent to practicable or reasonable; 44 Wis. 208. An undertaking to supply an article as soon as possible is construed to mean with all reasonable promptitude, regard being had to the manufacturer's means of business, and his orders already in hand; 26 L. J. C. P. 73; 4 Q. B. D. 670.

POST (Lat.). After. When two or more alienations or descents have taken place between an original intruder and the tenant or defendant in a writ of entry, the writ is said to be in the post, because it states that the tenant had not entry unless after the ouster of the original intruder. 3 Bla. Com. 182. Persons claiming under the propositus by feoffment or inheritance were said to be "in the per," while those claiming in any other manner, e. g. the limitation of a use, as tenant in dower, etc., were said to be "in the post." Except in case of the heir, the distinction is that persons in the per take by the act of the party at common law unassisted by statute, while persons in the post take by operation of law without any act of the party or by his act aided by statute; 4 L. Quart. Rev. 362. See ENTRY, WRIT OF.

A military establishment where a body of troops is permanently fixed. 19 Wall. 268; a military post is synonymous with military station. 94 U. S. 219.

POST CONQUESTUM. After the conquest. Words inserted in the king's title by King Edward I., and constantly used in the time of Edward III. Toml.

POST-DATE. To date an instrument a time after that on which it is made. See DATE.

POST DIEM (Lat.). After the day; as, a plea of payment post diem, after the day when the money became due. Com. Dig. Pleader (2 W 29).

POST DISSEISIN. In English Law. The name of a writ which lies for him who, having recovered lands and tenements by force of a novel disseisin, is again disseised by a former disseisor. Jacob, Law Dict.

POST ENTRY. In Maritime Law. An entry made by a merchant upon the importation of goods, after the goods have been weighed, measured, or gauged, to make up the deficiency of the original or prime entry. The custom of making such entries has arisen from the fact that a merchant in making the entry at the time of importation is not or may not be able to calculate exactly the duties which he is liable to pay: he therefore makes an approximately correct entry, which he subsequently corrects by the post entry. See Chitty, Com. L. 746.

POST FACTO. See EX POST FACTO.

POST-FACTUM or POSTFACTUM (Lat.). An after-act; an act done afterwards; a post-act.

POST FINE. A duty formerly paid to the king for a fine acknowledged in his court.

POST LITEM MOTAM (Lat.). After the commencement of the suit.

Declarations or acts of the parties made post litem motam are presumed to be made with reference to the suit then pending, and, for this reason, are not evidence in favor of the persons making them; while those made before an action has been commenced, in some cases, as when a pedigree is to be proved, may be considered as evidence; 4 Camp. 401.

POST-MARK. A stamp or mark put on letters in the postoffice.

Post-marks are evidence of a letter's having passed through the postoffice; 2 Camp. 620; 3 B. & P. 316; 15 East 416; 1 Maule & S. 201; 15 Conn. 206. But they are not evidence per se without proof; 1 Campb. 215; id. 178; 16 M. & W. 124; 3 Stark. 64; R. & R. C. C. 264. The opinion of a person in the habit of receiving letters is, it seems, evidence of the genuineness of a post-mark; 5 Bing. 289. Cited in Stark. Ev., Sharsw. ed. 174, note c. See LETTER; POSTAL SERVICE.

POST MORTEM (Lat.). After death: as, an examination post mortem is an examination made of a dead body to ascertain the cause of death; an inquisition post mortem is one made by the coroner.

It is the duty of the coroner, after death by violence, to cause a post mortem examination to be made by a competent medical authority. A physician thus employed may, at common law, maintain an action against the county for trouble and labor expended in such examination; Gibson, C. J., in 4 Pa. 289.

A father may maintain an action against one to whom he has intrusted his child for treatment, for an autopsy performed upon it after death; 47 N. E. Rep. 401, where it was held that as the natural guardian of the child, the father had the right to the possession of the dead body. Being entitled to such possession for the purpose of burial, his right against one who unlawfully interferes with it and mutilates it is as great as if that one had unlawfully removed the body from the lot in which it was buried. See 55 Alb. L. J. 434. A widow may recover damages in a similar case for the unlawful dissection of the body of her dead husband; 47 Minn. 307. The right of a person entitled to the possession of a body is thus defined by Patterson, J.: "The right is to the possession of the corpse in the same condition it was in when death supervened. It is the right to what remains when the breath leaves the body, and not merely to such a hacked, hewed, and mutilated corpse as some stranger, an offender against the criminal law, may choose to turn over to an afflicted relative;" 1 App. Div. N. Y. 551; other authorities to the same general effect are 125 Ind. 536; 81 Md. 358; 19 Am. Law Rev. 251; 10 Alb. L. J. 71; 4 Am. L. T. 127; 8 Chic. Leg. N. 878; Ferley, Mortuary Law 26. See DEAD BODY.

POST-NATUS (Lat.). Literally, after born; it is used by the old law writers to designate the second son. See PUISNE; POST-NATI.

POST NOTES. A species of bank-notes payable at a distant period, and not on demand. 2 W. & S. 463. A kind of bank-notes intended to be transmitted at a distance by post. See 24 Me. 36.

POST-NUPTIAL. Something which takes place after marriage: as, a post-nuptial settlement, which is a conveyance made generally by the husband for the benefit of the wife.

A post-nuptial settlement is either with or without consideration. The former is valid even against creditors, when in other respects it is untainted with fraud; 4 Mas. 443; 2 Bail. 477. The latter, when made without consideration, if bona fide, and the husband be not involved at the time, and he be not disproportionate to his means, taking his debts and situation into consideration, is valid; 4 Mas. 443. See 4 Dall. 804; SETTLEMENT; VOLUNTARY CONVEYANCE.

POST-OBIT (Lat.). An agreement by which the obligor borrows a certain sum of money and promises to pay a larger sum, exceeding the lawful rate of interest, upon the death of a person from whom he has some expectation, if the obligor be then living. 7 Mass. 119; 6 Madd. 111; 5 Ves. 57; 19 id. 628. See CATCHING BARGAIN;

EXPECTANCY; MACEDONIAN DECREE.

POSTOFFICE. A government office for the receipt and delivery of the mail.

All the streets of the city are post roads, because they are letter carrier routes, as are all public roads and highways while kept up and maintained as such; 1 Suppl. 428; and all railroads; 148 U. S. 92; 160 id. 1, 40; 38 Fed. Rep. 552; all the waters, canals, and plank roads of the United States during the time the mail is carried thereon; R. S. § 3964. See also 3 How. 151; 13 Ct. Cl. 199.

The power to establish postoffices does not enable the postmaster-general to bind the government by leasing a postoffice for twenty years when there is no appropriation therefor; 155 U. S. 489.

The top of a letter-box is not an authorized depository for mail matter; 17 Op. A. G. 524.

A repair shop though designated as a station is not a branch postoffice or station; 30 Ct. Cl. 59.

Where goods are sent by mail the post-office is the agent of the buyer and not the seller; [1898] A. C. 200; and when they are delivered by the seller to the postoffice the title vests in the buyer; id. 204.

No person shall furnish any private conveyance for letters or packets, or in any manner cause or provide for the conveyance of the same by regular trips or at stated periods over any post route or between places between which the mail is carried. See 16 Fed. Rep. 609.

POST ROADS. See POSTOFFICE.

POSTAGE. The money charged by law for carrying and delivering mail matter.

The rates of postage between places in the United States are fixed by law; the rates of postage upon foreign letters are fixed by arrangements entered into by the postmaster-general, in pursuance of authority vested in him by congress for that purpose.

POSTAGE-STAMPS. The act of congress approved March 3, 1847, section 11, and the act of congress of March 3, 1841, sections 3, 4, provide that, to facilitate the transportation of letters in the mail, the postmaster-general be authorized to prepare postage-stamps, which when attached to any letter or packet shall be evidence of the payment of the postage chargeable on such letter. The same sections declare that any person who shall falsely or fraudulently make, utter, or forge any post-stamp, with the intent to defraud the postoffice department, shall be deemed guilty of felony, and be punished by a fine not exceeding five hundred dollars, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment. And if any person shall use or attempt to use, in prepayment of postage, any postage-stamp which shall have been used before for like purposes, such person shall be subject to a penalty of fifty dollars for every such offence; to be recovered in the name of the United States, in any court of competent jurisdiction. See, also, Act of Mar. 3, 1851, 9 Stat. at L. 589; Act of Aug. 31, 1852, 10 Stat. at L. 141; 1 Suppl. R. S. p. 249, § 28. It is made penal to sell stamps or stamped envelopes for a larger sum than that indicated on the stamp or than is charged by the department; Act of Mar. 3, 1855, 10 Stat. at L. 842. See R. S. § 5463. Postmasters and other postal employees are forbidden to dispose of postage-stamps, stamped envelopes, or postal cards except for cash, or sell or dispose of them for any larger or less sum than the values indicated on their faces; 1 Suppl. R. S. p. 187.

POSTAL SAVINGS-BANK. A savings-bank in connection with a post-office. The idea was evolved in England in 1861, was adopted by Australia in 1863, Canada in 1868, and the United States June 25, 1910.

In the United States, the funds deposited bear 2 per cent. interest, depositors must be 10 years of age or over, and not more than $100 in any one month or $500 in all may be deposited by any one person.

A married woman may open an account in her own name and her deposits will be free from control by her husband.

In Great Britain and Ireland, accounts may be opened by any one over 7 years old, $250 a year is the largest sum that may be deposited, and no total deposit may exceed $1,000; deposits in the name of a married woman are deemed to be her separate property; interest is paid at the rate of 2½ per cent. Deposits and interest are guaranteed by the Federal Treasury and the Exchequer of the United Kingdom, respectively. Stand. Dict.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES. See POSTAL SAVINGS-BANK.

POSTAL SERVICE. That relating to the mails, their transmission and delivery.

The act of July 26, 1892, provides that after a general advertisement for the transportation of the mails, the postmaster-general may secure any mail service that may become necessary, and the contract shall be made with the lowest bidder. Where a contract is awarded to the lowest bidder, it can be changed only in the manner provided in §§ 3967-3959; 31 Ct. Cl. 832. The contract should be in the name of the United States; 18 Op. Atty. Gen. 112; and the bid must have with it an acceptable bond; 17 id. 294. Under § 3962 the postmaster-general may by order make a mail service subject to fines and deductions; 24 Ct. Cl. 61, 350; 26 id. 344.

A contractor for mail messenger service is not required to haul mail bags for repairs to and from a subsequently established repair shop; 30 Ct. Cl. 59.

The compensation of mail contractors is fixed by contract and by law of congress. The postmaster-general may make deduction for failure to perform services, and may also deduct the price of the trip in all cases where the trip is not performed; 24 Ct. Cl. 61; 26 id. 344. Compensation for additional services in carrying the mail is not to be in excess of the exact proportion which the original compensation bears to the original services; 131 U. S. 31, 35. The original letting, and not any subsequent increase of service or pay, is made the standard of limitation under § 3960; 17 Op. Atty. Gen. 166. If an allowance is made under false representations or by mistake, the money paid can be recovered; 182 U. S. 271, 644; 135 id. 550; and money received under an expedited schedule as payment for additional horses and men and never used, though allowed in the order of expedition, was held bound to be subject to being refunded to the United States; 182 U. S. 271. The clause providing that the compensation should not be in excess of the exact proportion does not prevent its being less; 19 Op. Atty. Gen. 147.

Most of the criminal legislation of congress rests upon no express grant of power, but upon the power to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution the powers conferred; Ordron. Const. Leg. 559. The power to establish postoffices and post roads includes the power to punish offences committed against its administration, by whatever name it may be known; 13 Blatch. 335; 2 Cra. 212; 7 Wall. 482; and to forbid the use of the mails to carry matter which disseminates crime and immorality; 143 U. S. 110.

Opening a letter which had been in the postoffice, before delivery to the person to whom it was directed, with the intent to pry into his correspondence, is an offence against the postal laws, even though the letter was not sealed at the time; 2 Curt. 285; and though it come from a criminal and is supposed to contain improper information; 1 Biss. 237; 163 U. S. 420; but in order to constitute an offence against the postal laws the letter must have been in the custody of the postmaster or his agents; 20 Fed. Rep. 625.

Obstructing mails. The United States may enjoin obstructions to highways used in interstate commerce and in transporting the mails; 158 U. S. 584. This applies to obstructions upon railroads and electric railways, and includes employees who suddenly desert their work; id.; 55 Fed. Rep. 380; 44 id. 592. See LABOR UNION.

Arresting a letter carrier on an indictment for murder is not obstructing the mail; 7 Wall. 482. A state statute which necessarily interferes with speedy and uninterrupted carriage of the United States mails cannot be considered as a reasonable police regulation; 163 U. S. 842. The committing an unprovoked assault upon a postmaster, the necessary result whereof was an obstruction and retarding of the passage of the mail, is an offence, unless the act was independent and disconnected from the postoffice and matters pertaining thereto; 14 Fed. Rep. 127.

A person having a lien against horses for their keeping cannot enforce the same in such a manner as to stop the United States mail in a stage coach drawn by such horses; 3 Hughes 545. But no offence is committed by enforcing it unless the mail is in transitu and unless the horses or vehicle taken are actually being used in carrying mail; id. It has been held that it is an offence under the statute to stop a mail train although one had obtained a judgment and writ of execution from a state court against the railway company; 3 Fed. Rep. 478. It is not an offence under the statute to restrain the driver of a mail coach from driving through a crowded city at such a rate as seriously to endanger the lives of the citizens; 9 Pet. 390. Restricting the speed of trains to six miles an hour by city ordinance does not obstruct the mails; 5 Op. Atty. Gen. 554.

Larceny and robbery. Embezzlement or destruction of mail matter by an employee in any department of the postal service is an offence against the postal laws. This statute has been held to create two distinct offences; viz.: (1) the embezzlement of a letter carried in the United States mail, and (2) the stealing of its contents; and one may be punished separately for each offence; 87 Fed. Rep. 200; 34 id. 316; and see 134 U. S. 624. Under the statute no one can be convicted who is not an employee of the postoffice department; 1 McLean 499; 2 id. 14. One who steals from the mail, whether an employee or not, commits an offence against the postal laws; 95 Fed. Rep. 59; and in taking or abstracting articles or receiving them when so taken, with the object of opening, secreting, destroying, embezzling, or stealing the same constitutes the offence; 87 Fed. Rep. 108.

As to the use of decoy letters, see that title.

As to using the mails for improper or non-mailable matter, see LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; LOTTERY; OBSCENITY.

See SAVINGS BANKS.

POSTAL UNION. A treaty made at Berne in October, 1874, for the regulation of rates of postage and other matters connected with the postoffice between England and various other countries. See 88 & 89 Vict. c. 22; 1 Hall. Int. L. 286. Several international conferences have since been held on the subject.

POSTEA (Lat. afterwards). In Practice. The indorsement, on the non prius record, purporting to be the return of the judge before whom a cause is tried, of what has been done in respect of such record.

It states the day of trial, before what judge, by name, the cause is tried, and also who is or was an associate of such judge; it also states the appearance of the parties by their respective attorneys, or their defaults, and the summoning and choice of the jury, whether those who were originally summoned, or those who were tales, or taken from the standers-by; it then states the finding of the jury upon oath, and, according to the description of the action, and the assessment of the damages, with the occasion thereof, together with the costs.

These are the usual matters of fact contained in the postea; but it varies with the description of the action. See LEE.

Dict. Postea; 3 Lilly, Abr. 387; 16 Viner, Abr. 465; Bacon, Law Tr. 127.

When the trial is decisive, and neither the law nor the facts can afterwards be controverted, the postea is delivered by the proper officer to the attorney of the successful party, to sign his judgment; but it not unfrequently happens that after a verdict has been given there is just cause to question its validity: in such case the postea remains in the custody of the court. Eunomus, Dial. 2, § 33, p. 116.

POSTERIORES (Lat.). This term was used by the Romans to denote the descendants in a direct line beyond the sixth degree. It is still used in making genealogical tables.

POSTERITY. Being or coming after. It is a word of comparison, the correlative of which is priority: as, when a man holds lands from two landlords, he holds from his ancient landlord by priority, and from the other by posterity. Co. 2d Inst. 892.

These terms, priority and posterity, are also used in cases of liens: the first are prior liens, and are to be paid in the first place; the last are posterior liens, and are not entitled to payment until the former have been satisfied.

POSTERITY. All the descendants of a person in a direct line to the remotest generation. 8 Bush 527.

POSTHUMOUS CHILD. One born after the death of its father; or, when the Cæsarean operation is performed, after that of the mother. The doctrine is universally adopted throughout the United States, that posthumous children inherit in the same manner as if born during the father's life; and this relates back to the conception of the child, if it is born alive; 8 Washb. R. P. *412; 4 Paige 52; 80 Pa. 178; Mitch. R. E. 231. The court will allow a longer time than nine months for the birth of the child, when the opinion of physicians, or circumstances warrant it; 2 Greenl. Cruise, R. 140.

When a father makes a will without providing for a posthumous child, the will is generally considered as revoked, pro tanto; 3 Washb. R. P. 699, 412; 4 Kent 412, 521, n., 525; 28 Am. Rep. 466; 160 Pa. 458.

In most of the states there are statutes providing that in case of future estates or remainders limited to heirs, issue, or children of any person, posthumous children take as if living at the death of the parent without the limitation of an estate, to support contingent remainders; and most of such statutes also provide that the future estate limited to take effect on the death of a person without heirs, etc., is defeated by the birth of a posthumous child. In a few states the time within which such child must be born is limited to ten months after the death of the father. See 31 Fla. 139; LEGACY; DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION; EN VENTRE SA MERE.

POSTLIMINIUM (Lat. from post, after, and limen, threshold). A fiction of the civil law, by which persons or things taken by the enemy were restored to their former state on coming again under the power of the nation to which they formerly belonged. Calvinus, Lex.; 1 Kent 108. It is also recognized by the law of nations. But movables are not entitled to the benefit of this rule, by strict law of nations, unless promptly recaptured. If recaptured after twenty-four hours they vest in the recaptor, subject, amongst most nations, to re-vest in the owner, upon payment of military salvage; Kinsley, Law of War 143.

The rule does not affect property which is brought into a neutral territory; 1 Kent 108. It is so called from the return of the person or thing over the threshold or boundary of the country from which it was taken.

When an enemy's military occupation comes to an end, the legal state of things previously existing is deemed to have been in continuous existence during the occupation. Postliminium applies to territory, to private immovable property, and to every kind of property that may not lawfully be seized. But property, public or private, that has been lawfully taken by an enemy, such as booty or treasure, is not subject to the fiction. Acts done once and for all, within an invader's competence to perform, hold good. There is no postliminium as regards lawful prize, though it is said there may be by recapture; which, if it occur before capture is complete, may have effects like those of postliminium, though the latter fiction does not include any idea of salvage; Risley, Law of War 148.

The jus postliminii in international law is derived from a similar term in the Roman law by which persons and property captured by an enemy and then recaptured are restored to their original owner. The term now applies almost exclusively to property both real and personal which when recaptured does not belong to the recaptor but to the original owner. Snow, Int. Law 116.

POSTLIMINIUM. See POSTLIMINIUM.

POSTMAN. A senior barrister in the court of exchequer, who has precedence in motions; so called from place where he sits. 2 Bla. Com. 28; Wharton, Dict. A letter-carrier. Webster, Dict.

POSTMASTER. An officer who keeps a postoffice, attending to the receipt, forwarding, and delivery of letters and other matter passing through the mail.

Postmasters must reside within the delivery district for which they are appointed. For those offices where the salary or compensation is less than a thousand dollars a year, the postmaster-general appoints; where it is more, the president. Postmasters are divided into four classes, exclusive of the postmaster at New York, according to the amount of salary; those of the first class receiving three thousand or more, those of the fourth less than one thousand; 1 Supp. R. S. p. 110; id. 417. They must give bond to the United States of America; see 19 How. 73; Gilp. 54; which remains in force, for suit upon violation, during the term; 1 W. & M. 150; for three, formerly two, years after the expiration of the term of office; R. S. § 8838; 7 How. 681. See R. S. § 3836.

Where an office is designated as a money-order office, the bond of the postmaster shall contain an additional condition for the faithful performance of all duties and obligations in connection with the money-order business; R. S. § 3834.

The presumption that public officers do their duty applies to the duty of postmasters to report a contractor's delinquencies; 132 U. S. 644.

Every postmaster is required to keep an office in the place for which he may be appointed; and it is his duty to receive and forward by mail, without delay, all letters, papers, and packets as directed, to receive the mails, and deliver, at all reasonable hours, all letters, papers, and packets to the persons entitled thereto.

Every person who, without authority from the postmaster-general, sets up any office bearing the title of postoffice is liable to a penalty of $500 for each offence; R. S. § 3829.

A postmaster is liable for all losses occasioned by his own default in office; 3 Wils. 443; Cowp. 754; 5 Burr. 2709; Edw. Bailm. 483; 1 Bell, Com. 488; 2 Kent 474; Story, Bailm. § 463; see 97 Ala. 710; but in order to make him liable for negligence, it must appear that the loss or injury sustained was in consequence of such negligence; 7 Cra. 242; 6 Barb. 232. He is bound only to the exercise of due diligence in the care of matter deposited in the postoffice; 15 Wall. 837. See 1 Ld. Raym. 646, where the question is elaborately discussed.

A postmaster is liable for the acts of his clerks or servants who were not regularly appointed and sworn as his assistants; 28 Vt. 663; 106 Mass. 446. In Pennsylvania it has been decided that he is not responsible for their secret delinquencies; though, perhaps, he is answerable for want of attention to the official conduct of his subordinates; 8 Watts 433; but see 97 Ala. 710. An attempt to induce a postmaster to sell stamps on credit is in violation of a statute providing against the attempt to influence any officer of the United States to a violation of his lawful duties; 136 U. S. 257.

POSTMASTER-GENERAL. The chief officer of the postoffice department of the executive branch of the government of the United States.

His duties, in brief, are, among other things, to establish postoffices and appoint postmasters (see POSTMASTER) at convenient places upon the post-roads established by law; to give instructions for conducting the business of the department; to provide for the carriage of the mails; to obtain from the postmasters balances due, with accounts and vouchers of expenses; to pay the expenses of the department; see 15 Pet. 377; to prosecute offences, and, generally, to superintend the business of the department in all the duties assigned to it. He is assisted by four assistants and a large corps of clerks,—the four assistants being appointed by the president. He must make ten several reports annually to congress, relating chiefly to the financial management of the department, with estimates of the expenses of the department for the ensuing year. R. S. § 413. He is a member of the cabinet. See R. S. §§ 388-414; DEPARTMENT; OFFICER.

POSTNATI (Lat.). Those born after. Applied to American and British subjects born after the separation of England and the United States; also to the subjects of Scotland born after the union of England and Scotland. Those born after an event, as opposed to antenati, those born before. 2 Kent 56; 2 Pick. 395; 5 Day 166*. See ANTENATI.

POSTPONE. To put off; to delay; to continue or adjourn, as to postpone a hearing.

POSTULATIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. The name of the first act in a criminal proceeding.

A person who wished to accuse another of a crime appeared before the praetor and requested his authority for that purpose, designating the person intended. This act was called postulatio. The postulant (calumniam jurabat) made oath that he was not influenced by a spirit of calumny, but acted in good faith with a view to the public interest. The praetor received this declaration, at first made verbally, but afterwards in writing, and called a libel. The postulatio was posted up in the forum, to give public notice of the names of the accuser and the accused. A second accuser sometimes appeared and went through the same formalities.

Other persons were allowed to appear and join the postulant or principal accuser. These were said postulare subscriptionem, and were denominated subscriptores. Cic. in Cæcil. Divin. 15. But commonly such persons acted concurrently with the postulant, and inscribed their names at the time he first appeared. Only one accuser, however, was allowed to act; and if the first inscribed did not desist in favor of the second, the right was determined, after discussion, by judges appointed for the purpose. Cic. in Verr. 1. 6. The preliminary proceeding was called divinatio, and is well explained in the oration de Cluentio, entitled Divinatio. See Aulus Gellius, Att. Noct. lib. ii. cap. 4.

The accuser having been determined in this manner, he appeared before the praetor, and formally charged the accused by name, specifying the crime. This was called nominatio criminis delicti. The magistrate reduced it to writing, which was called inscriptio, and the accuser and his adjuncts, if any, signed it, subscribent. This proceeding corresponds to the indictment of the common law.

If the accused appeared, the accuser formally charged him with the crime. If the accused confessed it, or stood mute, he was adjudged to pay the penalty. If he denied it, the inscriptio contained his answer, and he was then in reatus (indicted, as we should say), and called delictus reus, and a day was fixed, ordinarily after an interval of at least ten days, according to the nature of the case, for the appearance of the parties. In the case of Verres, Cicero obtained one hundred and ten days to prepare his proofs; although he accomplished it in fifty days, and renounced, as he might do, the advantage of the remainder of the time allowed him.

At the day appointed for the trial, the accuser and his adjuncts or colleagues, the accused, and the judges, were summoned by the herald of the praetor. If the accuser did not appear, the case was erased from the roll. If the accused made default, he was condemned. If both parties appeared, a jury was drawn by the praetor or Judex quaestio. The jury was called jurati homines and the drawing of them sortitio, and they were taken from a general list made out for the year. Either party had a right to object to a certain extent to the persons drawn; and then there was a second drawing called subsortitio, to complete the number.

In some tribunals quaestiones (the jury) were editi (produced) in equal number by the accuser and the accused, and sometimes by the accuser alone, and were objected to or challenged in different ways, according to the nature of the case. The number of the jury also varied according to the tribunal (quaestio); they were sworn before the trial began. Hence they were called jurati.

The accusers, and often the subscriptores, were heard, and afterwards the accused, either by himself or by his advocates, of whom he commonly had several.

After the pleadings were concluded, the praetor or the Judex quaestio distributed tablets to the jury, upon which each wrote, secretly, either the letter A (absolvo), or the letter C (condemno), or N. L. (non liquet). These tablets were deposited in an urn. The president assorted and counted the tablets. If the majority were for acquitting the accused, the magistrate declared it by the words factae non videtur, and by the words factae videtur if the majority were for a conviction. If the tablets marked L. were so many as to prevent an absolute majority for a conviction or acquittal, the cause was put off for more ample information, ampliato, which the praetor declared by the word amplius. Such, in brief, was the course of proceeding before the quaestiones perpetuae.

The forms observed in the comitia centuriata and comitia tributa were nearly the same, except the composition of the tribunal and the mode of declaring the vote.

POSTULATIO ACTIONIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Demand of an action (actio) from the praetor, which some explain to be a demand of a formula, or form of the suit; others, a demand of leave to bring the cause before the judge. Taylor, Civ. Law 80; Calvinus, Lex. Actio.

POT-DE-VIN. In French Law. A sum of money frequently paid at the moment of entering into a contract, beyond the price agreed upon.

It differs from arrha in this that it is not part of the price of the thing sold, and that the person who has received it cannot by returning double the amount, or the other party by losing what he has paid, rescind the contract; 18 Toullier, n. 52.

POTENTATE. One who has a great power over an extended country; a sovereign.

By the naturalization laws of the United States, an alien is required, before he can be naturalized, to renounce all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereign whatever.

POTENTIALLY. In possibility, not in act, not positively; in efficacy, not in actuality. 19 Neb. 556.

POTESTAS (Lat.). In Civil Law. Power; authority; domination; empire, Imperium, or the jurisdiction of magistrates. The power of the father over his children, patria potestas. The authority of masters over their slaves, which makes it nearly synonymous with dominium. See Inst. 1. 9. 12; Dig. 2. 1. 13. 1; 14. 1; 14. 4. 1. 4.

FOUND. A place, enclosed by public authority, for the temporary detention of stray animals. 4 Pick. 258; 9 id. 14.

Animals may not be impounded unless they are suffered by the owner to run at large within the strict construction of the statute; 1 Aik. 316; if the impounding is illegal, they can be recovered by the owner; 28 Me. 481; 21 N. H. 448; 23 Vt. 674. If it is legal, the owner must pay the costs imposed; 20 Ill. 383; and the pound-keeper need not deliver over the animals until all legal charges are paid; 5 Cush. 263; 89 Vt. 34; the impounder has the right to use the same force to maintain his possession as a sheriff has to protect his possession under legal process; 36 Vt. 625.

Where the proper officer finds cattle running at large in public streets, he may pursue them upon private property; 63 Me. 84; but when a man finds strange cattle in his field, he is not bound to impound or retain them for the owner, but may drive them off into the highway; 18

Pick. 227; if, however, he impounds, he must feed and water them properly, according to the usage of the country and good husbandry; 13 id. 384; he must proceed strictly according to the statute, or he will be a trespasser; 16 Pa. 22; notice must be given before the impounded animal can be sold; 126 Mass 364; and such notice must state the legal charges; 16 Metc. 198. Laws authorizing the impounding and sale of stock without notice or judicial investigation are held to be unconstitutional as authorizing a sale of private property without due process of law; 35 N. Y. 302; 98 N. C. 44; 64 Miss. 283; but it has been held that such laws are valid under the police power; 58 Wis. 144. See ANIMAL; ESTRAY; RUNNING AT LARGE.

Money. The sum of twenty shillings. Previous to the establishment of the federal currency, the different states made use of the pound in computing money: it was of different value in the several states.

Pound Sterling is a denomination of money of Great Britain. It is of the value of a sovereign (q. v.). In calculating the rates of duties, the pound sterling shall be considered and taken as of the value of four dollars and eighty-six cents and six and one-half mills; R. S. § 3565.

The pound sterling of Ireland is to be computed, in calculating said duties, at four dollars and ten cents; id.

Weights. There are two kinds of weights, namely, the troy and the avoirdupois. The pound avoirdupois is greater than the troy pound in the proportion of seven thousand to five thousand seven hundred and sixty. The troy pound contains twelve ounces, that of avoirdupois sixteen ounces.

POUND-BREACH. The offence of breaking a pound in order to take out the cattle impounded. 3 Bla. Com. 146. The writ de parco fracto, or pound-breach, lies for recovering damages for this offence; also case. Id. It is also indictable.

POUND-KEEPER. An officer charged with the care of a pound, and of animals confined there.

POUNDAGE. In Practice. The amount allowed to the sheriff, or other officer, for commissions on the money made by virtue of an execution. This allowance varies in different states and to different officers.

POURFAIREPROCLAIMER. An ancient writ addressed to the mayor or bailiff of a city or town, requiring him to make proclamation concerning nuisances, etc. Fitz. Nat. B. 176.

POURPARLER. In French Law. The conversations and negotiations which have taken place between the parties in order to make an agreement. These form no part of the agreement. Pardessus, Dr. Com. 142.

POURSUIVANT. A follower; a pursuer. In the ancient English law, it signified an officer who attended upon the king in his wars, at the council-table, exchequer, in his court, etc., to be sent as a messenger. A poursuivant was, therefore, a messenger of the king.

POVERTY AFFIDAVIT. An affidavit furnished by a party to a suit that he is not able to furnish security for costs. 36 Kan. 263. In the United States courts, an affidavit of poverty for the purpose of avoiding the giving of a cost bond, may be filed after the granting, on notice to plaintiff, of an order for such bond; 82 Fed. Rep. 865.

POWDER. Technically, "powder" may be a mass of fine particles of any substance, yet, when used in connection with an allegation of shooting and the use of leaden balls, any person, would know that gunpowder was meant. 66 S. W. 995.

POWER. The right, ability, or faculty of doing something.

The distinction between "power" and "right," whatever may be its value in ethics, in law is very shadowy and unsubstantial. He who has legal power to do anything has the legal right; 143 Pa. 64.

Technically, an authority by which one person enables another to do some act for him. 2 Lilly, Abr. 338.

Derivative Powers are those which are received from another. This division includes all the powers technically so called. They are of the following classes:—

Coupled with an interest, being a right or authority to do some act, together with an interest in the subject on which the power is to be exercised. Marshall, C. J., 8 Wheat. 203; and the interest coupled with a power in order to make it irrevocable, must be an interest in the thing itself; 125 U. S. 342.

A power of this class survives the person creating it, and, in case of an excess in execution, renders the act valid so far as the authority extends, leaving it void as to the remainder only. It includes powers of sale conferred on a mortgagee.

Naked, being a right of authority disconnected from any interest of the donee in the subject-matter. 3 Hill, N. Y. 365. In the case of a naked power not coupled with an interest the law requires that every prerequisite to the exercise of that power should precede it; 4 Wheat. 77; 134 U. S. 256. A naked power given to several persons cannot be executed by the survivors; 16 Beav. 233.

Implied Power. The true test of "implied power" is, whether a preferred means is adapted to the end of an express power, and is also unprohibited, or, in other words, is congenial with the spirit and purpose of a constitution. 2 Duv. (Ky.) 21.

Inherent Powers. Those which are enjoyed by the possessors of natural right, without having been received from another. Such are the powers of a people to establish a form of government, of a father to control his children. Some of these are regulated and restricted in their exercise by law, but are not technically considered in the law as powers.

Special Power. "Special power" to dispose of by will, within the meaning of a statute, is a power which is specifically expressed, or as clearly and unequivocally manifested, of disposing by will of some particular estate. 9 Bush (Ky.) 397.

Powers under the Statute of Uses. An authority enabling a person, through the medium of the statute of uses, to dispose of an interest in real property, vested either in himself or another person.

Methods of causing a use, with its accompanying estate, to spring up at the will of a given person. Will. R. P., 18th ed. 333; 2 Washb. R. P. 300.

The right to designate the person who is to take a use. Co. Litt. 271 b, Butler's note, 231, § 3, pl. 4.

A right to limit a use. 4 Kent 334.

An authority to do some act in relation to lands, or the creation of estates therein, or of charges thereon, which the owner granting or reserving such power might himself lawfully perform.

They are distinguished as—

Appendant. Those which the donee is authorized to exercise out of the estate limited to him, and which depend for their validity upon the estate which is in him. 2 Washb. R. P. 304. A life-estate limited to a man, with a power to grant leases in possession, is an example. Hardr. 416; 1 Cal. Cas. 15; Sugd. Pow. 107; Burton, R. P. § 179.

Of appointment. Those which are to create new estates. Distinguished from powers of revocation.

Collateral. Those in which the donee has no estate in the land. 2 Washb. R. P. 305.

General. Those by which the donee is at liberty to appoint to whom he pleases.

In gross. Those which give a donee, who has an estate in the land, authority to create such estates only as will not attach on the interest limited to him or take effect out of his own interest. 3 Cow. 286; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 293; Watk. Conv. 260.

Of revocation. Those which are to divest or abridge an existing estate. Distinguished from those of appointment; but the distinction is of doubtful exactness, as every new appointment must divest or revoke a former use. Sanders, Uses 154.

As to the effect of the insertion of a power of revocation, either single or in connection with one of appointment, see Styles 389; 2 Washb. R. P. 307.

Special. Those in which the donee is restricted to an appointment to or among particular objects only. 2 Washb. R. P. 307.

The person bestowing a power is called the donor; the person on whom it is bestowed is called the donee.

The person who receives the estate by appointment is called the appointee; the donee of the power is sometimes called the appointor.

The creation of a power may be by deed or will; 2 Washb. R. P. 314; Mitch. R. E. 506; by grant to a grantee, or reservation to the grantor; 4 Kent 319; and the reservation need not be in the same instrument, if made at the same time; 1 Sugd. Pow. 159; by any form of words indicating an intention; 2 Washb. R. P. 315. The doubt whether a power is created or an estate conveyed can, in general, exist only in cases of wills; 2 Washb. R. P. 316; and in any case is determined by the intention of the grantor or deviser, as expressed in or to be gathered from the whole will or deed; 10 Pet. 532; 8 How. 10; 3 Cow. 651; 6 Watts 87; 4 Bibb 307. It must be limited to be executed, and must be executed within the period fixed by the rules against perpetuities; 5 Bro. P. C. 592; 2 Ves. 368; 13 Sim. 393.

The interest of the donee is not an estate; Watk. Conv. 271; 2 Prest. Abstr. 275; but is sufficient to enable the donee to act, if the intention of the donor be clear, without words of inheritance; 8 Ves. 467; 1 P. Wms. 171; 7 Johns. Ch. 84; see Co. Litt. 271 b, Butler's note 231; and may coexist with the absolute fee in the donee; 10 Ves. 255; 4 Greenl. Cruise, Dig. 241, n. As a general rule a power to sell does not include a power to mortgage; 3 Hill N. Y. 361; 66 Tex. 31; 89 Va. 873; but where it is for raising a particular charge, and the estate itself is settled or devised subject to that charge, then it may be proper under the circumstances to raise the money by mortgage, and the court will support it as a conditional sale; 1 De G. M. & G. 645; 8 Jur. n. s. 1143; Sugd. Powers 425; and sale generally means a cash sale; 4 Kent 331; 3 Hill N. Y. 378. See infra.

As to exercising the power. If it be simply one in which no person is interested but the donee, it is a matter of election on his part whether to exercise it or not; 1 Sugd. Pow. 158; see infra; but if coupled with a trust in which other persons are interested, equity will compel an execution; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1082; 2 Mas. 244, 251.

A power to appoint by will, conferred on a life tenant, does not empower him to devise the land for the payment of his own debts; 69 Md. 390. But a power conferred by will to invest or use includes the power to sell; 115 N. C. 40.

The execution must be in the manner prescribed, by the proper person, see APPOINTMENT, and cannot be by an assignee; 2 Washb. R. P. 321; unless authorized by the limitation; 4 Cruise, Dig. 211; or unless an interest be coupled with the power; 2 Cow. 296; 8 Wheat. 203; nor by a successor, as on the death of an executor; 13 Metc. 220. As to whether a sale by a donee who has also an estate in the land is held to be an execution of the power, see 2 Washb. R. P. 325; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 306; 5 B. & C. 720; 6 Co. 18; 16 Pa. 25.

A power to sell gives authority to sell for cash only, and does not uphold a mere exchange; 140 U. S. 253; 22 How. 75; 52 Ia. 91; Perry, Trusts § 769; or mortgage; 15 Minn. 212; 6 Cash. 117; 66 Tex. 81; contra, 151 Pa. 322; 163 id. 628; and see 163 Mass. 187.

Where three executors, given power to sell real estate, have accepted the trust, one alone cannot execute the power; 78 Tex. 293; and in a devise to two sisters to sell if they desired, the power can only be exercised by their joint deed and is lost by the death of either of them; 56 Conn. 316. A power given by will cannot be delegated, but an appointment under it need not allude to the power; 88 Va. 588.

Where an exact execution is impossible under authority of court, it may be executed as near as may be (cy-près) to carrying out the donor's intention; 2 Term 241; 4 Ves. 681; 5 Sim. 632; 3 Wash. C. C. 12.

It must be made at a proper time, and, where several powers are given over different parts of the same estate, in proper succession; 1 Co. 174; 1 W. Bla. 281.

Equity will compel the donee to execute a power where it is coupled with a trust in which other persons are interested; Story, Eq. Jur. § 1062; and to correct a formal defect in the manner of execution; 2 P. Wms. 489, 622; 2 Mas. 251; 3 Edw. Ch. 175.

Three classes of cases have been held sufficient demonstrations of an intended exercise of a power: 1. Where there has been some reference in the will, or other instrument, to the power; 2. or a reference to the property, which is the subject on which it is to be executed; 3. or when the provisions in the will or other instrument, executed by the donee of the power, would otherwise be ineffectual or a mere nullity, in other words it would have no operation, except as an execution of the power; 134 U. S. 590. See 98 Id. 326; 109 Id. 366; 38 N. Y. 392; 92 Ill. 538.

The suspension or destruction of a power may sometimes happen by a release by the donee, by an alienation of his estate, by his death, and by other circumstances.

An appendant power may be suspended by a conveyance of his interest by the donee; 4 Cruise, Dig. 221; Cro. Car. 472; 4 Bingh. N. C. 734; 2 Cow. 237; and may be extinguished by such conveyance; 2 B. & Ald. 93; 10 Ves. 246; or by a release; 1 Russ. & M. 431, 436, n.; 1 Co. 102 b; 2 Wash. R. P. 308.

Illusory powers. It was held at common law that when a power is given to appoint among certain persons, it is a sufficient and legal exercise of the power if a large part of property is appointed to some of the beneficiaries and very little to the others. Thus a power to appoint a thousand dollars between A. and B. would be satisfied if nine hundred and ninety-nine were given to A. and only one dollar to B. The courts of equity interfered in such case and compelled a substantial distribution to prevent the appointment becoming illusory or a fraud on the power. But by 1 Wm. IV. c. 38, the common-law rule was restored; 44 Pa. 527; 66 Pa. 248.

A power in gross may be released to one having the freehold in possession, reversion, or remainder, and not by any other act of the donee; Tud. Lead Cas. 294; Burt. R. P. § 176; Chauce, Pow. § 3172; Hardr. 416; 1 P. Wms. 777; an infant may execute a power in gross; 7 Ch. D. 728.

A collateral power cannot be suspended or destroyed by act of the donee; F. Moo. 605; 5 Mod. 437; such a power may be executed by an infant; 4 Kent 342. And see 1 Russ. & M. 431; 13 Metc. 220.

Impossibility of immediate vesting in interest or possession does not suspend or extinguish a power; 2 Bingh. 144. A power of sale in a mortgage for condition broken is not revoked by the mortgagor's death; 143 Mass. 49; 4 S. D. 604. In general, a power of sale is exhausted by a single exercise of power; 30 Fed. Rep. 532.

A power may be executed by a married woman; 4 Kent 342; but she will not be compelled to exercise a power of appointment of which she is donee for the benefit of her creditors; 17 Q. B. D. 521.

For the distinction between political and judicial power, see 78 Ill. 261; 75 Id. 132; 29 Mich. 451; 43 Ia. 452; 114 Mass. 247; 8. c. 19 Am. Rep. 341; 10 Bush 72; Cooley, Const. Lim. 122.

See BALANCE OF POWER; BENEFICIAL

POWER; CONCURRENT POWER; POLICE POWER; CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

POWER OF ATTORNEY. An instrument authorizing a person to act as the agent or attorney of the person granting it. It is often called letter of attorney.

A general power authorizes the agent to act generally in behalf of the principal.

A special power is one limited to particular acts.

It may be by parol or under seal. 1 Pars. Contr. 94. The attorney cannot, in general, execute a sealed instrument so as to bind his principal, unless the power be under seal; 2 B. & P. 338; 5 B. & C. 355; 2 Me. 358. See 7 M. & W. 322, 331; 7 Cra. 299; 4 Wash. C. C. 471; 19 Johns. 60; 2 Pick. 345.

Powers of attorney are strictly construed; 6 Cush. 117; 5 Wheat. 326; 8 M. & W. 806; 5 Bingh. 442. General terms used with reference to a particular subject-matter are presumed to be used in subordination to that matter; 7 B. & C. 278; 5 Den. 49; 7 Gray 287. See, as to a power to collect a debt; 1 Blackf. 252; to settle a claim; 5 M. & W. 645; 8 Blackf. 291; to make an adjustment of all claims; 8 Wend. 494; 7 Watts 716; 14 Cal. 399; 7 Ala. N. S. 800; to accept bills; 7 B. & C. 278.

Where a power of attorney is executed in a foreign country in the language of that country, the intention of the writer is to be ascertained by evidence of competent translators and experts, including, if necessary, lawyers of the country, as to the meaning of the language used; and if, according to such evidence, the intention appears to be that the authority shall be acted upon in other countries, the extent of the authority in any country in which the authority is acted upon must be determined by the law of that country; [1891] 1 Q. B. 79.

Third parties dealing with an agent on the basis of a written letter of attorney are not prejudiced by any private instructions from the principal to the agent, unless such instructions are in some way referred to in the letter; 15 Johns. 44; 3 Term 757; 81 N. C. 5; 27 Gratt. 119. Where an agent is acting under such a written letter, it is the duty of third persons to examine the instrument; Story, Ag. § 72. A failure to do this precludes a recovery unless the claim is based on fraud; 1 Pet. 264; Whart. Ag. § 227; 22 N. H. 360; 72 Pa. 351; 53 Md. 28. When a power of attorney is to a partnership as such, a deed executed in the partnership name by one of the partners is good; 81 Tex. 505.

A power of attorney to convey lands is immediately revoked by the death of the principal, and deeds subsequently made by the attorney are void; 50 Fed. Rep. 712; and upon the death of some of the donors of a power of attorney, it is revoked as to them if not as to all; 119 U. S. 156.

See AGENCY; PRINCIPAL.

PRACTICABLE, PRACTICABLY. Practicable is that which may be done, practiced, or accomplished, that which is performable, feasible, possible; and the adverb practically means in a practical manner. 43 Ill. 165.

A settled, uniform, and long-continued practice, without objection, is evidence of what the law is; and such practice is based on principles which are founded in justice and convenience; 2 Russ. 19, 570; 2 Jac. 232; 5 Term 380; 1 Y. & J. 167, 168; 2 C. & M. 55; Ram, Judgm. c. 7.

With respect to criminal practice, it has been forcibly remarked by a learned judge that even where the course of practice in criminal law has been unfavorable to parties accused, and entirely contrary to the most obvious principles of justice and humanity, as well as those of law, it has been held that such practice constituted the law, and could not be altered without the authority of parliament. Per Maule, J., Scott, N. C. 599, 600.

PRACTICE COURT. In English Law. A court attached to the court of king's bench, which heard and determined common matters of business and ordinary motions for writs of mandamus, prohibition, etc.

PRÆMUNIRE (Lat.). In order to prevent the pope from assuming the supremacy in granting ecclesiastical livings, a number of statutes were passed in England, during the reigns of Edward I. and his successors, punishing certain acts of submission to the papal authority there mentioned. In the writ for the execution of these statutes, the words præmunire facias (cause to be forewarned), being used to command a citation of the party, gave not only to the writ, but to the offence itself of maintaining the papal power, the name of præmunire. Co. Litt. 129; Jacob, Law Dict.

The penalties of præmunire were subsequently applied to other offences of various kinds, as the molestation of possessors of abbey lands, the assertion that the houses of parliament have a legislative authority without the sovereign or the sending sub-

PRÆTOR. In Roman Law. A municipal officer of Rome, so called because (præiret populo) he went before or took precedence of the people.

The consuls were at first called prætores. Liv. Hist. iii. 55. The word prætor means literally a general and is a title of honor accorded to the consuls in the first centuries of the republic. The prætor was really a third consul who was specially intrusted, not with the military command, but with the administration of justice. This is the reason why, in point of rank (and in the number of his lictors), he was inferior to the consul, though, on principle, his power was consular; Sohm, Inst. Rom. L. 48, n. 1. He was a sort of minister of justice, invested with certain legislative powers, especially in regard to the forms or formalities of legal proceedings. Ordinarily, he did not decide causes as a judge, but prepared the grounds of decision for the judge, and sent to him the questions to be decided between the parties. The judge was always chosen by the parties, either directly, or by rejecting, under certain rules and limitations, the persons proposed to them by the prætor. Hence the saying of Cicero (pro Cluentio 48) that no one could be judged except by a judge of his own choice. There were several kinds of officers called prætores. See Vocat. Voc.

Before entering on his functions, he published an edict announcing the system adopted by him for the application and interpretation of the law during his magistracy. The edict issued by the prætor on his taking office was called the edictum perpetuum. It was said that these edicts were of great authority. They were called the jus honorarium, "because those who bear honors in the state, that is the magistrate, have given it their sanction; Inst. I. 2, 7; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 10; the fact that the circumstances and habits of thought, untrammelled as they were under this system, led to the exercise by the prætor of equitable functions and extension of the jurisdiction of the old civil law, was a potent factor in the judge-made law which replaced the ancient technical and rigid system by one more flexible. The lex Cornelia (B. C. 67) forbade a prætor to depart during his term from the edict promulgated by him at its beginning. The edicts of preceding prætores were collected and condensed by Salvius Julianus, who had filled the office during the time of Hadrian, this was a final edictum perpetuum, and it was known distinctively by that title. It is doubtful whether after that annual edicts were issued. Sand. Inst. Just. II. 1; Sohm, Rom. L. 51; Mack, Rom. L. 45.

The authority of the prætor extended over all jurisdictions, and was summarily expressed by the words do dico, addico, i. e. do I give the action, dico I declare the law, addico I invest the judge with the right of judging. There were certain cases which he was bound to decide himself, assisted by a council chosen by himself, perhaps the decemviri. But the greater part of causes brought before him he sent either to a judge, an arbitrator, or to recuperatores, or to the centumviri, as before stated. The prætor had no power to legislate, but he might grant or refuse an action; Sohm, Rom. L. 52. Under the empire, the powers of the prætor passed by degrees to the prefect of the prætorium or the prefect of the city; so that this magistrate, who at first ranked with the consuls, at last dwindled into a director or manager of the public spectacles or games.

The prætor urbanus was a special officer appointed to administer justice in the city; afterwards (about 242 A. C.) the increase of business made it necessary to appoint a second prætor, who was called a prætor peregrinus to whom were assigned all cases in which either or both of the parties were foreigners. Prætores tutelares were special magistrates nominated in Rome and vested with the power of appointing tutores which right had previously been exercised by the prætor urbanus.

A prætor fidei commissarius was a magistrate specially appointed to have jurisdiction of fidei commissum.

The prætor fiscalis has special jurisdiction of cases affecting the public treasury.

PRAGMATIC SANCTION. In French Law. An expression used to designate those ordinances which concern the most important object of the civil or ecclesiastical administration. Merlin Répert.; 1 Fournel, Hist. des Avocats 24, 38.

In Civil Law. The answer given by the emperors on questions of law, when consulted by a corporation or the citizens of a province or of a municipality, was called a pragmatic sanction. Léçons El. du Dr. Civ. Rom. § 53. This differed from a rescript.

PRAIRIE. An extensive tract of land destitute of trees, covered with coarse grass, and usually characterized by a deep, fertile soil; a meadow or tract of grass-land; especially a so called "natural meadow." 51 Kan. 23.

PRATIQUE or PRATIC. A license for the master of a ship to traffic in the ports of Italy upon a certificate that the place whence he came is not annoyed with any infectious disease. R. & L. Dict.; Encyc. Lond.

PRAY IN AID. In old English practice. To call upon for assistance. In real actions, the tenant might pray in aid, or call for assistance of another, to help him to plead, because of the feebleness or imbecility of his own estate. 3 Bl. Com. 300.

PRAYER. In Equity Practice. The request in a bill that the court will grant the aid which the petitioner desires. That part of the bill which asks for relief. The word denotes, strictly, the request, but is very commonly applied to that part of the bill which contains the request.

OF PROCESS. That part of the bill which asks that the defendant may be compelled to appear and answer the bill, and abide the determination of the court upon the subject.

It must contain the names of all the parties; 1 P. Wms. 593; 3 Dick. Ch. 707; 2 Johns. Ch. 245; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; Bishp. Eq. § 9; see 55 Fed. Rep. 835; although they are out of the jurisdiction; 1 Beav. 106; Mitt. Eq. Pl. 164. The ordinary process asked for is a writ of subpoena; Story, Eq. Pl. § 44; and in case a distringas against a corporation; Coop. Eq. Pl. 16; or an injunction; 2 S. & S. 219; 1 Sim. 50; is sought for, it should be included in the prayer.

FOR RELIEF, is general, which asks for such relief as the court may grant; or special, which states the particular form of relief desired. A special prayer is generally inserted, followed by a general prayer, 4 Madd. 408; 16 Pet. 195; 23 Vt. 247; 6 Gill 105; 25 Me. 153; 10 Rich. Eq. 58; 7 Ind. 681; 15 Ark. 555; a general prayer if omitted, may be added by amendment or amended bill; 39 W. Va. 583. Unless the general prayer is added, if the defendant fails in his special prayer he will not be entitled to any relief; 1 Ves. 426; 12 id. 62; 3 R. I. 129; 15 Ala. 9; except in case of charities and bills in behalf of infants; 1 Atk. 6, 355; 18 Ves. 325; 1 Russ. 235; 2 Paige, Ch. 896.

A general prayer is sufficient for most purposes, and the special relief desired may be prayed for at the bar; 4 Madd. 408; 1 Edw. 28; Story, Eq. Pl. § 41; 31 N. H. 193; 2 Paine 11; 9 How. 890; 9 Mo. 201; 9 Gill & J. 80; 19 Ark. 62; 18 Ala. 871; 23 Vt. 247; but where a special order and provisional process are required, founded on peculiar circumstances, a special prayer therefor is generally inserted; 6 Madd. 218; 3 Ind. 419. A prayer for general relief is sufficient to support any decree warranted by the allegations of the bill; 148 Ill. 623; but under such a prayer a party cannot recover a claim distinct from that demanded by the bill; 29 W. Va. 1.

Such relief, and such only, will be granted, either under a special prayer, whether at bar; 2 Ves. 299; 4 Paige, Ch. 239; 35 Me. 133; 30 Ala. n. s. 416; or in the bill; 16 Tex. 399; 19 Ga. 499; 21 Pa. 131; or under a general prayer, as the case is stated will justify; 7 Ired. Eq. 80; 4 Sneed 633; 18 Ill. 143; 5 Wisc. 117, 434; 24 Mo. 31; 7 Ala. n. s. 163; 13 Ark. 183; 3 Barb. Ch. 613; 3 Gratt. 513; 9 How. 390; and a bill framed apparently for one purpose will not be allowed to accomplish another, to the injury of the defendant; 16 Tex. 399; 21 Pa. 131; 6 Wend. 68.

And, generally, the decree must conform to the allegations and proof; 7 Wheat. 523; 19 Johns. 496; 2 Harr. Ch. 401; 1 Ired. Eq. 88; 6 Ala. n. s. 518; 4 Bibb 876; 13 Conn. 146. See 75 Tex. 287. But a special prayer may be disregarded, if the allegations warrant relief under the general prayer; 15 Ark. 553; 4 Tex. 20; 3 Cal. 239; 23 Ala. n. s. 646; 8 Humphr. 230; 1 Blackf. 905; the relief granted must be consistent with the special prayer; 37 Ala. 507; 21 Pa. 131; 1 Jones, Eq. 100; 14 Ga. 52; 1 Edw. Ch. 634; 9 Gill & J. 80; 4 Des. Eq. 530; 9 Yerg. 301; 1 Johns. Ch. 111.

PREAMBLE. An introduction prefixed to a statute, reciting the intention of the legislature in framing it, or the evils which led to its enactment. It is no part of the law; 26 Pa. 287. It is no more than a recital of some inconveniences, which does not exclude any other, for which a remedy is given by the enacting part of the statute. Resort cannot be had to the preamble of a statute to ascertain the intention of an act unless there is an ambiguity in the enacting part. Effect should be given to a preamble to the extent that it shows what the legislature intended, and if the words of enactment have a meaning which does not go beyond that preamble, or which may come up to the preamble, in either case that meaning should be preferred to one which shows an intention of the legislature which would not answer the purposes of the preamble or would go beyond them. To that extent only is the preamble material; 8 App. Cas. 888. The clear language of an act cannot be cut down by a reference to the preamble; 29 Ch. D. 450. It may explain what is of doubtful meaning, but will not limit what is clear; 15 R. I. 299; 19 Fed. Rep. 304.

A preamble is said to be the key of a statute, to open the minds of the makers as to the mischiefs which are to be remedied and the objects which are to be accomplished by the provisions of the statute; Co. 4th Inst. 209; 6 Feb. 301. In modern legislative practice, preambles are much less used than formerly, and in some of the United States are rarely inserted in statutes. In the interpretation of a statute, though resort may be had to the preamble, it cannot limit or control the express provisions of the statute; Dwarrit, Stat. 504; Wilberf. Stat. Law 277. Nor can it by implication enlarge what is expressly fixed; 1 Story, Const. b. 3, c. 6; 5 M'Cord 298; 15 Johns. 89; Bussb. 181; Davis 38.

A preamble reciting the existence of public outrages, provision against which is made in the body of the act, is evidence of the facts it recites. See 4 Maule & S. 539; 2 Russ. Cr. 720.

The facts recited in a preamble of a private statute are not evidence, as between the person for whose benefit the act passed and a third person; 3 Litt. 472; 7 Hill 80; but the statement of legislative reasons in the preamble will not affect the validity of an act; 42 Conn. 583.

SEE STATUTE; CONSTRUCTION.

A recital inserted in a contract for the purpose of declaring the intention of the parties.

PRE-AUDIENCE. The right of being heard before another. A privilege belonging to the English bar, the members of which are entitled to be heard in their order, according to rank, beginning with the Queen's attorney general, and ending with barristers at large; 3 Bl. Com. 28, note.

PREBEND. In Ecclesiastical Law. The stipend granted to an ecclesiastic, in consideration of officiating in the church. It is in this distinguished from a canonicate, which is a mere title and may exist without stipend. The prebend may be a simple stipend, or a stipend with a dignity attached to it, in which case it has some jurisdiction belonging to it. 2 Burn, Ecol. Law 88; Stra. 1083; 1 Term 401; 2 id. 630; 1 Wils. 208; Dy. 273 a; 7 B. & C. 113; 8 Bingh. 490; 5 Taunt. 2; Jacob, L. Dict.

PRECABLE. Day works which the tenants of certain manors were bound to give their lords in harvest time. Cowel.

PRECARIOUS. The affairs of an executor are precarious only when conducted with such recklessness as in the opinion of prudent and discreet men endangers their security. 60 Barb. 58.

PRECARIOUS RIGHT. The right which the owner of a thing transfers to another, to enjoy the same until it shall please the owner to revoke it.

If there is a time fixed during which the right may be used, it is then vested for that time, and cannot be revoked until after its expiration, Wolff, Inst. § 333.

PRECARIUM (Lat.). The name of a contract among civilians, by which the owner of a thing, at the request of another person, gives him a thing to use as long as the owner shall please. Pothier, n. 87. See Yelv. 173; Cro. Jac. 235; 9 Cow. 687; Rolle 128; Bac. Abr. Bailment (C); Ersk. Inst. 3. 1. 9; Story, Bailm. §§ 127, 253 b. A tenancy at will is a right of this kind.

PRECATORY WORDS. Expressions in a will praying or requesting that a thing shall be done. A trust created by such words, which are more like words of entreaty and permission, than of command or certainty.

Examples of such words, which the courts have held sufficient to constitute a trust, are "wish and request," "have fullest confidence," "heartily beseech," and the like; Rap. and Lawr. L. Dict.

Although recommendatory words used by a testator, of themselves, seem to leave the devisee to act as he may deem proper, giving him a discretion, as when a testator gives an estate to a devisee, and adds that he hopes, recommends, has a confidence, wish, or desire that the devisee shall do certain things for the benefit of another person, yet courts of equity have formerly construed such precatory expressions as creating a trust; 6 Ves. Ch. 380; 18 id. 41; Bac. Abr. Legacies (B); 98 Mass. 274; 35 Vt. 173; 4 Am. L. Rev. 617; 113 Mo. 112. See, contra, 20 Pa. 268; 1 McCart. 397; 2 Story, Eq. Jur. § 1069; 49 N. J. Eq. 570; 139 Mass. 117; Bisph. Eq. 78.

But this construction will not prevail when either the objects to be benefited are imperfectly described, or the amount of property to which the trust should attach is not sufficiently defined; 1 Bro. C. C. 142; 1 Sim. 542, 536.

While the expression of confidence, if the context shows that a trust is intended, may create a trust, yet, if upon the whole will the confidence is merely that the legatee will do what is right in disposing of the property, a trust is not imposed; 4 Kent 305; [1895] 2 Ch. 370; 140 N. Y. 122; 152 Pa. 103; 159 Mass. 229. As to when the words confidence, etc., create a trust, see note to Lloyd & G. 154; see also 2 Pa. 129. The words in the fullest confidence were held to create a trust; 1 Turn. & R. 143.

The current of decision in England with regard to precatory words is said to be now changed. A trust will not be created where the testator shows an intention to leave property absolutely; 27 Ch. Div. 394. See 70 Pa. 158; 19 Conn. 351. The leaning of the courts is against the implication of a trust; 1 Jarm. Wills 865. It is a question of what was the intention, not of what particular word was used; [1895] 2 Ch. 370. But it was held that a testamentary gift with added words of entreaty or recommendation, or expressing a hope or confidence will constitute a trust; 100 Mass. 340; 34 Ala. 349. See the cases in 1 Jarm. Wills 865, on this subject.

"The true rule, upon principle, and according to the weight of more recent authorities, is said to be that the whole will must be examined to determine whether the words used were to impose an obligation or to give the devisee full discretion." 4 Kent 305, note b, citing 8 Ch. D. 540; 109 U. S. 725; 126 Mass. 213; 79 Ky. 378. See 140 N. Y. 122.

Vagueness in the object tends to show that no trust was intended. See L. R. 8 Eq. 673. It has been held that precatory words are prima facie imperative, and create a trust; 83 Md. 200; 71 id. 108; 127 U. S. 300.

Precatory words do not always create a trust. The question in every case is one of intention. Expressions per se sufficient to create a trust may be deprived of that effect by a context especially declaring or by implication showing no trust was intended. The question in all cases is, was the direction imperative? The real question to be determined when such words are used is whether the confidence, hope, or wish expressed is meant to govern the donee, or whether it was a mere indication of that which the testator thinks would be a reasonable or suitable use of the property conveyed, leaving the matter ultimately to the decision of the donee; 1 Jarm. Wills 406, n.

The meaning of the word "precatory," according to its ordinary use, does not embrace a command—it means beseeching, suppliant, prayerful. 79 Ky. 381.

PRECEDENCE. The right of being first placed in a certain order,—the first rank being supposed the most honorable.

In this country no precedence is given by law to men.

Nations, in their intercourse with each other, do not admit any precedence; hence, in their treaties, it is the usage for the powers to alternate, both in the preamble and in the signatures, so that each power occupies, in the copy intended to be delivered to it, the first place. Sometimes signatures are made in alphabetical order of the states which are parties to the act, the French alphabet being adopted for that purpose. 2 Hall, Int. L. 132.

In some cases of officers, when one must of necessity act as the chief, the oldest in commission will have precedence; as, when the president of a court is not present, the associate who has the oldest commission will have a precedence; or if their commissions bear the same date, then the oldest man.

In the army and navy there is a regular order of precedence. See RANK.

For rules of precedence in England, see Whart. Law Dict.

PRECEDENTS. In Practice. Legal acts or instruments which are deemed worthy to serve as rules or models for subsequent cases.

The word is similarly applied in respect to political and legislative action. In the former use, precedent is the word to designate an adjudged case which is actually followed or sanctioned by a court in subsequent cases. An adjudged case may be of any degree of weight, from that of absolute conclusiveness down to the faintest presumption; and one which is in fact disregarded is said never to have become a precedent. In determining whether an adjudication is to be followed as a precedent, the following considerations are adverted to. First, the justice of the principle which it declares, and the reasonableness of its application. Hob. 270. If a precedent is to be followed because it is a precedent, even when decided against an established rule of law, there can be no possible correction of abuses, because the fact of their existence would render them above the law. It is always safe to rely upon principles. See 16 Viner, Abr. 499;

2 J. & W. 318; 3 Ves. 527; 2 P. Wms. 258; 2 Bro. C. C. 86; 1 Tex. 11; 2 Evans, Poth. 377, where the author argues against the policy of making precedents binding when contrary to reason. "The reason and spirit of cases make law: not the letter of particular precedents." 8 Burr. 1384, per Lord Mansfield. See, also, 1 Kent 475; Liverm. Syst. 104; Greal. Eq. Ev. 300; 1 Johns. 402; 20 id. 723; Cro. Jac. 537; 83 Hen. VII. 41; Jones, Bailm. 46; 1 Hill, N. Y. 438; 9 Barb. 544; 40 N. Y. 451; Wells, Res. Adj. & Dec.

According to Lord Talbot, it is "much better to stick to the known general rules than to follow any one particular precedent which may be founded on reasons unknown to us." Cas. f. Talb. 26. Blackstone, 1 Com. 70, says that a former decision is, in general, to be followed, unless "manifestly absurd or unjust;" and in the latter case it is declared, when overruled, not that the former sentence was bad law, but that it was not law. If an adjudication is questioned in these respects, the degree of consideration and deliberation upon which it was made; 4 Co. 94; the rank of the court, as of inferior or superior jurisdiction, which established it, and the length of time during which it has been acted on as a rule of property, are to be considered. The length of time which a decision has stood unquestioned is an important element: since where a rule declared to be law, even by an inferior tribunal, has been habitually adopted and acted upon by the community, and becomes thus imbedded in the actual affairs of men, it is frequently better to enforce it as it is, instead of allowing it to be re-examined and unsettled. It is said that in order to give precedents binding effect there must be a current of decision; Cro. Car. 528; Cro. Jac. 386; 8 Co. 183; 10 Wisc. 870; and even then, injustice in the rule often prevails over the antiquity and frequency of its adoption, and induces the court to overrule it. But this is to be very cautiously done where it is a rule of property, or wherever a departure from it would unjustly affect vested rights; 8 Cal. 188; 47 Ind. 286; 30 Miss. 258; 23 Wend. 340.

"The only use of authorities, or decided cases, is the establishment of some principle which the judge can follow out in deciding the case before him. . . . Where a case has decided a principle, although I myself do not concur in it, and although it has been only the decision of a tribunal of co-ordinate jurisdiction, I have felt bound to follow it where it is of respectable age and has been used by lawyers as settling the law, leaving to the appellate court to say that a case is wrongly decided, if the appellate court should so think." 13 Ch. D. 712, per Jessel, M. R.

"Without minutely examining all the cases, or saying whether I do or do not agree with them, it is sufficient for me to abide by the principle established by them; the principle is the thing which we are to extract from cases, and to apply it in the decision of other cases." 7 Term 148, per Lord Kenyon, C. J.

"Now, I have often said, and I repeat it, that the only thing in a judge's decision binding as an authority upon a subsequent judge is the principle upon which the case was decided; but it is not sufficient that the case should have been decided on a principle, if that principle is not itself a right principle, or one not applicable to the case." 13 Ch. D. 785, per Jessel, M. R.

"If one authority were produced to me, and my own opinion were the other way, I would not follow that authority; but if the authorities are numerous, I admit that I must be bound." L. R. 19 Eq. 460, per Jessel, M. R.

"Courts should be careful not to overrule decisions which, not being manifestly erroneous and mischievous, have stood for some time unchallenged, and from their nature and the effect which they may reasonably be supposed to have produced upon the conduct of a large portion of the community, as well as of parliament itself, in matters affecting rights of property, may fairly be treated as having passed into the category of established and recognized law." 15 Ch. D. 336, per Theisger, L. J.

"Where an old case is contrary to the principles of the general law, the court of appeal ought not to shrink from overruling it even after a considerable lapse of time. But when an old decided case has made the law on a particular subject, the court of appeal ought not to interfere with it, because people have considered it as establishing the law and have acted upon it;" 9 Q. B. D. 352, per Jessel, M. R., cited by Lord Esher, M. R., in 23 Q. B. D. 619. See also 12 Q. B. D. 318.

"Where there is a decision which has stood for more than two hundred years in respect of a subject-matter constantly arising in practice, the court does not overrule it unless absolutely obliged to do so. . . . Even if the court did not agree with the decision, it would not overrule it." [1895] 2 Q. B. 665. Where a dictum of law has been accepted, and is likely to have affected divers contracts and dealings between man and man, and if not followed, many transactions done on the faith of it would be disturbed, the court will follow the dictum; 26 Ch. D. 821. But where a decision had not stood wholly unquestioned the court need not feel bound to follow it merely because it has stood for twelve years without being authoritatively overruled; 27 Ch. D. 154.

"Where the decision is really one as to the jurisdiction of another court there is no reason why, at any distance of time, a superior court may not overrule it." 13 Q. B. D. 591, per Brett, M. R.

"Speaking for myself, I do not pay much attention to the dicta of modern judges, as I consider it my duty to decide for myself. This, of course, does not apply to decisions of modern judges, nor to old recognized dicta by eminent judges." 23 Ch. D. 49, per Jessel, M. R. See, also, 23 Ch. D. 127; [1891] 3 Ch. 376.

Decisions on the constructions of instruments, if the words are identical, are not strictly binding, much less so if the words are only similar; L. R. 10 Ch. 397; 23 Ch. D. 488; and this is true even of the decisions of the appeal court; 23 Ch. D. 111.

In 25 Q. B. D. 57, Lord Esher drew a distinction between "fundamental propositions of law," which could be changed only by parliament, and "the evidence of the existence of such a proposition," which was within the disposition of the court.

There is no common law or statutory rule to oblige a court to bow to its own decision; it does so again on the grounds of judicial comity. But when a court is equally divided, this comity does not exist, for there is no authority of the court as such, and those who follow must choose one of two adverse decisions. When the court is equally divided, if the case comes before it again, it will exercise an independent opinion and abide by one of the two views. The case may be different as regards the house of lords, for it is the ultimate court of appeal, for if it is otherwise there exists an uncertainty as to the law; 9 P. D. 98.

In 44 L. T. 440, Jessel, M. R., stated that he had frequently differed from the courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction and the same was said by Brett, L. J., in 10 Q. B. D. 328, in reference to a decision in the Exchequer Chamber, where the judges were equally divided, and it was said by Brett, M. R., in 13 Q. B. D. 355, that a court of law is not justified in overruling the decisions of another court of co-ordinate jurisdiction, citing Jessel, M. R., in 13 Ch. D. 180.

"For us to reverse the judgment of a lord chancellor would require a tremendous case—a case of a clear error." 12 Ch. D. 47, per James, L. J. While the decisions of the lord chancellor, at all events sitting alone, are not absolutely binding, yet the greatest weight ought to be given to them, and unless manifestly wrong, they ought not to be overruled; 12 Ch. D. 54, per Theisger, L. J. The old lord chancellors overruled one another, and sometimes they overruled their own decisions without the slightest trouble; 21 Ch. D. 346, Jessel, M. R.

It is said that the house of lords has the same power that every other tribunal has in subsequently applying the law laid down by it to other cases; 5 H. L. Cas. 63. The observations made by the members beyond the ratio decidendi which is propounded and acted upon in giving judgment, although they may be entitled to respect, are only to be followed in so far as they may be considered agreeable to sound reason and to prior authorities. But the house of lords, as a tribunal, is bound by its own precedents which it will not overrule, and the doctrine on which the judgment of the house is founded must be universally taken for law, and can only be altered by act of parliament; 3 H. L. Cas. 391; 8 id. 391; 9 id. 388; L. R. 8 C. P. 313. This doctrine has just been again laid down, after argument, in 78 L. T. Rep. 361. If two cases in the house of lords are not to be reconciled, the more recent ought to prevail; 5 App. Cas. 798; 7 id. 294, 302.

The judicial committee of the privy council is not bound by its own precedents, see 4 Moore, P. C. 63; but where a decision of the privy council has been reported to the queen, and been sanctioned and embodied in an order in council, it becomes the decree or order of the final court of appeal, and every subordinate tribunal to whom the order is addressed should carry it into execution; 6 App. Cas. 483.

The supreme court of the United States has overruled its own precedents in some instances, notably on the question of the extent of admiralty jurisdiction and in the legal tender cases.

It has been said that a judgment made by an equally divided court has no weight as a precedent; 5 Wend. 372; 25 id. 256; and does not even settle the question of law; 5 id. 372; but a judgment affirmed by a divided court in the house of lords is a binding precedent; 9 H. L. Cas. 338. The subject of precedents both in English law and in other systems is treated by Prof. John C. Gray in 9 Harv. L. Rev. 327.

Instances of a lower court disregarding the decision of a higher court will be found in L. R. 2 Eq. 385, where a case formerly decided by Lord Westbury was disregarded because he had decided it in ignorance of a statute, and in L. R. 8 Ch. 420, where the lord chancellor made a ruling as to the abatement of legacies, which was nothing more than a blunder, and was subsequently disregarded by the vice-chancellors. See 9 Harv. Law Rev. 327.

See STARE DECISIS.

Mr. Powell (Appellate Proceedings) develops at some length the thought that two of the most important ideas and principles in judicial proceedings are essentially of modern origin. These are the force and effect of precedent, and the aid afforded by appellate proceedings in the correction of errors and the perfecting of the law. Neither of these ideas were known to the ancients, or recognized in the civil law, and they were almost entirely disregarded in the courts of continental Europe until the present day. We are indebted for their development to England. Both of the subjects—the citation of a former case as evidence of the law, upon the trial of a subsequent case, and the supervision by the superior courts of the correctness of the proceedings and decisions of the inferior courts began to make their appearance about the time of Edward I.

The argument until quite recently so much used by jurists of continental Europe and civilians, is thus summarized and answered: "They say that judicial decisions are either conformable to law or not; if the former, they are mere applications of a pre-existing rule to individual cases falling within it, and do not therefore create new laws; if the latter, they are not binding, but are themselves against law. This is more ingenious than fair or truthful; for such decisions are not made and called into requisition where a pre-existing rule existed, but in those doubtful and evenly balanced questions between two or more opinions, and further light and aid are called for, where all pre-existing rules have failed, satisfactorily, to give that aid. The assumption of the dilemma is contrary to experience and reason; for it is the frequent experience of the jurist to find cases where pre-existing rules entirely fail him; and reason also teaches that it must be so, since it is found that all human productions are imperfect. The using of such former judicial decisions as aids in forming a judgment and decision, is no more than what was done under the civil law, in calling in aid the opinion and writings of distinguished juris consulti. But the usefulness and justice of thus using previous judicial decisions is now generally admitted and followed. The earliest use of judicial proceedings as precedents is said, on the authority of Guterbock on Bracton and his Relation to the Roman Law, to have been by Bracton about the time of Edward I.

The considerations bearing upon the weight of authority given to judicial decisions are said by the author quoted to be:

1. The decisions of the appellate courts are of absolute authority in the subordinate courts, no matter how much the latter may differ in their conclusions "unless in any case it was considered (which is hardly supposable) to be contrary to the constitution or common sense."

2. Decisions of the same court, or co-ordinate ones, are authorities, but subject to be reviewed, dissented from, or overruled with reference to the time when they were made, and the extent to which they have been acted upon.

3. The decision of any court or the opinion of any jurist, is an authority, to be more or less relied upon as it accords with settled principles of law, and as it is justified by reason. The opinions of jurists, though they may be received, are not to be accorded the weight of judicial decisions.

These principles, it is contended, though very important, are only made effective by a judicious system of appellate jurisdiction, sifting out errors and irregularities, and bringing the decisions into harmony with the law and rendering it one consistent whole; Powell, App. Proc. 4.

The real object and function of appellate tribunals is, in this last sentence, very well expressed. It has been the subject of much discussion in connection with regulating the right of appeal by the amount in controversy. Such limitations are sometimes thought to cause inequality in the administration of justice, between, as it is said, the rich and the poor. It may, however, be said that the primary purpose of an appellate tribunal is to settle and unify the law as administered by the various subordinate courts under the general supervisory jurisdiction of the appellate court. In theory, an appeal to a higher court cannot be considered as a right of any litigant; the rights of a litigant are fully protected by giving him a day in court for the trial of his cause in the court below, with the opportunity, by motion for a new trial, to secure the correction of any error of law or manifest injustice in the verdict.

Of the place filled by case law in the jurisprudence of England and America, it has been said: "The resource of English lawyers, when called on to fill the gap which was elsewhere supplied by the Roman law, was custom. Of this custom the judges were themselves, in the last resort, the repository. Thus it comes to pass that English case law does for us what the Roman law does for the rest of western Europe." Markby, Elem. of Law § 90. The difference between the common law of England and the continental law is thus characterized by the same author: "Where the principles of the Roman law are adopted, the advance must always be made on certain lines. An English or American judge can go wherever his good sense leads him. The result has been that whilst the law of continental Europe is formally correct, it is not always easily adapted to the changing wants of those amongst whom it is administered. On the other hand, the English law, whilst it is cumbersome, ill-arranged, and barren of principles, whilst it is obscure and frequently in conflict with itself, is yet a system under which justice can be done; anyhow it stands alone in the history of the world." Id. § 92. Freeman says: "The life and soul of English law has ever been precedent," and to this he ascribes, not only the growth of the common law but that of the unwritten constitution of England. Freeman, Eng. Const. ch. ii. iii.

In a lucid discussion of the value of judicial decisions as an essential part of the English and American systems, Judge Dillon says: "Judicial precedent is not simply part of the law in a general sense... but it is a part of our law in a sense, and with effects, which are distinctively and most strikingly peculiar. The doctrine as established, is shortly this: that a decision by a court of competent jurisdiction of a point of law lying squarely in the pathway of judicial judgment that the case could not be adjudged without deciding it, is not only binding upon the parties to the cause in judgment, but the point, so decided, becomes, until it is reversed or overruled, evidence of what the law is in like cases, which the courts are bound to follow, not only in cases precisely like the one which was first determined, but also in those which, however different in their origin or special circumstances, stand, or are considered to stand, upon the same principles." Laws and Jurispr. 231. Passing over the question whether a judicial decision is law or only evidence of it, the same writer notes the difference between the authoritative effect of a judicial decision in our system, and the entire want of it in continental Europe, the result being that under the former system "a point solemnly decided has the force and effect of law, binding the judges in all other cases that clearly fall within its principle, which the judges are therefore bound to follow and apply, unless, to use Blackstone's well-known and much criticised qualification, the precedent is 'flatly absurd or unjust;'" Id.

Allusion is very properly made to a point of great importance in estimating the value of judicial decisions, which is frequently overlooked, that is, the contribution made by the arguments of counsel. The writer quoted says: "Indirectly, the reports embody also the results of the researches, studies, experience, and ability of the bar during the same period, since of these the judges have had the advantage in the argument of the causes so decided. Indeed the doctrine of judicial precedent implies that the point of the decision whereof such force is attributed should have been argued by opposing counsel." Id. 233. So important is this consideration that it might almost be suggested as a wise rule to apply to the use of judicial decisions as precedents, that no case should be held to acquire binding force as law unless the point on which it was decided had been argued by counsel.

The fortuitous and irregular growth of case law is the necessary result of the rule of its existence, that no point can become the subject of a judicial decision until it actually arises for judgment. So that it is left, as has been observed, to "the casual exigencies of litigation to determine what parts of it shall be filled up and what left incomplete," with the result that "all kinds of curious little questions receive elaborate answers, while great ones remain in a provoking state of uncertainty." Pollock, Essays on Jurisprudence and Ethics, ch. iii.

Concerning the true office and use of adjudged cases, the views of Mr. Justice Miller are expressed in a letter which is published in a note to lecture IX. of Judge Dillon's work already referred to. After adverting to the difficulty experienced by a judge in the use of judicial decisions, he groups the cases into three classes: 1. Those which must be decided by principles not disputed, in which citations are of little value, because the duty of the judge is confined to the application of principles in a particular case. 2. Those which construe the constitutions and statutes, as to which the decisions of the highest court of the government which adopted them, are generally conclusive. 3. Those depending upon general principles of law or equity which must be determined, if there is a conflict of decision, by the weight of authority, and in which the citation of adjudged cases is most useful.

Allusion is also made to the fact that the opinions of certain judges, even when dissenting or obiter, carry special weight apart from the courts in which they were delivered.

Another very able writer considers that the development of the law, by this system, results, to some extent, in a paradox both in form and substance. "In form its growth is logical. The official theory is that each new decision follows syllogistically from existing precedents," but they "survive in the long run after the use they once served is at an end and the reason for them has been forgotten. The result of following them must often be failure and confusion from a merely logical point of view." On the other hand, he considers that the growth of the law, in substance, is legislation in the sense that "the secret root from which it draws all the juices of life" is really to be found in the consideration of what is "expedient for the community concerned" on "more or less definitely understood views of public policy," not less so because the "unconscious result of instinctive preferences and inarticulate convictions." When the law is administered with ability and experience, even if ancient rules are maintained, they will be fitted with new reasons, so that both form and substance are changed by the transplanting. Holmes, Com. L. 35.

Few modern writers agree with the older theory formulated by Blackstone, that the courts are "not delegated to pronounce a new law, but to maintain and expound the old one;" 1 Bla. Com. 69; but see Lieber, Hermeneutics Ham. ed. 812. The tendency is strongly to accept the view that it is a "childish fiction employed by our judges that judiciary or common law is not made by them, but is a miraculous something made by nobody; existing from eternity and merely declared from time to time by the judges;" 2 Aust. Lect. Jurisp. 655. The same view is elaborated by Sir Henry Maine who makes judicial decision the beginning of all law, and contends that the distinction between case law and code law is only one of form, and that both are, properly speaking, written, not unwritten, law. Anc. Law ch. 1.

"I cannot understand how any person who has considered the subject can suppose that society could possibly have gone on if judges had not legislated, or that there is any danger whatever in allowing them that power which they have in fact exercised to make up for the negligence or incapacity of the avowed legislature. That part of the law of every country which was made by judges has been far better made than that part which consists of statutes enacted by the legislature." 1 Aust. Lect. Jurisp. 224.

It must be accepted as a fact that courts have always exercised the power of making rules for new cases or modifying existing laws in accordance with current ideas of equity or changed conditions, and that they justify themselves under cover of exercising the judicial function of determining whether a binding custom exists or applying general laws to particular cases. Holland, Jur. 56.

But it has also been said that the application of an existing principle to a new state of facts is not judicial legislation. To call it such is to assert that the existing body of law consists practically of the statutes and decided cases and to deny that the principles (of which these cases are ordinarily said to be evidence) existed at all. 4 Harv. L. Rev. 213.

Written forms of procedure which have been sanctioned by the courts or by long professional usage, and are commonly to be followed, are designated precedents. Steph. Pl. 392. And this term, when used as the title of a law-book, usually denotes a collection of such forms.

PRECEDING AND FOLLOWING.

The words "preceding" and "following," when used by way of reference to any section of the Kentucky Statutes, construed to mean the section next preceding or next following that in which such reference is made, unless when some other is expressly designated. Section 462, Kentucky Statutes.

PRECEPARIUM. The continuance of a suit by consent of both parties. Cowell.

PRECES PRIMARIE, OR PRIME. A right of the crown to name to the first prebend that becomes vacant after the accession of the sovereign, in every church of the kingdom. This right was exercised by the crown of England in the reign of Edward I. 2 Steph. Com. 670, n.

PRECEPT (Lat. precipio, to command). A writ directed to the sheriff, or other officer, commanding him to do something.

PRECINCT. The district for which a high or petty constable is appointed in, England, called a precinct. Wilcox, Const. xii. See 124 Mass. 172.

Precinct is used, in certain legislation in Wyoming, relatively to assessing taxes on railroad property, as a general word and not a technical one, and indicates any district marked out and defined. It further signifies a district inferior to a county and superior to a township. 116 U. S. 524.

In Pennsylvania and other states it is used to indicate a subdivision of a city for election purposes.

PRECIPUIT. In French Law. An object which is ascertained by law or the agreement of the parties, and which is first to be taken out of property held in common by one having a right, before a partition takes place.

The precipuit is an advantage or a principal part to which some one is entitled precipuit jure, which is the origin of the word precipuit. Dalloz, Dict.; Pothier, Obl. By precipuit is also understood the right to sue out the precipuit.

PRECISE. When the terms "clear, precise, explicit, unequivocal, and indubitable," are used by the courts to define the requisite proof of a fact, it is meant that the witnesses shall be credible, that the facts are distinctly remembered by them, that details are narrated exactly, and that their statements are true. 89 Pa. 314.

PRECLUDI NON (Lat.). In Pleading. A technical allegation contained in a replication which denies or confesses and avoids the plea.

It is usually in the following form: "And the said A B, as to the plea of the said C D, by him secondly above pleaded, says that he, the said A B, by reason of anything by the said C D in that plea alleged, ought not to be barred from having and maintaining his aforesaid action thereof against the said C D, because he says that," etc. 2 Wils. 42; 1 Chitty, Pl. 573; Steph. Pl. 398.

PRECOGNITION. In Scotch Law. The examination of witnesses who were present at the commission of a criminal act, upon the special circumstances attending it, in order to know whether there is ground for a trial, and to serve for direction to the prosecutor. But the persons examined may insist on having their declaration cancelled before they give testimony at the trial. Erskine, Inst. 4. 4. n. 49.

PRECONTRACT. An engagement entered into by a person which renders him unable to enter into another; as, a promise or covenant of marriage to be had afterwards. When made per verba de presenti, it is in fact a marriage, and in that case the party making it cannot marry another person. Bish. Mar. & D. § 53; 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 280, 1891. See PROMISE OF MARRIAGE.

PREDECESSOR. One who has preceded another.

This term is applied in particular to corporations who are now no longer such, and whose rights have been vested in their successor; the word ancestor is more usually applicable to common persons. The predecessor in a corporation stands in the same relation to the successor that the ancestor does to the heir.

One who has filled an office or station before the present incumbent.

PREDESTINATION. See ABSOLUTE PREDESTINATION.

PREDICATE. To affirm logically.

PREDOMINANT. Something greater or superior in power and influence to others with which it is connected or compared. 22 Pick. 53.

PRE-EMPTION. In International Law. The right of pre-emption is the right of a nation to detain the merchandise of strangers passing through her territories or seas, in order to afford to her subjects the preference of purchase. 1 Chitty, Com. Law 103; 2 Bla. Com. 287.

According to general modern usage the doctrine of pre-emption rests upon the distinction between articles which are contraband (q. v.) universally, and those which are contraband only under the particular circumstances of the case. The carrying of the former class alone is punishable, and entails the penalty of confiscation, either of ship or cargo or both. The latter class are subject to the milder belligerent right of pre-emption, which is regarded as a fair compromise between the right of the belligerent to seize, and the claim of the neutral to export his native commodities, though immediately subservient to the purpose of hostility; 3 Phill. Int. L. 450; 1 C. Rob. 241. The right of pre-emption is said to be rather a waiver of a greater right than a right itself; an indulgence to the neutral rather than a right of the belligerent; Ward, Contraband 196.

This right is sometimes regulated by treaty. In the treaty made between the United States and Great Britain, November 19, 1794, ratified in 1795, it was provided, after mentioning that the usual munitions of war, and also naval materials, should be confiscated as contraband, that, "whereas the difficulty of agreeing on precise cases in which alone provisions and other articles not generally contraband may be regarded as such, renders it expedient to provide against the inconveniences and misunderstandings which might thence arise, it is further agreed that whenever any such articles so being contraband according to the existing laws of nations shall for that reason be seized, the same shall not be confiscated, but the owners thereof shall be speedily and completely indemnified; and the captors, or, in their default, the government under whose authority they act, shall pay to the masters or owners of such vessel the full value of all articles, with a reasonable mercantile profit thereon, together with the freight, and also the damages incident to such detention." According to the practice of the British prize court, a profit of ten per cent. has been usually allowed to the proprietor of the goods seized, for the purposes of pre-emption; 3 Phill. Int. L. 451.

See NEUTRALITY.

PRE-EMPTION RIGHT. The right given to settlers upon the public lands of the United States to purchase them at a limited price in preference to others.

It gave a right to the actual settler who was a citizen of the United States, or who had filed a declaration of intention to become such, and had entered and occupied without title, to obtain a title to a quarter-section at the minimum price fixed by law, upon entry in the proper office and payment, to the exclusion of all other persons. It is an equitable title; 15 Miss. 780; 9 Mo. 683; 15 Pet. 407; and does not become a title at law to the land till entry and payment; 2 Sandf. Ch. 78; 11 Ill. 529; 15 Ill. 131. It may be transferred by deed; 9 Ill. 454; 15 Ill. 131; and descends to the heirs of an intestate; 2 Pet. 201; 12 Ala. N. S. 822.

No person is entitled to more than one pre-emption right to public land; and where a party has filed a declaration, he cannot file another for another tract, or for an addition to the first tract; 139 U. S. 642.

A person cannot acquire by his occupation only of unsurveyed lands of the United States, a right of pre-emption to them under the laws of the United States; 130 U. S. 232. The word heirs as used in R. S. § 269, which provides for the issuance of a patent to the heirs of a deceased pre-emptor, includes illegitimate children, when such can inherit it from their father in the state where he was domiciled and the land located; 162 U. S. 65.

By act of March 3, 1891, the pre-emption laws were repealed, saving the rights of claims already initiated; 1 R. S. Sup. 942; and bona fide pre-emption claimants were permitted to transfer any part of their land for church, cemetery, and school purposes and for the right of way of railroads, canals and irrigation and drainage works.

See LANDS, PUBLIC.

PRE-EXISTING. "Pre-existing" debt includes all debts previously contracted whether they have become payable or not; 136 Mass. 340.

PREFECT. In French Law. A chief officer invested with the superintendence of the administration of the laws in each department. Merlin, Répert.

PREFER. To bring any matter before a court; as,—A. preferred a charge of assault against B.

To apply or move; thus,—"to prefer for costs." Abb. Law Dict.

PREFERENCE. The paying or securing to one or more of his creditors, by an insolvent debtor, the whole or a part of their claim, to the exclusion of the rest. The right which a creditor has acquired over others to be paid first out of the assets of his debtor; as, when a creditor has obtained a judgment against his debtor which binds the latter's land, he has a preference.

A failing creditor, if an individual or partnership, may prefer any one creditor to the exclusion of others; 6 Cow. 285; 12 Pet. 178; 38 Pa. 446; 7 Hun 146; 15 Mo. 378; 48 Ala. 377. See 144 Mass. 192; 49 Ala. 376; 76 Va. 276; 13 R. I. 463.

At common law, unless prohibited by statute, a corporation whether insolvent or not, had a right to pay a creditor, whether a director, officer, stockholder or outsider; 94 N. Y. 169; 2 Moraw. Corp. § 602; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1601; so had an individual a right to prefer any creditor; 94 N. Y. 168. As to preference by failing corporations, there are now two doctrines; one that the assets are a trust fund for the benefit of all creditors pro rata and no preference can be given to any creditor; 45 Fed. Rep. 7; 130 Ill. 162; 64 Wis. 639; 46 Ohio St. 66, 493; 5 L. R. A. 378; 3 N. Y. 479; 39 Mo. App. 131; 96 Ala. 439; 76 Mich. 634. The other that a corporation has the same power in dealing with the assets and preferring creditors as an individual has under similar circumstances; 70 Ia. 697; 16 N. J. Eq. 239; 41 Ill. 635; 45 Fed. Rep. 149; 90 W. Va. 95, 123; 76 Va. 737; 14 Mich. 477; 25 Fed. Rep. 577; 85 Ill. 433; 5 W. & S. 233; 25 Mo. App. 190; 79 Ga. 185; 13 Ark. 583; 46 Am. Dec. 743; 78 Fed. Rep. 71; 150 U. S. 371; 184 Pa. 1; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1601. In the absence of statutory prohibition it has been held a corporation may convey its property to the creditor upon condition that he pay himself and return the surplus: 5 W. S. 223, 247; 6 Conn. 333; Am. Dec. 561.

It has been held that a failing corporation may prefer its own stockholders: 106 Ill. 439; 17 B. Mon. 412; 66 Am. Dec. 165; 20 Vt. 421; but not its own directors: 149 Pa. 148; 39 N. Y. 202; 36 Md. 60; 61 N. H. 611; 93 Ala. 377, 439; 33 Mo. App. 139; 44 Fed. Rep. 231; 45 id. 7; 130 Ill. 162; 64 Wis. 639; 25 Fed. Rep. 577; but see, contra, 70 Ia. 697; 78 id. 660; 78 Va. 737; 1 Spears, Eq. 545; 93 Mo. 79. After suspension and insolvency no preference will be allowed: 43 N. H. 263; 16 R. I. 597; 5 L. R. A. 361. The directors may advance money to a corporation in difficulties and secure themselves by mortgage of its property: 91 U. S. 387; 138 Ill. 655. If the preferred creditor be one of its officers, he must show that the preference was fair and conecionable and not collusive for the mere purpose of preference: 184 Pa. 1. The liquidation in good faith of debts due to directors with the hope of continuing business, is not invalid: 164 Mass. 437; 59 N. Y. 5. Judge Thompson takes very strong ground against the right of a corporation to prefer any creditor, but especially an officer, or stockholder: Thompson, Corp. § 6492; 32 Am. L. Rev. 138. The opposite ground is taken on principle in 2 No. W. L. Rev. by Prof. Harriman. In New York, by statute, a failing corporation cannot transfer any of its property to an officer, director or stockholder. This does not apply to a non-stock, mutual insurance company: 18 N. Y. L. J. 1601.

Preferences in assignment are allowed: Arizona, to creditors who will accept their share and release; Arkansas, generally, but not by corporations; Georgia, by individuals and firms, not by corporations; Massachusetts, if assented to by creditors in excess of the amount assigned and not valid against insolvent assignee; Minnesota and N. Carolina, generally; Virginia, certain preferences allowed, but not by limited partnerships; Montana, good, if absolute; New York, as to one-third of the estate, less claims preferred by law; but none by corporations or limited partnerships; Utah, none, if conditioned on release. In the other states and the territories, preferences appear to be invalid. In some states assignments which attempt to create a preference are void and the assignment is for the equal benefit of all creditors. See 4 Am. Lawy. 344. Preferences are usually invalidated by bankrupt acts.

PREFERENCE SHARES. Shares of a corporation or a joint-stock company entitling their holders to a preferential dividend and sometimes to priority on the division of the assets. See STOCK.

PREFERENTIAL DEBTS. Preferential debts, in bankruptcy, are those prior to all others; as, wages of a clerk, servant, or workman, rates due and taxes. Brett, Comin. 890.

PREFERRED. This word is relative; it refers to something else, and it means that the thing to which it is attached, whatever that may be, has some advantage over another thing of the same character, which, but for this advantage, would be like the others. 16 S. C. 530.

PREFERRED CLAIMS. See MORTGAGE; RECEIVER.

PREFERRED CREDITOR. A creditor whom the debtor has directed shall be paid before other creditors. See PREFERENCE.

PREFERRED DEBTS. See PREFERENTIAL DEBTS.

PREFERRED SHARES. See PREFERENCE SHARES.

PREFERRED STOCK. See STOCK.

PREGNANCY. In Medical Jurisprudence. The condition of a woman who has within her the product of a conception which has occurred within a year. Billings, Nat. Med. Dictionary.

Extra uterine or ectopic pregnancy is the development of the ovum outside of the uterine cavity, as in the Fallopian tubes or ovary. Extra uterine pregnancy commonly terminates by rupture of the sac, profuse internal hemorrhage, and death if not relieved promptly by a surgical operation. Rupture usually takes place between the second and sixth month of pregnancy.

The signs of pregnancy. These acquire a great importance from their connection with the subject of concealed, and also of pretended, pregnancy. The first may occur in order to avoid disgrace, and to accomplish in a secret manner the destruction of offspring. The second may be attempted to gratify the wishes of a husband or relations, to deprive the legal successor of his just claims, to gratify avarice by extorting money, and to avoid or delay execution.

These signs and indications are both subjective and objective. The chief subjective signs are: (1) cessation of menstruation, which rarely may not occur, and on the other hand may occur in other conditions; (2) nausea and vomiting which usually develop about the 6th week; (3) nervous disorders, including changes in disposition; (4) pain or discomfort in the breasts; (5) quickening or sensations due to the movements of the fetus within the uterus. These sensations are first noticed about the end of the fourth month. The movements begin much earlier but are not felt until the uterus has developed sufficiently to come in contact with the abdominal walls.

The chief objective symptoms are: (1) changes in the facial expression with dark rings about the eyes and often spots of pigmentation resembling large freckles; (2) enlargement of the breast, the nipple becoming prominent, and in brunettes surrounded by an aureola of pigmentation; (3) enlargement of the abdomen, usually not evident before the third or fourth month. The prominence is pear-shaped with the small end downward; (4) foetal movements which can be felt through the abdominal walls as early as the end of the fifth month; (5) the uterine souffle or sound heard with the ear upon the abdomen and caused by the blood current in the dilated uterine arteries. This sound may be heard as early as the end of the fourth month; (6) the most important of all the signs consists of the sounds of the foetal heart. These sounds can be heard about the beginning of the fifth month, and are of course a positive sign of pregnancy. The sounds have been aptly compared to the ticking of a watch heard through a pillow; (7) softening of the cervix or neck of the uterus; (8) Ballotement, the impulse or wave excited by suddenly lifting the uterus with a hand in the vagina, the other hand being placed firmly upon the abdomen.

The duration of pregnancy is normally about nine calendar or ten lunar months, or about 273 days from the cessation of the last menstrual period. The possibility of prolonged pregnancy has long been a fruitful subject of discussion but "by a study of the analogy of other functions of the body, by observations in the lower animals, and by accurate reliable data, from women in particular, we are forced to the conclusion that pregnancy may be and often is prolonged. . . . Gestation may be lengthened, parturition may be delayed from a few days to several months." American Text-Book of Obstetrics, Saunders, 1896.

The laws relating to pregnancy concern the circumstances under and the manner in which the fact is ascertained. There are two cases where the fact whether a woman is or has been pregnant is important to ascertain. The one is when it is supposed she pretends pregnancy, and the other when she is charged with concealing it.

Pretended pregnancy may arise from two causes: the one when a widow feigns herself with child in order to produce a supposititious heir to the estate. The presumptive heir may in such case have a writ de ventre inspiciendo, by which the sheriff is commanded to have such made, and the fact determined whether pregnancy exists or not, by twelve matrons, in the presence of twelve knights. If the result determine the fact of pregnancy, then she is to be kept under proper guard until she is delivered. If the pregnancy be negatived, the presumptive heir is admitted to the inheritance; 1 Bla. Com. 456; Cro. Eliz. 566; 4 Bro. C. C. 90; 2 P. Wms. 591; Cox, C. C. 297. A practice quite similar prevailed in the civil law.

The second cause of pretended pregnancy occurs when a woman is under sentence of death for the commission of a crime. At common law, in case this plea be made before execution, the court must direct a jury of twelve matrons, or discreet women, to ascertain the fact, and if they bring in their verdict quick with child (for barely with child, unless it be alive in the womb, is not sufficient), execution shall be stayed, generally till the next session of the court, and so from session to session, till either she is delivered or proves by the course of nature not to have been with child at all; 4 Bla. Com. 394; 1 Bay 497.

In Scotland, all that is necessary to be proved, to have execution delayed, is the fact of pregnancy, no difference being made whether she be quick with child or not. This is also the provision of the French penal code upon this subject. In this country, there is little doubt that clear proof that the woman was pregnant, though not quick with child, would at common law be sufficient to obtain a respite of execution until after delivery. The difficulty lies in making the proof sufficiently clear, the signs and indications being all somewhat uncertain, some of them wanting, all liable to variation, and conviction of the fact only fastening upon the mind when a number of them, inexplicable upon any other hypothesis, concur in that one result.

It has been held that pregnancy at the time of marriage by another than the husband is sufficient ground for divorce, provided the pregnancy was unknown to the husband and there was no reasonable ground of suspicion by him; 99 Pa. 196; 79 Mich. 591. This can hardly be laid down as an absolute rule; 1 Bish. Mar. Div. & Sep. § 493. And in a later case it was held that false representations of pregnancy made by a woman to induce a man, with whom she has had illicit intercourse, to marry her are not such fraud as will entitle him to a divorce if he does so, at least if they were not believed by him; 24 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 128. See 20 Ore. 579.

Pregnancy is seldom concealed except for the criminal purpose of destroying the life of the fetus in utero, or of the child immediately upon its birth. Infant life is easily extinguished; while proof of the unnatural crime is hard to be furnished. This has led to the passage of laws, both in England and in this country, calculated to facilitate the proof and also to punish the very act of concealment of pregnancy and death of the child when, if born alive, it would have been illegitimate. In England, the very stringent act of 21 Jac. 1. c. 27, required that any mother of such child who had endeavored to conceal its birth should prove by at least one witness that the child was actually born dead; and for want of such proof it arrived at the forced conclusion that the mother had murdered it. This cruel law was essentially modified in 1803, by the passage of an act declaring that women indicted for the murder of bastard children should be tried by the same rules of evidence and presumption as obtain in other trials of murder.

The early legislation of Pennsylvania was characterized by the same severity. The act of May 31, 1781, made the concealment of the death of a bastard child conclusive evidence to convict the mother of murder. This was repealed by the act of 5th April, 1790, s. 6, which declared that the constrained presumption that the child whose death is concealed was therefore murdered by the mother shall not be sufficient to convict the party indicted, without probable presumptive proof is given that the child was born alive. The law was further modified by the act of 22d April, 1794, s. 18, which declares that the concealment of the death of any such child shall not be conclusive evidence to convict the party indicted for the murder of her child, unless the circumstances attending it be such as shall satisfy the mind of the jury that she did wilfully and maliciously destroy and take away the life of such a child. The act also punishes the concealment of the death of a bastard child by fine and imprisonment. The act of 31 March, 1860, P. & L. Dig. 1118, now governs in Pennsylvania. It makes the concealment of the death of an illegitimate child a substantive offence punishable by fine and imprisonment, and leaves the question of the murder of the child by its mother, subject to the mode of trial and punishment as ordinary cases of murder. Counts for murder and concealing the death of the child may, however, be united in the same indictment. The states of New York, Massachusetts, Vermont, Connecticut, New Jersey, New Hampshire, Georgia, Illinois, and Michigan, all have enactments on this subject,—the punishment prescribed being, generally, fine and imprisonment. For duration of pregnancy, see GESTATION.

See PHYSICAL EXAMINATION; JURY OF WOMEN; EN VENTRE SA MERE; ILLNESS.

PREGNANT. See AFFIRMATIVE PREGNANT; NEGATIVE PREGNANT.

PREJUDICE (Lat. præ, before, judicare, to judge).

A forejudgement. A leaning toward one side of a cause for some reason other than its justice. See 12 Ga. 448.

PRELATE. The name of an ecclesiastical officer. There are two orders of prelates: the first is composed of bishops, and the second, of abbots, generals of orders, deans, etc.

PRELEVEMENT. In French Law. The portion which a partner is entitled to take out of the assets of a firm before any division shall be made of the remainder of the assets between the partners.

The partner who is entitled to a prélèvement is not a creditor of the partnership; on the contrary, he is a part-owner; for if the assets should be deficient, a creditor has the preference over the partner; on the other hand, should the assets yield any profit, the partner is entitled to his portion of it, whereas the creditor is entitled to no part of it, but he has a right to charge interest when he is in other respects entitled to it.

PRELIMINARY. Something which precedes: as, preliminaries of peace, which are the first sketch of a treaty, and contain the principal articles on which both parties are desirous of concluding, and which are to serve as the basis of the treaty.

PRELIMINARY ACT. In English Law. A document stating the time and place of a collision between vessels, the names of the vessels, and other particulars required to be filed by each solicitor in actions for damage by such collisions. Whart. Law. Dict.

PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION. The hearing given to a person accused of crime, by a magistrate or judge, exercising the functions of a committing magistrate, to ascertain whether there is evidence to warrant and require the commitment and holding to bail of the person accused. See Bish. New Cr. L. § 32, 225-230 n.

Coroners generally have the powers of a committing magistrate as also have the mayors of cities in many of the states; id. 229 b.

In case, as it often happens, there is question as to what precise crime should be charged against the prisoner or whether more than one crime is involved in the facts shown, the commitment should be so framed as to cover them all, leaving to the prosecuting officer and the grand jury the opportunity for election; but if the commitment does not cover all charges it does not discharge the prisoner from liability for the rest; id. § 33. The discharge of a prisoner on a preliminary examination will not operate as a bar to further proceedings; 47 N. J. L. 251; 16 Tex. App. 321; 10 Neb. 78.

It is said that a person charged with crime, unless a fugitive from justice, is entitled to a preliminary examination; 44 Neb. 417; but it was also held that such examination is not necessary as a basis for finding an indictment; 3 Pac. Rep. (Ida.) 272; and that in proper cases the court may direct the prosecuting attorney to submit indictments without such examination; 2 Dist. Rep. Pa. 743. A complaint made on such examination may be dismissed and a new charge prosecuted before another magistrate; 7 Wash. 506; but after holding the accused to bail the magistrate cannot discharge him without notice to the prosecutor; 160 Pa. 119. The denial of the right to be taken before a magistrate of the county in which one is arrested, to give bail does not vitiate a subsequent trial and conviction; 79 Hun 410.

Where the evidence seems to warrant the commitment of the accused person, or time is required for the introduction of other evidence or for further investigation, the person may be committed or held to bail for further hearing. The examination may be postponed on account of the physical inability to attend of important witnesses for the state; 47 La. Ann. 1677.

Generally the offence charged is stated in the complaint and warrant and a preliminary examination is waived; and a plea that there was no such examination will not be entertained after information filed; 54 Kan. 206. An objection that there was no preliminary examination must be raised before trial by plea in abatement or motion to quash; 44 Neb. 417.

A person arrested and taken before a magistrate for preliminary examination may waive it even where the state constitution secures the right to such examination; 115 Cal. 57; 47 Pac. Rep. (Idaho) 945. See, also, 46 Neb. 631. See, also, as to waiver of such examinations, 83 Wis. 486; 103 Mich. 473; 25 Fla. 675; 45 Hun 34.

It is the duty of the committing magistrate to secure the attendance of witnesses for the prosecution who are examined by him, for which purpose he may require them to give bail for their appearance before the grand jury or in the criminal court, with or without surety which is usually in his discretion; 1 Bish. N. Cr. L. 34. Where the preliminary examination is provided for by law, the testimony of the witnesses taken thereat may be afterwards shown in contradiction; 85 Cal. 421; 17 Vt. 658; 34 La. Ann. 1037; 40 Ark. 454; see 2 Swan 237; 32 Ia. 36. And the witnesses are liable to the penalties of perjury for false swearing if so authorized, otherwise not; 40 La. Ann. 460; 26 Me. 69; 2 McClain, Cr. Law § 858.

The filing of an information after the preliminary examination, but before a return of it made by the examining magistrate, is a mere irregularity and does not vitiate the proceedings; 115 Cal. 57. In Colorado, by statute, an information may be filed without a preliminary examination, upon the affidavit of any person who has knowledge of the commission of the offence and is a competent witness; 23 Col. 1, 9.

Where a complaint charged perjury on a certain date, and examination was waived, and the information subsequently filed charged the commission of the crime on another date, a plea in abatement on the ground that there was no examination on the offence charged in the information, was sustained; 91 Wis. 245.

A statutory requirement that the magistrate shall, on preliminary examination, examine the witnesses to support the accusation, does not require that all of the witnesses known to the state shall be examined, but merely sufficient to justify the magistrate in binding over the accused for trial; 65 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 848.

United States commissioners holding preliminary examinations have no judicial power, but only authority to determine whether there is probable cause to believe that the offence was committed; 70 Fed. Rep. 972; and a district judge holding a preliminary examination has only, quoad hoc, the powers of a commissioner; id.

Where an examining magistrate certified that he found probable cause to believe that an offence had been committed and had taken bail, it was sufficient to sustain an information without a positive certificate by the magistrate that an offence had been committed; 102 Mich. 519.

In England, when an accused person has been arrested, either without warrant or by a justice's warrant, if he is charged with an offence for which he may be tried before a jury, the justice holds a preliminary inquiry to decide whether he ought or ought not to be sent for trial. The admission of the public during these inquiries is a matter of discretion with the justice. The witnesses for the prosecution are examined under oath and may be cross-examined by the defendant or his counsel or solicitor. The evidence is taken down in writing and after the prosecution is closed, it is read in the hearing of the defendant and he is asked whether he has anything to say in answer to the charge, being first told that he is not required to speak but that whatever he does say will be taken down in writing and may be given in evidence against him on the trial. The defendant is then allowed to call witnesses to prove his innocence. He may examine these himself or by his counsel or solicitor, and they may be cross-examined by the prosecutor. The defendant may not be questioned nor may he give evidence on his own behalf, except in certain special cases. If he chooses to give evidence on oath he is liable to be cross-examined by the prosecutor.

If a prima facie case is not made out the defendant is discharged. If the justices are of opinion that a case has been made out they send him to trial. Hearings may be adjourned upon reasonable grounds to a stated time and place, in which case the accused is either removed under custody or discharged on his own recognizance, with or without sureties, to appear at the adjourned hearing. The limit of time must not exceed eight days. If the accused be held for trial, the prosecutor and the witnesses are bound by recognizance to appear and give evidence at the trial. The accused will not be released on bail when the charge is treason. In cases of felony and a large number of misdemeanors, the justice has a discretion in the matter. In case of misdemeanors not specially provided for, they have no power to refuse bail. Haycraft, Exec. Pow. in Rel. to Crime.

PRELIMINARY PROOF. In Insurance. Marine policies in the United States generally have a provision that a loss shall be payable in a certain time, usually sixty days, "after proof," meaning "preliminary proof," which is not particularly specified. Fire policies usually specify the preliminary proof. Life policies, like marine, usually make the loss payable sixty or ninety days after notice and proof; 81 Me. 325; 6 Gray 896; 6 Harr. & J. 408; 3 Gill 276; 2 Wash. Va. 61; 23 Wend. 43; 1 La. 216; 11 Miss. 278; Stew. Low. C. 854; 14 Mo. 220; 10 Pet. 507; 6 Ill. 484; 5 Sneed 139; 2 Ohio 452; 6 Ind. 137; 80 Vt. 659; Beach, Ins. 1216. See PROOFS OF LOSS.

PREMEDITATEDLY. Thought of beforehand, for any length of time, however short. 106 Mo. 108. "Deliberately" logically contains in it all that is meant by "premeditatedly," and more. But "premeditatedly" is also contained in the phrase "malice aforethought." 108 Mo. 303; 118 id. 96.

PREMEDITATION. A design formed to commit a crime or to do some other thing before it is done. 8 Wash. St. 99.

Intent before the act, but not necessarily existing any extended time before. 28 Fla. 318.

Premeditation differs essentially from will, which constitutes the crime; because it supposes, besides an actual will, a deliberation, and a continued persistence which indicate more perversity. The preparation of arms or other instruments required for the execution of the crime are indications of premeditation, but are not absolute proof of it; as these preparations may have been intended for other purposes, and then suddenly changed to the performance of the criminal act. Murder by poisoning must of necessity be done with premeditation. See MALICE.

PREMIER. The principal minister of state; the prime minister. See CABINET.

PREMISES (Lat. præ, before, mittere, to put, to send).

That which is put before. The introduction. Statements previously made. See 1 East 456.

In Conveyancing. That part of a deed which precedes the habendum, in which are set forth the names of the parties with their titles and additions, and in which are recited such deeds, agreements, or matters of fact as are necessary to explain the reasons upon which the contract then entered into is founded; and it is here, also, the consideration on which it is made is set down and the certainty of the thing granted. 2 Bla. Com. 298; 8 Mass. 174; 6 Conn. 289; 13 N. J. Eq. 331; 15 id. 418.

In Equity Pleading. The stating part of a bill. It contains a narrative of the facts and circumstances of the plaintiff's case, and the wrongs of which he complains, and the names of the persons by whom done and against whom he seeks redress. Cooper, Eq. Pl. 9; Bart. Suit in Eq. 28; Mitf. Eq. Pl. 43; Story, Eq. Pl. § 27.

Every material fact to which the plaintiff intends to offer evidence must be stated in the premises; otherwise, he will not be permitted to offer or require evidence of such fact; 1 Bro. C. C. 94; 3 P. Wms. 276; 11 Ves. 240; 2 Hare 264; 6 Johns. 565; 9 Ga. 148.

In Estates. Lands and tenements. 1 East 453; 3 Maule & S. 169; 21 Ohio St. 188.

PREMIUM. In Insurance. The consideration for a contract of insurance.

A policy of insurance always expresses the consideration called the premium, which is a certain amount or a certain rate upon the value at risk, paid wholly in cash, or partly so and partly by promissory note or otherwise. 2 Pars. Marit. Law 182. By the charters of mutual fire insurance companies, the insured building is usually subject to a lien for the premium; 19 Miss. 53; 21 How. 35. The premium may be payable by service rendered; 5 Ind. 96.

In life insurance, the premium is usually payable periodically; 18 Barb. 541; and the continuance of the risk is usually made to depend upon the due payment of a periodical premium; 2 Dutch. 288. But if the practice of the company and its course of dealings with the insured, and others known to him, have been such as to induce a belief that so much of the contract as provides for a forfeiture upon non-payment at a fixed time will not be insisted on, the company will not be allowed to set up such a forfeiture, as against one in whom their conduct has induced such belief; May, Ins. § 361; 95 U. S. 380; 85 Ala. 848. The acceptance by a manager and agent of a life insurance company of a promissory note from the insured for the amount of the advance premium, and a delivery of the policy upon receipt of the note, constitute a waiver of the cash premium provided for in the application and policy which binds the company, although the policy also provides that the first premium shall be paid at the home office of the company on the delivery of the policy, and that no agent has power in any way to waive the terms of the contract; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1785. An action lies to recover a premium paid on a policy of life insurance where the company, upon the discovery of certain false statements inserted therein by the company's agents, cancelled the policy, but the cost of the insurance enjoyed by the insured during the life of the policy must first be deducted; 38 Atl. Rep. (N. H.) 500. But this is doubted in 46 Am. L. Reg. 40, because the insured should be entitled to recover the entire premium, he never having had any insurance under the void policy. See 117 U. S. 519. So far as the agreed risk is not run in amount or time under a marine policy, the whole or a proportional stipulated or customary part of the premium is either not payable, or, if paid, is to be returned unless otherwise agreed; 2 Pars. Marit. Law 185; 16 Barb. 280; 7 Gray 248. Where an insurance company authorizes the insured to send a premium by mail, such premium is paid when the letter containing it is deposited in the post office addressed to the company; 77 Hun 556. See INSURANCE, Endowment Insurance.

PREMIUM NOTE. In Insurance. A note given in place of payment of the whole or a part of the premium.

The premium, or a part of it, is not unfrequently paid wholly or in part by a promissory note, with a stipulation in the policy that the unpaid amount shall be set off and deducted in settling for a loss; 1 Phill. Ins. § 51. It is also usually collaterally secured by a stipulation in the policy for the forfeiture of the policy by non-payment of the premium note, or any amount due thereon by assessment or otherwise; 12 N. Y. 477; 2 Ind. 65; 3 Gray 215; 19 Miss. 135; 35 N. H. 328; 29 Vt. 23; 32 Pa. 75; 34 Me. 431; Beach, Ins. 520.

PREMIUM PUDICITE (Lat. the price of chastity.) The consideration of a contract by which a man promises to pay to a woman with whom he has illicit intercourse a certain sum of money.

When the contract is made as the payment of past cohabitation, as between the parties, it is good, and will be enforced, if under seal, but such consideration will not support a parol promise; 3 Q. B. 483; Poll. Contr. 288; 1 Story, Contr. § 670. It cannot be paid on a deficiency of assets, until all creditors are paid, though it has a preference over the heir, next of kin, or devisee. If the contract be for future cohabitation, it is void; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 13th ed. § 296; 5 Ves. 286; 3 E. & B. 642; 2 P. Wms. 432; 1 W. Bal. 517; 1 Ball & B. 360; Roberts, Fraud, Conv. 428; Cas. Talb. 153, and the cases there cited; 6 Ohio 21; 5 Cow. 253; Harp. 201; 3 T. B. Monr. 35; 11 Mass. 368; 2 N. & M'C. 251. See CONSIDERATION.

PRENDER, PRENDRE (L. Fr.). To take. This word is used to signify the right of taking a thing before it is offered; hence the phrase of law, it lies in render, but not in prender. See A PRENDRE; PROFITS A PRENDRE; Gale & W. Easem; Washb. Easem.

PRENOMEN (Lat.). The first or Christian name of a person. Benjamin is the prenomem of Benjamin Franklin. See Cas. Hardw. 288; 1 Tayl. 148.

PREPENSE. Aforethought. See 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 1784.

PREPONDERANCE. See FAIR PREPONDERANCE.

PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE. Greater weight of evidence, or evidence which is more credible and convincing to the mind. 80 Wis. 193. See 37 Ark. 588.

PREROGATIVE. In Civil Law. The privilege, pre-eminence, or advantage which one person has over another: thus, a person vested with an office is entitled to all the rights, privileges, prerogatives, etc., which belong to it.

In English Law. The royal prerogative is an arbitrary power vested in the executive to do good and not evil. Rutherford, Inst. 379; Co. Litt. 90; Chitty, Prerog. Bac. Abr. The word simply means a power or will which is discretionary, and above and uncontrolled by any other will. It is frequently used to express the uncontrolled will of a sovereign power in the state and is applied not only to the king but also to the legislative and judicial branches of the government.

It is sometimes applied by law writers to the thing over which the power or will is exercised, as fiscal prerogatives, meaning king's revenues; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 147.

PREROGATIVE COURT. In English Law. An ecclesiastical court held in each of the two provinces of York and Canterbury before a judge appointed by the archbishop of the province.

Formerly in this court testaments were proved, and administrations granted where a decedent left chattels to the value of five pounds (bona notabilia) in two distinct dioceses or jurisdictions within the province, and all causes relating to the wills, administrations, or legacies of such persons were originally cognizable. This jurisdiction was transferred to the court of probate by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, § 4, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 95, and now, by the Judicature Acts, it is included in the supreme court of judicature.

An appeal lay formerly from this court to the king in chancery, by stat. 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, afterwards to the privy council, by stat. 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 92; 2 Steph. Com. 11th ed. 206; 3 Bla. Com. 65.

In American Law. A court having a jurisdiction of probate matters, in the state of New Jersey.

PREROGATIVE WRITS. Processes issued by an exercise of the extraordinary power of the crown on proper cause shown. They are the writs of procedendo, mandamus, prohibition, quo warranto, habeas corpus; 3 Stephens, Com. 11th ed. 626. They differ from other writs in that they are never issued except in the exercise of the judicial discretion, and are directed generally not to the sheriff, but to the parties sought to be affected themselves; 3 Bla. Com. 132.

PRESBYTERY. See JUDICATORIES.

PRESCRIBABLE. To which a right may be acquired by prescription.

PRESCRIBE. To claim, or allege a title to a thing, on the ground of long or immemorial usage.

PRESCRIPTION. A mode of acquiring title to incorporate hereditaments by immemorial or long-continued enjoyment.

A prescribing for title; the claim of title to a thing by virtue of immemorial use and enjoyment; the right or title acquired by possession had during the time and in the manner fixed by law; a mode of acquiring real property, when a man can show no other title to what he claimed than that he and those under whom he claimed had immemorially used to enjoy it; 26 W. Va. 427.

The distinction between a prescription and a custom is that a custom is a local usage and not annexed to a person; a prescription is a personal usage confined to the claimant and his ancestors or grantors. The theory of prescription was that the right claimed must have been enjoyed beyond the period of the memory of man, which for a long time, in England, went back to the time of Richard I. To avoid the necessity of proof of such long duration, a custom arose of allowing a presumption of a grant on proof of usage for a long term of years.

The length of time necessary to raise a strict prescription was limited by statute 82 Hen. VIII. at sixty years; 8 Pick. 308; 7 Wheat. 59; 4 Mas. 402; 2 Greenl. Ev. § 539. See 29 Vt. 43; 24 Ala. N. S. 130; 29 Pa. 22; 4 Del. Ch. 648.

Grants of incorporeal hereditaments are presumed upon proof of enjoyment of the requisite character for a period of years equal to that fixed by statute as the period of limitation in respect of real actions; 8 Kent 442; 12 Wend. 830; 27 Vt. 285; 2 Bail. 101; 4 Md. Ch. Dec. 396; 18 N. H. 360; 4 Day 244; 10 S. & R. 63; 9 Pick. 251. See 3 Me. 120; 1 B. & P. 400; 5 B. & Ald. 232; 7 Mackey 1; 84 Ky. 420; 82 Ga. 770; 66 Hun 638; but a grant cannot be presumed where it would have been unlawful; 112 N. Y. 142.

Prescription properly applies only to incorporeal hereditaments; 3 Barb. 105; Finch, Law 132; such as easements of water, light and air, way, etc.; 4 Mas. 897; 20 Pa. 331; 1 Gale & D. 203, 210. n.; Tudor, Lead. Cas. 114; see 140 Ill. 581; 4 Mus. Rep. 48; 44 La. Ann. 492; 156 Mass. 89; a class of franchises; Co. Litt. 114; 10 Mass. 70; 10 S. & R. Pa. 401. See FERRY; Herbert. Prescription.

A person cannot acquire a prescriptive right of way over his own lands, or the lands of another which he occupies as tenant; 116 Mo. 379. The fact that certain persons have a right of way by grant does not prevent other persons from acquiring a prescriptive right to use the way; 156 Mass. 449.

It has been held that corporations may exist by prescription; 2 Kent *277; 12 Mass. 400. It is necessary in such case to presuppose a grant by charter or act of parliament, which has been lost; 35 Barb. 319.

In Louisiana, a manner of acquiring property or discharging debts by the effect of time. Rev. Code of La. Art. 2457. See 40 La. Ann. 701.

See as to rights by prescription to use lands of another, 10 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 494.

In France thirty years has been substituted for immemorial prescription, and in Prussia periods of from thirty to fifty years.

In International Law. The doctrine of Immemorial Prescription is indispensable in public law; 1 Phill. Int. L. § 255. The general consent of mankind has established the principle that long and uninterrupted possession by one nation excludes the claim of every other. All nations are bound by this consent, since all are parties to it; none can safely disregard it without impugning its own title to its possessions; 1 Wheat. Int. L. 207. The period of time cannot be fixed in public law as it can in private law; it must depend upon varying and variable circumstances; 1 Phill. Int. L. § 260.

Burke speaks of the "solid rock of prescription—the soundest, the most general, the most recognized title between man and man that is known in municipal, as in public jurisprudence." Vol. ix. p. 449.

Time of. A length or period of time sufficient to establish the right of prescription, or title by prescription See TERRITORIAL PROPERTY.

PRESENCE. The being in a particular place.

In many contracts and judicial proceedings it is necessary that the parties should be present in order to render them valid; for example, a party to a deed, when it is executed by himself, must personally acknowledge it, when such acknowledgment is required by law, to give it its full force and effect, and his presence is indispensable, unless, indeed, another person represent him as his attorney, having authority from him for that purpose.

Actual presence is being bodily in the precise spot indicated.

Constructive presence is being so near to or in such relation with the parties actually in a designated place as to be considered in law as being in the place.

Attempting to deter a witness from testifying, while he is in the witness-room or hallway of the court-room, by offering him money, is a misdemeanor in the presence of the court, and punishable without indictment, as contempt; 181 U. S. 367.

It is a rule in the civil law that he who is incapable of giving his consent to an act is not to be considered present although he be actually in the place. A lunatic, or a man sleeping, would not, therefore, be considered present; Dig. 41. 2. 1. 3. And so if insensible; 4 Bro. P. C. 71; 3 Russ. 441; or if the act were done secretly so that he knew nothing of it; 1 P. Wms. 740.

The English statute of frauds, § 5, directs that all devises and bequests of any lands or tenements shall be attested or subscribed in the presence of the devisor. Under this statute it has been decided that an actual presence is not indispensable, but that where there was a constructive presence it was sufficient; as, where the testatrix executed the will in her carriage standing in the street before the office of her solicitor, the witness retiring into the office to attest it, and it being proved that the carriage was accidentally put back, so that she was in a situation to see the witness sign the will, through the window of the office; Bro. C. C. 98. See 2 Curt. Eccl. 320, 331; 2 Salk. 688; 3 Russ. 441; 1 Maule & S. 294; 2 C. & P. 491; 135 Mass. 241; 81 Va. 410.

In Criminal Law. In trials for cases in which corporal punishment is assigned, the defendant's appearance must ordinarily be in person, and must so appear on record. There can be no judgment of conviction taken by default; 6 Pa. 387; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 540. The prisoner's actual presence is not requisite at the making and arguing of motions of all kinds, though in motions for arrest of judgment and in error, the old practice was to require it; 88 Ill. 284; Bish. New Cr. Pro. 265; 63 Mo. 159. This is not now usually required in proceedings in error; 1 Park. C. C. 360. In felonies presence at the verdict is essential, and this right cannot be waived; 18 Pa. 103; 63 id. 386; but where a prisoner was voluntarily absent during the taking of a portion of the testimony in an adjoining room, he was considered as constructively present; 25 Alb. L. J. 303. See 88 Pa. 189. In trials for misdemeanors these rules do not apply; 9 Dana 304; 7 Cow. 525; Whart. Cr. Pl. & Pr. § 550.

PRESENT. A gift, or more properly, the thing given. It is provided by the constitution of the United States, art. 1. s. 9. n. 7, that "no person holding any office of profit or trust under them [the United States] shall, without the consent of congress, accept of any present, emolument, or office, or title, of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign state."

PRESENT USE. One which has an immediate existence and is at once operated upon by the statute of uses.

PRESENTATION. In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of a patron offering his clerk to the bishop of the diocese to be instituted in a church or benefice.

PRESENTATION OFFICE. The office of the lord chancellor's official, the secretary of presentations.

PRESENTTEE. In Ecclesiastical Law. A clerk who has been presented by his patron to a bishop in order to be instituted in a church.

PRESENTLY. When a person is bound to do or perform a thing for another, "presently," all that can be required is, that the business shall be commenced and prosecuted with such despatch, as diligent persons would make use of, who have fully resolved and determined to do and perform the same thing for themselves, not permitting any other employment to interfere with, or retard the performance. 5 J. & Mar. (Ky.) 299.

PRESENTMENT. In Criminal Practice. The written notice taken by a grand jury of any offence, from their own knowledge or observation, without any bill of indictment laid before them at the suit of the government. 4 Bla. Com. 301.

Upon such presentment, when proper, the officer employed to prosecute afterwards frames a bill of indictment, which is then sent to the grand jury, and they find it to be a true bill. In an extended sense, presentments include not only what are properly so called, but also inquisitions of office and indictments found by a grand jury. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 25, s. 1.

The difference between a presentment and an inquisition is this: that the former is found by a grand jury authorized to inquire of offences generally, whereas the latter is an accusation found by a jury specially returned to inquire concerning the particular offence. 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 25, s. 6. See, generally, Com. Dig. Indictment (B); Bac. Abr. Indictment (A); 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 163; 7 East 887; 1 Meigs 112; 11 Humphr. 12.

The writing which contains the accusation so presented by a grand jury. 1 Brock. 158.

In Contracts. The production of a bill of exchange or promissory note to the party on whom the former is drawn, for his acceptance, or to the person bound to pay either, for payment.

The holder of a bill is bound, in order to hold the parties to it responsible to him, to present it in due time for acceptance, and to give notice, if it be dishonored, to all the parties he intends to hold liable; 2 Pet. 170; 12 Pick. 309; 7 Gray 217; 20 Wend. 321; 12 Vt. 401; 13 La. 357; 7 B. Monr. 17; 8 Mo. 268; 7 Blackf. 367; 1 M'Cord 322; 7 Leigh 179. See 20 D. C. 26; 1 App. D. C. 171. And when a bill or note becomes payable, it must be presented for payment.

In general, the presentment for payment should be made to the maker of a note, or the drawee of a bill, for acceptance, or to the acceptor for payment; 2 Esp. 509; but a presentment made at a particular place, when payable there, is, in general, sufficient; 8 N. Y. 266. A personal demand on the drawee or acceptor is not necessary; a demand at his usual place of residence; 1 M. & G. 83; 3 B. Monr. 461; 17 Ohio 78; of his wife, or other agent, is sufficient; Byles, Bills 283; 17 Ala. N. S. 42; 1 Const. 367; 2 Esp. 509; Holt 313; or place of business, of the acceptor; 3 Kent 64, 65; 4 Mo. 52; 11 Gratt. 260; 2 Camp. 596. See 158 Mass. 90. When, on presentment of a bill of exchange at the acceptor's usual place of business, within proper hours, a notary finds the doors closed, he is justified, nothing further appearing, in protesting the bill for non-payment, without inquiry for the acceptor at his residence, and without making further effort to find him; 86 Tenn. 201. The term residence is not used in a strict sense, so necessarily implying a permanent, exclusive, or actual abode in a place, but it may be satisfied by a temporary, partial, or even constructive residence; 148 Mass. 181. See RESIDENCE.

The presentment for acceptance must be made in reasonable time; and what this reasonable time is depends upon the circumstances of each case; 9 Moore, P. C. 66; 2 H. Bla. 665; 4 Mass. 336; 1 M'Cord 322; 7 Gray 217; 7 Cow. 205; 9 Mart. La. 336; 7 Blackf. 367. See 65 Miss. 242. The presentment of a note or bill for payment ought to be made on the day it becomes due; 4 Term 148; 8 Mass. 453; 3 N. H. 14; 13 La. 386; 28 Conn. 218; 20 Me. 109; 7 Gill & J. 73; 8 Ia. 894; 10 Ohio 486; and notice of non-payment given, otherwise the holder will lose the security of the drawer and indorsers of a bill and indorsers of a promissory note; 1 Wheat. 171; 1 Harr. Del. 10; 5 Leigh. 523; 5 Blackf. 215; 2 Jones, N. C. 23; 13 Pick. 465; 19 Johns. 391; 8 Vt. 191; 1 Ala. N. S. 875; 8 Mo. 836; and if the money be lodged there for its payment, the holder would probably have no recourse against the maker or acceptor if he did not present them on the day and the money should be lost; 5 B. & Ald. 244; 27 Me. 149. The facts being undisputed, the question of reasonable time for presentment of a draft is one of law; 51 Mo. App. 245.

The excuses for not making a presentment are general, and applicable to all persons who are indorsers; or they are special, and applicable to the particular indorser only.

Among the former are—inevitable acci*dent or overwhelming calamity*; Story, Bills § 308; 8 Wend. 483; 9 Ind. 324. The prevalence of a malignant disease, by which the ordinary operations of business are suspended; 3 Johns. Cas. 1; 8 Maule & S. 267. The breaking out of war between the country of the maker and that of the holder; 1 Paine 156. The occupation of the country where the note is payable, or where the parties live, by a public enemy, which suspends commercial operations and intercourse; 8 Cra. 153; 15 Johns. 57; 7 Pet. 336; 2 Brock 20. The obstruction of the ordinary negotiations of trade by a major. Positive interdictions and public regulations of the state which suspend commerce and intercourse. The utter impracticability of finding the maker or ascertaining his place of residence; Story, Pr. Notes §§ 205, 236, 238, 241, 264; 4 S. & R. 490; 14 La. An. 484; 3 M'Cord 494; 1 Dev. 247; 2 Cal. 121.

Among the latter, or special excuses for not making a presentment, may be enumerated the following. The receiving the note by the holder from the payee, or other antecedent party, too late to make a due presentment; this will be an excuse as to such party; 16 East 248; 7 Mass. 463; Story, Pr. Notes §§ 201, 263; 11 Wheat. 431; Byles, Bills 206. The note being an accommodation note of the maker for the benefit of the indorser; Story, Bills § 370. See 2 Brock. 20; 7 Harr. & J. 381; 7 Mass. 452; 1 Wash. C. C. 461; 1 Haw. 271; 4 Mas. 413; 1 Cal. 157; 1 Stew. Ala. 175. A special agreement by which the indorser waives the presentment; 8 Me. 218; 11 Wheat. 629; Story, Bills § 371. The receiving security or money by an endorser to secure himself from loss, or to pay the note at maturity. In this case, when the indemnity or money is a full security for the amount of the note or bill, no presentment is requisite; Story, Bills § 374; Story, Pr. Notes § 281; 4 Watts 828; 9 Gill & J. 47; 7 Wend. 165; 2 Me. 207; 5 Mass. 170; 5 Conn. 175. The receiving the note by the holder from the indorser as a collateral security for another debt; Story, Pr. Notes § 284; Story, Bills § 372; 2 How. 427, 457.

Where a negotiable note is by its terms payable at a particular bank, proof of presentment at that bank for payment, at its maturity, is indispensable to a recovery in an action thereon against an endorser; 29 W. Va. 528.

A want of presentment may be waived by the party to be affected, after full knowledge of the fact; 8 S. & R. 438. See 6 Wend. 658; 3 Bibb 102; 5 Johns. 383; 4 Mass. 847; 8 Cush. 157; Bac. Abr. Merchant, etc. (M); 47 Mo. App. 151; 114 Mo. 276. See, generally, 1 Hare & W. Sel. Dec. 214, 224; Story, Pr. Notes; Byles, Bills; Parsons, Bills; Dan. Neg. Instr.; 13 L. R. A. 727.

PRESENTS. This word signifies the writing then actually made and spoken of: as, these presents; know all men by these presents; to all to whom these presents shall come.

PRESERVATION. Keeping safe from harm; avoiding injury. This term always presupposes a real or existing danger.

A jettison, which is always for the preservation of the remainder of the cargo, must therefore be made only when there is a real danger existing. See AVERAGE; JETTISON.

In certain cases the court may make orders for the preservation of the subject-matter of litigation. An order has been made for the sale of a horse which was consuming its value in food while an action on a warranty was pending; 3 C. P. D. 816; Brett, Comm. 762. See PERISHABLE GOODS.

PRESIDENT. An officer of a company who is to direct the manner in which business is to be transacted. From the decision of the president there is an appeal to the body over which he presides.

PRESIDENT OF A BANK. This officer, under the banking system in the United States, is ordinarily a member of the board of directors of the bank, and is chosen by them. It is his duty to preside at all meetings of the board of directors; to exercise a constant, immediate, and personal supervision over the daily affairs of the bank; and to institute and carry on legal proceedings to collect demands or claims due the institution; Morse, Banks 144, citing 2 Metc. (Ky.) 240; 5 How. 83; Bolles, Bank Off. 1-70; 28 Vt. 24. Mortgages to secure subscriptions to stock are often put in his name; 1 Sandf. Ch. 179; but he has no more control over the property of the bank than any other director; 7 Ala. 281; 1 Seld. 320. He has no authority to release the claims of the bank without the authorization of the board of directors; 7 R. I. 224; 115 Mass. 547; and an agreement made by him, after the bank has gone into liquidation, to continue its guarantee upon certain notes, is not binding upon the stockholders; 133 U. S. 67. See NATIONAL BANKS; OFFICER. See, generally, Ball, Nat. Banks 58.

PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL. An officer of state who is a member of the cabinet. He attends on the sovereign, proposes business at the council table, and reports to the sovereign the transactions there. 1 Bla. Com. 230.

PRESIDENT JUDGE. A title sometimes given to the presiding judge. It was formerly used in England and is now used in the courts of common pleas in Pennsylvania. The lord chief justice is now permanent president of the high court in England. The title president is said to have a high Norman flavor. Inderwick, King's Peace 225.

PRESIDENT JUSTICE. Same as chief justice (q. v.). Anderson.

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA. The title of the chief executive officer of the United States.

The constitution directs that the executive power shall be vested in a president of the United States of America. Art. 2, s. 1.

No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States at the time of the adoption of the constitution, shall be eligible to the office of president; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained the age of thirty-five years and been fourteen years resident within the United States. Art. 2, s. 1, par. 5.

He is chosen by presidential electors (q. v.). See Kent 276; Story, Const. 5th ed. § 1453. The votes of the electors are transmitted to the vice-president and by him opened in the presence of both houses of congress and counted by tellers previously selected by the two houses separately. If there is no election, a president is chosen by the house of representatives, the members voting by states, from the candidates not exceeding three, having the highest number of electoral votes.

In case of a vacancy the vice-president succeeds, and if there be none then the members of the cabinet succeed in a prescribed order. See CABINET.

The president shall, at stated times, receive for his services a compensation which shall neither be increased nor diminished during the period for which he shall have been elected; and he shall not receive within that period any other emolument from the United States, or any of them. Art. 2, s. 1, par. 7. The act of March 3d, 1873, c. 226, fixed the salary of the president at fifty thousand dollars.

In addition to certain specified powers, the president is vested by the constitution with the executive power of the federal government and the duty of seeing that the laws are faithfully executed. As to his powers, generally, and the historical development of the executive office, see EXECUTIVE POWER.

The president and all civil officers of the United States shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors. Art. 2, sec. 4.

PRESIDENTIAL ELECTORS. Persons chosen in the different states whose sole duty it is to elect a president and vice-president of the United States. Each state appoints a number of electors equal to the whole number of senators and representatives to which the state is entitled in congress, and it is within the power of the state legislature to direct how such electors shall be appointed. (Const. art. ii. sect. 1). The electors have frequently been appointed by the state legislatures directly, and they have been elected separately by congressional districts; but the more usual method of appointment is by general ballot, so that each voter in a state votes for the whole number of electors to which his state is entitled.

The appointment and mode of appointment of electors belong exclusively to the states, under the constitution; 146 U. S. 1.

The constitution provides, Amend. art. 12, that "the electors shall meet in their respective states, and vote by ballot for president and vice-president, one of whom, at least, shall not be an inhabitant of the same state with themselves; they shall name in their ballots the person voted for as president, and in distinct ballots the person voted for as vice-president; and they shall make distinct lists of all persons voted for as president, and of all persons voted for as vice-president, and of the number of votes for each, which list they shall sign and certify, and transmit, sealed, to the seat of the government of the United States, directed to the president of the senate." See PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES; ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

PRESS. By a figure this word signifies the art of printing.

All men have a right to print and publish whatever they may deem proper, unless by doing so they infringe the rights of another, as in the case of copyrights (q. v.), when they may be enjoined. For any injury they may commit against the public or individuals they may be punished, either by indictment or by a civil action at the suit of the party injured, when the injury has been committed against a private individual. See U. S. Const. Amend. art. 1; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; LIBEL.

PRESS COPIES. The identity of the handwriting as shown on the impression is not destroyed, nor rendered unrecognizable by persons acquainted with its characteristics. A person having accurate knowledge can testify to the genuineness with as much accuracy as if the original sheets were before him. Such copies are the same as other writings partially obliterated by damp and exposure, which are admissible as evidence, if duly identified by testimony. They are not however satisfactory as standards of comparison of handwriting. Enough originality is left to be identified by a witness when its own originality is in question; 7 Allen 561; 1 Cush. 217; to prove the contents of a lost letter, or where a party refused to give up the original; 6 S. & R. 420; 19 La. An. 61; 37 Conn. 553. The necessity of producing the original, or laying the foundation in the usual way for secondary evidence, is not obviated by the fact that a party keeps letter press copies; 44 N. Y. 171; so in 85 Md. 123. A copy, sworn to be correctly made from a press copy of a letter, is admissible as secondary evidence, to prove its contents, without producing the press copy; 103 Mass. 362. Press copies are admissible against a party when they appear to be in his handwriting and the originals cannot be produced; 7 Allen 661. Strictly speaking, a letter-press copy is secondary to the document from which it is taken, and cannot be treated as an original; 3 Camp. 228; 4 McLean 378; 35 Md. 123; 19 La. An. 61; 81 Fed. Rep. 313. See, generally, 57 Ga. 60; 73 Ill. 161; 18 Kan. 544.

PREST. A duty in money that was to be paid by the sheriff on his account in the exchequer, or for money left or remaining in his hands. Cowell.

PRESTATION. A right by which neutral vessels may be appropriated by way of hire by a belligerent on payment of freight beforehand. In 1870 the Prussian troops sank six British vessels to obstruct navigation in the river Seine. The act was defended by Prussia on the ground of military necessity; indemnification was subsequently made; 1 Halleck, Int. L. 485.

PRESTIMONY, OR PRÆSTIMONIA. In the Canon Law. A fund or revenue appropriated by the founder for the subsistence of a priest, without being erected into any title or benefice, chapel, prebend, or priory. It is not subject to the ordinary; but of it the patron, and those who have a right from him, are the collators. Whart. Law Lex.

PRESUME. To believe or accept upon probable evidence. It is not so strong a word as infer; 46 Conn. 885. See INFERENCE; PRESUMPTION.

PRESUMPTION. An inference affirmative or disaffirmative of the truth or falsehood of any proposition or fact drawn by a process of probable reasoning in the absence of actual certainty of its truth or falsehood, or until such certainty can be ascertained. Best, Presump. 4.

An inference affirmative or disaffirmative of the existence of a disputed fact, drawn by a judicial tribunal, by a process of probable reasoning, from some one or more matters of fact, either admitted in the cause or otherwise satisfactorily established. Best, Presump. 12.

A rule of law that courts and judges shall draw a particular inference from a particular fact, or from particular evidence, unless and until the truth of such inference is disproved. Steph. Ev. 4; 136 N. Y. 120.

Conclusive presumptions are inferences which the law makes so peremptorily that it will not allow them to be overturned by any contrary proof, however strong. Best, Presump. 20. They are called, also, absolute and irrebuttable presumptions.

Disputable presumptions are inferences of law which hold good until they are invalidated by proof or a stronger presumption. Best, Presump. 29; 2 H. & M'H. 77; 4 Johns. Ch. 287.

Presumptions of fact are inferences as to the existence of some fact drawn from the existence of some other fact; inferences which common sense draws from circumstances usually occurring in such cases. 3 B. & Ad. 890; 8 Hawks 122; 1 Wash. C. C. 872.

Presumptions of law are rules which, in certain cases, either forbid or dispense with any ulterior inquiry. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 14. Inferences or positions established, for the most part, by the common, but occasionally by the statute, law, which are obligatory alike on judges and juries. Best, Presump. 17. They are either conclusive or disputable.

Mixed presumptions hold an intermediate place and consist of presumptive inferences which, from their strength, importance, or frequent occurrence, attract the observation of the law, and, from being constantly recommended by judges and acted on by juries, become as familiar to the courts as presumptions of law, and occupy as important a place in the administration of justice. They have been termed quasi legal presumptions, and are divided into three classes: 1st, Where the inference is one which common-sense would have made for itself; 2d, Where an artificial weight is attached to the evidentiary facts, beyond their mere natural tendency to produce belief; and 3d, Where from motives of legal policy, juries are recommended to draw inferences which are purely artificial. Chamb. Best, Ev. § 824.

The distinctions between presumptions of law and presumptions of fact are—first, that in regard to presumptions of law a certain inference must be made whenever the facts appear which furnish the basis of the inference; while in case of other presumptions a discretion more or less extensive is vested in the tribunal as to drawing the inference. See 9 B. & C. 648. Second, in case of presumptions of law, the court may draw the inference whenever the requisite facts are developed in pleading; Steph. Pl. 382; while other presumptions can be made only by the intervention of a jury. Presumptions of law are reduced to fixed rules, and form a part of the system of jurisprudence to which they belong; presumptions of fact are derived wholly and directly from the circumstances of the particular case, by means of the common experience of mankind. See 2 Stark. Ev. 684; 35 Pa. 440.

It has been said that a more useful and accurate division of presumptions of fact is obtained by treating them with reference to their effect upon the burden of proof and designating them in this aspect as slight and strong; Chamb. Best, Ev. § 319. Slight presumptions, though sufficient to excite suspicion or produce an impression in favor of the truth of the facts they indicate, do not, when taken singly, either constitute proof or shift the burden of proof; id. Strong presumptions shift the burden of proof even though the evidence to rebut them involved the proof of a negative; id. § 321. These are of great weight and in the absence of other evidence are decisive in civil cases; id. § 322. It has been suggested as the characteristic distinction between presumptions of law and presumptions of fact, either simple or mixed, that when the former are disregarded by a jury, a new trial is granted as matter of right, but that the disregard of any of the latter, however strong and obvious, is only ground for a new trial at the discretion of the court; Chamb. Best, Ev. § 327; 1 Term 167; 44 Ala. 159; 31 Ga. 331.

The lack of precision which attaches to the use of the word presumption springs naturally from the variety of the uses to which the word is applied. Of these Prof. J. B. Thayer in his pamphlet on the Presumption of Innocence enumerates seven: (1) The presumption of facts properly defined, where a fact or set of facts furnishes evidence or inference of another. (2) The presumption of law properly defined, as, where a fact or set of facts is considered sufficient evidence of another in the absence of the contrary. (3) Where a fact or set of facts makes out a case which shall stand until overthrown by a specific quantity of evidence; (a) sufficient to satisfy a jury; (b) a preponderance; (c) evidence beyond a reasonable doubt. (4) Where the term is used to imply that a certain fact is the legal equivalent of another fact; e. g. the presumption of malice. (5) Where the contrary of the so-called presumption is not to be taken as true without evidence, the effect being to regulate the burden of proof. (6) Where neither a fact nor the contrary of it is to be assumed as true without evidence, the presumption being of the truth of what is termed a neutral fact, or in other words, that there is no presumption; as in case of shipwreck where there is no presumption of survivorship. 8 H. L. Cas. 183. (7) Where the word is used as a rhetorical term to express a legal doctrine as the presumption of innocence. See, for a discussion of this classification and a collection of cases relating thereto, Chamb. Best, Ev. 306.

In giving effect to presumptions of fact, it is said that the presumption stands until proof is given of the contrary; 1 Cr. M. & R. 895; 2 H. & M'H. 77; 2 Dall. 22; 4 Johns. Ch. 287. See BURDEN OF PROOF; ONUS PROBANDI. This contrary proof may be a conflicting presumption; and Mr. Best lays down the following rules for application in such cases: first, special presumptions take the place of general ones; see 8 B. & C. 737; 9 id. 643; 5 Taunt. 326; 1 Marsh. 68; second, presumptions derived from the ordinary course of nature are stronger than casual presumptions; 4 B. & C. 71; Co. Litt. 378 a; third, presumptions are favored which tend to give validity to acts; 1 Mann.

& R. 668; 3 Camp. 432; 7 B. & C. 578; 2 Wheat. 70; 1 South. 148; 7 T. B. Monr. 344; 2 Gill & J. 114; 10 Pick. 359; 1 Rawle 396; 72 Mich. 446; 38 Minn. 143; and see MAXIMS, Omnia presumuntur, etc.; fourth, the presumptions of innocence is favored in law; 4 C. & P. 116; Russ. & R. 61; 10 M. & W. 15.

Among conclusive presumptions may be reckoned estoppels by deed, see ESTOPPELS; solemn admissions, of parties, and unsolemn admissions which have been acted on; 1 Camp. 139; 1 Taunt. 398; 15 Mass. 82; see ADMISSIONS; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 205; that a sheriff's return is correct as to facts stated therein as between the parties; 15 Mass. 82; that an infant under the age of seven years is incapable of committing a felony; 4 Bla. Com. 23; see 84 Ky. 457; that a boy under fourteen is incapable of committing a rape; 7 C. & P. 592; contra, 5 Lea 352; 84 Ky. 457; that children born in wedlock are presumed to be legitimate; 2 Allen 453; 75 Ill. 315; 2 Bush 621; 75 Cal. 379; at least where the husband might have had access and though the infidelity of the wife be proved; 3 C. & P. 215; 5 Cl. & F. 163; and positive proof of non-access is required to rebut the presumption; 58 Vt. 49; 85 Va. 245; and it cannot be proved by the wife; 60 Wis. 583; that despatches of an enemy carried in a neutral vessel between two hostile ports are hostile; 6 C. Rob. 440; that all persons subject to any law which has been duly promulgated, or which derives its validity from general or immemorial custom, are acquainted with its provisions; 4 Bla. Com. 27; 1 Co. 177; 2 id. 3 b; 6 id. 54 a. See, also, LIMITATION; PRESCRIPTION.

A person not heard from for seven years by those who would probably have heard from him if alive is presumed to be dead; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 41; Chamb. Best, Ev. 304, note citing cases; 180 Pa. 644; and though the time at which death is presumed to have taken place is a subject of controversy, the better opinion is that there is no presumption as to that; Chamb. Best, Ev. 305; 2 Brett. Com. 941; 2 M. & W. 694; and the onus is on the person whose case requires proof of death at a particular period; 75 Ala. 27; 73 Wis. 170; 13 Ired. Law 338; 8 U. C. Q. B. 291; though in some cases it has been held that death will be presumed at the end of seven years; 11 N. H. 197; 15 N. J. Eq. 119; 4 Bradf. Sur. N. Y. 117; 4 U. C. Q. B. 510. In most states this subject is regulated by statute but it is held that the statutory presumption of death from absence or concealment for seven years, without having been heard from, does not apply to children of tender age, incapable of absencing or concealing themselves of their own volition, and whose movements are governed by others; 73 Miss. 417. In order to establish a presumption of death the place to look for the person is his last known place of residence, and not the place from which he has removed; 183 Pa. 155. See, as to presumption of death, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 512-553.

Among rebuttable presumptions may be reckoned the presumptions that a nian is innocent of the commission of a crime; Steph. Ev. 97; 2 Lew. Cr. Cas. 227; see 3 Gray 465; 4 B. & C. 247; 2 B. & Ald. 385; 23 Neb. 33; 44 N. J. Eq. 329; that the possessor of property is its owner; 18tra. 505; 9 Cush. 150; 21 Barb. 333; 35 Me. 139, 150; 113 N. Y. 284; 4 Harring. 327; that buildings belong to the owner of the land on which they stand; 150 U. S. 483; that possession of real property accompanies ownership; 120 U. H. 519; 10 Mass. 205; 7 Gill 84; 45 Me. 516, 550; 15 Conn. 206; and in the usual and ordinary way; 96 Mo. 591; that solemn instruments are duly executed; 1 Rob. Eccl. 10; 9 C. & P. 570; 15 Me. 470; 1 Metc. 849; 15 Conn. 206; that a person, relation, or state of things once shown to exist continues to exist, as, life; 2 Rolle 451; 1 Pet. 453; 3 McLean 890; see 2 Camp. 113; 14 Sim. 28, 277; 19 Pick. 112; 1 Ga. 518; 11 N. H. 191; 86 Me. 176; 13 Ired. 313; 1 Penn. N. S. 605; but see 84 Wis. 135; that statutes of other states are the same as those of the state in which the court is sitting; 40 La. Ann. 766; 135 Pa. 394; 144 id. 293; 85 Tenn. 616; 85 Neb. 375; 78 Hun 200; 93 Cal. 172; but see 50 Ark. 287; that a mature male has normal powers of virility; 81 Ga. 144; that a child was born in lawful wedlock; 127 Ill. 554; that a person has testamentary capacity; 45 N. J. Eq. 703; that he is sane; 127 Ill. 533; 26 Neb. 635; identity of person is presumed from identity of name; 75 Cal. 98, 340; 83 Ala. 523; homicide committed by means of a deadly weapon, creates a presumption of malice; 83 Ala. 39; 100 N. C. 512; that a vote is legal; 40 Kan. 270; 97 Mo. 311; 98 N. C. 591; that a letter duly directed and mailed, was received by the person to whom it was directed, in the regular course of mail; 63 Hun 624; 147 Ill. 176; 141 U. S. 25.

A favorite maxim is that ignorantia legis neminem excusat, or that every one is conclusively presumed to know the law. There is no such presumption in fact; 2 C. B. 720; L. R. 3 Q. B. 629. The fact is simply that it is a rule of public policy that ignorance of the law shall not be set up as a defence against legal liability; 11 Blatch. 200; 37 Miss. 379; 7 Pick. 278. In many cases a commonly accepted misconception of law has been held sufficient excuse; 80 Pa. 430; 2 Black 872; 21 Wall. 178; 91 U. S. 45; 36 N. J. L. 125; 43 Ala. 197.

Another very much misused maxim is that one is presumed to intend the natural consequence of his act. This has been characterized as "merely a fantastic transference into the law of evidence of the phraseology of positive law;" Chamb. Best. Ev. 310; 10 Cush. 373; 7 Md. 108. So far as it is a rule of law it means simply that mere carelessness is not a ground of defence against legal liability; 72 N. Y. 90; 80 Ill. 28; 23 Vt. 151; 8 Cal. 113; 100 Mass. 505.

There is a presumption of jurisdiction which attaches to the record of the judgment or the decree of a court of general jurisdiction in another state, and where the record discloses nothing in regard to the service of process or notice and no evidence is given on the subject, jurisdiction over the person will be presumed; 134 N. Y. 833, affirming 12 App. Div. N. Y. 278.

Consult Greenleaf, Starkie, Phillips, Wharton, Stephen, on Evidence; Best, Matthews, on Presumptive Evidence; Russell on Crimes. See VIOLENT PRESUMPTION.

PRESUMPTIVE EVIDENCE. See EVIDENCE. PROBABLE EVIDENCE; VIOLENT PRESUMPTION.

PRESUMPTIVE HEIR. See HEIR PRESUMPTIVE.

PRESUMPTIVE TITLE. See TITLE.

PRÊT À LA GROSSE. See NAUTICA PLECURIA.

PRÊT A USAGE. (Fr. loan for use). A phrase used in the French law instead of commodatum.

PRETENDED TITLE STATUTE. The statute 82 Hen. VIII. c. 9, § 3. It enacts that no one shall sell or purchase any pretended right or title to land, unless the vendor hath received the profits thereof for one whole year before such grant, or hath been in actual possession of the land, or of the reversion or remainder, on pain that both purchaser and vendor shall each forfeit the value of such land to the king and the prosecutor.

PRETENSED. Pretended; claimed.

PRETENSION, or PRETENSION. In the French law, a claim made to a thing which the claimant believes himself entitled to demand, but which is not admitted or adjudged to be his. R. & L. Dict.

The words right, actions, and pretensions are usually joined; not that they are synonymous, for right is something positive and certain, action is what is demanded, while pretension is sometimes not even accompanied by a demand.

PRETERITION (Lat. preteritum and eo, to go by). In Civil Law. The omission by a testator of some one of his heirs who is entitled to a legitime (q. v.) in the succession.

Among the Romans, the preterition of children when made by the mother was presumed to have been made with design; the preterition of sons by any other testator, was considered as a wrong, and avoided the will, except the will of a soldier in service, which was not subject to so much form.

PRETEXT (Lat. pretextum, woven before). The reasons assigned to justify an act, which have only the appearance of truth, and which are without foundation, or which, if true, are not the true reasons for such act. Vattel, liv. 3, c. 8, § 82.

Ostensible reason or motive assigned or assumed as a color or cover for the real reason or motive; false appearance, pretence. 27 Neb. 604.

PRETIUM AFFECTIONIS (Lat.). An imaginary value put upon a thing by the fancy of the owner in his affection for it or for the person from whom he obtained it. Bell, Dict.

When an injury has been done to an article, it has been questioned whether in estimating the damage there is any just ground, in any case, for admitting the pretium affectionis. It seems that when the injury has been done accidentally by culpable negligence, such an estimation of damages would be unjust, but when the mischief has been intentional it ought to be so admitted. Kames, Eq. 74, 75.

PRETIUM PERICULI. The price of the risk, e. g. the premium paid on a policy of insurance; also the interest paid on money advanced on bottomry or respondentia.

PRETORIUM. A court house or hall of justice. 8 How. St. Tr. 425.

PREUVE (Fr.). Proof, evidence, trial, ordeal. Wes. Fr. Eng. Dict.

PREVAILING PARTY. To be such does not depend upon the degree of success at different stages of the suit, but whether, at the end of the suit, or other proceeding, the party who has made a claim against the other, has successfully maintained it. 60 Me. 286. See 53 Mo. 830.

PREVARICATION. In Civil Law. The acting with unfaithfulness and want of probity. The term is applied principally to the act of concealing a crime. Dig. 47. 15. 6.

PREVENT. To hinder; to obstruct; to intercept. 20 Ark. 185. It is held not to mean to obstruct by physical force; 17 Q. B. 145.

PREVENTION (Lat. prevenire, to come before). In Civil Law. The right of a judge to take cognizance of an action over which he has concurrent jurisdiction with another judge.

In Pennsylvania it has been ruled that a justice of the peace cannot take cognizance of a cause which has been previously decided by another justice. 2 Dall. 77, 114.

PREVIOUS QUESTION. In parliamentary practice, the question whether a vote shall be taken on the main issue, or not, brought forward before the main or real question is put by the speaker and for the purpose of avoiding, if the vote is in the negative, the putting of this question. The motion is in the form "that the question be now put," and the mover and second order vote against it.

In the house of representatives of the United States and in many state legislatures the object of moving the previous question is to cut off debate and secure immediately a vote on the question under consideration.

PREVIOUSLY. An adverb of time, used in comparing an act or state named, with another act or state, subsequent in order of time, for the purpose of asserting the priority of the first. 40 La. 94.

PRICE. The consideration in money given for the purchase of a thing.

It is not synonymous with value; 51 Kan. 408.

There are three requisites to the quality of a price in order to make a sale.

It must be serious and such as may be demanded; if, therefore, a person were to sell me an article, and by the agreement, reduced to writing, he were to release me from the payment, the transaction would no longer be a sale, but a gift. Pothier, Vente, n. 18.

It must be certain and determinate; but what may be rendered certain is considered as certain; if, therefore, I sell a thing at a price to be fixed by a third person, this is sufficiently certain, provided the third person make a valuation and fix the price; Pothier, Vente, n. 23; 2 Sumn. 539; 4 Pick. 179; 13 Me. 400; 2 Ired. 86; 3 Pa. 50; 2 Kent 477. When the parties have not expressed any price in their contract, the presumption of law is that the thing is sold for the price it generally brings at the time and place where the agreement was made; 3 T. B. Monr. 133; 6 H. & J. 273; Cox 281; 10 Bingh. 876; 11 U. C. Q. B. 545.

The third quality of a price is that it consists in money, to be paid down, or at a future time; for if it be of anything else it will no longer be a price, nor the contract a sale, but exchange or barter; Pothier, Vente, n. 30; 16 Toulhier, n. 147; 12 N. H. 390; 10 Vt. 457; see, 54 N. Y. 173, where it was held that price in an act meant value or compensation.

The true price of a thing is that for which things of a like nature and quality are usually sold in the place where situated, if real property; in the place where exposed to sale, if personal; Pothier, Vente, n. 243. The first price or cost of a thing does not always afford a sure criterion of its value. It may have been bought very dear or very cheap; Ayl. Parerg. 447; Merlin, Répert; 4 Pick. 179; 16 id. 227.

In a declaration in trover it is usual, when the chattel found is a living one, to lay it as of such a price; when dead, of such a value; 8 Wentw. Pl. 872, n. 2; 3 Lilly, Abr. 629.

Lord Tenterden's act has substituted value for price in the English statute of frauds; 25 L. J. C. P. 257. See Campb. Sales 162; Cost.

See CONTRACT PRICE; FACTORY PRICE; UPSET PRICE.

PRICE CURRENT. A list or enumeration of various articles of merchandise, with their prices, the duties (if any), payable thereon, when imported or exported, with the drawbacks occasionally allowed upon their exportation. Wharton.

PRICES ON EXCHANGE. See QUOTATIONS OF PRICES ON AN EXCHANGE.

PRIDE GAVEL. A rent or tribute. Tayl. Gavels. 112.

PRIEST. An officer in the second order of ministry in the church.

PRIMA FACIE (Lat.). At first view or appearance of the business; as the holder of a bill of exchange, indorsed in blank, is prima facie its owner.

Prima facie evidence of fact is in law sufficient to establish the fact, unless rebutted; 6 Pet. 622, 632; 14 id. 334. See generally, 7 J. J. Marsh. 425; 8 N. H. 484; 7 Ala. 267; 5 Rand. 701; 1 Pick. 332; 1 South. 77; 1 Yeates 347; 2 N. & M'C. 320; 1 Mo. 334; 11 Conn. 95; 2 Root 286; 16 Johns. 60, 136; 1 Bail. 174; 2 A. K. Marsh. 244; 97 U. S. 3. For example, when buildings are fired by sparks emitted from a locomotive engine passing along the road, it has been held to be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of those who have the charge of it; 3 C. B. 229; and proof of the mailing of a letter is prima facie evidence of its receipt by the person to whom it is addressed; 147 Ill. 176; 27 S. W. Rep. (Mo.) 436; 63 Hun 624.

PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE. Evidence which, unexplained and uncontradicted, appears to be sufficient to establish the fact, or which would warrant a finding of the fact or matter, to support or prove which it is introduced. It is evidence which suffices to establish the fact unless rebutted or until overcome by other evidence. It is not conclusive, but may be contradicted or controlled. Elliot, Evidence § 17, 15.

Prima facie evidence is sufficient to outweigh the presumption of innocence, and, if not met by opposing evidence, to support a verdict. 219 U. S. 219, quoting 6 Pet. 632.

PRIMA TONSURA (Lat.). A grant of a right to have the first crop of grass. 1 Chitty, Pr. 181.

PRIMAE IMPRESSIONIS. First impression. A case which presents to a court of law for its decision a question of law which is new, and for which there is consequently no precedent, is said to be a case of first impression. R. & L. Dict. SEE IMPRESSION.

PRIMAGE. In Mercantile Law. A duty payable to the master and mariners of a ship or vessel,—to the master for the use of his cables and ropes to discharge the goods of the merchant, to the mariners for lading and unlading in any port or haven. Abb. Sh. 270.

A small payment to the master for his care and trouble which he is to receive for his own use, unless he has otherwise agreed with the owner. Abb. Sh. 13th ed. 331; it is of a very ancient date and subject to authority and regulations. "In the 'Guidon,' it is called la contribution des chausses ou pot de vin du maître." It is sometimes called the master's hat-money; id.

It is no longer a gratuity to the master, unless especially stipulated; but it belongs to the owners or freighters, and is nothing but an increase of the freight rate; 14 Fed. Rep. 421.

PRIMARIES. Methods by which party adherents agree upon candidates whom they intend to offer and support for ultimate choice by all qualified electors. In no sense elections for office. 256 U. S. 250.

PRIMARY. That which is first or principal; as, primary evidence, that evidence which is to be admitted in the first instance, as distinguished from secondary evidence, which is allowed only when primary evidence cannot be had.

PRIMARY BOYCOTT. See BOYCOTT.

PRIMARY CONVEYANCES. Those common law conveyances, by means of which an estate is created or first arises. 2 Bl. Com. 309.

PRIMARY ELECTION. A popular election held by members of a particular political party, for the purpose of choosing delegates to a convention empowered to nominate candidates for that party to be voted for at an approaching election. 135 Ind. 210. In many states they are regulated by law and frauds are punishable as in a general election.

PRIMARY EVIDENCE. The best evidence of which the case in its nature is susceptible. 8 Bouvier, Inst. n. 8058. See Steph. 67; EVIDENCE

PRIMARY OBLIGATION. An obligation which is the principal object of the contract; for example, the primary obligation of the seller is to deliver the thing sold, and to transfer the title to it. It is distinguished from the accessory or secondary obligation to pay damages for not doing so. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 702.

PRIMARY POWERS. The principal authority given by a principal to his agent; it differs from mediale powers. Story, Ag. § 58.

PRIMATE. In Ecclesiastical Law. An archbishop who has jurisdiction over one or several other metropolitans.

PRIME. In a contract for delivery of "prime barley" prime will be understood according to its use among merchants. 14 Mo. 9.

Prime cost, the true price paid for goods upon a bona fide purchase. 2 Mas. 53.

PRIME MINISTER. See CABINET; PREMIER.

PRIME SERJEANT. The Queen's first serjeant at law.

PRIMER ELECTION. A term used to signify first choice.

In England, when coparcenary lands are divided, unless it is otherwise agreed, the eldest sister has the first choice of the parts; this part is called the enitia pars. Sometimes the oldest sister makes the partition; and in that case, to prevent partiality, she takes the last choice. Hob. 107; Litt. §§ 243; 245; Bac. Abr. Coparceners (U)

PRIMER FINE. The fine due the crown by ancient prerogative on suing out the writ of præcipe. 1 Steph. Com. 560.

PRIMER SEISIN. In English Law. The right which the king had, when any of his tenants died seised of a knight's fee, to receive of the heir, provided he were of full age, one whole year's profits of the lands, if they were in immediate possession; and half a year's profits, if the lands were in reversion, expectant on an estate for life. 2 Bla. Com. 66. See FEUDAL LAW.

PRIMECEBIUS. The first of any degree of men. 1 Mon. Ang. 838.

PRIMO BENEFICIO. A writ directing a grant of the first benefice in the sovereign's gift. Cowell.

PRIMOGENITURE. The state of being first born; the eldest.

At common law, in cases of the descent of land, primogeniture gave a title to the oldest son in preference to the other children. This distinction has been abolished in the United States. Formerly in Pennsylvania, in cases of intestacy, the oldest son took a double portion of the real estate; 1 Binn. 91, where it was held that a trust estate (the legal title) descends as at common law; and this case was followed in Delaware; 4 Houst. 648.

The law of primogeniture has not been altered in England; see however the radical act of 1897, cited in LAND TRANSFER.

PRIMOGENITUS (Lat.). The first-born. 1 Ves. 290. And see 3 Maule & S. 25; 8 Taunt. 468; 3 Vern. 660.

PRIMUM DECRETUM (Lat.). In the courts of admiralty, this name is given to a provisional decree. Bacon, Abr. The Court of Admiralty (E).

PRINCE. In a general sense, a sovereign; the ruler of a nation or state. The son of a king or emperor, or the issue of a royal family; as, princes of the blood. The chief of any body of men.

PRINCE OF WALES. A title given to the eldest son of the British sovereign or to the heir apparent to the crown.

PRINCES OF THE BLOOD. The younger sons of the British sovereign and male members of other branches of the royal family not in the direct line of succession.

PRINCES AND RULERS. See RESTRAINT OF PRINCES AND RULERS.

PRINCESS ROYAL. The title borne by the eldest daughter of the sovereign, if and when it is conferred on her by the sovereign. No grant by letters patent is necessary. The question as to what happens when the title is borne by the eldest daughter of a subsequent sovereign has never arisen until now. The title had not up to the end of 1921 been conferred on the eldest daughter of his present Majesty. It would seem that the title cannot well be held simultaneously by two ladies. Byrne.

PRINCIPAL. Leading; chief; more important.

This word has several meanings. It is used in opposition to accessory, to show the degree of crime committed by two persons. Thus, we say, the principal is more guilty than the accessory after the fact.

In estates, principal is used as opposed to incident or accessory: as in the following rule: "The incident shall pass by the grant of the principal; but not the principal by the grant of the incident: accessorium non ducit sed sequitur suum principale." Co. Litt. 152 a.

It is used in opposition to agent, and in this sense it signifies that the principal is the prime mover.

It is used in opposition to interest: as, the principal being secured, the interest will follow.

The corpus or capital of the estate in contradistinction to the income.

Money bearing interest; a capital sum lent on interest.

It is used also in opposition to surety: thus, we say, the principal is answerable before the surety.

Principal is used also to denote the more important; as, the principal person.

In the English law, the chief person in some of the inns of chancery is called principal of the house. Principal is also used to designate the best of many things: as, the principal bed, the principal table, and the like.

In Contracts. One who, being competent sui juris to do any act for his own benefit or on his own account, confides it to another person to do for him. 1 Domat b. 1, tit. 15, Intro.; Story, Ag. § 3.

Every one of full age, and not otherwise disabled, is capable of being a principal; for it is a rule that whenever a person has power, as owner, or in his own right, to do a thing, he may do it by another; Com. Dig. Attorney (C 1); Heineccius, ad Pand. p. 1.1. 3, tit. 1, § 424; 9 Co. 75 b; Story, Ag. § 6. Infants are generally incapable of appointing an agent; but under special circumstances they may make such appointments. For instance, an infant may authorize another to do any act which is beneficial to him, but not to do an act which is to his prejudice; 2 Kent 233; 9 Co. 75; 3 Burr. 1804; 6 Cow. 398; 10 Ohio 37; 10 Pet. 58, 69; 14 Mass. 463. A married woman could not, in general, appoint an agent or attorney; and when it was requisite that one should be appointed, the husband usually appointed for both. She might, perhaps, dispose of or incur her separate property, through an agent or attorney; Cro. Car. 165; 2 Bulstr. 18; but this seemed to be doubted; Cro. Jac. 617; 1 Brownl. 134; Ad. Ej. 174. Idiots, lunatics, and other persons sui juris are wholly incapable of appointing an agent; Story, Ag. § 6.

The general principle which governs the liability of a principal is that the responsibility is measured by the character and extent of the authority given; see AGENCY; AGENT; for example, authority to an agent to vote at a corporate meeting upon the stock of his principal does not empower the former to act for the latter in connection with other stockholders, who were also creditors of the corporation, in taking measures for cancelling a mortgage of the corporation under which the claims of the principal and those stockholders against the corporation were secured; 113 Ala. 228. The powers of the agent must be measured and determined by the application to each particular case of ordinary business principles, and sound judgment to be exercised by the agent in executing his authority, and by the court which is to deal with the case in considering the question of the responsibility of the principal. Where a discretion has been conferred upon the agent the principal must abide the result of its exercise and will be held liable to third persons where it has been honestly exercised. So where an agent has power to borrow money on exceptional terms in cases of emergency, a lender is not bound to inquire whether in the particular case the emergency has or has not arisen; 15 L. R. App. 357. And where the agent was entrusted with securities and instructed by the principal to raise a certain sum upon them, but borrowed a larger sum and fraudulently appropriated the difference, the principal could not redeem the securities without paying the lender in full where he had acted bona fide and in ignorance of the limitation, although he had no knowledge of the agent's authority to borrow and made no inquiry, and the agent practised fraud and forgery to obtain the loan; [1895] App. Cas. 173, affirming [1895] 3 Ch. 130.

The principal is entitled to the service of the agent with respect to the matter in hand as though the agent were attending to his own business; and the latter will be considered, to that extent, as merging his own individuality and will be held to act entirely for the benefit of the principal. He cannot make a profit out of the business which he transacts for the principal derived from any knowledge acquired by him in the course of it, except consistently with the engagements between the principal and agent. So where an agent, acting in a confidential capacity, obtained information of a defect in his principal's title and put in an outstanding claim through a third party, it was held that he could not profit by his purchase but held the title for his principal; 12 U. S. App. 606. On the other hand, a principal cannot retain the fruit of his agent's acts and yet disclaim his authority in order to escape the corresponding obligation. Where a corporation obtained from the plaintiff the right to construct a road in front of his property and constructed it, it could not refuse to recognize its agent's authority to bind it to pay the sum he agreed to pay; 47 N. Y. Supp. 327. It is said in this case that agency cannot be proved by the uncorroborated testimony of the agent, nor can any implication of consent to the work done arise, in the absence of proof of knowledge that it was being done.

The rights to which principals are entitled arise from obligations due to them by their agents or by third persons.

The rights of principals in relation to their agents are—first, to call them to an account at all times in relation to the business of the agency; 2 Bouvier, Inst. 28. Second, when the agent violates his obligations to his principal, either by exceeding his authority, or by positive misconduct, or by mere negligence or omissions in the discharge of the functions of his agency, or in any other manner, and any loss or damage falls on his principal, the latter will be entitled to full indemnity; Story, Ag. § 217 c; 12 Pick. 328; 6 Hare 366; 7 Beav. 176. But the loss of damage must be actual, and not merely probable or possible; Story, Ag. § 222; Paley, Ag. 7, 8, 74, 75. But see id. 74, note 2. Third, where both the principal and agent may maintain a suit against a third person for any matter relating to the agency, the principal has a right to supersede the agent, by suing in his own name; and he may by his own intervention intercept, suspend, or extinguish the right of the agent under the contract; Story, Ag. § 408; 4 Camp. 194; 3 Hill, N. Y. 72, 73; 6 B. & R. 27; 2 Wash. C. C. 223; 1 Maule & S. 576. See 57 Fed. Rep. 468. But, as we shall presently see, an exception to this rule arises in favor of the agent, to the extent of any lien, or other interest, or superior right, he may have in the property; Story, Ag. §§ 393; 397, 407, 424. The principal has a right to determine or revoke the authority given to his agent, at his own mere pleasure, where not otherwise agreed between them; 141 U. S. 627.

Agents are not entitled to use the materials gained or collected by them in the cause of their employment to the detriment of their principal; [1893] 1 Ch. 218.

In general, the principal, as against third persons, has a right to all the advantages and benefits of the acts and contracts of his agent, and is entitled to the same remedies against such third persons, in respect to such acts and contracts, as if they were made or done with him personally; Story, Ag. §§ 418, 420; Paley, Ag. 823; 8 La. 296; 2 Stark. 443. See 108 Cal. 43. But to this rule there are the following exceptions. First, when the instrument is under seal, and it has been exclusively made between the agent and the third person, as, for example, a charter-party or bottomry bond made by the master of a ship in the course of his employment, in this case the principal cannot sue or be sued on it; Story, Ag. § 422; Abb. Sh. pt. 3, ch. 1. § 2; 4 Wend. 285; 1 Paine 251; 3 Wash. C. C. 560. Second, when an exclusive credit is given to and by the agent, and therefore the principal cannot be considered in any manner a party to the contract, although he may have authorized it and be entitled to all the benefits arising from it. The case of a foreign factor buying or selling goods is an example of this kind; he is treated, as between himself and the other party, as the sole contractor, and the real principal cannot sue or be sued on the contract. This, it has been well observed, is a general rule of commercial law, founded upon the known usage of trade; and it is strictly adhered to, for the safety and convenience of foreign commerce; Story, Ag. § 425; 9 B. & C. 87; 4 Taunt. 574. Third, when the agent has a lien or claim upon the property bought or sold, or upon its proceeds, which is equal to or exceeds the amount of its value, the principal cannot sue without the consent of the agent; Story, Ag. §§ 403, 407, 424.

But contracts are not unfrequently made without mentioning the name of the principal. In such case he may avail himself of the agreement; for the contract will be treated as that of the principal as well as of the agent. If, however, the person with whom the contract was made, bona fide dealt with the agent as owner, he will be entitled to set off any claim he may have against the agent, in answer to the demand of the principal; and the principal's right to enforce contracts entered into by his agent is affected by every species of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of the agent which would defeat it if proceeding from himself; Story, Ag. §§ 420, 440; 2 Kent 633; Paley, Ag. 324; 3 B. & P. 490; 24 Wend. 458.

Where the principal gives notice to the debtor not to pay money to the agent, unless the agent has a superior right, from a lien or otherwise, the amount of any payment afterwards made to the agent may be recovered by the principal from the debtor; Story, Ag. § 420; 4 Camp. 80; 6 Cow. 181, 186. Money paid by an agent may also be recovered by the principal under any of the following circumstances: first, where the consideration fails; second, where money is paid by an agent through mistake; third, where money is illegally extorted from an agent in the course of his employment; fourth, where the money of the principal has been fraudulently applied by the agent to an illegal and prohibited purpose; Paley, Ag. 335. When goods are entrusted to an agent for a specific purpose, a delivery by him for a different purpose, or in a manner not authorized by the commission, passes no property in them, and they may, therefore, be reclaimed by the owner; Paley, Ag. 340; 3 Pick. 495. Third persons are also liable to the principal for any tort or injury done to his property or rights in the course of the agency. If both the agent and third person have been parties to the tort or injury, they are jointly as well as severally liable to the principal, and he may maintain an action against both or either of them. Story, Ag. § 436; 3 Maule & S. 562.

The liabilities of the principal are either to his agent or to third persons. The liabilities of the principal to his agent are—to reimburse him all his advances, expenses, and disbursements lawfully incurred about the agency, and also to pay him interest upon such advances and disbursements whenever interest may fairly be presumed to have been stipulated for or to be due to the agent; Story, Ag. § 335; Story, Bailm. 196, 197; Paley, Ag. 107, 108; second, to pay him his commissions as agreed upon, or according to the usage of trade, except in cases of gratuitous agency; Story, Ag. § 324; Paley, Ag. 100; third, to indemnify the agent when, without his own default, he has sustained damages in following the directions of his principal: for example, when the agent has innocently sold the goods of a third person, under the direction or authority of his principal, and a third person recovers damages against the agent, the latter will be entitled to reimbursement from the principal; Story, Ag. § 339; 9 Metc. Mass. 212.

The principal is bound to fulfil all the engagements made by the agent for or in the name of the principal, which come within the scope of his usual employment, although the agent in the particular instance has in fact exceeded or violated his private instructions; Story, Ag. 443; 4 Watts 222; 21 Vt. 129; 20 Me. 84; 1 Wash. C. C. 174; 114 N. Y. 415; 98 Mo. 478. See [1893] 1 Q. B. 346. And where an exclusive credit is not given to the agent, the principal is liable to third persons upon contracts made by his agent within the scope of his authority, although the agent contracts in his own name and does not disclose his agency; Story, Ag. § 446. But if the principal and agent are both known, and exclusive credit be given to the latter, the principal will not be liable though the agent should subsequently become insolvent; Story, Ag. § 447. When goods are sold to a person who in fact is the agent of another, but the seller has no knowledge of the agency, the latter may elect to make the principal his debtor on discovering him; 48 Conn. 314; 50 Ark. 488. The same principle applies where the seller is informed at the time of the sale that the buyer is an agent, but is not informed who the principal is; 9 B. & C. 78; 2 Metc. 319. Where money is paid by a third person to the agent, by mistake or upon a consideration that has failed, the principal will be liable to repay it although he may never have received it from his agent; Story, Ag. § 451; Paley, Ag. 293; 2 Esp. 509.

An interesting collection of cases illustrating the doctrine of the liability of the principal for the act of the agent is the subject of an annotation in 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 580, as to the authority of officers of corporations to employ physicians and nurses in cases of accident to employees or others. It has been held that the superintendent or general manager of a railroad company has the authority to employ a physician in such cases; 126 Ind. 99; 28 Mich. 289; 24 Kan. 328; L. R. 2 Ex. 228. Such employment was sustained in the case of any superior officer, where no higher one was present; as, a division superintendent; 52 Kan. 433; a conductor; 121 Ind. 353; 22 Fla. 356; a master mechanic; 19 Kan. 256; a yard master; 28 Mich. 289; and a station agent; 3 Ex. 268. In any case the company will be bound if the employment be ratified by the superintendent; 98 Ind. 891; 19 Kan. 236. There is no inherent power in the general manager, but the question of his delegated authority is for the jury; 45 Mo. App. 283; 49 Conn. 556; 7 Ind. App. 678; and so the authority of a superintendent and general manager of an electric light company, who was also a director, to bind the corporation by employing a nurse, was held a question for the jury; 87 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 564.

The death of the principal usually revokes the authority to act for him or for his estate; 150 U. S. 520; 75 Cal. 349. Where an agent by the sudden death of his principal without known heirs is left in sole charge of his principal's estate, he is entitled to compensation for services in connection with the estate until the persons entitled to the property are found and their rights established in the orphans' court; 180 Pa. 192. See AGENCY.

There is a general presumption that an agent is presumed to have disclosed to his principal all facts which come to his knowledge in the course of the agency, and this presumption remains in force so long as the agent acts within the scope of his employment in good faith for the interest of the principal; but if he forms the purpose of dealing with the principal's property for his own benefit or that of some one else opposed in interest, his subsequent action based upon such purpose is considered to be in fraud of the rights of the principal, and the presumption no longer prevails; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1121.

The principal is not, in general, liable to a criminal prosecution for the acts or misdeeds of his agent, unless he has authorized or co-operated in such acts or misdeeds; Story, Ag. § 452; Paley, Ag. 303; 1 Mood. & M. 433. He is, however, civilly liable to third persons for the misfeasance, negligence, or omission of duty of his agent in the course of the agency, although he did not authorize or know of such misconduct, or even although he forbade it; Story, Ag. § 432; Paley, Ag. 294; 26 Vt. 112, 123; 6 Gill & J. 291; 20 Barb. 507; 7 Cush. 385; 83 Ala. 333; 51 Fed. Rep. 160; 33 Fla. 696; 3 Tex. Civ. App. 476; see 78 Ga. 328; and he is liable for the injuries and wrongs of sub-agents who are retained by his direction, either express or implied; Story, Ag. § 454; Paley, Ag. 296; 1 B. & P. 409. But the responsibility of the principal for the negligence or unlawful acts of his agent is limited to cases properly within the scope of the agency. Nor is he liable for the wilful acts of his agent whereby damage is occasioned to another, unless he originally commanded or subsequently assented to the act; Paley, Ag. 298, 299; Story, Ag. § 456; 9 Wend. 268; 23 Pick. 25; 20 Conn. 284. See 11 Colo. 233. Strict compliance with the instructions of a principal by the agent is a condition of exemption of the agent from liability; 187 U. S. 473.

A principal who accepts the benefits of a contract made on his behalf by his authorized agents is responsible for the fraudulent representation of the agent, although made without authority; 85 Tenn. 139; 2 C. C. App. 535; and a person who has adopted a sale made by his agent, and receives the benefit of it, takes the sale with all the burdens created by false representations of the agent; 78 Cal. 490; 40 Minn. 476; 52 Kan. 245; 85 Hun 182; see 160 Mass. 177; and a principal must adopt the acts of his agents as a whole; 24 Neb. 653; 150 U. S. 129; 15 So. Rep. (La.) 16. A ratification by a principal of an unauthorized contract made by his agent, relates back to the beginning of the transaction; 37 Fed. Rep. 973; and a principal having the right to disaffirm acts of an agent must do it promptly, and if not done within a reasonable time ratification will be presumed; 120 U. S. 256. There can be no ratification by a principal of the acts of his agent, where he has no knowledge of such acts; 71 Md. 200; 76 Ia. 129.

In Criminal Law. The actor in the commission of a crime.

All who are present, either actually or constructively, at the place of a crime, and are either aiding, abetting, assisting, or advising its commission, or are present for such purpose, are principals in the crime; 3 Fed. Rep. 851. See 25 Tex. App. 538; 21 id. 107.

Principals are of two kinds, namely, principals in the first degree, and principals in the second degree.

A principal in the first degree is one who is the actual perpetrator of the act. 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 233, 615; 15 Ga. 346. But to constitute him such it is not necessary that he should be actually present when the offence is consummated; 3 Denio 100; 21 Tex. App. 107. For if one lay poison purposely for another, who takes it and is killed, the offender, though absent when it was taken, is a principal in the first degree; Clark, Cr. L. 83; 1 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 81, § 7; 4 Bla. Com. 34; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 257. And the offence may be committed in his absence, through the medium of an innocent agent: as, if a person incites a child under the age of discretion, or any other instrument excused from the responsibility of his actions by defect of understanding, ignorance of the fact, or other cause, to the commission of crime, the inciter, though absent when the act was committed, is ex necessitate liable for the act of his agent and a principal in the first degree; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 514; 2 Leach 978. But if the instrument be aware of the consequences of his act, he is a principal in the first degree; the employer, in such case, if present when the fact is committed, is a principal in the second degree, and, if absent, an accessory before the fact; Russ. & R. 163; 1 C. & K. 589; 1 Archb. Cr. L. 58.

Principals in the second degree are those who are present aiding and abetting the commission of the act. 2 Va. Cas. 856. They are generally termed aiders and abettors, and sometimes, improperly, accomplices; for the latter term includes all the particeps criminis, whether principals in the first or second degree or mere accessories. A person to be a principal in the second degree need not be actually present, an ear or eye-witness of the transaction. The presence may be constructive. He is, in construction of law, present aiding and abetting if, with the intention of giving assistance, he be near enough to afford it should the occasion arise. If, for instance, he be outside the house watching to prevent surprise or the like, whilst his companions are in the house committing a felony, such constructive presence is sufficient to make a principal in the second degree; Clark, Cr. L. 85; 1 Russ. Cr. L. 27; 1 Hale 555; Wright, Ohio 75; 9 Pick. 496; 9 C. & P. 437; 15 Ill. 511. There must, however, be a participation in the act; for although a person be present when a felony is committed, yet if he does not consent to the felonious purpose or contribute to its execution, he will not be a principal in the second degree merely because he does not endeavor to prevent the felony or apprehend the felon. 1 Russ. Cr. 27; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 439; 9 Ired. 440; 3 Wash. C. C. 223; 1 Wisc. 159.

The law recognizes no difference between the offence of principals in the first and principals in the second degree. And so immaterial is the distinction considered in practice that, if a man be indicted as principal in the first degree, proof that he was present aiding and abetting another in committing the offence, although his was not the hand which actually did it, will support the indictment; and if he be indicted as principal in the second degree, proof that he was not only present, but committed the offence with his own hand, will support the indictment. So, when an offence is punishable by a statute which makes no mention of principals in the second degree, such principals are within the meaning of the statute as much as the parties who actually committed the offence; 1 Archb. Cr. L. 66. See 89 Mo. 312.

In treason, and in offences below felony, and in all felonies in which the punishment of principals in the first degree and of principals in the second degree is the same, the indictment may charge all who are present and abet the fact as principals in the first degree, provided the offence permits of a participation, or specially, as aiders and abettors; Archb. Cr. Pl. 7; 11 Cush. 422; 1 C. & M. 187. But where by particular statutes the punishment is different, then principals in the second degree must be indicted specially as aiders and abettors; Archb. Cr. Pl. 7. If indicted as aiders and abettors, an indictment charging that A gave the mortal blow, and that B, C, and D were present aiding and abetting, will be sustained by evidence that B gave the blow, and that A, C, and D were present aiding and abetting; and even if it appears that the act was committed by a person not named in the indictment, the aiders and abettors may, nevertheless, be convicted; Dougl. 207; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 350. And the same though the jury say that they are not satisfied which gave the blow, if they are satisfied that one of them did, and that the others were present aiding and abetting; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 52; 2 C. & K. 382.

PRINCIPAL AND AGENT.

A person who authorizes another to act on his behalf is called the "principal," and the person so authorized is called the "agent." The law of principal and agent deals both with the rights and duties of the principal and agent inter se, and with those of each of them toward third persons. As to the law of principal and agent generally, see Sm. Merc. L. 109 et seq. R. & L. Dict. See PRINCIPAL.

PRINCIPAL CHALLENGE. See CHALLENGE.

PRINCIPAL CONTRACT. One entered into by both parties on their own account or in the several qualities they assume.

PRINCIPAL OBLIGATION. That obligation which arises from the principal object of the engagement which has been contracted between the parties. It differs from an accessory obligation. For example, in the sale of a horse, the principal obligation of the seller is to deliver the horse; the obligation to take care of him till delivered is an accessory engagement. Pothier, Obl. n. 182. By principal obligation is also understood the engagement of one who becomes bound for himself, and not for the benefit of another. Pothier, Obl. n. 186.

PRINCIPAL PLACE OF BUSINESS. The term "principal place of business," as used in a statute, requiring corporations to place their names on their principal place of business, does not apply to a local office of a telephone company, having its main offices at other places. 108 S. W. 262. Highest in rank, authority, character, importance, or degree; most considerable or important, chief, main. An incorporated company may have one or more "principal places of business" depending entirely upon the method of conducting its business. 110 Ky. 823, 62 S. W. 897.

PRINCIPAL STREET. A "principal street" is a principal thoroughfare dedicated to the use of the public. 161 Ky. 846, 171 S. W. 396.

PRINCIPLES. By this term is understood truths or propositions so clear that they cannot be proved nor contradicted unless by propositions which are still clearer.

That which constitutes the essence of a body or its constituent parts. 8 Term 107. See 5 McLean 63; PATENT.

They are of two kinds: one when the principle is universal, and these are known as axioms or maxims: as, no one can transmit rights which he has not; the accessory follows the principal, etc. The other class are simply called first principles. These principles have known marks by which they may always be recognized. These are—first, that they are so clear that they cannot be proved by anterior and more manifest truths; second, that they are almost universally received; third, that they are so strongly impressed on our minds that we conform ourselves to them whatever may be our avowed opinions.

First principles have their source in the sentiment of our own existence, and that which is in the nature of things. A principle of law is a rule or axiom which is founded in the nature of the subject, and it exists before it is expressed in the form of a rule. Domat, Lois Civiles, liv. prel. t. 1, s. 2; Toullier, tit. prel. n. 17. The right to defend one's self continues as long as an unjust attack, was a principle before it was ever decided by a court: so that a court does not establish but recognizes principles of law.

PRINCIPLES OF CONSTITUTIONAL LAW. See CONSTITUTIONAL LAW.

PRINT. The word includes most of the forms of figures or characters or representations, colored or uncolored, that may be impressed on a yielding surface. 97 U. S. 367; 20 Blatchf. 464; 38 Fed. Rep. 829.

PRINTED FORMS. A court in construing a contract will look at what was originally the printed form and at what was introduced in writing to alter that printed form; 2 C. & M. 539. Words written in a printed form, such as an insurance policy, will in case of doubt have a greater effect than the printed words; 23 Q. B. D. 501.

PRINTER. Of Newspaper. The "printer" is the person whose mechanical skill has, (by means of the type and printing press, etc.), stamped upon the paper the words, sentences and ideas of the author. 6 J. J. Mar. (Ky.) 18.

PRINTING. The art of impressing letters; the art of making books or papers by impressing legible characters.

In patent cases in the circuit court, the taxable costs do not include expenditures for printing, charts, models, exhibits, printed records, briefs, copies of testimony, and the like; 83 Fed. Rep. 183; but the practice varies in different circuits.

See LIBEL; LIBERTY OF THE PRESS; PRESS.

PRIORITY. Precedence; going before.

He who has the precedence in time has the advantage in right, is the maxim of the law; not that time, considered barely in itself, can make any such difference, but because, the whole power over a thing being secured to one person, this bars all others from obtaining a title to it afterwards; 1 Fonbl. Eq. 320.

In the payment of debts, the United States is entitled to priority when the debtor is insolvent or dies and leaves an insolvent estate. The priority was declared to extend to cases in which the insolvent debtor had made a voluntary assignment of all his property, or in which his effects had been attached as an absconding or absent debtor, on which an act of legal bankruptcy had been committed; 1 Kent 243.

Among common creditors, he who has the oldest lien has the preference,—it being a maxim both of law and equity, qui prior est tempore potior est jure; 2 Johns. Ch. 608. See INSOLVENCY.

But in respect to privileged debts, arising ex contractu, existing against a ship or vessel under the general admiralty law, the order of priority is most generally that of the inverse order of their creation,—thus reversing the order of priority generally adopted in the courts of common law. The ground of this inversion of the rule is that the services performed at the latest hour are more efficacious in bringing the vessel and her freightage to their final destination. Each foregoing incumbrance is, therefore, actually benefited by means of the succeeding incumbrance; 16 Post. Law Rep. 1, 204; 17 id. 421. See MARI-TIME LIENS; ASSETS; LIEN.

PRISAGE. An ancient duty or right of the crown of one-tenth of the amount of wine carried by the ships of merchants, aliens, or denizens. 8 Bulstr. 1.

PRISER EN AUTRE LIEU. A taking in another place. A plea in abatement to a writ of replevin.

PRISON. A public building for confining persons, either to insure their production, in court, as accused persons and witnesses, or to punish them as criminals.

The root is French, as is shown by the Norman prisons, prisoners; Kelham, Norm. Fr. Dict.; and Fr. prisons, prisons. Britton, c. 11, de Prisons. Originally it was distinguished from gaol, which was a place for confinement, not for punishment. See Jacob, Dict. Gaol. But at present there is no such distinction.

The United States has no prisons. The joint resolution of September 3, 1789, recommended to the states to authorize state prisons to receive United States prisoners, the latter paying the states for the service. In the absence of a state prison, the marshal, under the jurisdiction of the district judge, may procure a suitable place. See R. S. § 5337, 5339; 9 Cra. 76; PENITENTIARY; GAOL; PRISONER; DETAINER.

PRISON BREAKING. The act by which a prisoner, by force and violence, escapes from a place where he is lawfully in custody. This is an offence at common law. This offence is to be distinguished from rescue (q. v.), which is a deliverance of a prisoner from lawful custody by a third person. 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1065.

To constitute this offence there must be—a lawful commitment of the prisoner on criminal process; Co. 2d Inst. 589; 1 Carr. & M. 295; 2 Ashm. 61; 1 Ld. Raym. 424; see 43 N. J. L. 553; an actual breach with force and violence of the prison, by the prisoner himself, or by others with his privity and procurement; Russ. & R. 458; 1 Russ. Cr. 380; the prisoner must escape; 2 Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 18, s. 12. See 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 607; 4 Bla. Com. 130; Co. 2d Inst. 500; 1 Gabb. Cr. Law 305; Alison, Scotch Law 553; Dalloz, Dict. Efraction; 3 Johns. 449; 5 Metc. Mass. 559. See BREACH OF PRISON; ESCAPE.

PRISON LABOR. In most of the states prisoners convicted of crime are sentenced to hard labor, and in the constitution of the United States and of several of the states, the right to require the services of prisoners is secured by the exception of cases of punishment for crime from the provisions which abolish involuntary servitude.

In some states convict labor is farmed out to contractors, who thereby acquire a right in the prison and its inmates where the former is leased. The state, in order to resume its possession, must compensate the lessee as in other cases of taking private property; 18 Cal. 11. The right of the lessee, however, is subject to the pardoning power; 15 id. 429; and to the legislative power to modify and control the punishment; id.; 55 Mo. 101. A contract by the warden of a penitentiary for the hire of convicts is substantially a contract by the state, and a bill for the specific performance of it will not lie; 70 Ala. 493; 7 Paige 301.

In some states the sale or lease of convict labor is forbidden by constitution or statute. See 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 141, where these provisions are collected. In North Carolina it is unlawful, unless authorized by the court before which the prisoner has been tried, and it has been held that this authority cannot be given at a term other than that at which the prisoner was convicted; 100 N. C. 414.

Where the statute provides as to how the letting of contracts shall be done, the directions as to advertising, etc., are mandatory and not directory; 1 Mich. 438.

As the result of labor agitation there have been attempts by legislation to forbid or regulate strictly the sale of convict-made goods. The Ohio act of May 19, 1894, forbidding any person to sell without license convict-made goods, was held unconstitutional. The court said: "It is not competent for a state legislature to declare that convict-made goods are not articles of traffic and commerce, and then to act upon such declaration, and discriminate against such goods, or exclude them from the state by unfriendly legislation. Whatever congress, either by silence or statute, recognizes as articles of traffic and commerce, must be so received and treated by the several states. There is no act of congress declaring that convict-made goods are not fit for traffic or commerce, and it therefore follows that such goods are the subject of commerce, and when transported from one state to another for sale or exchange, become articles of interstate commerce, and entitled to be protected as such; and any discrimination against such goods in the state where offered for sale is unconstitutional. . . . The act in question is not a police regulation, but an attempt to prevent, or at least to discourage, the importation of convict-made goods from other states, and thereby protect our citizens, laborers, and market against such goods. But if we are in a condition to require such protection, the appeal for relief must be made to congress, which body alone has the power to legally grant such relief." 56 Ohio St. 417.

In Massachusetts a law limiting the production of goods in prison work-shops went into effect on Jan. 1, 1898. It provides that not over thirty per cent. of the number of the inmates of any penal institution in the state having more than one hundred inmates, shall be employed in any one industry, except in the industry of cane-sewing and in the manufacture of umbrellas. See PRISONER; HARD LABOR.

In England, by 60 & 61 Vict. c. 63, the importation of foreign prison-made goods is absolutely prohibited.

PRISON-MADE GOODS. See PRISON LABOR.

PRISONER. One held in confinement against his will.

Lawful prisoners are either prisoners charged with crimes or for a civil liability. Those charged with crimes are either persons accused and not tried; and these are considered innocent, and are therefore entitled to be treated with as little severity as possible, consistently with the certain detention of their persons; they are entitled to their discharge on bail, except in capital cases; or those who have been convicted of crime, whose imprisonment, and the mode of treatment they experience, is intended as a punishment: these are to be treated agreeably to the requisitions of the law, and, in the United States, always with humanity. See PENITENTIARY. Prisoners in civil cases are persons arrested on original or mesne process, and these may generally be discharged on bail; and prisoners in execution, who cannot be discharged except under the insolvent laws.

Persons unlawfully confined are those who are not detained by virtue of some lawful, judicial, legislative, or other proceeding. They are entitled to their immediate discharge on habeas corpus. For the effect of a contract entered into by a prisoner, see 1 Salk. 402, n.; 6 Toullier 82.

Throughout the United States there have grown up abuses in the treatment of prisoners, particularly by the detective force of larger cities, which amount in those cases to a practical denial of the plainest constitutional guaranties of liberty of person and property and of freedom from unreasonable searches. Among these abuses have been the illegal searches of the person of prisoners arrested on bare suspicion, who are often the victims of the mere whim of the arresting officer. The growth of these abuses is promoted by the fact that the large majority of prisoners in whose cases they occur are, through ignorance or poverty, unable to assert their rights.

In a recent case in Illinois the principles governing this subject were thus stated: "An officer may take from a prisoner any articles of property which it is presumable may furnish evidence against him, but money should not be taken unless it is in some way connected with the charge or proof against him, as he is thereby deprived of the means of making his defence. The arresting officer if he finds on the prisoner's body, or otherwise in his possession, either goods or money which he reasonably believes to be connected with the supposed crime as its fruits, or as supplying proofs relating to the transaction, may take and hold them to be disposed of as the court directs." It was there held that whether money found on a prisoner and taken from him by the officer is the fruits of the crime, is a question for the jury; 69 Ill. App. 668. By statute in Iowa an officer making an arrest, or a jailer upon committing a person to jail, may search him and take from him all offensive weapons and property which might be used in effecting an escape, but he has no right to take from him watches and money in no way connected with crime; 65 Ia. 666, where it was said: "Where a party submits to a search of his person by an officer, it cannot be said that the search was with his consent, because he makes no physical resistance: when the search is completed and the fruits thereof are retained by the officer, it would require a strong showing to hold that this was with the consent of the prisoner."

Where money had been taken from a prisoner and an effort was made to reach it by garnishment against the officer, it was held that it was illegally taken, not being connected with the offence charged or necessary as evidence of the crime; but an application for a mandamus to compel the restoration of the money by the officer was denied because the propriety of its restoration was the subject of litigation under the attachment; 92 Ala. 102; S. C. 13 L. R. A. 120.

Pieces of silver intended for the manufacture of counterfeit coin were held to have been properly taken by the sheriff from the person who was carrying them to the place of manufacture, and it was held that the owner could not sustain trover therefor against the sheriff; 21 Vt. 9, where it was held by Redfield, J., that the base metal was properly detained both as evidence and because from its character it was, "so to speak, outlawed, and common plunder." In New Hampshire it was held that "if a prisoner has about his person money, or other articles of value, by means of which, if left in his possession, he might obtain tools or implements, or assistance, or weapons, with which to effect his escape, the officer arresting him may seize and hold such property for a time, without being liable for a conversion of the property, if he acts in good faith and for the purposes aforesaid. It is a question of fact in such cases for the jury, whether the officer taking such property from his prisoner, acted in good faith and for a proper purpose, or in bad faith, with an improper and unlawful purpose." 47 N. H. 482.

It has been held that United States officials have no right to confiscate money found on federal prisoners, and when it has been done and the money paid into the treasury, it may be recovered back by suit against the United States under the act of March 3, 1887, 1 Supp. 559; 77 Fed. Rep. 821.

In England it has been held that an officer who arrests a prisoner has no right to take from him money which he has about him unless it is in some way connected with the offence with which he is charged, as he thereby deprives him of the means of making his defence; 7 C. & P. 138, 488, 515; and it was also so held with respect to a watch and other articles taken by a police officer at the time of arrest; id. 447. In this case the indictment was for rape, and it was said by Patteson, J.: "Certainly the property must be given up; it has nothing whatever to do with the charge. It ought not to have been taken." And Gurney, B., said: "It should not have been taken; it must be delivered up to the prisoner himself." See SEARCH.

Handcuffing an accused person arrested on suspicion, not yet put upon his trial, was characterized at the hearing of a prisoner before a Manchester magistrate in England as degrading and improper, and in the unreported case of Norman v. Smith at the Manchester Assizes, in 1890, a plaintiff was awarded £15 damage for being wrongfully handcuffed; 29 Ch. Leg. News 88. It was laid down as early as 1835 that handcuffing could only be justified in cases when it was necessary to prevent the prisoner from escaping when he has attempted to escape; 4 B. & C. 596. Recently Lord Russell, C. J., remarked that "handcuffing was only justifiable where reasonable necessity existed, and if it were resorted to in the absence of such necessity, the person so treated might bring an action to recover damages for such a grievous indignity." 59 J. P. 393. In commenting on these cases it is said that handcuffs may be justified when the prisoner is of notoriously bad character, violent or dangerous, or threatens or assaults the constable, or the offence is of a grave nature, or when there is an attempt to escape. In the absence of such grounds or in case of trivial offences he should not be. Nor should women or aged prisoners; 29 Ch. Leg. News 88. See FETTERS.

A party waives his constitutional right "to be confronted with the witness against him," by admitting that witnesses, if present, would testify to certain facts stated in the affidavit of the district attorney for a continuance, and thereby preventing a postponement of the trial; 2 Mont. 239; or by wrongfully keeping away the witnesses; 7 Am. L. Reg. 9.

Bertillon System. The increase of habitual criminals in modern times has given additional interest to the various expedients for their identification, and records of various kinds are kept of all persons confined as prisoners for criminal offences. The simplest and most natural expedient of photographing all such persons gives rise to the "rogues' gallery," which is now, in most cities, a prominent institution in connection with the criminal administration. But an improved method which is considered the most effectual, is what is known as the Bertillon system of anthropometrical measurements. This system rests upon three distinct bases which it is said by M. Bertillon, Chief of the Central Bureau of Identification of France since 1882, have been shown by ten years' experience to be unimpeachable. (1) The almost absolute immutability of the human frame after the twentieth year of age; the growth thereafter, being only of the thigh bone, is so little that it is easy to make allowance for it. (2) The diversity of dimension of the human skeleton of different subjects is so great that it is difficult, if not impossible, to find two individuals whose bony structure is even sufficiently alike to make confusion between them possible. (3) The facility and comparative precision with which certain dimensions of the skeleton may be measured in the living subject by calipers of simple construction. The measurements which, as the result of minute criticism, have been preferred, are as follows: (1) Height (man standing); (2) reach (finger tip to finger tip); (3) trunk (man sitting); (4) length; (5) width; (6) length of right ear; (7) width of right ear; (8) length of left foot; (9) length of left middle finger; (10) length of left little finger; (11) length of left forearm.

Measurements are classified and grouped and preserved in an elaborate card index. The French statistics indicate that practically the result of this system is certainly in the recognition of a criminal by measurements. It has been adopted by statute in the states of Massachusetts and New York, and permitted by statute in Pennsylvania, and adopted by prison regulations in Illinois, Ohio, and some United States military posts. There is a bureau of identification on this system in Chicago to which resort is had by the police of any cities, and the use of the system is rapidly extending in the United States. See the work of M. Bertillon on his System of Identification; Rep. U. S. Comm. Education, 1895-6, vol. 2, ch. 23, where the system is fully described and the statutes on the subjects are collected.

TIARY.

The subject of granting a parole to convicts, independently of the exercise of the power of pardon, is the subject of an able report made to the American Bar Association, 1898, by Hon. J. Franklin Fort of Newark, N. J.

Acts have been passed in Alabama, California, Colorado, Connecticut, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, Nebraska, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Utah, and Wisconsin. Iowa, Vermont, Virginia, and West Virginia have a system of conditional pardon which has a very similar operation. Maryland has a statute which permits the trial court to parole any person convicted of a crime not capital, by which he is not sentenced, but is subject to recall for sentence at any time. Nearly all of these acts have been passed within the last five years. None of them extend to any person convicted of murder in the first or second degree, and most of them are limited to persons serving a term for a first offence. In some states there is a further limitation to persons between the ages of 16 and 25 or 30 at the time of their conviction. The committee report that the most carefully considered statute is that of Indiana passed in 1897.

The same committee reports on indeterminate sentences, which it defines as "sentences imposed by the court without fixing a definite period of limitation or term of imprisonment, but which simply directs that the convict be imprisoned or placed in the custody of the prison authorities to be held for not less than the minimum nor longer than the maximum fixed by law for the offence for which the prisoner stands convicted." New York, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana have passed such acts which have worked well in practice. They are mostly confined to prisoners who are first offenders and are between the ages of 16 and 30 years. The committee reported that it was not willing to give this system its unconditional approval, though it might prove successful in connection with the parole system provided the judge who sentenced the prisoner should fix a maximum term. Indeterminate sentences as defined by the committee have been sustained as constitutional in 43 Ohio 629; 148 Ill. 413; 167 id. 447; 49 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 894; 167 Mass. 144. They have been held unconstitutional in 88 Mich. 219.

The committee report that after careful investigation and correspondence with the executives of various states the system of paroling convicts has been beneficial.

In England, by statute, a convict undergoing a term of servitude may be set at large by a license granted by the home secretary, who may revoke the license at any time. It is subject to the conditions indorsed upon it, which generally are that the holder shall produce it when called upon to do so by a magistrate or police officer, shall abstain from any violation of the law, shall not habitually associate with notoriously bad characters, and shall not lead an idle and vicious life without visible means of obtaining an honest livelihood. The holder is obliged to report his place of residence to the general officer of the district where he resides and report himself there once a month. When he removes from one district to another, he must notify his removal to the general officer of the old district and report his address to the general officer of the new district. If a licensed convict is indicted and convicted of any offence his license is forfeited thereby. When forfeited the convict is liable to undergo a term of penal servitude equal to the unexpired portion of his original term. See TICKET-OF-LEAVE; SENTENCE.

PRISONER OF WAR. One who has been captured while fighting under the banner of some state. He is a prisoner although never confined in a prison.

In modern times, prisoners are treated with more humanity than formerly: the individual captor has now no personal right to his prisoner. Prisoners are under the superintendence of the government, and they are now frequently exchanged. See 1 Kent 14.

The Brussels Conference, 1874, laid down rules which are generally accepted. Lawful combatants become prisoners of war when captured; and so may such non-combatants as guides, messengers, newspaper correspondents, balloonists, telegraphers, and contractors who are with their army and so clearly associated with it as to be rendering it direct service; Risley, Law of War 129. Important public officials may be captured in any place where acts of war are lawful. Sailors may become prisoners of war, but surgeons and chaplains are considered as exempt; id.

It is a general rule that a prisoner is out of the protection of the laws of the state so far that he can have no civil remedy under them, and he can, therefore, maintain no action. But his person is protected against all unlawful acts. Buc. Abr. Abatement (B 3), Aliens (D). See PAROLE.

PRIVACY. The right of privacy has been defined as the right of an individual to withhold himself and his property from public scrutiny, if he so chooses. The doctrine is of recent growth, and is as yet insufficiently defined. It is said to be incapable of exact definition, and to exist only so far as its assertion is consistent with law or public policy, and in a proper case equity will interfere, if there is no remedy at law, to prevent an injury threatened by the invasion of, or infringement upon, this right from motives of curiosity, gain, or malice. Such remedy has been invoked to prevent the publication of oral lectures delivered by a professor; 12 App. Cas. 326; 3 L. J. Ch. 209; or copies of private drawings and etchings; 1 MacN. & G. 25; or a letter in the possession of a person by whom it was received, without the writer's consent, where the publication is not necessary for the vindication of the receiver or the public interests; 2 Ves. & B. 19; 2 Atk. 342; Ambl. 737; 2 Swanst. 402; 4 Duer 379; 2 Dush 480; a telegram of a private nature; 50 How. Pr. 194; a scientific, artistic, or literary composition kept for the private use of the composer; 4 Burr. 2303, 2330, 2406; 2 Eden 329; 2 Meriv. 435; 8 Pet. 501; a portrait in a newspaper; 6 Misc. Rep. 290; or a photograph by the photographer; 40 Ch. Div. 345; 64 Fed. Rep. 280. But such publication of a photograph or portrait will not be prevented where the person is a "public character," such as a foremost inventor of world-wide reputation; 64 Fed. Rep. 280, reversing 57 id. 434, on this point. The case on appeal held that the publication of such a photograph will not be restrained. The doctrine prevailed one time that an injunction against the publication of letters could only be granted where they were of the nature of a literary composition; 3 Edw. Ch. 515; 3 Barb. Ch. 320; but this doctrine no longer prevails; 4 Duer 379. In many cases the unauthorized use of one's name, where it will tend to cause irreparable damage, will be enjoined, as a recommendation of a medicinal preparation by a physician; 27 Abb. N. C. 402; see 11 Beav. 561; a use of a person's name as director of a corporation; 10 Beav. 561; or a publisher's statement that one is a member of a bankrupt firm; 7 L. R. Eq. 488; a false statement of a dispute pending a suit in relation thereto; 52 L. J. Ch. 134; 8 W. R. 734.

The property of an author or composer of any work, whether of literature, art, or science, in such work, unpublished and kept for his private use or pleasure, cannot be questioned; 1 MacN. & G. 42.

Every clerk employed in a merchant's counting house is under an implied contract that he will not make public that which he learns in the execution of his duty as clerk; 2 Hare 398; 1 MacN. & G. 45.

The court will interfere by injunction to prevent a party's availing himself in any manner of a title arising out of the violation of right or any breach of confidence;

1 MacN. & G. 25.

A photographer who had taken a negative likeness of A, for money, was restrained from selling or exhibiting copies, both on the ground that there was an implied contract not to use the negative for such purposes, and also that such sale or exhibition was a breach of confidence. The right to enjoin the copying of a photograph does not depend on the existence of a property right; the court of chancery has always had original jurisdiction to prevent what it considered and treated as a wrong, whether arising from the violation of a right or from breach of contract or confidence; 40 Ch. Div. 334, following 1 MacN. & G. 25.

Where a party was employed to make a certain number of copies of a picture, his employment carried with it the necessary implication that he would not make more copies for himself or sell the additional copies in competition with his employer. Such conduct on his part is a gross breach of contract and a gross breach of faith, which clearly entitles the employer to an injunction whether there is a copyright on the picture or not; 19 L. R. Q. B. Div. 639.

Where the defendant was intrusted by the plaintiff with the secret of making a kind of medicine which the plaintiff called a patent medicine, though he had no patent, it was held that there was such a relation between the plaintiff and the defendant and such a breach of contract or breach of faith on the part of the defendant as would entitle the plaintiff to an injunction restraining the use of the secret by the defendant; 9 Hare 241 (approved in 19 L. R. Q. B. Div. 639). In 9 Hare 241, the court said that different grounds have been assigned for the exercise of the jurisdiction; in some cases it has been referred to property, in others to contract, and in others again it has been treated as founded upon trust or confidence, but upon whatever grounds the jurisdiction is founded, the authorities leave no doubt as to the exercise of it.

In Prince Albert v. Strange, De G. & S. 652, and, on appeal, 1 MacN. & G. 23, it was held that the reproduction of etchings belonging to the plaintiff and Queen Victoria, and made for their own pleasure, would be restrained, and the defendants would also be restrained from publishing a description of them, whether more or less limited or summary, and whether in the form of a catalogue or otherwise.

An author of letters or papers of whatever kind, whether they be letters of business or private letters, or literary compositions, has a common and exclusive copyright therein unless he has unequivocally dedicated them to the public or some private person, but no person has the right to publish them without his consent unless such publication be required to establish a personal right or claim or to vindicate character. The government has perhaps a right to publish official letters addressed to it by public officers; but no private person has such a right without the sanction of the government; 2 Story 100.

If the recipient of a letter attempt to publish such letter on occasions not justifiable, equity will prevent the publication as a breach of private rights. . . . The general property, and the general rights incident to property, belong to the writer, whether the letter is a literary composition, or a familiar letter, or contains details of business. Third persons standing in no privity with either party are not entitled to publish letters to subserve their own private purposes of interest or curiosity or passion; 2 Story 111. The writer of letters, though written without any purpose of profit or any idea of literary property, possesses such a right of property in them that they cannot be published without his consent, unless the purposes of justice, civil or criminal, require the publication; 2 Swanst. 418, Romilly, arguendo; but see High, Inj. § 1012, contra.

This subject of the right to privacy was much discussed in the case Schuyler v. Curtis, in which an injunction was sought to prevent certain persons from making a statue of a deceased woman and exhibiting it at the Columbian Exposition, the avowed object being to honor her as a philanthropist and reformer. A decree for an injunction entered by the supreme court of New York was affirmed by the general term, but was reversed by the court of appeals; 147 N. Y. 431, reversing 70 Hun 598; s. c. 2 Am. & Eng. Dec. Eq. 462, and 24 N.Y. Supp. 512 [1893]. In this case the question whether the action contemplated was a violation of the right of privacy was discussed, and the conclusion reached by a majority of the court that "the individual right of privacy which any person has during his life dies with the person, and any right of privacy which survives is a right pertaining to the living only," and that "any privilege of surviving relatives of a deceased person to protect his memory exists for the benefit of the living to protect their feelings and to prevent a violation of their own rights in the character and memory of the deceased." It was held that "persons attempting to raise a statue or bust of a woman who is no longer living, if their motive is to do honor to her, and if the work is to be done in an appropriate manner, cannot be restrained by her surviving relatives from carrying out such a purpose, merely because they had not the honor of her personal acquaintance or friendship while she was living, or, at the most, had merely been associated with her philanthropic enterprises. The mere fact that a person's feelings may be injured by the erection of a statue to a deceased relative was decided not to be a ground for an injunction against its erection, unless there is reasonable and plausible ground for the existence of this mental distress and injury. It must not be the creation of mere caprice, nor of pure fancy, nor the result of a supersensitive and morbid mental organization dwelling with undue emphasis upon the exclusive and sacred character of this right of privacy."

The opposite view was presented by Gray, J., who dissented:

"Upon the findings in this case, I think we are bound to say that the purpose of the defendants was to commit an act which was an unauthorized invasion of the plaintiff's right to the preservation of the name and memory of Mrs. Schuyler intact from public comment and criticism. As the representative of all her immediate living relatives, it was competent for him to maintain action to preserve them from becoming public property, as would be the case if a statue were erected by strangers for public exhibition under such classification, with respect to the characteristic virtues of the deceased, as they judged befitting. I cannot see why the right of privacy is not a form of property, as much as is the right of complete immunity of one's person."

In 1893 it was held in a New York case that an injunction will lie to restrain the publication of the plaintiff's picture in a newspaper, with an invitation to the readers of the newspaper to vote upon the question of the popularity of the plaintiff as compared with that of another person whose picture was also published; 26 N. Y. Supp. 808.

In an article in 4 Harv. Law Rev. 193, by Samuel D. Warren and Louis Brandeis, the following are suggested as the limitations to the right to privacy:—

1. The right to privacy does not prohibit any publication of matter which is of public or general interest.

2. The right to privacy does not prohibit the publication of any matter, if in itself not private, when the publication is made under circumstances which would render it a privileged publication according to the law of slander and libel.

3. The law would probably not grant any redress for the invasion of privacy by oral publication in the absence of special damage.

4. The right to privacy ceases upon the publication of facts by the individual, or with his consent.

5. The truth of the matter published does not afford a defence.

6. The absence of "malice" in the publisher does not afford a defence.

PRIVATE. Affecting or belonging to individuals, as distinct from the public generally. Not clothed with office.

PRIVATE ACT. See STATUTE; GENERAL LAW; PUBLIC ACTS.

PRIVATE BILL. In legislative parlance, is a project of a private act; the draught, as presented in the legislature, of a measure which, when passed, will affect individuals only. The expression is in general use only as respects bills in legislation: there is no distinction of public and private bills of exchange, bills in equity, etc. Abbott.

PRIVATE BILL OFFICE. An office of the British parliament where the business of securing private acts of parliament is conducted.

PRIVATE CARRIER. One who agrees in some special case with some private individual to carry for hire, as distinguished from a common carrier who holds himself out to all persons who choose to employ him as ready to carry for hire. Story, Cont. 752 a; 37 N. Y. 342. See CARRIER.

PRIVATE CHARITY. See PUBLIC CHARITY.

PRIVATE CORPORATION. See CORPORATION.

PRIVATE DWELLING-HOUSE. A covenant which requires a house to be used as a private dwelling-house only, is broken by its being used as a school or dancing academy; 25 L. J. Q. B. 264; or as an institution for educating the daughters of missionaries; 47 L. J. Ch. 230; or as a club; id.; or as a hotel or lodging-house; 53 id. 692; but not by a public auction of the furniture of the house; 24 W. R. 485.

PRIVATE INTERNATIONAL LAW. A name used by some writers to indicate that branch of the law which is now commonly called conflict of laws.

Mr. Dicey, in 6 Law Quart. Rev., says: This department of law has been called by various names, none of which are free from objection. The defect in the use of the term "conflict of laws" is that the supposed "conflict" is fictitious, and the expression has the further radical effect of concealing from view the circumstance that the question by the law of what country a given transaction shall be governed is often a matter too plain to admit of doubt. The term has been defended on account of its applicability, not to any conflict between the laws themselves, but to a question in the mind of the judge as to which of two systems of law should govern a given case. This, however, gives a new and forced sense to a received expression.

The term private international law is convenient and manageable. It brings into light the great and increasing harmony between the rules as to the application of foreign laws which prevail in all civilized countries, but the term is at bottom incorrect. The words private international law should mean a private species of the body of rules which prevails between one nation and another, but nothing of this sort is, however, intended, and the unfortunate employment of the phrase has led to endless misconception of the true nature of this department of legal science. Further, it confounds two classes of rules which are generically different from each other. The principles of international law, properly so called, are international because they prevail among nations, but they are not in the proper sense laws. On the other hand, the principles of private international law are laws in the strictest sense of that term, but they are not international, for they are laws which determine the private rights of one individual as against another, and these individuals may or may not belong to one and the same nation. The expression International Private Law is no doubt a slight improvement, but the name has the insuperable fault of giving to the adjective, international, a meaning different from the sense in which it is generally and correctly employed.

The same learned author further approaches the subject from the standpoint adopted by English judges when it is their duty to deliver a judgment on any question which may raise a so-called conflict of laws. If the case falls within the terms of any English statute there is no further room for discussion. If it does not fall within a statute, the next inquiry for the judge is whether it is covered by any English precedent which has the authority of law, and if it does, discussion is again closed. If, lastly, it falls neither within the terms of a statute nor under any principle established by authority, English judges look for guidance to foreign decisions, to the opinions of jurists, or to arguments drawn from general principles. See INTERNATIONAL LAW; CONFLICT OF LAWS; INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE LAW.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS. The United States obtained from the Republic of Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, on the 2d of February, 1848, and by the treaty of Masilla, known as the Gadsden purchase, dated December 30, 1853, all the property included in what is now the states of California, Colorado, Utah, Wyoming, and Nebraska, and the territories of new Mexico and Arizona; and by these treaties the United States agreed to protect and recognize the rights of property of every kind belonging to Mexicans that was situated in the ceded territory. Under the stipulations contained in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, congress, on March 3, 1851, passed a law to determine the validity of private land grants in the state of California; and on March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L. 854), it passed a law for the settlement of title to private land grants under both treaties, entitled "An act to establish a court of private land claims and to provide for the settlement of private land claims in certain states and territories." By this act all persons claiming rights protected by the treaties, whether their title was complete and perfect or incomplete and inchoate, are given the right to present their claims and have the validity thereof ascertained and determined by the court.

These private land claims originated from grants and cessions made by Spain to various settlers, emigrants, and citizens up to the treaty of Cordoba, August 24, 1821 (which was the initiation of the severance of Mexico from Spain, and which culminated, after many desultory revolutions, in the complete independence of Mexico, by the adoption of the new constitution on October 23, 1835), and from various sales and grants, made by the Mexican government, both under the monarchy and under the republic, from 1835 down to the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo on February 2, 1848.

These various sales and grants of public lands may be conveniently divided into the first and second epoch of the Central System of Government, beginning on Oct. 3, 1835, when all legislatures were abolished and departmental councils (juntas) were established, and (December 29, 1836) when the new constitution was adopted, which divided the national territory into departments, provided for the appointment of governors and the election of departmental councils and defined their powers, and running down to August 4, 1846, when the constitution of 1824 was re-established. It was at this time (August 18, 1846) that General Kearney entered Santa Fe and took possession of New Mexico in the name of the United States. This period marks the end of the first epoch of the central system of government.

From that time, March 17, 1853, there was a succession of revolutions and counter-revolutions, culminating in the election of Santa Anna as president of the republic, from which time dates the beginning of the second epoch of the central system of government. Many of these claims are conflicting in their nature; many of them which were granted by one government were declared null upon the inauguration of another, and as each revolution succeeded the other, attempts were made to undo everything that had been done during the lease of power by the other forces, so that the titles to the lands of that portion of the United States obtained through the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Gadsden purchase, having for their foundation the grants made by Spain and the various succeeding governments of Mexico, were in an almost hopeless state of confusion and uncertainty, rendering the passage of the act of March 3, 1891, establishing the court of private land claims, for the purpose of passing upon these titles, at once a necessity and a boon.

For a history and compilation of the various Spanish and Mexican land laws, see Reynolds on Spanish and Mexican land laws, passim. This work, compiled by the United States attorney for the court of private land claims, contains, in addition to the court of private land claims act and the rules of practice in that court, an historical sketch of new Spain and New Mexico and old Mexico under its Spanish dominion and subsequently, together with a translation of all of the Spanish and Mexican land laws, and to any one interested in these matters it will be found to be an invaluable aid.

Court of Private Land Claims. By the act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. L. 854), congress created a court of private land claims. The court is composed of a chief justice and four associate justices, appointed by the president of the United States. The United States are represented by a United States attorney appointed by the president to protect the interests of the government in litigation before that court. The jurisdiction and method of procedure is specifically pointed out in section 9 of the act. The jurisdiction embraces all claims for lands within the limits of the territory derived by the United States from the republic of Mexico, and now embraced within the territories of New Mexico, Arizona, or Utah, or within the states of Nevada, Colorado, or Wyoming, claimed by virtue of any Spanish or Mexican grant, concession, warrant, or survey, which the United States are bound to recognize and confirm by virtue of the treaties of cession of said country by Mexico to the United States, which at the date of the passage of the said act had not been confirmed by act of congress or otherwise finally decided upon lawful authority and are not already complete and perfect. The action is begun by filing a petition, whereupon procedure is had in accordance with the act and in accordance with the rules of practice laid down by the court. If a title shall be found to be perfect and be confirmed, the confirmation shall be for so much land only as is found to be held by a perfect title, excepting any part of such land that shall have been disposed of by the United States, and always subject to and not to affect any conflicting private interests, rights, or claims held or claimed adversely to any such claim or title, or adversely to the holder of any such claim or title. No confirmation of claims or title shall have any effect other or further than as a release of all claims of title by the United States; and no private right of any person as between himself and other claimants or persons in respect of any such lands, shall be in any wise affected thereby. It is also provided that the head of the Department of Justice may, through the United States attorney for the court or private land claims, file in the court a petition against the holder or possessor of any claim or land within these states or territories who shall not have voluntarily come in under the provisions of this act for the purpose of settling the title to the claim held by him. It is provided, also, that any party against whom the court shall in any case decide, may appeal to the supreme court of the United States, and that the United States may appeal in case of the confirmation of any title, such appeals to be taken within six months after the rendition of the decision. Upon any such appeal, the supreme court is required to try the case de novo. Whenever a decision of confirmation shall have become final, the clerk of the court is required to certify that fact to the commissioner of the general land office, together with a copy thereof, and the commissioner is required thereupon, without delay, to cause the tract so confirmed to be surveyed at the cost of the United States, and when this shall have been done, he is required to give notice thereof, by publication in Spanish and in English, in newspapers published in the capital of the territory or state. Such survey shall be open to public inspection for ninety days, and if, at the expiration of that period, no objection shall have been filed, shall be approved and forwarded to the general land office. If objection be made, the survey is to be forwarded, together with such objections and the proofs thereof and report thereon. The commissioner of the general land office is required to transmit the survey to the court of final decision, by which, if found to be correct, it shall be approved, and if found incorrect, shall be corrected. When any survey is finally approved by the court, it is required to be returned to the commissioner of the general land office, who is required to issue a patent to the proper party; the neglect to file a petition in this case for the period of two years is a bar to the claim, except in cases of minors, married women, or persons non compos mentis, in which case the court is required to appoint a guardian ad litem for such persons. It is provided that no claim shall be allowed unless it appear to be upon a title lawfully and regularly derived from the government of Spain or Mexico, or from some of the states of the republic of Mexico having lawful authority to make grants of lands, and one that, if not then complete and perfect at the date of the acquisition of the territory by the United States, the claimant would have had a lawful right to make perfect had the territory not been acquired by the United States, and such that the United States are bound, upon the principles of public law or by the provisions of the treaty of cession, to respect and permit to become complete and perfect if the same was not at said date already complete and perfect. No claim can be allowed that will interfere with or overthrow any just and unextinguished Indian title or right. No confirmation confers title to mines or minerals, unless the grantee has become otherwise entitled thereto in law or in equity, but all such mines and minerals remain the property of the United States. No claim hitherto decided by congress shall be confirmed. Private rights of persons, as between each other, are not concluded by a decree under this act, but only the rights as between the United States and claimants, and that only for the purpose of releasing to the claimant such right or title to the land as the United States may have acquired from the treaties. No confirmation can be made for more than eleven square leagues to the original grantees.

There are other minor and unimportant exceptions and reservations, for which see the act itself.

By the original act this court was to cease to exist on December 31, 1893, but its life was subsequently extended to December 31, 1897, and again to March 4, 1899 (Sup. Rev. Stats. vol. 2, pp. 417 and 556). See UNITED STATES COURTS.

PRIVATE PROPERTY. As used in a constitution, the term applies to such property as belongs absolutely to an individual, and of which he has the exclusive right of disposition; property of a specific, fixed, and tangible nature, capable of being had in possession and transmitted to another, as houses, lands, and chattels; 29 Miss. 32.

PRIVATE SCHOOLS. See PUBLIC SCHOOLS.

PRIVATE STATUTES. See PUBLIC ACTS.

PRIVATE TRUSTEE. See PUBLIC TRUSTEE.

PRIVATE WAY. An incorporeal hereditament of a real nature, entirely different to a common highway. The right of going over another man's ground. 98 Pa. 5. See WAY.

PRIVATE WRONGS (otherwise termed Civil injuries). The violation of public or private rights, when considered in reference to the injury sustained by the individual, and consequently as subjects for civil redress or compensation.

PRIVATEER. A vessel owned by one or more private individuals, armed and equipped at his or their expense, for the purpose of carrying on a maritime war, by the authority of one of the belligerent parties.

A privateer is a private vessel commissioned by the state by the issue of a letter of marque to its owner to carry on all hostilities by sea, presumably according to the laws of war. She continues under the control of her private owner, and her crew are under the same discipline as the crew of a merchant ship. Formerly a state issued letters of marque to its own subjects, and to those of neutral states as well, but a privateersman who accepted letters of marque from both belligerents was regarded as a pirate.

For the purpose of encouraging the owners of private armed vessels, they are usually allowed to appropriate to themselves the property they capture, or, at least, a large proportion of it; 1 Kent 96. See 2 Dall. 56; 1 Wheat. 46; 2 Gall. 19, 56, 526; 1 Mass. 365; 3 Wash. C. C. 209.

By the Declaration of Paris (q. v.) privateering was abolished, but the United States, Spain, Mexico, and Venezuela did not accede to this declaration.

The creation of a volunteer navy by a belligerent was not prohibited by the Declaration of Paris. A volunteer cruiser is a vessel loaned by her private owner to the state. Her officers are commissioned and her crew are subject to the discipline of a ship of war; she only resembles a privateer in that her prizes belong to her owner. In 1870, when Prussia proposed the creation of a volunteer navy, the French government protested, but the English government held that such a navy was to be distinguished from privateers, and that their employment was no evasion of the Declaration of Paris; but from this opinion Phillimore decidedly dissented; Risley, Law of War 112.

A merchant vessel without any commission may become a lawful combatant in self-defence, and if she captures her assailant, the latter may be condemned as lawful prize.

During the civil war in America, congress authorized the president to issue letters of marque, but he did not do so. The confederates offered their letters of marque to foreigners, but they were not accepted. The confederate vessels were commissioned as of its regular navy. Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law.

The president's proclamation at the outbreak of the Spanish-American war, 1898, declared that privateering would not be resorted to by the United States.

It has been thought that the constitutional provision empowering congress to issue letters of marque deprives it of the power to join in a permanent treaty abolishing privateering. See 28 Am. L. Rev. 615; 24 id. 902; 19 Law Mag. & Rev. 35.

PRIVATION. A taking away or withdrawing. Co. Litt. 289.

PRIVEMENT ENCEINTE (L. Fr.). A term used to signify that a woman is pregnant, but not quick with child. See WOOD, Inst. 662; ENCEINTE; FETUS; PREGNANCY.

PRIVIES. Persons who are partakers or have an interest in any action or thing, or any relation to another. Wood, Inst. b. 2, c. 3, p. 255; Co. Litt. 271 a.

There are several kinds of privies: namely, privies in blood, as the heir is to the ancestor; privies in representation, as is the executor or administrator to the deceased; privies in estate, as the relation between the donor and donee, lessor and lessee; privies in respect to contracts; and privies on account of estate and contract together. Prest. Conv. 327. Privies have also been divided into privies in fact and privies in law. 8 Co. 42 b. See Viner, Abr. Privy; 5 Com. Dig. 347; Hamm. Part. 131; Woodf. Landl. & T. 279; 1 Dane, Abr. c. 1, art. 6. The latter are created by the law casting land upon a person, as in escheat; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 189.

PRIVILEGE. Exemption from such burdens as others are subjected to. 24 N. J. L. 557. See 67 Tex. 542; 123 Mass. 519.

In Civil Law. A right which the nature of a debt gives to a creditor, and which entitles him to be preferred before other creditors. Dalloz, Dict. Privilege; Domat, Lois Civ. liv. 2, t. 1, s. 4, n. 1; 43 La. Ann. 1078, 1194.

Privilege is "a real right in a thing (jus in re) springing from the nature of a debt which has been contracted with reference to that thing, and securing the debt by a preference on the proceeds of the thing when it is sold under legal process." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 86.

"A mortgage under the civil law is to all intents and purposes what it is in equity in the English law or the law of Connecticut, a security for a debt given by the agreement of the debtor. But a debtor cannot, by his mere agreement, proprio vigore, confer a privilege.

"If he contracts a debt, which by its nature has a privilege under the law, then the privilege exists, as a method of securing the debt. It inures in the thing with reference to which the debt has been contracted, follows it into the hands of third persons (in the absence of some law of recedation providing to the contrary), and as a rule would prime a mortgage of the same property." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 87.

"The one is legal; the other conventional. This former is sometimes called by the civilians a privileged hypothecation; the latter a mere hypothecation." Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 88.

The civil law privilege became, by adoption of the admiralty courts, the admiralty lien; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 89; 19 How. 82, 90; 148 U. S. 1.

Creditors of the same rank of privileges are paid in concurrence, that is, on an equal footing. Privileges may exist either in movables or immovables, or in both at once. They are general or special, on certain movables. The debts which are privileged on all the movables in general are the following, which are paid in this order. Funeral charges. Law charges, which are such as are occasioned by the prosecution of a suit before the courts. But this name applies more particularly to costs, which the party cast has to pay to the party gaining the cause. It is in favor of these only that the law grants the privilege. Charges, of whatever nature, occasioned by the last sickness, concurrently among those to whom they are due. See LAST SICKNESS. The wages of servants for the year past, and so much as is due for the current year. Supplies of provisions made to the debtor or his family during the last six months by retail dealers, such as bakers, butchers, grocers, and during the last year by keepers of boarding-houses and taverns. The salaries of clerks, secretaries, and other persons of that kind. Dotal rights due to wives by their husbands.

The debts which are privileged on particular movables are—the debt of a workman or artisan, for the price of his labor, on the movable which he has repaired or made, if the thing continues still in his possession; that debt on the pledge which is in the creditor's possession; the carrier's charges and accessory expenses on the thing carried; the price due on movable effects, if they are yet in the possession of the purchaser; and the like. See LIEN.

As to privileges on movables, see a good summary in 1 Stims. Am. Stat. L. § 4662, and compare with the texts.

Creditors who have a privilege on movables in Louisiana are (1) vendors for purchase money, (2) architects, mechanics, contractors, etc., for construction, rebuilding and repair of houses, etc., (3) material men, (4) those who have worked by the job in the manner required by law or police regulation on levees, bridges, ditches, and roads of a proprietor; Code §§ 3248-51.

In regard to privilege, Domat says, "We do not reckon in the number of privileges the preference which the creditor has on the movables that have been given him in a pawn, and which are in his custody. The privilege of a creditor is the distinguishing right which the nature of his credit gives him, and which makes him to be preferred before other creditors, even those who are prior in time, and who have mortgages." Domat, pt. 1, lib. iii. tit. i. sec. v.

These privileges were of two kinds: one gave a preference on all the goods, without any particular assignment on any one thing; the other secures to the creditors their security on certain things, and not on the other goods.

Among creditors who are privileged, there is no priority of time, but each one is in the order of his privilege, and all creditors who have a privilege of the same kind take proportionately, although their debts be of different dates. And all privileges have equally a preference over those of an inferior class, and over debts which do not have this favored character, whether subsequent or antecedent in point of time.

The vendor of immovable property, for which payment has not been made, is preferred before creditors of the purchaser, and all other persons, as to the thing sold. By the Roman law, this principle applies equally to movables and immovables; and the seller may seize upon the property in the hands of his vendee, or wherever he can find it.

So, too, a person who has lent money to repair a thing, or to make improvements, has this privilege. And this, though he lends to workmen or architects, etc., if it be done with the knowledge of the owner.

Carriers have a privilege not only for the price of carriage, but for money paid on account of the goods.

Landlords have a privilege for the rents due from their tenants even on furniture of the under-tenants, if there be a sub-lease. But not if payment has been made to the tenant by an immediate lessor; although a payment made by the sub-tenant to the landlord would be good as against the tenant.

The privilege was lost by a novation, or by anything in the original contract which showed that the vendor had taken some other security inconsistent with the privilege. See Domat, pt. i. lib. iii. tit. i. sec. v.

See Dalloz, Dict. Privilege; LIEN; LAST SICKNESS; PREFERENCE.

IN MARITIME LAW. An allowance to the master of a ship of the general nature of prize, being compensation, or rather a gratuity, customary in certain trades, and which the law assumes to be a fair and equitable allowance, because the contract on both sides is made under the knowledge of such usage by the parties.

PRIVILEGE FROM ARREST. Privilege from arrest on civil process.

It is either permanent, as in case of ambassadors, public ministers, and their servants, the royal family and servants, peers and peeresses, etc., or temporary, as in case of members of both houses of congress, and of the state legislature, who are privileged eundo, manendo, et redeundo; 1 Kent 243; Cooley, Const. Lim. 163; 8 R. I. 43; see 2 Stra. 985; practising barristers, while actually engaged in the business of the court; 2 Dowl. 51; 1 H. Bla. 636; 1 M. & W. 488; 6 Ad. & E. 623; a clergyman in England whilst going to church, performing services, and returning; 7 Bingh. 320; witnesses and parties to a suit and bail, eundo, manendo, et redeundo; 5 B. & Ad. 1078; 6 Dowl. 682; 1 Maule & S. 638; 1 M. & W. 488; 6 Ad. & E. 623; 17 R. I. 715; 136 N. Y. 585; and other persons who are privileged by law. See ARREST. Privilege (from arrest) does not extend to defendants in criminal cases; 6 Dist. Rep. Pa. 595.

In case of the arrest of a legislator contrary to law, the house of which he is a member may give summary relief, by ordering his discharge, and if this be not complied with, by punishing the persons concerned in such arrest, as for contempt of its authority. If the houses neglect to interfere, the court from which the process issued should set it aside, on the fact being shown to it; and any court or officer having authority to issue writs of habeas corpus may inquire into the case and release the party; Cooley, Const. Lim. 163; Cush. Parl. Pract. § 548. "When attachment is mere process, privilege exists; when it is punitive or disciplinary, privilege does not exist." Brett, Comm. 748. See 1 H. L. Cas.

By the constitutions of some of the states, the privilege has been enlarged, so as to exempt the persons of legislators from any service of civil process; e.g. Michigan, Kansas, Nebraska, California, Wisconsin, Indiana, Oregon, and others.

See EXTRAJURISDICTION; Piggott, Consular Jurisdiction.

PRIVILEGE TAX. See PROPERTY TAX, etc.

PRIVILEGE, WRIT OF. A process to enforce or maintain a privilege. Cowell.

PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATIONS. Communications made bona fide upon any subject-matter in which the party communicating has an interest, or in reference to which he has a duty, if made to a person having a corresponding interest or duty, although it contain criminary matter which without this privilege would be slanderous and actionable.

Duty, in this canon, cannot be confined to legal duties, which may be enforced by indictment, action, or mandamus, but must include moral and social duties of imperfect obligation; 5 E. & B. 347. The proper meaning of a privileged communication, said Baron Parke, is only this: that the occasion on which the communication was made rebuts the inference prima facie arising from a statement prejudicial to the character of the plaintiff, and puts it upon him to prove that there was malice in fact,—that the defendant was actuated by motives of personal spite or ill-will, independent of the occasion on which the communication was made; 2 Cr. M. & R. 578. So, also, in 16 N. Y. 373. See 73 Mich. 445; 40 Minn. 475; 83 Va. 106; 3 How. 287; [1891] App. Cas. 78; 83 Wis. 451.

The law recognizes two classes of cases in which the occasion either supplies an absolute defence, or a defence subject to the condition that the party acted bona fide without malice. The distinction turns entirely on the question of malice. The communications last mentioned lose their privilege on proof of express malice; 12 Fed. Rep. 528. The former depend in no respect for their protection upon the bona fides of the defendant. The occasion is an absolute privilege, and the only questions are whether the occasion existed, and whether the matter complained of was pertinent to the occasion; Heard, Lib. & S. § 89. See Webb, Poll. Torts 335; Ogd. Sl. & L. 184; 109 N. C. 270.

As to communications which are thus absolutely privileged, no person is liable, either civilly or criminally, in respect of anything published by him as a member of a legislative body, in the course of his legislative duty, or in respect of anything published by him in the course of his duty in any judicial proceeding. This privilege extends not only to parties, counsel, witnesses, jurors, and judges in a judicial proceeding, but also to proceedings in legislative bodies, and to all who, in the discharge of public duty or the honest pursuit of private right, are compelled to take part in the administration of justice, or in legislation. A fair report of any judicial proceeding or inquiry is also privileged; Heard, Lib. & S. §§ 90, 103, 110; Ogd. Lib. & S. "189; but to be privileged it must be an accurate and impartial account of what actually occurred; 50 Ohio St. 71. A report to a newspaper of judicial proceedings if made by an outsider is actionable if made from motives of personal hostility; 5 Ex. Div. 53. See 46 Ill. App. 313; 45 La. Ann. 1184; [1893] 1 Q. B. 65.

The bona fide statements of one church member on the trial of another, before a church tribunal, are privileged; 88 Ga. 620. They have a qualified privilege; Poll. Torts 253.

Freedom of speech in parliament is protected by the Bill of Rights; 1 W. & M. Sess. 2, c. 2. An action will not lie against a judge for words spoken in his judicial capacity in a court of justice; L. R. 3 Ex. 220.

Unfounded insinuations made by counsel against the prosecutor are privileged; 11 Q. B. Div. 588; so are volunteered statements of a witness involving a criminal charge against a person not connected with the case under inquiry. Military courts stand in the same way; L. R. 7 H. L. 744; communications relating to affairs of state and passing between officials are absolutely privileged; Poll. Torts 253; [1895] 1 Q. B. 888; as to whether military and naval reports, not made in the cause of some judicial inquiry, are absolutely privileged, or have only a qualified privilege, see L. R. 5 Q. B. 94. Fair reports of judicial and parliamentary inquiries are said to have an absolute privilege; Poll. Torts 253.

A communication is privileged when made in good faith in answer to one having an interest in the information sought, and it will be privileged if volunteered, when the party to whom it is made has an interest in it and such party stands in such relation to him as to make it a reasonable duty, or at least proper, that he should give the information.

"A communication which would otherwise be privileged, if made with malice in fact or through hatred, ill-will, and a malicious design to injure, is not a privileged communication, but the burden of proof is on the plaintiffs to show malice in fact." 12 Fed. Rep. 526; 111 Pa. 404. A member of a legislative body cannot take advantage of his position to utter private slanders against others; 184 Pa. 108.

Information furnished by a charity organization society at the request of a person not a member, but who was interested, is a privileged communication; 13 Cent.

L. J. 432. So are communications to a near relative respecting the character of a person with whom the relative is negotiating for a marriage; 8 C. & P. 88 (but not by a stranger); 5 Allon 170; so where one communicated to an employer his suspicions of dishonest conduct in a servant towards himself; 8 C. R. N. s. 597.

A publication by a newspaper of an article without inquiry is not privileged because received from a regular correspondent; 68 Hun 474. Communications between an applicant for a patent and the patent office touching an unissued patent are not privileged; 44 Fed. Rep. 294. As to statements made to commercial agencies, see that title. Whenever it is right in the interest of society for one person to communicate to another what he believes or has heard concerning any person's conduct or character is a privileged occasion; Poll. Torts 256; L. R. 5 Q. B. 11. Thus a solicitor to his client about the soundness of a security, or a father to his daughter about her suitor; Poll. Torts 256; a creditor of a firm in liquidation to another of its creditors as to a member of the debtor firm; L. R. 4 Ex. 232; communications addressed to a person in public position relating to the redress of grievances; 5 E. & B. 344. Where the defendant dismissed the plaintiff from its service on account of gross neglect of duty, a statement by the defendant to its servants of the reason for plaintiff's dismissal is a privileged communication. The occasion being privileged, the communication is so, unless the plaintiff can show that it was malicious; [1901] 2 Q. B. 189.

In making privileged communications of a confidential kind, the failure to use the ordinary means of insuring privacy will destroy the privilege; L. R. 9 C. P. 393.

If the occasion be privileged the plaintiff must prove malice, that is dishonest or reckless ill-will. To constitute malice there must be something more than the absence of reasonable ground for belief; Poll. Torts 282. See 8 Harv. L. Rev. 9; CONFIDENTIAL COMMUNICATIONS; LIBEL; MALICE; JUSTIFICATION; SLANDER.

In America, as in England, the defence of privilege is confined to comment and criticism of the acts of public men, as they actually happened, and does not extend to false assertions of fact; 55 Fed. Rep. 456. See 152 Pa. 406; 13 Lawy. Rep. Ann. 97.

PRIVILEGED COPYHOLDS. Those copyholds which are held according to the custom of the manor and not according to the will of the lord. They include ancient demesne and customary freehold. See CUSTOMARY COPYHOLD; 3 Woodd. Lect. 33; Lee, Aba. 63; 1 Crabb, R. P. 709, 919; 2 Bla. Com. 100.

PRIVILEGED DEBTS. Those which an executor or administrator, assignee in bankruptcy, etc., may pay in preference to others, such as funeral expenses, servants' wages, and doctors' bills during last sickness, etc. See PRIVILEGE; ADMINISTRATOR.

PRIVILEGED DEED. In Scotch Law. An instrument, for example, a testament, in the execution of which certain statutory formalities usually required are dispensed with, either from necessity or expediency. Erskine, Inst. 3. 2. 22; Bell, Dict.

PRIVILEGED PLACES. Places—all in or near the city of London—in which a pretended right of sanctuary existed. They were Whitefriars, the Savoy, Salisbury Court, Ram Alley, Mitre Court, Fuller's Rents, Mintage Close, the Minories, the Mint, and Clink or Deadman's Place. This pretended right was taken away by the statute 8 & 9 Will. 3, c. 26, which provided for the execution of process within these places and for the punishment of anyone resisting. A subsequent statute dealt further with the Mint. Byrne.

PRIVILEGED VILLENAGE. Villainage. 1 Steph. Com. 198, 228. See SOCIAGE.

PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES. The words privileges and immunities are used in the XIV amendment of the constitution, and in other parts of that document, and were also used in the articles of confederation. They are such privileges as are fundamental, which belong to the citizens of all free governments and which have at all times been enjoyed by citizens of the United States; 16 Wall. 76; 123 U. S. 150; 144 U. S. 861.

These have been enumerated as some of the principal privileges: Protection by the government, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the right to acquire and possess property of every kind, and to pursue and obtain happiness and safety; 16 Wall. 76; 123 U. S. 156; 144 id. 361; subject nevertheless to such restraints as the government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole. The right of a citizen of one state to pass through or reside in any other state, for purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise (but he is entitled to no greater privileges and immunities than are possessed by the citizens of the latter state; 135 U. S. 492), to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, to institute and maintain actions of every kind in the courts of the state, to take, hold, and dispose of property, and an exemption from higher federal taxes or impositions than are paid by the citizens of other states, etc.; 4 Wash. C. C. 371. Other judges have preferred to leave the meaning of the phrase to be determined as each case arises; 94 U. S. 391. See Cooley, Const. 24.

The constitution also declares that "no state shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States;" but this amendment does not control the power of the state over its own citizens; 31 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 322.

A citizen of the United States has been said to have a right as such to participate in foreign and inter-state commerce, to have the benefit of the postal laws, to make use in common with others of the navigable waters of the United States, to pass from state to state and into foreign countries; he may petition the federal authorities, visit the seat of government without being subjected to the payment of a tax for the privilege (6 Wall. 35), be the purchaser of public lands on the same terms as others; 112 U. S. 76; 144 id. 263; participate in the government if he comes within the conditions of suffrage, be protected from violence while exercising his right of suffrage; 144 U. S. 263; demand the protection of the government on the high seas or in foreign countries; Cooley, Const. 489, 246; see 16 Wall. 86; take out patents and copyrights, buy, sell, or devise United States securities, and take the benefit of the national bankrupt laws; Black, Const. L. 531. A state may not impose a tax upon travellers passing by public conveyance out of the state; 6 Wall. 35; nor impose conditions upon the rights of citizens of other states to sue its citizens in the federal courts; 20 Wall. 445; see 37 Ia. 145; nor deny to colored citizens the privilege of serving on the jury, because of their color; 100 U. S. 303, 313, 339; or to citizens who have become such by naturalization; 5 Leigh 743.

The right to free education is not a privilege and immunity; 30 Chi. Leg. N. 138; or the right of suffrage; 21 Wall. 162; 48 Hun 138; or the right to practise law in the courts of the state; 16 Wall. 130; or to have a controversy in the state court prosecuted or determined by one form of action rather than by another; 160 U. S. 389; nor does an act forbidding the practice of medicine until after examination by a state board; 4 Wash. St. 424.

Among statutes which have been held not to abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens are: Requiring that every child attending school shall be vaccinated; 65 Conn. 193; that policies of insurance shall not be issued without securing a charter of incorporation; 184 Pa. 306; that contractors shall accept no more than eight hours' work in twenty-four except in cases of necessity; 77 Hun 120; that every person before registration for election must be able to read and write; 84 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 521; that one who sells patents shall file an authenticated copy of the letters patent and an affidavit that such letters are genuine; 51 Fed. Rep. 774 (distinguishing 25 id. 894); that women shall not be employed in saloons, theatres, etc., where liquor is sold; 83 Fed. Rep. 157; that minors shall not remain therein; 73 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 111; prohibiting plumbers from exercising their calling without a certificate from a board of examiners; 81 Hun 434; requiring that the seller of fertilizers shall take out a license; 43 Fed. Rep. 609; that those carrying on the banking business shall comply with the provisions of an act relating thereto; 51 N. W. Rep. (S. D.) 858; regulating the right to practise medicine; 10 Col. 383; 88 Ala. 122; 112 Ind. 402; dentistry; 52 Ark. 223; 44 Kan. 505 (but such regulation cannot discriminate against citizens of other states; 65 N. H. 108); suppressing a nuisance; 82 Fed. Rep. 628; regulating or prohibiting the sale of liquor within a state. See LIQUOR LAWS.

Refusal to any person of the accommodations of any public conveyance or place of amusement; 103 U. S. 3; refusing to allow colored children to attend the public schools; 103 Mo. 546 (but see 7 Nev. 342); excluding persons of color not taxed, in an enumeration of inhabitants for the purpose of reorganizing a senatorial district; 10 N. Y. S. 978; the establishment of separate schools for white and colored children; 107 N. C. 609; or prohibiting the carrying of dangerous weapons; 35 W. Va. 367; 153 U. S. 535; do not abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens; nor does a statute prohibiting the intermarriage of white and colored persons; 36 Ind. 389; 63 N. C. 547.

See Black, Const. L.; Cooley, Const. Linn.; 14 L. R. A. 679; CIVIL RIGHTS; DUE PROCESS OF LAW; PROTECTION OF THE LAW; LIBERTY OF CONTRACT; SCHOOLS.

PRIVILEGIUM (priva lex, i. e. de uno homine). In Civil Law. A private law inflicting a punishment or conferring a reward. Calvinus, Lex.; Cicero, de Lege 3, 19; pro Domo 17; Vicat, Voc. Jur. Every peculiar right by which one creditor or class of creditors is preferred to another in personal actions. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Every privilege granted by law in derogation of common right. Mackeldey § 188. A claim or lien on a thing, which once attaching, continues till waiver or satisfaction, and which exists apart from possession. So at the present day in maritime law; e. g. the lien of seamen on ship for wages. 2 Pars. Marit. Law 561. See PRIVILEGE.

PRIVILEGIUM CLERICALE (Lat.) Benefit of clergy, which see.

PRIVILEGIUM, PROPTER, PROPERTY. A qualified property in animals ferre natura, i. e. a privilege of hunting, taking, and killing them, in exclusion of others. 2 Bla. Com. 394.

PRIVITY. The mutual or successive relationship to the same rights of property. 1 Greenl. Ev. § 189; 6 How. 60; 1 U. S. App. 101; 2 Colo. App. 571.

PRIVITY OF CONTRACT. The relationship which subsists between two contracting parties.

From the nature of the covenant entered into by him, a lessee has both privity of contract and of estate; and though by an assignment of his lease he may destroy his privity of estate, still the privity of contract remains, and he is liable on his covenant notwithstanding the assignment; Dougl. 458, 764; Viner, Abr.; 6 How. 60.

PRIVITY OF ESTATE. Identity of title to an estate.

The relation which subsists between a landlord and his tenant.

It is a general rule that a termor cannot transfer the tenancy or privity of estate between himself and his landlord without the latter's consent: an assignee who comes in only in privity of estate is liable only while he continues to be legal assignee; that is, while in possession under the assignment; Bac. Abr. Covenant (14); Woodf. Landl. & T. 261; Viner, Abr.; Washb. R. P.

PRIVITY OF POSSESSION. To establish this, the later occupant must enter under the prior one, and must obtain his possession either by purchase or deed. When the possession is actual, it may commence in parol without deed or writing; and it may be transferred or pass from one occupant to another by parol bargain, and sale, accompanied by delivery. All the law requires is continuity of possession, where it is actual; 2 Sawy. 545; 22 Or. 77.

PRIVY. One who is a partaker or has any part or interest in any action, matter, or thing.

PRIVY COUNCIL. The chief council of the sovereign, called, by pre-eminence, "the Council," composed of those whom the king appoints. 1 Bla. Com. 229.

The statute of Charles II. in 1679 limited the number to thirty,—fifteen of the chief officers of the state ex virtute officii, the other fifteen at the king's pleasure; the number is now indefinite. A committee of the privy council was a court of ultimate appeal in admiralty and ecclesiastical cases and cases of lunacy; 3 P. Wms. 108; and from all dominions of the crown except Great Britain and Ireland; H. Wood. Lect. 157 b. The court of appeal now has its jurisdiction in lunacy and admiralty. See JUDICIAL COMMITTEE.

PRIVY PURSE. The income set apart for the sovereign's personal use.

PRIVY SEAL. In English Law. A seal which the king uses to such grants or things as pass the great seal. Co. 2d Inst. 534.

PRIVY SIGNET. The seal which is first used in making grants, etc., of the crown. It is always in custody of the secretary of state. 2 Bla. Com. 847; 1 Woodd. Lect. 250; 1 Steph. Comm., 11th ed. 593.

PRIVY TOKEN. By stat. 33 Henry VIII. c. 1, punishment is provided against those evil-disposed persons who devised how they might unlawfully get into their possession goods, chattels, and jewels of other persons by "privy tokens and counterfeit letters in other men's names," unto divers persons their friends and acquaintances, by color whereof they have unlawfully obtained the same. A false privy token within the statute has generally been taken to denote some seal, visible mark, or thing, as a key, a ring, etc. 13 Viner, Abr. 460. When one makes use of a false token, he is indictable for the cheat, though the act is not larceny; 1 Bish. Cr. L. § 585. But when the consent obtained covers no more than the possession, and the goods are converted to his own use, the offence becomes larceny; 1 Leach 420; East, Pl. Cr. 691. See FALSE TOKEN.

PRIVY VERDICT. One which is delivered privily to a judge out of court.

PRIZE. In Maritime Law. The apprehension and detention at sea of a ship or other vessel, by authority of a belligerent power, either with the design of appropriating it, with the goods and effects it contains, or with that of becoming master of the whole or a part of its cargo. 1 C. Rob. 228. See BENEDE. ADM. § 509.

The vessel or goods thus taken. Goods taken on land from a public enemy are called booty; and the distinction between a prize and booty consists in this, that the former is taken at sea and the latter on land.

A lawful prize includes enemy's property captured on the high seas or in territorial waters belonging either to the captor or to the enemy, and property of neutrals captured and confiscated for breach of blockade or as contraband of war; Risley, Law of War 144.

In order to vest the title of the prize in the captors, it must ordinarily be brought with due care into some convenient port for adjudication by a competent court. But circumstances may render such a step improper; and of these the captor must be the judge. In making up his decision, good faith and reasonable discretion are required; 18 How. 110; 1 Kent 101. The condemnation must be pronounced by a prize court of the government of the captor sitting in the country of the captor or his ally; 7 Wheat. 283; the prize court of an ally cannot condemn.

Strictly speaking, as between the belligerent parties the title passes, and is vested when the capture is complete; and that was formerly held to be complete and perfect when the battle was over, or the flag hauled down, and the spes recuperandi was gone. Later, twenty-four hours' possession was required, and in still later times it was considered that the captured vessel must be brought infra præsidia (q. v.) to a place of safety. But by the modern usage of nations this is not sufficient to change the property. A judicial tribunal must pass upon the case; and the property is not charged in favor of a neutral vendee or recaptor, so as to bar the original owner, until a regular sentence of condemnation; 1 Kent 102; 1 C. Rob. 135; but this rule is not inflexible.

A neutral ship in the employment of a belligerent is, as well as the enemy's cargo, subject to capture; 24 Fed. Rep. 88. Where a vessel is captured by the army it is not subject to condemnation as prize; 108 U. S. 92.

Formerly prizes could be brought into a neutral port and kept there until condemned by a prize court sitting in the belligerent's territory; but it is probable that, at present, this right would be limited to cases arising out of stress of weather, lack of supplies, etc., and only for such length of time as necessity requires; Risley, Law of War 176.

All captures are made for the government; 10 Wheat. 306; and the title to captured property always vests primarily in the government of the captors. The rights of individuals, where such rights exist, are the result of local law or regulation; 101 U. S. 42; 2 Russ. & M. 56. The question of prize or no prize in England is triable only in a court of admiralty under a commission from the crown, with an appeal to the crown in council, for the crown reserves the right to decide such questions by its own authority and does not commit its determination to any municipal court.

Under the prize laws of the United States a ship includes a torpedo steam launch; 118 U. S. 747.

Where there is a probable cause to believe that a vessel is liable to capture, it is proper to take her and subject her to the examination and adjudication of a prize court; 4 Dall. 84. Circumstances creating a reasonable suspicion of conduct warranting her capture are sufficient; 1 Mas. 24.

A captured vessel is usually put in charge of a prize master, whose duty is, immediately on his arrival in port, to institute proceedings for condemnation. He is a bailee for the captors, and may become liable for negligence resulting in loss to them, for demurrage, etc.; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 391. A captor should bring his prize, as speedily as may be consistent with his other duties, within the jurisdiction of a competent prize court, though under imperious circumstances, he may take it to a foreign port or even sell it. The proceeds of a sale must be subject to the order of a prize court.

The Navy Department rules of August, 1876, and the act of June 30, 1864, prescribe rules for the captors of prizes.

A captor's right of prize may be forfeited in various ways, as by delay in seeking a prize court; cruel treatment of the captured crew, embezzlement, etc.

See PRIZE COURT; NEUTRALITY; RECAPTURE; CAPTURE; INFRA PRÆSIDIA; PRE-EMPTION.

In Contracts. A reward which is offered to one of several persons who shall accomplish a certain condition; as, if an editor should offer a silver cup to the individual who shall write the best essay in favor of peace. In this case there is a contract subsisting between the editor and each person who may write such essay that he will pay the prize to the writer of the best essay; Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 875.

PRIZE COURT. In English Law. That branch of admiralty which adjudicates upon cases of maritime captures made in time of war. A special commission issues in England, in time of war, to the judge of the admiralty court, to enable him to hold such court. See ADMIRALTY.

Some question has been raised whether the prize court is or is not a separate court from the admiralty court. Inasmuch as the commission is always issued to the judge of that court, and the forms of proceeding are substantially those of admiralty, while the law applicable is derived from the same sources, the fact that the commission of prize is only issued occasionally would hardly seem to render the distinction a valid one. But Lord Mansfield said that the whole system of procedure, litigation, and jurisprudence is different; Dougl. 613. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

In the United States, the admiralty courts discharge the duties both of a prize and an instance court (q. v.). The district courts are prize courts; 3 Dall. 6. The president cannot confer jurisdiction to act as a prize court; 13 How. 498. The circuit and district courts and the supreme court are now courts of admiralty for the condemnation of prizes, the original jurisdiction being in the district court. Appeals may be taken directly from it to the supreme court if the amount in controversy exceeds two thousand dollars, or if there is a certificate of the district judge that the question involved is one of general importance; but by the act of March 3, 1891, this limitation is probably removed.

On the breaking out of hostilities the district court appoints commissioners to examine witnesses, etc., under the direction of the court; R. S. § 4621. For the practice see BENEDE. ADM. § 509-512; 1 Wheat. 494; 2 id. 429; and as to the English practice, 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 421. Questions of booty may be referred to the admiralty by the crown; Knapp, P. C. 360.

If there is probable cause for the seizure of a vessel that is not a good prize, the captors may have their costs though the vessel is not condemned; 12 Ct. Cls. 408; they are not liable in damages; 2 Gall. 240, 325; but if a captor unreasonably delays bringing suit for condemnation, he is liable for demurrage if the court decrees a restoration; 108 U. S. 92, where the United States was held liable for demurrage from the time when surrender might have been made, at the rate fixed by the charter party. A captor does not lose his right by delay in sending home a prize for adjudication, if he thinks it necessary and uses discretion and good faith; 18 How. 110. It is the usual practice of the prize court to give freight to the neutral carrier of enemy's goods that are seized; 3 Phill. Int. L. 873. The burden of proof that the prize is neutral rests upon the claimant; and if he fails to show it, condemnation ensues; 2 C. Rob. 77; he must clear himself of suspicion; 22 Ct. Cls. 408.

A prize court of the captors cannot sit in neutral territory, though it may in conquered territory, and in that of a co-belligerent; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 401.

The decision of a prize court is conclusive against the subject of the state and as to the property in the subject-matter against all parties; but unlawful condemnation may subject the state of the captors to demands for indemnity by a foreign state; id. 407. But courts of other nations may examine as to the jurisdiction of a prize court, and if a condemnation therein was not according to the rules of international law, may treat it as a nullity; id. 411. Condemnations of prize courts are final in actions between individuals, and as to the vessel condemned, giving purchasers a good title against all the world, but do not bind foreign nations, if wrongfully decreed; 23 Ct. Cls. 1.

There is a clearly marked distinction between proceedings for prize and forfeiture. "The libel for prize is founded upon the law of nations, and depends for proof upon the facts of her acts upon the high seas. The libel for forfeiture is for the violation of a municipal statute, and depends upon a set of facts and circumstances entirely different from that of piratical aggression. The offences charged are separate and distinct, and the cause of action is in no wise the same." 28 Fed. Rep. 150. In the case of The Itata, it was said that "when a ship is libelled for prize, and the facts fail to sustain the libel, but make out a strong prima facie case of a statutory forfeiture, it would be the duty of the court to remand the case for a new libel; but under no circumstances could a ship be libelled for one offence, and have a decree entered against it for another distinct and separate offence." 56 id. 505, 515.

The duties of prize courts are thus described by Lord Stowell:—

"In forming my judgment, I trust that it has not for a moment escaped my anxious recollection what it is that the duty of my station calls for from me; namely, not to deliver occasional and shifting opinions to serve present purposes of particular national interests, but to administer, with indifference, that justice which the Law of Nations holds out, without distinction, to independent States, some happening to be neutral, and some belligerent. The seat of judicial authority is, indeed, locally here, in the belligerent country, according to the known law and practice of nations; but the law itself has no locality. It is the duty of the person who sits here, to determine this question exactly as he would determine the same question, if sitting at Stockholm; to assert no pretensions on the part of Great Britain which he would not allow to Sweden in the same circumstances; and to impose no duties on Sweden, as a neutral country, which he would not admit to belong to Great Britain in the same character." 1 C. Rob. 350.

In another case, he says:

"It is to be recollected that this is a court of the Law of Nations, though sitting here under the authority of the King of Great Britain. It belongs to other nations as well as to our own; and what foreigners have a right to demand from it, is the administration of the Law of Nations simply, and exclusively of the introduction of principles borrowed from our own municipal jurisprudence, to which it is well known they have at all times expressed no inconsiderable reluctance." 6 id. 349.

PRIZE-FIGHT. A public prize-fight is an indictable offence. No concurrence of wills can justify a public tumult and alarm; therefore, persons who voluntarily engage in a prize-fight and their abettors are all guilty of assault; 4 C. & P. 537; Poll. Tort 186, n.; 1 Cox, C. C. 177; 2 Bish. C. L. § 35. Prize-fights are unlawful, and all persons guilty of aiding and abetting a prize-fight are guilty of an assault; 8 Q. B. Div. 534. See, also, 108 Mass. 802; 67 Miss. 350.

To constitute prize-fighting there must be an expectation of reward to be gained by the contest or competition, either to be won from the contestant or to be otherwise awarded, and there must be an intent to inflict some degree of bodily harm on the contestant; 96 Mich. 576.

Prize-fighting is unlawful; 1 Bish. Cr. Law § 535; C. & M. 314; fighting with the fists is an assault and battery, though the parties agree thus to fight and have no ill-will toward each other; Washb. Manual of Crim. Law; it is a breach of the peace; Poll. Torts 189; 9 C. & P. 214.

If two persons go out to fight with their fists, by consent, and do fight with each other, each is guilty of an assault, although there is no danger or ill-will; 119 Mass. 350, disagreeing with 1 Hill S. C. 10; it is no bar to an action for assault that the parties fought with each other by mutual consent, but such consent may be shown in mitigation of the damages; 33 Ind. 531; one may recover in an action for assault and battery, although he agreed to fight with his adversary; for such agreement to break the peace being void, the maxim volenti non fit injuria does not apply; 3 Jones N. C. 131; mere voluntary presence at a fight does not, as a matter of law, necessarily render persons so present guilty of an assault, as aiding and abetting in such fight; 8 Q. B. Div. 534 (4 C. & P. 537, distinguished); semble, mere presence of a person at a prize-fight affords some evidence for the consideration of a jury of an aiding and abetting in such fight; 8 Q. B. Div. 534.

To constitute a prize-fight it is not essential that the fight should be with the naked fist or hand, but the fact that a contest was had with gloved hands, as also the kind, size, weight, and other characteristics of the gloves so used, may be looked to in connection with the other evidence in the case in determining whether a contest was a prize-fight, or merely a sparring or boxing exhibition without prize or reward to the victor; 4 Ohio N. P. 81.

Prize-fighting was not a distinct offence at common law and participants were indictable and punishable for assault, riot, or affray; 8 Q. B. Div. 534; 3 C. & M. 314; 2 C. & P. 234; 67 Miss. 850.

A spectator at a sparring match is not particeps criminis; there is nothing unlawful in sparring, unless the men fight until they are so weak that a dangerous fall is likely to be the result of the game. Therefore, except in the latter case, death caused by an injury received during a sparring match does not amount to manslaughter; 10 Cox, C. C. 371.

In Arkansas a court of equity has power to issue an injunction to restrain a prize-fight advertised to take place within its jurisdictional limits; 85 Am. Law Reg. & Rev. 100; 28 L. R. A. 727; in Indiana an injunction was granted at the suit of the state, upon the ground that a corporation was misusing its franchise and maintaining its property as a nuisance, although the act complained of was a crime; 143 Ind. 96.

Consent to engage in a boxing match is not a defence to an indictment for a breach of the peace. It is for the jury to determine from the nature of the contest whether it was a breach of the peace, under proper instructions as to what constitutes such a breach.

Evidence is not admissible to prove that such matches are common and harmless amusements, practised in the colleges of this country, nor was there error in refusing to allow the jury to examine the boxing gloves used by the respondent; 56 Vt. 445.

It is not necessary that an indictment aver that the fight took place in public; nor that it contain averments which negative the existence of matters mentioned in the proviso of § 6890 of the revised statutes; 49 Ohio St. 117.

An agreement to engage in a prize-fight is a conspiracy to commit a crime; and the declarations of either party with reference to the common object, or in furtherance of the criminal design, while engaged in its prosecution, are competent evidence against the other, though the agreement was made through backers or other representatives of the principals and the latter were unknown to each other. Letters written by one of the principals, while in training for the fight, describing what the fight is to be, stating when and where it is to occur, and requesting the presence of his friends and others thereat, are in furtherance of the unlawful enterprise, and admissible in evidence against the other; 49

Ohio St. 117.

Whether a pugilistic encounter is a fight or boxing exhibition, is not a question upon which expert testimony is admissible on the trial of an indictment for engaging in a prize-fight. The question must be decided by the jury upon the evidence of what actually took place, under proper instructions from the court, and not upon the opinions of professional pugilists, and others experienced in such combats, or the rules adopted by associations for conducting such contests; 49 Ohio St. 117.

Statutes prohibiting prize-fights have been passed in nearly all the states. That of Nevada (1897) alone need be set forth. Any male person over twenty-one years may procure a license for an exhibition in a public place for any contest or exhibition with gloves between man and man for a wager or reward, and the weight of the gloves used shall not be less than four ounces. The sheriff of any county in which such exhibition is to be held, shall issue a license therefor on payment to him of one thousand dollars. The licensee shall, ten hours before any proposed contest, file with the county clerk where such contest is to be held, a certificate in writing executed by two regular practising physicians of the state showing that the contestants are in sound physical health and condition. The exhibition shall be within an enclosure sufficient to exclude the view of the public not in attendance thereat; no intoxicating liquors of any kind shall be sold or given away at or during the contest upon the grounds or within the enclosure. A charge may be made for admission. Any persons who shall participate in, conduct, or manage any glove contest contrary to the provisions of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

What constitutes prize-fighting is a question of law; but it is a term in common use, and the very employment of the word indicates what is meant; 96 Mich. 576.

By statute it is even made criminal for inhabitants of a state by previous agreement to leave the state and engage in a fight outside of its limits; 108 Mass. 302.

See McClain, Cr. Law §§ 196, 249, 1013; 1 Bish. Cr. Law §§ 632-633; 6 L. Quart. Rev. 110.

PRO CONSILIO. For counsel given. An annuity pro consilio amounts to a condition, but in a feoffment or lease for life, etc., it is the consideration, and does not amount to a condition; for the state of the land by the feoffment is executed, and the grant of the annuity is executory. PROBABILITY. Likelihood; consonance to reason; for example, there is a strong probability that a man of good moral character, and who has heretofore been remarkable for truth, will, when examined as a witness under oath, tell the truth; and, on the contrary, that a man who has been guilty of perjury will not, under the same circumstances, tell the truth: the former will, therefore, be entitled to credit, while the latter will not.

PROBABLE. Having the appearance of truth; appearing to be founded in reason.

PROBABLE CAUSE. A reasonable ground of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in the belief that a person accused is guilty of the offence with which he is charged. 53 N. Y. 17; 109 Mo. 281; 63 Hun 626; id. 254; 1 Colo. App. 397.

Want of probable cause is one of the elements required to support an action for malicious prosecution, which title see for a discussion of the subject.

In extradition cases, probable cause is made out by proof furnishing good reason to believe that the crime alleged has been committed by the person charged with having committed it; 161 U. S. 502. See EXTRADITION.

In cases of municipal seizure for the breach of revenue, navigation and other laws, if the property seized is not condemned, the party seizing is exempted from liability for such seizure if the court before which the cause is tried grants a certificate that there was probable cause for the seizure. If the seizure was without probable cause, the party injured has his remedy at common law. See 7 Cra. 389; 2 Wheat. 118; 9 id. 843; 16 Pet. 342; 8 How. 197; 4 id. 251; 18 id. 498.

PROBABLE EVIDENCE. Presumptive evidence is so called, from its foundation in probability.

PROBABLE REASONING. Reasoning founded on the probability of the fact or proposition sought to be proved or shown.

PROBATE. Originally, relating to proof; afterwards, relating to the proof of wills. In American law, now a general name or term used to include all matters of which probate courts have jurisdiction. 47 Minn. 575.

PROBATE CODE. The body or system of law relating to the estates of deceased persons, and of persons under guardianship. 47 Minn. 575.

PROBATE IN COMMON FORM. See SOLEMN FORM.

PROBATE COURT. See COURT OF PROBATE.

PROBATE COURTS. See COURTS OF PROBATE.

PROBATE DUTY. A tax laid by the government on the gross value of the personal property of the deceased testator.

This is a stamp duty payable (except where it is merged in estate duty) with certain unimportant exceptions, on all the personal property over the value of £100 in England of anyone in respect of whom a grant of probate or letters of administration should be obtained. Such personal property includes property appointed by will under a general power. It is not payable in respect of deaths since 1st August, 1894, upon any estate for which estate duty (q. v.) is payable; but it is still payable upon the personal estates in England of persons domiciled abroad, inasmuch as no estate duty is payable thereon, and it therefore is not entirely superseded by estate duty. Like estate duty, it is payable on the total value of the property which is subject to it; but, unlike estate duty, it applies only to personality. Byrne. See DEATH DUTIES.

PROBATE IN SOLEMN FORM. See SOLEMN FORM.

PROBATE OF A WILL. The proof before an officer authorized by law that an instrument offered to be proved or registered is the last will and testament of the deceased person whose testamentary act it is alleged to be.

Jurisdiction. In England, the ecclesiastical courts were the only tribunals in which, except by special prescription, the validity of wills of personal estate could be established or disputed. Hence in all courts, the seal of the ecclesiastical court is conclusive evidence of the factum of a will of personality; from which it follows that an executor cannot assert or rely on his authority in any other court, without showing that he has previously established it in the spiritual court,—the usual proof of which is the production of a copy of the will by which he is appointed, certified under the seal of the ordinary. This is usually called the probate. The probate of a will is conclusive as to personality; but not as to realty, which can only be settled by an issue out of chancery or a trial at law; 4 Kent 510.

The ecclesiastical courts had no jurisdiction of devises of lands; and in a trial at common law or in equity the probate of a will is not admissible as evidence, but the original will must be produced, and proved the same as any other disputed instrument. This rule has been modified by statute in some of the United States. In New York, the record, when the will is proved by the subscribing witnesses, is prima facie evidence, and provision is made for perpetuating the evidence. See 12 Johns. 193; 14 id. 407. In Massachusetts, North Carolina, and Michigan the probate is conclusive of its validity, and a will cannot be used in evidence till proved; 12 Allen 1; 1 Gall. 632; 2 Mich. Comp. Laws (1871) 1875; Battle, Rev. 849. In Pennsylvania, the probate was held not conclusive as to lands, and, although not allowed by the register's court, it might be read in evidence; 5 Rawle 80; but see 119 Pa. 188; but it becomes conclusive as to realty, unless withdrawn in five years from probate those interested shall contest its validity. In South Carolina the will must be proved de novo in the court of common pleas, though allowed in the ordinary; 1 N. & M'C. 328. In New Jersey, probate is necessary, but it is not conclusive; 1 Penn. N. J. 42; except in actions not commenced within seven years from the probate; N. J. Rev. Stat. 1250. See LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

The effect of the probate in this country, and the rules in regard to jurisdiction, are generally the same as in England; but, as no ecclesiastical courts exist in the United States, probate is granted by some judicial officer, who performs the part of the ordinary in England, but generally with more ample powers in relation to the administration of the estate. See SURROGATE; LETTERS TESTAMENTARY.

The proof of the will is a judicial proceeding, and the probate a judicial act. The party propounding the instrument is termed the proponent, and the party disputing, the contestant. In England, proof ex parte was called probate in common form, and proof on notice to the next of kin, proof in solemn form. In the United States, generally speaking, proofs are not taken until citation or notice has been issued by the judge to all the parties interested to attend. On the return of the citation, the witnesses are examined, and the trial proceeds before the court. If the judge, when both parties have been heard, decides in favor of the will, he admits it to probate; if against the will he rejects it. In Pennsylvania no citation is required.

More than one instrument may be proved; and where the contents of two or more instruments are not wholly inconsistent with each other, they may all be admitted as together constituting the last will and testament of the deceased; *Will, Exec. *138.*

On the probate the alleged will may be contested on any ground tending to impeach its validity; as, that it was not executed in due form of law and according to the requisite statutory solemnities; that it was forged, or was revoked, or was procured by force, fraud, misrepresentation, or undue influence over a weak mind, or that the testator was incompetent by reason of idiocy or lunacy.

PROBATIO (Lat. from probare, to prove). Proof Probatio viva; living proof; proof by witnesses viva voce. Burrill; Bract. fol. 400.

PROBATION. The evidence which proves a thing. It is either by record, writing, the party's own oath, or the testimony of witnesses. Proof. It also signifies the time of a novitiate; a trial. Nov. 5.

PROBATION SYSTEM. A method of allowing a person convicted of a minor offense to go at large under suspension of sentence, but usually under the supervision of a probation officer. Stand. Dict.

In England, under the Probation of Offenders Act, 1907, where a person is charged before a magistrate with a summary offense which is proved, or where a person is convicted on indictment, the magistrate may, instead of convicting, dismiss the charge or discharge the offender on recognisances (with or without sureties) for good behavior and to come up for judgment within three years, and the court before which the prisoner is convicted on indictment may discharge him on the like recognisances; but one of these courses is permissible only where it is considered desirable, in view of the character, antecedents, age, health, or mental condition of the accused, or the trivial nature of the offense, or extenuating circumstances. The court may also order payment by the accused of the compensation to the extent of £10, or any higher amount fixed by statute, and the costs of the proceedings. The recognisance may contain various conditions aimed at securing the good conduct of the offender. There may be appointed probation officers, for adult offenders, and also "children's probation officers," who keep in touch with offenders on probation. Where an offender fails to observe the conditions of his recognisance he may be brought up and sentenced for the original offense. Byrne.

PROBATIVE FACT. A fact which actually has the effect of proving a fact sought.

PROBATOR. In Old English Law. Strictly, an accomplice in felony who to save himself confessed the fact, and charged or accused any other as principal or accessory, against whom he was bound to make good his charge. It also signified an approver, or one who undertakes to prove a crime charged upon another. Jacob, Law Dict.

PROBATORY TERM. In the British courts of admiralty, after the issue is formed between the parties, a time for taking the testimony is assigned. This is called a probatory term.

This term is common to both parties, and either party may examine his witnesses. When good cause is shown, the term will be enlarged. 2 Brown, Civ. Law 418; Dunlop, Adm. Pr. 217.

PROBI ET LEGALES HOMINES (Lat.). Good and lawful men; persons competent in point of law to serve on juries. Cro. Eliz. 654, 751; Cro. Jac. 635; Mart. & Y. 147; Hard. 63; Bac. Abr. Juries (A).

PROCEDENDO (Lat.). In Practice. A writ which issues where an action is removed from an inferior to a superior jurisdiction by habeas corpus, certiorari, or writ of privilege, and it does not appear to such superior court that the suggestion upon which the cause has been removed is sufficiently proved; in which case the superior court by this writ, remits the cause to the court from whence it came, commanding the inferior court to proceed to the final hearing and determination of the same. See 2 W. Bla. 1060; 6 Term 365; 52 Conn. 166.

A prerogative writ which issues (1) when the judge of an inferior court delays the parties to a proceeding before him, by not giving judgment for one side or the other, when he ought to do so; or (2) when a cause has been removed from an inferior court to a superior court improperly or on insufficient grounds, and the superior court thinks fit to remit or remove it back to the inferior court. In the former class of cases, the writ of mandamus (q. v.) is more frequently used. Byrne.

PROCEDURE. The methods of conducting litigation and judicial proceedings.

It might be termed, by way of illustration, the mechanism of the law, as distinguished from jurisprudence, which is the science of the law.

The term is so broad in its signification that it is seldom employed in our books as a term of art. It includes in its meaning whatever is embraced by the three technical terms, pleading, evidence, and practice. And practice in this sense means those legal rules which direct the course of proceeding to bring parties into the court and the course of the court after they are brought in; and evidence as a part of procedure signifies those rules of law whereby we determine what testimony is to be admitted and what rejected in each case, and what is the weight to be given to the testimony admitted. Bish. Cr. Proc. § 2; 107 U. S. 231. See 5 Ind. App. 95.

The term is, with respect to its present use, rather a modern one. Recently the supreme court of the United States commented on the fact that it was unable to find anywhere a satisfactory definition of it. Apart from observations of the most general character the subject is one which does not admit of distinct or detailed treatment under this title. It includes all the practical titles of the law to which reference should be had, with respect to any particular matter, as they are separately treated in this work.

Probably the most salient fact with respect to legal procedure in civil cases is the modern tendency in England and the United States to obliterate technical distinctions between law and equity and to authorize the enforcement of equitable remedies, as well in courts of law as of chancery. But with respect to this tendency it has been very justly said that:

"Although, under modern systems, courts of law may enforce equitable rights, the proof must agree with the pleadings, and the relief granted must be within the prayer for relief and the grounds relied on." 70 Fed. Rep. 949.

Another feature of modern thought on the subject of procedure is the controversy between the advocates of common-law practice and that under codes, which will be found discussed at length under the titles CODES and COMMON LAW, respectively. See also Clarke, The Science of Law and Law-Making.

In England the last quarter of the century has witnessed the most radical change in procedure as the result of the Judicature Acts, which title see. Under the changes thus introduced, where one formerly, in seeking relief from judicial tribunals, was obliged to use different forms of procedure in different courts, these acts, and the rules made pursuant to them, "have to a very large extent introduced uniformity in this respect into the practice of the different divisions of the court." 1 Brett, Com. 330.

In criminal procedure there is a strong tendency indicated towards simplification and expedition. The most notable tendency of a general character is that towards the abolition or modification of the grand jury system, as to which see that title. Very recently vital and comprehensive changes have been made in the criminal procedure of France relating to the preliminary examination of accused persons. See JUDGE D'INSTRUCTION.

A new criminal code, notable both as to the changes introduced and the care with which it was prepared, went into effect in Italy in 1890, a careful analysis of which will be found in 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 696. In Great Britain the criminal procedure of Scotland is very different from that of England notwithstanding the union, and a carefully detailed account of it may be found in 35 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 619.

In a case defining the functions and authority of a prosecuting attorney and his right to enter a nolle prosequi after conviction, the supreme court of Louisiana, in a very able opinion, directed attention to some differences between the criminal procedure of that state and that of England and the states which follow English precedence. The great power given to the prosecuting officer under the common law is greatly diminished in that state, and the court concludes its examination of the subject by the statement that:

"First. The inauguration or preliminary stage, when the prosecuting officer has absolute control of his indictments.

"Second. The trial of the cause, and its incidents, during which the court has control and the power of the prosecuting officer is suspended.

"Third. The period between the verdict of the jury and the sentence of the court, when the pardoning power comes into operation." 48 La. Ann. 109, 144.

See POSTULATIO.

PROCEDURE ACTS. Three acts of parliament passed in 1852, 1854, and 1860, for the amendment of procedure at common law. Moz. & W. They have been largely superseded by the Judicature Acts of 1873 and 1875. See JUDICATURE ACTS.

PROCEEDING. In its general acceptance, the form in which actions are to be brought and defended, the manner of intervening in suits, of conducting them, the mode of deciding them, of opposing judgments, and of executing. It includes certified copies of pleadings on which the case was tried. 63 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1084.

Ordinary proceedings intend the regular and usual mode of carrying on a suit by due course at common law.

Summary proceedings are those where the matter in dispute is decided without the intervention of a jury; these must be authorized by the legislature, except, perhaps, in cases of contempt, for such proceedings are unknown to the common law.

In 81 Fed. Rep. 830 the question was suggested whether proceedings before pension commissioners are judicial proceedings within the meaning of R. S. § 860, which provides that evidence obtained from a party or witness shall not be used against him in any criminal proceeding. The court passed the question without deciding it, though apparently inclined to the affirmative.

In Louisiana there is a third kind of proceeding, known by the name of executory process (q. v.).

In New York the code of practice divides remedies into actions and special proceedings. An action is an ordinary proceeding in a court of justice, by which one party prosecutes another party for the enforcement or protection of a right, the redress or prevention of a wrong, or the punishment of a public offence. Every other remedy is a special proceeding.

The examination of a witness before a grand jury is a "proceeding" within the meaning of the proviso to the general appropriation act of 1903, that no person shall be prosecuted on account of anything which he may testify in any proceeding under the Anti-trust Law. The word should receive as wide a construction as is necessary to protect the witness in his disclosures. 201 U. S. 43.

See COLLATERAL PROCEEDING.

PROCEEDS. Money or articles of value arising or obtained from the sale of property. Goods purchased with money arising from the sale of other goods, or obtained on their credit, are proceeds of such goods. 2 Pars. Marit. L. 201; Bened. Adm. 200. See 61 Hun 372. The sum, amount, or value of goods sold, or converted into money. Whart. Dict. Proceeds does not mean necessarily money; 101 U. S. 380.

PROCES (Lat.). The name by which the chief magistrates in cities were formerly known. St. Armand, Hist. Eq. 88.

PROCES-VERBAL. In French Law. A true relation in writing in due form of law, of what has been done and said verbally in the presence of a public officer, and what he himself does upon the occasion. It is a species of inquisition of office.

The procès-verbal should be dated, contain the name, qualities, and residence of the public functionary who makes it, the cause of complaint, the facts tending to prove the existence of the crime, that which serves to substantiate the charge, point out its nature, the time, the place, the circumstances, state the proofs and presumptions, describe the place,—in a word, everything calculated to ascertain the truth. It must be signed by the officer. Dalloz, Dict. See JUDGE D'INSTRUCTION.

PROCESS. In Practice. The means of compelling a defendant to appear in court, after suing out the original writ, in civil, and after indictment, in criminal, cases.

The method taken by law to compel a compliance with the original writ or commands of the court.

A writ, warrant, subpoena, or other formal writing issued by authority of law; also the means of accomplishing an end, including judicial proceedings; 84 La. 567; the means or method pointed out by a statute, or used to acquire jurisdiction of the defendants, whether by writ or notice. 109 Mo. 598.

In civil causes, in all real actions and for injuries not committed against the peace, the first step was a summons, which was served in personal actions by two persons called summoners, in real actions by erecting a white stick or wand on the defendant's grounds. If this summons was disregarded, the next step was an attachment of the goods of the defendant, and in case of trespasses the attachment issued at once without a summons. If the attachment failed, a distringas issued, which was continued till he appeared. Here process ended in injuries not committed with force. In case of such injuries, an arrest of the person was provided for. See ARREST. In modern practice some of these steps are omitted; but the practice of the different states is too various to admit of tracing here the differences which have resulted from retaining different steps of the process.

In the English law, process in civil causes is called original process, when it is founded upon the original writ; and also to distinguish it from meane or intermediate process, which issues pending the suit, upon some collateral interlocutory matter, as, to summon juries, witnesses, and the like; meane process is also sometimes put in contradistinction to final process, or process of execution; and then it signifies all process which intervenes between the beginning and end of a suit. 3 Bla. Com. 279. See REGULAR PROCESS; OBSTRUCTING PROCESS.

No court can, at common law, exercise jurisdiction over a party unless he is served with the process within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, or voluntarily appears; 149 U. S. 194. See JURISDICTION.

As to the grant of letters patent for a process, see PATENT. See ORIGINAL PROCESS. JUDICIAL PROCESS.

PROCESS OF INTERPLEADER. See INTERPLEADER.

PROCESS OF LAW. See DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

PROCESSION. A peaceable procession in the streets of a town, if lawful, and the streets are not obstructed more than is ordinarily the case under such circumstances, is not an indictable offence on the part of those composing it. 72 N. C. 25.

The peaceable procession in the streets of a religious body, known as the Salvation Army, has been held lawful, although the members were aware of the lawless intention of their opponents to make it the occasion of a riot; 26 Sol. Journ. 505. See 26 Alb. L. J. 22.

PROCESSIONING. A term used to denote the manner of ascertaining the boundaries of land, as provided for by the laws of that state. 1 Tenn. Comp. Stat. § 2020. The term is also used in North Carolina and Georgia. 3 Murph. 504; 3 Dev. 268; 79 Ga. 406.

PROCESSUM CONTINUANDO. A writ for the continuation of process after the death of the chief justice or other justices in the commission of oyer and terminer. Reg. Orig. 128.

PROCHEIN (L. Fr.). Next. A term somewhat used in modern law, and more frequently in the old law; as, prochein ami, prochein cousin. Co. Litt. 10.

PROCHEIN AMI (L. Fr.; spelled also, prochein amy and prochain amy). Next friend (q. v.).

PROCLAMATION. The act of causing some state matters to be published or made generally known. A written or printed document in which are contained such matters, issued by proper authority; as, the president's proclamation, the governor's, the mayor's proclamation. Also used to express the public nomination made of any one to a high office; as, such a prince was proclaimed emperor.

The president's proclamation may give force to a law, when authorized by congress; as, if congress were to pass an act, which should take effect upon the happening of a contingent event, which was to be declared by the president by proclamation to have happened, in this case the proclamation would give the act the force of law, which till then it wanted. How far a proclamation is evidence of facts, see Bac. Abr. Evidence (F); Bull. N. P. 226; 12 Mod. 216; 8 How. St. Tr. 212; 4 Maule & S. 546; 2 Camp. 44; Bone, Abr. ch. 90, s. 2, 3, 4; 6 Ill. 577; Brooke, Abr. The public proclamation of pardon and amnesty has the force of public law, of which courts and officers will take notice though not specially pleaded; 145 U. S. 546. Courts take judicial notice of official proclamations and messages of the governor of the state; 110 Mo. 286.

On the breaking out of war it is usual for a nation to issue a proclamation announcing the existence of hostilities. See MANIFESTO; WAR.

In Practice. The declaration made by the crier, by authority of the court, that something is about to be done.

It usually commences with the French word Oyez, do you hear, in order to attract attention: it is particularly used on the opening of the court, and at its adjournment; it is also frequently employed to discharge persons who have been accused of crimes or misdemeanors.

PROCLAMATION OF EMANCIPATION. See BONDAGE.

PROCLAMATION OF EXIGENTS. In Old English Practice. On awarding an exigent, in order to outlawry, a writ of proclamation issued to the sheriff of the county where the party dwelt, to make three proclamations for the defendant to yield himself or be outlawed.

PROCLAMATION OF A FINE. The proclamation of a fine was a notice, openly and solemnly given at all the assizes held in the county where the lands lay. It was made within one year after engrassing the fine; and anciently consisted in the fine as expressed being openly read in court sixteen times,—four times in the term in which it was made, and four times in each of the three succeeding terms. This, however, was afterwards reduced to one reading in each term. These proclamations were upon transcripts of the fine, sent by the justices of the common pleas to the justices of assize and the justices of the peace. Abb. Law Dict. See 2 Bla. Com. 352.

PROCLAMATION OF REBELLION. In Old English Practice. When a party neglected to appear upon a subpoena, or an attachment in chancery, a writ bearing this name issued; and, if he did not surrender himself by the day assigned, he was reputed and declared a rebel.

PROCLAMATOR. An officer of the English court of common pleas.

PROCREATION. The generation of children: it is an act authorized by the law of nature. One of the principal ends of marriage is the procreation of children. Inst. tit. 2, in pr.

PROCTOR. One appointed to manage the affairs of another or represent him in judgment. The authority was in writing under the hand of the principal and was called a proxy.

One who is employed to manage for another proceedings in admiralty and ecclesiastical causes.

A proctor, strictly speaking, conducts the proceeding out of court, as an English solicitor does in common-law courts; while the advocate conducts those in court. But in this country the distinction is not observed. A proctor is properly appointed in writing, but not necessarily so. Until final decree, he has entire control of the cause; but after decree he has no power except to enforce it. See Bened. Adm. § 334; W. Rob. 835. The fees of proctors are fixed by R. S. §§ 828-829; but fees not in the statute may be allowed in special cases; 7 Fed. Rep. 246; 25 id. 872.

In England under the judicature acts proctors may practise in all divisions of the supreme court of judicature.

One of the representatives of the clergy in the convocations of the two provinces of Canterbury and York in the church of England.

An official in a university whose function it is to see that good order is kept.

See QUEEN'S PROCTOR.

PROCURATION. In Civil Law. The act by which one person gives power to another to act in his place, as he could do himself. A letter of attorney.

An express procurator is one made by the express consent of the parties. An implied or tacit procurator takes place when an individual sues another managing his affairs and does not interfere to prevent it. Dig. 17. 1. 6. 2; 50. 17. 60; Code 7. 32. 2.

Procurations are also divided into those which contain absolute power, or a general authority, and those which give only a limited power. Dig. 3. 3. 53; 17. 1. 60. 4.

Procurations are ended in three ways: first, by the revocation of the authority; second, by the death of one of the parties; third, by the renunciation of the mandatory, when it is made in proper time and place and it can be done without injury to the person who gave it. Inst. 3. 27; Dig. 17. 1; Code 4. 35. See AUTHORITY; LETTER OF ATTORNEY; MANDATE; PER PROC.

PROCURATIONS. In Ecclesiastical Law. Certain sums of money which parish priests pay yearly to the bishops or archdeacons, ratione visitationis. Dig. 3. 39. 25; Ayliffe, Parerg. 429; 17 Viner, Abr. 544.

PROCURATOR. In Civil Law. A proctor; a person who acts for another by virtue of a procurator. Procurator est, qui aliena negotia mandata Domini administrat. Dig. 3. 3. 1. See ATTORNEY; AUTHORITY. FOREIGN MINISTER.

PROCURATOR FISCAL. In Scotch Law. A public prosecutor. Bell, Dict.

PROCURATOR LITIS (Lat.). In Civil Law. One who by command of another institutes and carries on for him a suit. Vicat, Voc. Jur. Procurator is properly used of the attorney of actor (the plaintiff), defensor of the attorney of reus (the defendant). It is distinguished from advocatus, who was one who undertook the defence of persons, not things, and who was generally the patron of the person whose defence he prepared, the person himself speaking it. It is also distinguished from cooperator who conducted the cause in the presence of his principal, and generally in cases of citizenship; whereas the procurator conducted the cause in the absence of his principal. Calvinus, Lex.

PROCURATOR IN REM SUAM. In Scotch Law. A term which imports that one is acting as attorney as to his own property. When an assignment of a thing is made, as a debt, and a procurator or power of attorney is given to the assignee to receive the same, he is in such case procurator in rem suam. 8 Stair, Inst. 1. 2. 3. etc.; Erskine, Inst. 3. 5. 2; Bell, Dict.

PROCURATORIUM (Lat.). The proxy or instrument by which a proctor is constituted and appointed.

PROCURATORY OF RESIGNATION. A proceeding by which the vassal authorized the return of the fee to his superior. Bell, Dict.

PROCURE. To contrive, effect, or bring about; to cause. 23 Neb. 45.

There is a clear legal distinction between procuring an act to be done and suffering it to be done. 2 Ben. 196.

PROCUREUR DE LA REPUBLIQUE. The name of an officer charged with the prosecution of crimes under the French procedure, corresponding to the prosecuting attorney in the United States. See JOUR D'INSTRUCTION.

PROCURING CAUSE OF THE SALE. Where the owner of property puts it in the hands of a real estate agent for sale and the agent finds a purchaser, but the contemplated purchaser and the owner cannot agree on terms, and the owner, with a view of avoiding the agent's commission, withdraws the property from the hands of the agent without his consent and breaks off the negotiations with the purchaser, but thereafter sells the property to the purchaser brought to his attention by the agent, or to a third person who he knows is acting for him, the agent should be treated as the "procuring cause of the sale" and entitled to his commission. 161 Ky. 517, 171 S. W. 153.

PRODES HOMMES. See PRUD-HOMMES.

PRODIGAL. In Civil Law. A person who, though of full age, is incapable of managing his affairs, and of the obligations which attend them, in consequence of his bad conduct, and for whom a curator is therefore appointed.

PRODIGUS. In the Roman law, a spendthrift whose extravagance was such as to render him incapable of managing his own affairs, and to require the appointment of a guardian of his estate for his protection. R. & L. Diet.

PRODIGATORIE (Law Lat.). Treasonably. This is a technical word formerly used in indictments for treason, which they were written in Latin. Tomlins.

PRODUCE. The product of natural growth, labor, or capital. The produce of a farm has been held not to include beef raised and killed thereon; 6 W. & S. 280; and yearly produce of a farm is held to be confined to crops gathered annually; 19 Conn. 513.

PRODUCE BROKER. A person occupied in buying and selling agricultural or farm products. 1 Abb. 470. See BROKER; COMMISSION MERCHANT; FACTOR.

PRODUCENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. He who produces a witness to be examined.

PRODUCING BOOKS. See CORPORATION.

PRODUCTION. That which is produced or made product; fruit of labor; as the productions of the earth, comprehending all vegetables and fruits; the productions of intellect, or genius, as poems and prose compositions; the productions of art, as manufactures of every kind. 27 Ark. 567.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS. Where there is an issue either direct or collateral on the forgery of papers, courts of equity or law will compel their production for inspection in advance of trial. A party to an action at law may, before trial, maintain a bill for discovery of letters relied on by the other party to the suit and alleged to have been written by the plaintiff in the bill, but which the plaintiff alleges are forgeries. The production of private writings in which another person has an interest may be had by a bill of discovery in proper cases, or in trials at law by an order for inspection, a notice to produce or a writ of subpoena duces tecum.

The order for inspection, though now provided for by statute in most states, was within the practice of the English common-law courts at an early date. It is reported to where documents in the possession of the other party are required for use in preparing the pleadings either by the plaintiff; 4 Bing. 539; 1 Taunt. 366; 8 Dowd. 118; 89 Hun 613; or the defendant; 2 Cr. & M. 456; 6 B. & S. 669; 1 App. Div. N. Y. 136; but an order requiring a prospective defendant to produce books at an examination by plaintiff to enable the latter to prepare his complaint is erroneous;

81 Hun 490. Where there was but one copy of an agreement between two persons, he who retained it would be compelled to produce it for the inspection of the other who might also take a copy of it, as in the case of a partnership agreement; 1 Brod. & B. 318; or a lease; 4 Taunt. 666; or plans constituting part of an agreement sued on; 70 Fed. Rep. 337.

The practice was originally confined to cases in which there was but one copy, but it was speedily extended to any case in which the parties seeking an inspection have an interest in the document; 8 C. B. N. s. 817; nor was it necessary that it should be a single paper, but it extended to correspondence, as, a letter accepting an oral offer; id. An order for inspection might also be obtained by a defendant who suggested the alteration or forgery of the document which formed the cause of action; 2 Man. & G. 758. In such a case it was usual and proper for the application to be founded on an affidavit attacking the genuineness of the paper; 3 Cow. 17.

The right of inspection is confined to documents supporting the case of the party applying for it and does not extend to those which support the case of his opponent; 1 Myl. & K. 88; 4 Ves. 66; 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 712, and notes; nor can the right be used for the purpose of finding out the case of the other party; 6 C. B. N. s. 679; [1897] 2 Q. B. 62; or where the books applied for contain entries of a confidential, privileged nature, not relative to the action, and the legitimate information from them can be obtained at the trial, and they are in possession of the plaintiff and can be produced under subpoena; 20 App. Div. N. Y. 330; and in a libel suit an order will not be made for the production of the original manuscript where the publication is admitted; [1897] 2 Q. B. 184; [1895] 2 Q. B. 148. If, however, the party is entitled to the production of the document as being applicable to his case, his right is unaffected by the circumstance that it discloses the case of his opponent; id.; or that it is evidence for the other party's case also; 180 Pa. 14.

The right of common-law courts to order an inspection was established in England by stat. 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, § 6, which authorized the exercise of the power where an action was pending, and documents were in the control of the other party, of which by a bill of discovery the inspection could be secured. In the United States prior to the statutes of the same character which were passed in most states, the courts were indisposed to assume the power; 6 Cow. 81; and resort was more frequently had to a bill of discovery, the use of which is now usually unnecessary except in special cases. There is no federal statute definitely applying to the subject, though Rev. Stat. §§ 724, 858, 914, provide for the production of documents at the trial and in those courts therefore to secure an inspection before the trial a bill of discovery must still be resorted to. At least it would appear that the weight of the earlier authorities confines production under the section cited to the trial; 23 Fed. Rep. 82; 32 id. 743; contra, 9 id. 577; 67 id. 18. See, also, 1 Fost. Fed. Pr. § 267.

As to notice to produce and subpoena duces tecum, see those titles.

Public documents are subject to the general rule that their inspection will not be ordered where it would be detrimental to the public interest; 3 Tayl. Ev., 9th ed. § 1483; 1 Greenl. Ev. §§ 251, 476. As to the right of inspection of public records generally, see RECORDS.

It has been held that corporation books are not open to the inspection of strangers; 8 Term 590; 8 B. & C. 375; 44 Barb. 64; or in a litigation to which the corporation is not a party; 35 Fed. Rep. 13; contra, 16 id. 718; but its members or stockholders or officers always have the right of inspection and production in their interest; 3 Fick. 108; 70 N. Y. 220; 103 Pa. 111; 40 N. J. Eq. 992; 28 La. Ann. 204; 65 Vt. 519.

An objection to the production of documents on the ground that they may tend to criminate the party ordered to produce them must be taken only to the production of the documents alleged to have that effect and not to the order; [1897] 2 Q. B. 124. A person who has obtained an order for inspection of books cannot have irrelevant parts kept concealed during the whole litigation or unsealed and resealed on oath from time to time as the books are required in business, so as to cause interruption of it; it is sufficient if irrelevant entries are covered, during the actual inspection, with the affidavit of the person producing them that nothing material has been covered; [1897] 1 Ch. 761.

The provisions for production and inspection of documents in the New Jersey common-law practice act are held to apply to the court of chancery; 88 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 864. An order for production will be refused where the party applying refuses to state how the papers in question are material; 25 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 31.

Too great generality in the application for production of books is cured by particularizing books in the order; 12 Misc. Rep. 3.

See NOTICE TO PRODUCE PAPERS; SUBPOENA DUCES TECUM; PROPERT IN CURIA.

PRODUCTION OF SUIT (pro-ductio actæ). The concluding clause of all declarations is, "and thereupon he brings his suit." In old pleading, this referred to the production by the plaintiff of his acta or suit, i. e. persons prepared to confirm what he had stated in the declaration. The phrase has remained; but the practice from which it arose is obsolete; 3 Bla. Com. 295; Steph. Pl. And. ed. § 220.

PROFANE. That which has not been consecrated. By a profane place is understood one which is neither sacred, nor sanctified, nor religious. Dig. 11. 7. 2. 4.

PROFANELY. In a profane manner. In an indictment, under the act of assembly of Pennsylvania, against profanity, it is requisite that the words should be laid to have been spoken profanely. 11 S. & R. 394. See BLASPHEMY.

PROFANENESS, PROFANITY. In Criminal Law. A disrespect to the name of God or His divine providence. This is variously punished by statute in the several states. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d ed. 580. See BLASPHEMY.

PROFECTITUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. That which descends to us from our ascendants. Dig. 23. 3. 5.

PROFER. An offer or proffer.

PROPERT IN CURIA (Lat.) he produces in court: sometimes written proferit in curiam, with the same meaning). In Pleading. A declaration on the record that a party produces the deed under which he makes title in court. In ancient practice, the deed itself was actually produced; in modern times, the allegation only is made in the declaration, and the deed is then constructively in possession of the court; 3 Salk. 119; 6 M. & G. 277; 11 Md. 322; 67 Fed. Rep. 507.

Profer is, in general, necessary when either party pleads a deed and claims rights under it, whether plaintiff; 2 Dutch. 298; or defendant; 17 Ark. 279; to enable the court to inspect and construe the instrument pleaded, and to entitle the adverse party to oyer thereof; 10 Co. 92 b; 1 Chitty. Pl. 414; 1 Archb. Pr. 164; Andr. Steph. Pl. 180; and is not necessary when the party pleads it without making title under it; Gould, Pl. c. 7, p. 2, § 47. But a party who is actually or presumptively unable to produce a deed may plead it without profer, as in suit by a stranger; Com. Dig. Plead. O 8; Cro. Jac. 217; Cro. Car. 441; or one claiming title by operation of law; Co. Litt. 225; Bac. Abr. Plead. (I 12); 5 Co. 75; or where the deed is in the possession of the adverse party or is lost. In all these cases the special facts must be shown, to excuse the want of profer. See Gould, Pl. c. 8, p. 2;

Lawes, Pl. 96; 1 Saund 9 a. Profert and oyer are abolished in England by the Common Law Procedure Act, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76; and a provision exists, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, for allowing inspection of all documents in the possession or under the control of the party against whom the inspection is asked. See 25 E. L. & E. 304. In many of the states of the United States profert has been abolished, and in some instances the instrument must be set forth in the pleading of the party relying upon it. The operation of profert and oyer, where allowed, is to make the deed a part of the pleadings of the party producing it; 11 Md. 322; 3 Cra. 234. See 7 Cra. 176; PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS.

PROFESSION. A public declaration respecting something. Code 10. 41. 6. A state, art, or mystery: as, the legal profession. Dig. 1. 18. 6. 4; Dumat, Dr. Pub. l. 1, t. 9, s. 1, n. 7.

In Ecclesiastical Law. The act of entering into a religious order. See 17 Viner, Abr. 545.

The term professions in a statute laying a tax includes lawyers; 59 Ga. 187. See 41 Mich. 155; 19 id. 217.

PROFESSIONAL ETHICS. See ETHICS, LEGAL.

PROFIT A PRENDRE. The right to take soil, gravel, minerals, and the like from the land of another. An interest in the estate. 49 Fed. Rep. 549; Waslib. Easem. 11. This right may be the subject of a separate grant; 85 Me. 448. It is an interest in the estate; 22 Wend. 423; 70 N. Y. 419.

Profit a prendre is a peculiar species of easements. It is "the right to take something which is the produce of the land." It is in its nature an incorporeal right incapable of livery, though it is imposed upon corporeal or tangible property. It may be appurtenant to a dominant tenement, in the nature of an easement, or it may be a right in gross. It may be held apart from the possession of land, and differs therein from an easement, which requires a dominant tenement for its existence. When attached to other land it is in the nature of an easement; when not so attached it cannot properly be said to be an easement, but is an interest or estate in the land itself. Jones, Easements § 49.

The right can be acquired only by grant or prescription. Such a right in the soil of another cannot be claimed by custom. Thus a claim by the inhabitants of a township upon the land of another to take sand, etc., from the seashore, is without foundation; 15 C. B. N. S. 240; 17 N. H. 524.

The privilege of watering cattle at a pond or brook or of taking the water for domestic purposes is an easement and not a profit a prendre; 5 Ad. & El. 733; the right to take seaweed from the shores is a right to a profit in the soil; 49 Me. 100; and so is the right to take coal or any mineral from the land of another; 53 Pa. 206; and so is a right to use lands of another to cut grass, for pasturage, for hunting, or fishing; Jones, Easements 57; so is the right to take and kill game on land or water; 9 Q. B. D. 315.

The right to profit a prendre acquired by grant or prescription as appurtenant to certain lands cannot be used as a right in gross by one not holding any connection with the land; 12 C. B. N. S. See EASEMENTS: A PRENDRE.

PROFITS. The advance in the price of goods sold beyond the cost of purchase. See 84 N. Y. 23.

The gain made by the sale of produce or manufactures, after deducting the value of the labor, materials, rents, and all expenses, together with the interest of the capital employed.

An excess of the value of returns over the value of advances.

The excess of receipts over expenditures; that is, net earnings. 15 Minn. 519.

The receipts of a business, deducting current expenses; it is equivalent to net receipts. 94 U. S. 500; 5 Super. Ct. Pa. 276.

This is a word of very extended signification. In commerce, it means the advance in the price of goods sold beyond the cost of purchase. In distinction from the wages of labor, it is well understood to imply the net return to the capital of stock employed, after deducting all the expenses, including not only the wages of those employed by the capitalist, but the wages of the capitalist himself for superintending the employment of his capital or stock. Adam Smith, Wealth of Nat. b. i. c. 6, and McCulloch's Notes; Mill, Polit. Econ. c. 15. After indemnifying the capitalist for his outlay, there commonly remains a surplus, which is his profit, the net income from his capital. 1 Mill, Polit. Econ. c. 15. The word profit is generally used by writers on political economy to denote the difference between the value of advances and the value of returns made by their employment.

The profit of the farmer and the manufacturer is the gain made by the sale of produce or manufactures, after deducting the value of the labor, materials, rents, and all expenses, together with the interest of the capital employed,—whether land, buildings, machinery, instruments, or money. The rents and profits of an estate, the income or the net income of it, are all equivalent expressions. The income or the net income of an estate means only the profit it will yield after deducting the charges of management; 5 Me. 202; 35 id. 420.

Under the term profit is comprehended the produce of the soil, whether it arise above or below the surface: as, herbage, wood, turf, coals, minerals, stones; 23 S. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 686; also fish in a pond or running water. Profits are divided into profits a prendre, or those taken and enjoyed by the mere act of the proprietor himself, and profits a vendre, namely, such as are received at the hands of and rendered by another. Hamm. N. P. 172.

Profits are divided by writers on political economy into gross and net,—gross profits being the whole difference between the value of advances and the value of returns made by their employment, and net profits being so much of that difference as is attributable solely to the capital employed. The remainder of the difference, or, in other words, the gross profits minus the net profits, has no particular name; but it represents the profits attributable to industry, skill, and enterprise. See Malthus, Political Econ.; McCulloch, Political Econ. 563. But the word profit is generally used in a less extensive signification, and presupposes an excess of the value of returns over the value of advances.

It was said by Jessel, M. R., that "there is no such thing as gross profits." See 10 App. Cas. 446. Where a life insurance company issued "participating policies" for an increased premium, agreeing at the end of every five years to give two-thirds of the "gross profits" of such policies to the policy holders, it was held that this two-thirds constituted "annual profits or gains" of the company and were assessable to income tax; 10 App. Cas. 438, per Lords Blackburn and Fitzgerald, Lord Bramwell dissenting. The case seems to disregard the nature of the return of that portion of the premium charged in advance and subsequently ascertained to have been excessive, which the companies curiously call "dividends." See DIVIDENDS; NET PROFITS; OPERATING EXPENSES.

Using profit in this more limited and popular sense, persons who share profits do not necessarily share losses; for they may stipulate for a division of gain, if any, and yet some one or more of them may, by agreement, be entitled to be indemnified against losses by the others: so that whilst all share profits, some only bear losses. Persons who share gross returns share profits in the sense of gain; but they do not by sharing the returns share losses, for these fall entirely on those making the advances. Moreover, although a division of gross returns is a division of profits if there are any, it is so only incidentally, and because such profits are included in what is divided: it is not a division of profits as such; and under an agreement for a division of gross returns, whatever is returned must be divided, whether there be profit or loss, or neither; 1 Lindl. Part. 8, 17. These considerations have led to the distinction between agreements to share profits and agreements to share gross returns, and to the doctrine that, whilst an agreement to share profits creates a partnership, an agreement to share gross returns does not. See PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

Commissions may be considered as profits, for some purposes. A participation in commissions has been held such a participation in profits as to constitute the participants partners; 2 H. Bl. 235; 4 B. & Ald. 663. So, commissions received from the sales of a pirated map are profits which must be accounted for by the commission merchant on a bill by the proprietor of the copyright; 2 Curt. C. C. 608. As between partners, all gains which equitably belong to the firm, but which are clandestinely received by one partner, are accounted profits of the firm; Story, Part. § 174; 2 Curt. C. C. 608.

Depreciation of buildings in which a business is carried on, though they were erected by expenditure of the capital invested, is not ordinarily or necessarily considered in estimating the profits; 94 U. S. 500.

In computing the profits to which a party is entitled, interest on fines, debts, and taxes should be charged off and also a proper sum for depreciation of plant; 24 N. Y. Supp. 547.

A direction or power given in a will to raise money out of the rents and profits of an estate for the payment of debts and legacies, or to raise a portion within a definite period, within which it could not be raised out of the annual rents and profits, authorizes a sale; 3 Ch. Cas. 205; 1 Vern. 104; 2 id. 26, 310, 420, 424; 1 Ves. Sen. 491. And judges in later times, looking to the inconvenience of raising a large sum of money in this manner, have inclined much to treat a trust to apply the rents and profits in raising a portion, even at an indefinite period, as authorizing a sale or mortgage; 2 Jarm. Wills, 282; 1 Ves. 284; 1 Ves. Sen. 43. But, as a general rule, the question whether the money is to be raised by a sale or mortgage or out of the annual rents and profits will depend upon the nature of the purpose for which the money is to be raised, and the general tenor of the will; 2 Jarm. Wills 358; 3 Bro. P. C. 66; 3 Yo. & J. 360; 1 Atk. 550; 1 Russ. & M. 590; 2 P. Wms. 68. The circumstances that have chiefly influenced the decisions are—the appointment of a time within which the charge cannot be raised by annual profits: the situation of the estate, where a sale or mortgage would be very prejudicial, as in the case of a reversion, especially if it would occasion any danger that the charge would not be answered in its full extent; the nature of the charge, as where it is for debts or portions, and, in the latter instance, the age or death of the child; 2 Ves. 480, n. 1; 2 Vern. 26, 72, 420; 2 P. Wms. 13, 650; 1 Atk. 500, 550; 2 id. 358. But in no case where there are subsequent restraining words has the word profit been extended; Prec. Ch. 580, note, and the cases cited there; 1 Atk. 506; 2 id. 106.

A devise of the rents and profits of land is equivalent to a devise of the land itself, and will carry the legal as well as the beneficial interest therein; 1 Ves. Sen. 171; 9 B. & Ald. 42; 9 Mass. 372; 1 Cush. 93; 1 Spenc. 142; 17 Wend. 303; 35 Me. 414; 1 Bro. C. C. 310. A direction by the testator that a certain person shall receive for his support the net profits of the land is a devise of the land itself, for such period of time as the profits were devised; 35 Me. 419.

An assignment of the profits of an estate amounts to an equitable lien, and would entitle the assignee in equity to insist upon a mortgage. Thus, if a tenant for life of the real estate should, by covenant, agree to set apart and pay the whole or a portion of the annual profits of that estate to trustees for certain objects, it would create a lien in the nature of a trust on those profits against him and all persons claiming as volunteers or with notice under him; 2 Cox, Ch. 333; s. c. 1 Ves. 477; 3 Bro. C. C. 381, 388.

Profits expected to arise from merchandise employed in maritime commerce are a proper subject of insurance in England and in the United States; 3 Kent 271; 10 Pick. 399; 1 Sumn. 431. So in Italy; Targa, cap. xliii, no. 5; Portugal; Santerna, part iii, no. 40; and the Hanse Towns; 3 Magnus 213; Beneck, Ass. chap. 1, sect. 10, vol. 1, p. 170. But in France; Code de Comm. art. 347; Holland; Rykershoek, Quest. Priv. Jur. lib. iv. c. 5; and in Spain, except to certain distant parts; Ordinanzas de Bilbao, ch. xxii, art. 7, 8, 11; it is illegal to insure expected profits. Such insurance is required by the course and interest of trade, and has been found to be greatly conducive to its prosperity; 3 Kent 271; 2 East 544; 1 Arn. Ins., 6th ed. 37, 205. Sometimes the profits are included in a valuation of the goods from which they are expected to arise; sometimes they are insured as profits; 1 Johns. 433; 3 Pet. 222; 1 Sumn. 45; 6 E. & B. 312. They must be insured as profits; May, Ins. § 79. They may be insured equally by valued and by open policies; 1 Arn. Ins. 205; 3 Camp. 267. But it is more judicious to make the valuation; 1 Johns. 433; 3 Kent 273. The insured must have a real interest in the goods from which the profits are expected; 3 Kent 271; but he need not have the absolute property in them; 16 Pick. 397, 400. See May, Ins. § 79; INSURANCE.

A trustee, executor, or guardian, or other person standing in a like relation to another, may be made to account for and pay all the profits made by him in any of the concerns of his trust, as by embarking the trust funds in trade; 1 Story, Eq. Jur. 465; 2 Myl. & K. 66, 672, note; Lindl. Part., Am. ed. 523; 1 Ves. 32, 41; 11 id. 61; 3 V. & B. 315; 1 J. & W. 123, 131; 2 Will. Exec. 139, n.; 1 S. & R. 245; 1 Maule & S. 412; 3 Bro. C. C. 400; 10 Pick. 77; Lind. Part.

The expected profits of a special contract may be reckoned as a part of the damages for a failure to fulfil it, where it appears that such profits would have accrued from the contract itself as the direct and immediate consequence of its fulfillment; 13 How. 307, 344; 7 Cush. 516, 523; 8 Exch. 401; 16 N. Y. 499; Mayne, Dam. 15; 2 G. B. n. s. 593; 90 Ga. 416; 9 Utah 175; 66 Hun 331; 63 Wis. 309; 92 Mich. 606; 68 id. 690. But where the profits are such only as were expected to result from other independent bargains actually entered into on the faith of such special contract, or for the purposes of fulfilling it, or are contingent upon future bargains or speculations or states of the market, they are too remote and uncertain to be relied upon as a proper basis of damages; 13 How. 307, 344; 88 Me. 361; 7 Cush. 516, 522; 7 Hill 61; 13 C. B. 353. See, also, 21 Pick. 378, 381; 1 Pet. C. C. 85, 94; 3 Wash. C. C. 184; 1 Pet. 172; 11 S. & R. 445; 48 Ill. App. 26. Profits may be recovered as damages for the breach of a contract, where they are not uncertain or remote, or where, from the terms of the contract itself or the special circumstances under which it was made, it may be reasonably presumed that they were within the intent and mutual understanding of both parties at the time the contract was made; 139 U. S. 199; 153 id. 540. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES; PATENT.

A purchaser is entitled to the profits of the estate from the time fixed upon for completing the contract, whether he does or does not take possession of the estate; 2 Sugd. Vend. ch. 16, sect. 1, art. 1; 6 Dana 299; 3 Gill 82. See 12 M. & W. 761.

Under what circumstances a participation or sharing in profits will make one a partner in a trade or adventure, see PARTNERS; PARTNERSHIP.

PROGRESSION (Lat. progressio; from pro and gredior, to go forward).

That state of a business which is neither the commencement nor the end. Some act done after the matter has commenced and before it is completed. Plovid. 343. See CONSUMMATION; INCEPTION.

PROHIBITIO DE VASTO DIRECTA PARTI. A judicial writ which was formerly addressed to a tenant, prohibiting him from waste pending suit. Reg. Jud. 21.

PROHIBITION (Lat. prohibitio; from pro and habere, to hold back). Forbidden to do; inhibition; interdiction. 74 Md. 543.

In Practice. The name of a writ issued by a superior court, directed to the judge and parties of a suit in an inferior court, commanding them to cease from the prosecution of the same, upon a suggestion that the cause originally, or some collateral matter arising therein, does not belong to that jurisdiction, but to the cognizance of some other court. 3 Bla. Com. 112; Com. Dig.; Bac. Abr.; Viner. Abr.; 2 Sell. Pr. 308; Ayliffe, Parerg. 434; 2 H. Bla. 533; 4 Wash. 655; 142 U. S. 479; 147 id. 14.

The writ of prohibition may also be issued when, having jurisdiction, the court has attempted to proceed by rules differing from those which ought to be observed; Bull. N. P. 219; or when by the exercise of its jurisdiction, the inferior court would defeat a legal right; 2 Chitt. Pr. 355; or to prevent a judge from granting a new trial after expiration of the trial term; 113 Mo. 42.

A writ of prohibition is a civil remedy given in a civil action, even when instituted to arrest a criminal prosecution; 129 U. S. 104; and only lies in cases of the unlawful exercise of judicial functions; 31 W. Va. 617; 2 Hill 307; 41 Mo. 44; 83 Wis. 93; 96 Barb. 341.

The writ of prohibition issues only in cases of extreme necessity, and before it can be granted, it must appear that the party aggrieved has applied in vain for redress; and it is never allowed except in cases of usurpation or abuse of power, and not then unless other existing remedies are inadequate to afford relief, or no other remedy exists; 30 W. Va. 533; 40 La. Ann. 837. When a writ of error or appeal furnishes a complete and effective remedy, a writ of prohibition will not be issued; 98 Mo. 252; 40 La. Ann. 837; 48 id. 29; 78 Ga. 633; 84 Va. 698. Prohibition will not issue after judgment and sentence unless want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the proceedings, but before judgment the supreme court can examine not simply the process and pleadings of record, but also the facts and evidence upon which action was taken; 143 U. S. 472, 513, 515.

A writ of prohibition will not be issued to restrain a district court from taking jurisdiction of a petition of the owner of a barge for the benefit of the limited liability act; 146 U. S. 357.

When a party aggrieved by a judgment has an appeal to the supreme court which becomes inefficacious through his neglect, a writ of prohibition will not issue to prevent the enforcement of the judgment; 143 U. S. 472, 513.

Where it appears that the court whose action is sought to be prohibited has clearly no jurisdiction of the cause originally, or of some collateral matter arising therein, a party who has objected to the jurisdiction at the outset and has no other remedy is entitled to a writ of prohibition as a matter of right. But where there is another legal remedy by appeal or otherwise, or where the question of the jurisdiction of the court is doubtful, or depends on facts which are not made matter of record, or where the application is made by a stranger, the granting or refusal of the writ is discretionary. Nor is the granting of the writ obligatory where the case has gone to sentence, and the want of jurisdiction does not appear upon the face of the proceedings." See 153 U. S. 402, followed in 166 U. S. 110.

The supreme court of Mississippi has revisory jurisdiction only and cannot grant a writ of prohibition to circuit courts; 47

Miss. 200, 668.

The term prohibition is also applied to the interdiction of making and of selling or giving away, intoxicating liquors, either absolutely or for other than medicinal, scientific, and religious (sacramental) purposes. Anderson's L. Dict. See LIQUOR LAWS. NATIONAL PROHIBITION ACT.

PROHIBITION COMMISSIONER AND DIRECTORS.

The regulations of the National Prohibition Act provide for and designate a general agent of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, called a prohibition commissioner, who is authorized, among other things, to issue and sign permits to sell liquor at retail prices for medicinal purposes through licensed pharmacists, and also a local agent in each State or district, called a prohibition director, who is authorized, among other things, to issue and sign permits to purchase liquor to be used and sold under the permits last mentioned.

The act and the regulations make it plain that the prohibition commissioner and the prohibition directors are mere agents and subordinates of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. They act under his direction and perform such acts only as he commits to them by the regulations. They are responsible to him and must abide by his directions. 245 U. S. 391.

PROHIBITIVE IMPEDIMENTS.

Those impediments to a marriage which are only followed by a punishment but do not render the marriage null. Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law 44.

PROJET. In International Law. The draft of a proposed treaty or convention.

PROLES (Lat.). Progeny; such issue as proceeds from a lawful marriage; and, in its enlarged sense, it signifies any children.

PROLETARIUS. In Civil Law. One who had no property to be taxed, and paid a tax only on account of his children (proles); a person of mean or common extraction. The word has become, in French, proletaire signifying one of the common people; and in English proletariat.

PROLICIDE (Lat. proles, offspring, cædere, to kill). In Medical Jurisprudence. A word used to designate the destruction of the human offspring. Jurists divide the subject into fœticide, or the destruction of the fœtus in utero, and infanticide, or the destruction of the new-born infant. Ryan, Med. Jur. 137.

PROLIXITY. The unnecessary and superfluous statement of facts in pleading or in evidence. This will be rejected as impertinent. 7 Price 278, n.

PROLOCUTOR (Lat. pro and loquor, to speak before). In Ecclesiastical Law. The president or chairman of a convocation.

The speaker of the house of lords is called the prolocutor. The office belongs to the lord chancellor by prescription; 3 Steph. Com. 347.

PROLONGATION. Time added to the duration of something.

When the time is lengthened during which a party is to perform a contract, the sureties of such a party are, in general, discharged, unless the sureties consent to such prolongation. See GIVING TIME.

In the civil law the prolongation of time to the principal did not discharge the surety; Dig. 2. 14. 37; 12. 1. 40.

PROLYTÆ (Lat.). In Roman Law. The term used to denominate students of law during the fifth and last year of their studies. They were left during this year very much to their own direction, and took the name prolytæ, omnino soluti. They studied chiefly the Code and the imperial constitutions. See Dig. Pref. Prim. Const. 2; Calvinus, Lex.

PROMATERTERA (Lat.). Great maternal aunt; the sister of one's grandmother. Inst. 3. 6. 3; Dig. 38. 10. 10. 14.

PROMISE (Lat. promitto, to put forward). An engagement by which the promisor contracts with another to perform or do something to the advantage of the latter.

Within the statute of frauds a promise to pay the debt of another is an undertaking by a person not before liable, for the purpose of securing or performing the same duty for which the party for whom the undertaking is made, continues liable. 60 Conn. 71.

When an oral promise is made, all that is said at the time in relation to it must be considered; if, therefore, a man promises to pay all he owes, accompanied by a denial that he owes anything, no action will lie to enforce such a promise; 15 Wend. 187.

Strictly speaking a promise is not a representation; the failure to make it good may give a cause of action, but it is not a false representation, which will authorize the rescission of a contract; 96 Ala. 504.

And when the promise is conditional, the condition must be performed before it becomes of binding force; 7 Johns. 36. See CONDITION; CONTRACTS; 5 East 17; 2 Leon. 224; 4 B. & Ald. 595.

The words "I promise" in a note signed by several, will apply to and bind each of them. 6 Dana (Ky.) 341.

PROMISE OF MARRIAGE. A contract mutually entered into by a man and a woman that they will marry each other. Every marriage is necessarily preceded by an express or implied contract of this description, as a wedding cannot be agreed upon and celebrated at one and the same instant; Addison, Contr. 1106.

When a man and a woman agree to marry and subsequently either one refuses, the other may bring suit for damages, such suits being called breach of promise suits. It is no defence to an action for breach of promise that the defendant was married if the plaintiff did not have knowledge of such fact; 60 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 222; 183 N. Y. 633. If a man refuse to marry a woman she need not make a demand before bringing action; 77 Wisc. 663. Before the Reformation no action for breach of promise could be maintained, for marriage was a matter of spiritual jurisdiction. It was not till the middle of the seventeenth century that marriage was recognized by our law as a temporal benefit, and a breach of promise as cognizable by the temporal courts; 20 Q. B. D. 494, 504, 505.

A promise of marriage is not to be likened to an actual marriage. The latter, as has been seen in the article on marriage, is not a contract, but a legal relation; while the former is an executory contract in the strict sense of the term, and governed in general by the ordinary law of contracts, though it has certain peculiarities of its own. As in other contracts, the parties must be sui juris. If, therefore, the man or the woman be an infant, or labor under any other legal disability, he or she will not be bound by a promise of marriage; but if one of the parties be an infant and the other be an adult, the promise will be binding upon the latter; Stra. 937; 5 Cow. 475; 7 id. 22; 5 Sneed 659; 1 D. Chipm. 252; 42 Ill. App. 511. A promise made during infancy may be ratified after the infant attains majority. A late English statute requires a new and distinct contract, after majority, in order to bind the infant on his promise to marry after he comes of age; but a new contract may be inferred from continued acceptance of the engagement; L. R. 5 C. P. 410; and see 4 C. P. Div. 485. Neither does it follow, as we shall see presently, that a promise of marriage is not binding because the parties to the promise cannot form a valid marriage; they may be competent to contract, though not competent to marry.

There must be a legal and valid consideration; but as there are always mutual promises, they are a sufficient consideration for each other. There must be a meeting of the minds of the parties, i. e. a request or proposition on the one side, and an assent on the other. If the communications between the parties are verbal, the only questions which usually arise relate to evidence and proof. The very words or time or manner of the promise need not be proved, but it may be inferred from the conduct of the parties, and from the circumstances which usually attend an engagement to marry: as, visiting, the understanding of friends and relations, preparations for marriage, and the reception of the man by the woman's family as a suitor; 3 Salk. 16; 15 Mass. 1; 2 D. & C. 282; Leake, Contr. 210; 13 Pa. 381; 1 Ohio St. 26; 2 C. & P. 553; 6 Cow. 254; 26 Conn. 398; 4 Zab. 291; 65 Vt. 273. But as to the evidence of a contract to marry, more direct proof is now commonly required than formerly, since modern statutes permit parties themselves to take the stand; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 43. Therefore a promise cannot be inferred from devoted attention, frequent visits, and apparently exclusive attention; 53 N. Y. 267; nor from mere presents or letters not to the point; see 2 Brewst. 487; [1891] 2 Q. B. 534; nor from the plaintiff's wedding preparations, unknown to the defendant; 48 Ind. 562; 63 Ill. 41; nor from the woman's unexplained possession of an engagement ring; 2 Brewst. 487. See, generally, 53 N. Y. 267.

A later New York case holds that under the law allowing parties to an action to testify, a promise of marriage cannot be inferred from the mere proof of circumstances such as usually attend an engagement to marry. In the absence of fraud, there must be proof of an actual contract; a meeting of minds of the two parties. Courtship alone or mere intention to marry is not enough. Thorough acquaintance with character, habits, and disposition is essential in order to enter into such a contract intelligently, and an opportunity must be allowed to form the acquaintance which is required, without raising the inference of a contract; 151 N. Y. 598. Mere courtship is not an agreement to marry; 14 Am. R. 111; 63 Am. Dec. 529; 63 Ill. 41.

When the parties are at a distance from each other, and the offer is made by letter, it will be presumed to continue for a reasonable time for the consideration of the party addressed; and if accepted within a reasonable time, and before it is expressly revoked, the contract is then complete; 1 Pars. Contr. 84. No particular form of word is necessary; 53 N. Y. 267.

A promise of marriage is not within the third clause of the fourth section of the statute of frauds, relating to agreements made upon consideration of marriage; but if not to be performed within a year, it has been held to be within the fifth clause, and must, therefore, be in writing in order to be binding; 1 Ld. Raym. 387; 58 Ind. 29; 2 N. H. 515. But the later cases are inclined to construe the statute so as not to affect promises to marry; 66 Me. 187; 20 Conn. 485; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 44; the marriage may be performed within a year, and that is enough. See 85 Ill. 222.

If no time be fixed and agreed upon for the performance of the contract, it is, in contemplation of law, a contract to marry within a reasonable period, considering the circumstances of the age, pecuniary means, etc., of the contracting parties, and either party may call upon the other to fulfil the engagement, and in case of default may bring an action for damages. If both lie by for an unreasonable period, and do not treat the contract as continuing, it will be deemed to be abandoned by mutual consent. If the parties are somewhat advanced in years, and the marriage is appointed to take place at a remote period of time, the contract would be voidable at the option of either party, as in restraint of marriage; Addison, Contr. 678. The fact that the plaintiff consented to a two years' postponement of the wedding-day does not relieve defendant from his promise; 71 Hun 137.

Upon a refusal to marry, an action lies at once, although the time set for the marriage has not come; Leake, Contr. 752; 42 N. Y. 240; 60 N. Y. Sup. Ct. 222; so if a party puts it out of his power to perform his promise of marriage; 27 Mich. 217; 15

M. & W. 189. An action lies when one party has given notice that he will not fulfil his promise, although the time for fulfilment has not arrived; L. R. 8 C. P. 167. See PERFORMANCE. A refusal to fulfil the contract may be as well manifested by acts as by words. After the lapse of a reasonable time, if one party, without excuse, neglects or refuses to fulfil his promise, the other may consider this a breach and sue; 43 Mich. 346. It is sufficient if plaintiff shows that defendant has violated his promise by refusing to marry her, without averring or proving an offer on her part to marry defendant; 25 Atl. Rep. (R. I.) 348. See 71 Wis. 663.

It has been said that the action has curious points of affinity with actions of tort, one of which is a very large discretion given to the jury as to damages; Poll. Torts 184; and damages are often given which are, in fact, exemplary; L. R. 1 C. P. 331. The amount awarded is usually estimated according to plaintiff's loss of reputation, wealth, social position, and prospects in life, as well as the endurance of mortification, pain, or disgrace; 12 Ohio St. 313; 53 Wis. 462; 8 Barb. 323; 58 Mo. 600; 52 Mich. 336.

The defences which may be made to an action for a breach of promise of marriage are, of course, various; but it is only necessary to notice in this place such as are in some degree peculiar. Thus, if either party has been convicted of an infamous crime, or has sustained a bad reputation generally, and the other was ignorant of it at the time of the engagement, or if the woman has committed fornication, and this was unknown at the time to the man who promised to marry her, or if the woman prove unchaste subsequently; 77 Pa. 504; 51 Ill. 288; or if the woman is deeply involved in debt at the time of the engagement, and the fact is kept secret from her intended husband; Add. Contr. 630; but see 1 E. B. & E. 7, 96; or if false representations are made by the woman, or by her friends in collusion with her, as to her circumstances and situation in life and the amount of her fortune and marriage portion, either of these will constitute a good defence; 1 C. & P. 350, 529; 3 Esp. 236; 44 Me. 164; 1 C. & P. 463; 5 Bingham. N. C. 54; 5 La. Ann. 316; 18 Ill. 44. But it has been held not to be a defence that the plaintiff at the time of the engagement was under an engagement to marry another person, unless the prior engagement was fraudulently concealed; 1 E. B. & E. 790. But see 2 Pars. Contr. 550. And the defendant's pre-engagement would be no defence; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 48. It is not justification of a breach of promise to marry a woman, to show that she has been heard to use obscene language; 8 Can. L. J. 426; and where marriage between cousins is not forbidden by statute, such relationship will not mitigate or excuse a breach of promise to marry; 78 Wis. 72. A bare offer of marriage is not a defence to a prosecution for seduction; it must be accepted; 50 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 800; but the contrary was held in 27 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 815, which is said to be the only case sustaining that view; 57 Alb. L. J. 51. The general rule is undoubtedly that nothing short of actual marriage is a bar; 79 Ia. 703; 82 id. 393; 118 Mo. 181; 97 Cal. 449.

If after the engagement either party is guilty of gross misconduct, inconsistent with the character which he or she was fairly presumed to possess, the other party will be released; 4 Esp. 250; so if either party is guilty of acts of unchastity after the making of the promise, the other party will be absolved; 51 Ill. 288; 77 Pa. 504; but mutual improprieties and lewdness between the parties will not be allowed to bar the action or to go in mitigation or aggravation of damages; 3 Pittsb. 84; or excuse the performance of the contract; 107 Mo. 471. If the engagement is made without any agreement respecting the woman's property, and she afterwards disposes of any considerable portion of it without her intended husband's knowledge and consent, or if she insists upon having her property settled to her own separate use, it is said that this will justify him in breaking off the engagement: Add. Contr. 1201. So, if the situation and position of either of the parties as regards his or her fitness for the marriage relation is materially and permanently altered for the worse (whether with or without the fault of such party) after the engagement, this will release the other party. Thus, if one of the parties is attacked by blindness, or by an incurable disease, or any malady calculated permanently to impair and weaken the constitution, this will dispense with the performance of the contract on the part of the other party: Add. Contr. 1199; Pothier, Tr. du Mar. no. 1. 60, 61, 63. (In 1 Abb. App. Dec. 282, it was held that evidence that the plaintiff drank intoxicating liquors to excess was not admissible as a defence.) Whether it will also constitute a defence for the party afflicted, is a question of much difficulty. In 1 E. B. & E. 746, 765, where it appeared that the defendant since the engagement had become afflicted with consumption, whereby he was rendered incapable of marriage without great danger of his life, it was held, by six judges against five, that this constituted no defence; though it seemed to be agreed that it would have been a good defence for the other party.

The common opinion that an agreement to marry between persons incapable of forming a valid marriage is necessarily void, is erroneous. If the disability pertains only to one of the parties, and the other party was ignorant of it at the time of the engagement, it will constitute no defence for the former. Thus, if a man who already has a wife living makes a promise of marriage to another woman who is ignorant of the former marriage, he will be liable in damages for a breach of his promise, although a performance is impossible: Laake, Contr. 597; 2 C. & P. 553; 7 C. B. 999; 5 Exch. 775; 29 Barb. 22; 106 Mass. 339; 60 Hun. 578. Otherwise, if the woman knew at the time the engagement to marry was entered into, that the man was married; 39 N. J. L. 133; 63 Ill. 99. Knowledge that the man was married, obtained by the woman subsequently to the engagement to marry, is not a defence, but may go in mitigation of damages; 1 Heisk. 368.

In an action for breach of promise of marriage, the court will not interfere with the discretion of the jury as to the amount of damages, unless there has been some obvious error or misconception on their part, or it is made apparent that they have been actuated by improper motives; 1 C. B. n. s. 660; 1 Y. & J. 477; 26 Conn. 398. And if the defendant has undertaken to rest his defence, in whole or in part, on the general bad character or the criminal conduct of the plaintiff, and fails altogether in the proof, the jury may take this into consideration as enhancing the damages; 6 Cow. 254; 27 Mo. 600. Where such an action is brought by a woman, she may prove, in aggravation of damages, that the defendant, under color of a promise of marriage, has seduced her; 106 id. 395; s. c. 8 Am. Rep. 838, n.; 42 Mich. 346; s. c. 86 Am. Rep. 442; 37 Wisc. 46; 33 Md. 288; s. c. 3 Am. Rep. 174; L. R. 1. C. P. 331; 8 Barb. 323; 2 Ind. 402; 3 Mass. 73; 75 Tex. 352. But see, contra, 2 Pa. 80, commented on in 11 id. 316; 1 R. I. 493. And misconduct, showing that the plaintiff would be an unfit companion in married life, may be given in evidence in mitigation of damages; 1 Abb. App. Dec. 282. The defendant may show that his failure to marry the plaintiff proceeded from opposition by his mother to the marriage; 24 N. Y. 252; or that he was afflicted with an incurable disease at the time of his breach of the promise to marry, in mitigation of damages; 51 Ill. 288; 129 Ind. 430. Evidence that the general character of the plaintiff for chastity previously to the engagement was bad, is admissible in mitigation of damages; 71 Pa. 240; 4 Mo. App. 94; 2 Bradw. 236; so is indecent conduct (not criminal) of plaintiff before the promise was made; 7 Wend. 142. Evidence of the defendant's financial standing is admissible; 43 Mich. 346; s. c. 36 Am. Rep. 442; so of his social position; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 49.

See 31 Alb. L. J. 327; Schoul. Husb. & W. § 40; 5 So. L. Rev. n. s. 57; Maccola, Breach of Promise; Bishop, M. & D. chap. xi.

PROMISEE. A person to whom a promise has been made.

In general, a promisee can maintain an action on a promise made to him; but when the consideration moves not from the promisee, but some other person, the latter, and not the promisee, has a cause of action, because he is the person for whose use the contract was made; Latch 272; Cro. Jac. 77; 1 T. Raym. 271, 368; 4 B. & Ad. 435; 1 N. & M. 808; Cowp. 437; Doughl. 142. But see Carth. 5; 2 Ventr. 307; 9 M. & W. 92, 96.

PROMISES. When a defendant has been arrested, he is frequently induced to make confession in consequence of promises made to him that if he will tell the truth he will be either discharged or favored; in such a case, evidence of the confession cannot be received, because, being obtained by the flattery of hope, it comes in so questionable a shape, when it is to be considered evidence of guilt, that no credit ought to be given to it; 1 Mass. 144; 1 Leach 299. This is the principle; but what amounts to a promise is not so easily defined. See CONFESSION; CONCURRENT PROMISES; DEPENDENT PROMISES; INDEPENDENT PROMISES.

PROMISOR. One who makes a promise.

The promisor is bound to fulfil his promise unless when it is contrary to law, as a promise to steal or to commit an assault and battery; when the fulfilment is prevented by the act of God, as where one has agreed to teach another drawing and he loses his sight, so that he cannot teach it; when the promisee prevents the promisor from doing what he agreed to do; when the promisor has been discharged from his promise by the promisee; when the promise has been made without a sufficient consideration; and perhaps in some other cases.

PROMISSORY NOTE. A written promise to pay a certain sum of money, at a future time, unconditionally. 7 W. & S. 264; 2 Humphr. 143; 10 Wend. 675; 1 Ala. 233; 7 Mo. 42; 2 Cow. 536; 6 N. H. 364; 7 Vern. 22; 112 Mo. 251; the form of a promissory note is unessential, provided it contain the essential ingredients thereof. See 50 Pac. Rep. (Mont.) 713.

An unconditional written promise, signed by the maker, to pay absolutely and at all events, a sum certain in money, either to the bearer or to a person therein designated or his order. Benj. Chalm. Bills § 271.

A promissory note differs from a mere acknowledgment of a debt without any promise to pay, as when the debtor gives his creditor an I O U. See 2 Yerg. 50; 15 M. & W. 23. But see 2 Humphr. 143; 6 Ala. n. s. 373. In its form it usually contains a promise to pay, at a time therein expressed, a sum of money to a certain person therein named or to his order, for value received. It is dated and signed by the maker. It is never under seal; 9 Hun. 931; even when made by a corporation; 15 Wend. 263; 3 Houst. 288; 8 Fed. Rep. 403. But in L. R. 3 Ch. Ap. 758, it was held that a "debenture" under a corporate seal was provable against the company by the indorsee, free from equities between the payee and the corporation, and, semble, that it was a promissory note. In 15 R. I. 121, it was held that a paper seal of a corporation on an instrument in the form of a promissory note should be regarded as "mere excess." No particular form of words is necessary; but there must be an intention to make a note; see 15 M. & W. 29; Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc. 274; and it should amount in legal effect to an absolute promise to pay money; 75 Cal. 268.

He who makes this promise is called the maker, and he to whom it is made is the payee; 8 Kent 46. A writing in the form of a note payable to the maker's order, becomes a note by indorsement; 22 Pa. 89. A note payable to the maker's order, and indorsed by him in blank, is, in legal effect, a note payable to bearer and is transferable by delivery; 6 C. C. App. 423.

Although a promissory note in its original shape bears no resemblance to a bill of exchange, yet when indorsed it is exactly similar to one; for then it is an order by the indorser of the note upon the maker to pay the indorsee. The indorser is as it were the drawer; the maker, the acceptor; and the indorsee, the payee; 4 Burr. 669; 4 Term 149; 3 Burr. 1224.

Most of the rules applicable to bills of exchange equally affect promissory notes. No particular form is requisite to these instruments: a promise to deliver the money, or to be accountable for it, or that the payee shall have it, is sufficient; Chitty, Bills 53.

There are two principal qualities essential to the validity of a note: first, that it be payable at all events, not dependent on any contingency; 20 Pick. 132; nor payable out of any particular fund; 3 J. J. Marsh. 170, 542; 5 Ark. 441; 2 Blackf. 48; 1 Bibb 503; 9 Miss. 393; 3 Pick. 541; 4 Hawks 102; 5 How. 382. Second, it is required that it be for the payment of money only; 10 S. & R. 94; 47 Wisc. 551; 27 Mich. 191; 35 Me. 384; 11 Vt. 268 (though statutes in some states have made notes payable in merchandise negotiable); that is, in whatever is legal tender at the place of payment; 2 Ames, Bills 828; and not in bank-notes; though it has been held differently in the state of New York; 9 Johns. 120; 19 id. 144. The rule on this subject is said to be more strict in England than here, but to have been relaxed there in 2 Q. B. Div. 194. It is said that the tendency here is to use the term money in a very wide sense; Benj. Chalm. Bills, 2d Am. ed. 10.

A promissory note payable to order or bearer passes by indorsement, and although a chose in action, the holder may bring suit on it in his own name. Although a simple contract, a sufficient consideration is implied from the nature of the instrument. See 5 Com. Dig. 133, n., 151, 472; 4 B. & C. 235; 1 C. & M. 16. It has been urged that, upon principle, negotiable instruments are contracts binding by their own force, and therefore not requiring any consideration; Langd. Contr. § 49. When the back of a note is covered by various indorsements, an assignment of the note, written on a piece of paper pasted to the note, will pass the legal title. See INDORSEMENT.

A negotiable instrument payable to bearer is one which, by custom of trade, passes from hand to hand by delivery, and the holder of which for the time being, if he is a bona fide holder for value without notice, has a good title, notwithstanding any defect in title in the person from whom he took it; [1891] 1 Ch. 270.

As to whether a stipulation in an instrument, otherwise in the form of a promissory note, for the payment of an attorney's fee for the collection of the note in case of dishonor renders the instrument non-negotiable, see BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

A promissory note on the face of which, across one end, is written an agreement that the note will be renewed at maturity, is not negotiable; 126 Pa. 194; nor is one indorsed "without recourse"; 59 Fed Rep. 853.

A promissory note does not discharge the debt for which it is given unless such be the agreement of the parties; it only operates to extend the period for the payment of the debt; 131 U. S. 287. The holder of a note which is destroyed may recover on the note without giving a bond of indemnity; 47 Pac. Rep. (Col.) 1037. See, also, 9 Wheat. 558; 16 N. Y. 582; 21 Grat. 556; contra, 4 Cal. 37; 2 Dev. & C. B. 122; 1 Humphr. 145. See 7 B. & C. 90.

As to promises to pay a debt in specific articles, see 21 Am. Dec. 422.

See BILL OF EXCHANGE; INDORSEMENT; NOTICE; PAYMENT; Dan. Neg. Instr.; Ames, Bills & Notes; Byles, Bills.

PROMITTOR. In Roman law, he who made the promise in the contract of stipulatio. Hunter's Rom. L. (2nd ed.) 460. See STIPULATOR; STIPULATOR; ADSTIPULATOR.

PROMOTERS. Those who, in popular and penal actions, prosecute offenders in their own name and the king's.

Persons or corporations at whose instance private bills are introduced into and passed through parliament. Especially those who press forward bills for the taking of land for railways and other public purposes, who are then called promoters of the undertaking.

Persons who assist in organizing joint stock companies or corporations. Mozl. & W.

It has been said to be a term usefully summing up in a single word a number of business operations familiar to the commercial world, by which a company is generally brought into existence; 28 W. R. 351. One who does an act with reference to the formation of a company or in aid of its organization, is, as regards that act, a promoter of the company. Lloyd, Corp. Liab. for Acts of Prom. 17. It applies to any person who takes an active part in inducing the formation of a company, whether he afterwards becomes connected with the company or not; 97 Cal. 610. See 59 Va. 455.

Promoters stand in a relation of trust and confidence to the intended company, and are bound to exercise utrima fides; Lloyd Corp. Liab. 18; 64 Pa. 43; L. R. 6 Ch. Div. 372; their acts are carefully scrutinized; L. R. 3 App. Cas. 1218; they are precluded from making a secret advantage over the other stockholders; 64 Pa. 43.

The relation of promoters to the company has been considered as similar to that of a trustee to a beneficiary; 25 N. E. Rep. (N. Y.) 505; 6 Ch. Div. 371; or of an agent to a principal; id.; or as analogous to that of partners; 64 Pa. 43.

As between themselves, the relation has been said to be that of partners; 86 Mo. 882; 2 Rawle 359; contra, 34 Minn. 355; or to be rather that of agency; 53 Mo. 315; promoters may, in fact, be partners. It has also been held that their relation towards each other is that of principal and agent; each is liable for such contracts as he authorizes; 64 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 826.

As to the liability of a corporation in regard to any contract made by its promoters on its behalf (supposing the contract to be one which the corporation, after its organization, could legally have made), these rules have been laid down by a writer in 16 Am. L. Rev. 281.

I. As long as the contract remains executory on both sides, the party who contracted with the promoter cannot enforce the contract against the corporation, unless the corporation has ratified the same; and the corporation cannot enforce the contract against the other contracting party without carrying out all the engagements entered into with the other contracting party at the time of making the contract.

II. When a contract made by a promoter on behalf of a future corporation has been ratified and performed by the latter, it may force the party who contracted with the promoter to perform on his side.

III. When the contract has been executed by the other contracting party, the corporation should be held to perform on its side, if (1) it has ratified the contract, or (2) voluntarily accepted the benefit arising from the performance of the contract in such a manner as to estop the corporation from denying that it has ratified the contract. But on the other hand if the benefit from the contract came to the corporation without any voluntary action on its part, or on the part of those whose acts in regard to the subject-matter of the contract are to be regarded as the acts of the corporation, then there is no principle in law or in equity on which it can be compelled to carry out engagements entered into without its authority, and which it has never even impliedly ratified.

A promoter though he purport to act on behalf of a projected corporation cannot bind it by acts performed before it came into existence; 86 Tex. 350; also 44 Ark. 383; 63 Mo. App. 477; 29 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 878; 19 N. Y. Supp. 592; 134 N. Y. 197; 39 Pac. Rep. (Colo.) 584; 43 id. (Oreg.) 719. It has been said in one case, 143 N. Y. 430, that this rule does not apply to a private corporation; 9 N. Y. Supp. 184. The rule does not apply when there was a de facto corporation in existence when the acts were performed; 93 Ill. 153; or when the charter provides that the company shall be liable; 129 Mo. 106; 103 N. Y. 58. "Except as a fiction, therefore, this doctrine that a company can be bound before it is formed, and enters upon its corporate life 'cum onere,' must be regarded as unfounded in principle. . . . It is discredited in England and has not been followed (as far as can be ascertained) since the decision in 2 Macq. H. of L. 393. The American authorities repudiate it." Lloyd, Corp. Liab. for Acts of Prom. 42, citing 5 H. L. 805. The fact that all the stockholders were promoters and entered into the contract, does not make it binding upon the company when formed; 33 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 327; 37 Ark. 184; but see 2 Nev. 237. A corporation cannot, by ratification, become liable on a contract made by its promoters before it came into existence; L. R. 2 C. P. 175; L. R. 9 C. P. 503; 86 Tex. 350; contra, 59 Conn. 272; 21 Neb. 621; 129 Mo. 106; 50 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 776; such ratification, if binding, would date back to the original agreement; 59 Conn. 272. It has been held that the company may "adopt" the original contract and thus become liable under it; 86 Tex. 350; 103 N. Y. 58; 141 Mass. 145; but see 150 Mass. 248; 72 Ill. 531. But adoption is, in effect, the making of a new contract on the same terms as the old; L. R. 33 Ch. Div. 18; 51 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 216. It has been held that estoppel will constitute a ground of liability; 40 Md. 395; 86 Tex. 350.

Where a promoter has contracted for something to be performed after incorporation, the company, if it accept performance, with knowledge of the facts, is liable; 141 Mass. 145; L. R. 88 Ch. Div. 156; 143 N. Y. 430. Where the performance is partly before and partly after incorporation, the company may, by acceptance, render itself liable; 51 N. W. Rep. (Minn.) 216; but see 86 Tex. 350, where services were rendered, under different contracts, before and after incorporation, and a recovery was allowed for the latter and not for the former.

A vote of the directors (under a clause in the articles of association) that the promoter's preliminary expenses be paid, was held not a ground of recovery; L. R. 9 C. P. 503; but see 59 Conn. 272; and a vote of the directors that "the agreement of purchase be ratified" was held not to bind the corporation; L. R. 16 Ch. Div. 125.

A recovery for work done before incorporation, at the request of a promoter, has been allowed on the ground of a quasi-contractual obligation; 18 N. Y. Supp. 533; but see 27 Conn. 170; 65 Ill. 838; L. R. 9 C. P. 503; 86 Tex. 350. See Keener, Quasi-Contracts.

Ratification may be express, or may be implied from the voluntary acceptance of the benefit of the contract, whereby an estoppel is worked. See 12 N. H. 205; 15 Barb. 323. See, also, 7 Ch. Div. 368; L. R. 2 C. P. 174. A corporation cannot enforce a subscription to shares made before its formation on the faith of certain promises of its promoters, without fulfilling the promises; 10 N. Y. 530.

Promoters are personally liable on contracts made by them for the intended company when the latter proves abortive; L. R. 2 C. P. 174; and also for subscriptions paid in to an abortive company, and that without any deduction for expenses incurred; Beach, Priv. Corp. 159; 8 B. & C. 814.

A promoter is not liable ex contractu to a person who has been induced by his fraud to take shares in a company, but he may be liable ex delicto; 2 E. & B. 478. Promoters are liable in damages to subscribers whose subscriptions are obtained by fraud; 42 Vt. 389; 66 N. Y. 558; a bill in equity lies to recover back money which a person has been induced, through fraud, to invest in a bubble; 2 P. Wms. 153. As against a person acting as promoter, the corporation is entitled to the full benefit of all acts done and contracts made by him while acting in that capacity; and the promoter, as between himself and the corporation, is entitled to no secret profits; he may not purchase property for the corporation, and then sell the same to the corporation at an advance; 61 Pa. 202; 5 Ch. Div. 73, 395; 6 id. 371. Where one has already purchased a certain property at a good bargain, it is no fraud to organize a company and sell the property to it at an advance; Thomp. Liab. of Off. 222. See 1 Ch. Div. 182; 4 Hun 192. But if at the time of making the sale he occupies towards the corporation a position of trust, as promoter or otherwise, it would seem that he should not be allowed to sell at an exorbitant price; 16 Am. L. Rev. 289; but see 64 Penn. 43; and he should faithfully state to the company all material facts relating to the property which would influence it in deciding as to the purchase; Thomp. Liab. of Off. 219; L. R. 5 Eq. 464. See 2 Lind. Part. 580.

The writer quoted (Lloyd, Corp. Liab. for Acts of Prom.) states four propositions as the result of the cases as to the relation between the corporation and its promoters: 1. Where a promoter buys property intending to sell it to the company (already in process of formation) he cannot make a profit on the transaction without the fullest disclosure; L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 918. 2. Where one owns property he is at liberty to form a company and sell it at any price and without disclosing his profit, providing he make no fraudulent misrepresentations; 64 Pa. 43. 3. Where one buys property and soon after begins to promote a company, and declares that he bought the property for the company, and effects a sale to the company, he is liable for any profit made, on the ground that he has alleged that he acted as an agent in the matter; 61 Pa. 202. 4. If the promoter receives a gift or commission from the vendors of the property for arranging a sale to the company, he must account therefor; L. R. 11 Ch. Div. 918.

Where a promoter acts as the agent of the company, if he is under no special duty to purchase the land in question for the corporation, he may sell his own land to it, or buy any other land, and sell at a profit, provided he do so fairly, but it must appear that the company had an independent board of directors, who could exercise their own discretion in the purchase of the property; 3 App. Cas. 1218; 23 Can. Sup. Ct. 644; 59 N. J. Eq. 219; he must disclose his interest in the property; 3 App. Cas. 1218; 101 Cal. 94; he must state truly all the material facts; 3 App. Cas. 1218; 101 Cal. 90; 74 Wis. 307. A promoter who acts as a mere agent for the purchase of the property cannot retain a secret profit out of the transaction; 11 Ch. D. 918; 4 C. P. D. 396; 30 Fed. Rep. 538; 123 N. Y. 349; but a profit made with the knowledge and assent of all the members of the corporation may be retained; 14 Ch. D. 390. But where a promoter deals with the corporation at arm's length, he may make such profit as he can; 2 Hare 461.

The remedy for the corporation is either to rescind the contract, if no equities intervene to prevent, or to call upon the promoter to account for his unlawful profit; 4 Russ. 562; 54 N. Y. 403.

When a solvent trader converts his business into a limited liability company, complying with all the statutory requirements, the court will not go behind the transaction and decide that the company is not validly constituted on account of the non-fulfilment of conditions which are not found in the company's acts; [1897] A. C. 22. This case sustains the validity of what are known in England as "one man companies."

The use of the English Company Acts to enable two partners to carry on business with limited liabilities is an abuse of those acts; but the company so created is an effectual company, and the parties cannot be sued as partners, though, possibly, if they and the company were both before the court, the creditors might be entitled to an indemnity from them personally; 74 L. T. 149.

The subject is fully treated by Judge Thompson in his work above cited. See, also, Alger, Promoters; 18 Am. L. Rev. 281; 3 Am. & Eng. Dec. in Eq. 489; Keener, Quasi-Contracts; PROSPECTUS.

PROMOTION STOCK. See STOCK.

PROMPT. Quick, sudden, or precipitate. One who is ready is said to be prepared at the moment; one who is prompt is said to be prepared beforehand. 105 N. Y. 412.

PROMULGATION. The order given to cause a law to be executed, and to make it public; it differs from publication. 1 Bla. Com. 45; Stat. 6 Hen. VI. c. 4.

With regard to trade, unless previous notice can be brought home to the party charged with violating their provisions, laws are to be considered as beginning to operate in the respective collection districts only from the time they are received from the proper department by the collector. Paine 23, 32.

The promulgation of laws is an executive function. The mode may be prescribed by the legislature. It is the extrinsic act which gives a law, perfect in itself, executory force. Unless the law prescribes that it shall be executory from its passage, or from a certain date, it is presumed to be executory only from its passage; 17 La. Ann. 390. Formerly promulgation meant introducing a law to the senate; Aust. Jur. Lect. 28. See STATUTE.

PROMUTUUM (Lat.). In Civil Law. A quasi-contract, by which he who receives a certain sum of money, or a certain quantity of fungible things, which have been paid to him through mistake, contracts towards the payer the obligation of returning him as much. Pothier, de l'Usure, pt. 3, s. 1, a. 1.

This contract is called promutuum, because it has much resemblance to that of mutuum. This resemblance consists in this: first, that in both a sum of money or some fungible things are required; second, that in both there must be a transfer of the property in the thing; third, that in both there must be returned the same amount or quantity of the thing received. But, though there is this general resemblance between the two, the mutuum differs essentially from the pro-mutuum. The former is the actual contract of the parties, made expressly, but the latter is a quasi-contract, which is the effect of an error or mistake. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 1125.

PRONEPOS (Lat.). Great-grandson.

PRONEPTIS (Lat.). A niece's daughter. A great-granddaughter. Ainsworth, Dict.

PRONOUN. The use of "he" in an instrument, in referring to a person whose Christian name is designated by an initial, is not conclusive that the person is a male. Parol evidence is admissible to show that the person intended is a female. Anderson; 71 Cal. 38.

PRONURUS (Lat.). The wife of a great-grandson.

PROOF. In Practice. The conviction or persuasion of the mind of a judge or jury, by the exhibition of evidence, of the reality of a fact alleged. Thus, to prove is to determine or persuade that a thing does or does not exist; 8 Toullier, n. 2; Ayliffe, Parerg. 442; 2 Phil. Ev. 44, n. a; Steph. Ev. 82; 1 Greenl. Ev. § 1; 31 Cal. 203; 36 Ia. 106. Proof is the perfection of evidence; for without evidence there is no proof, although there may be evidence which does not amount to proof; for example, if a man is found murdered at a spot where another has been seen walking but a short time before, this fact will be evidence to show that the latter was the murderer, but, standing alone, will be very far from proof of it.

Ayliffe defines judicial proof to be a clear and evident declaration or demonstration of a matter which was before doubtful, conveyed in a judicial manner by fit and proper arguments, and likewise by all other legal methods: first, by proper arguments, such as conjectures, presumptions, indicia, and other admissible ways and means; secondly, by legal methods, or methods according to law, such as witnesses, public instruments, and the like. Ayliffe, Parerg. 442; Aso & M. Inst. b. 3, t. 7. See LITERAL PROOF.

PROOF OF DEATH. See DEATH.

PROOF OF LOSS. See LOSS.

PROOF OF SPIRITS. Testing the strength of alcoholic spirits, also the degree of strength; as high proof, first proof, second, third, and fourth proofs. In the internal revenue law it is used in the sense of degree of strength. 6 U. S. App. 63.

PROP. In Mining. "Props" are upright posts wedged between the roof and the floor to support the roof. 160 Ky. 671, 170 S. W. 14.

Caps. "Caps" or "props" are used for propping up, bracing and supporting the roof of a mine, to prevent slate from falling. 157 Ky. 763, 164 S. W. 304. See SAFE PLACE DOCTRINE.

PROPER. That which is essential, suitable, adapted, and correct.

Congress is authorized, by art. 1, s. 8, of the constitution of the United States, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this constitution of the United States, in any department or officer thereof."

Proper District. Under Judicial Code, § 28, 29, permitting removal of causes to the District Court "for the proper district," the proper district is that one which includes the county or place where the suit in the state court is pending at the time of the removal. 260 U. S. 262.

Proper Persons. The term "proper persons" as applied to persons entitled to be carried as passengers, means persons whose status or condition apparently entitled them to be carried as such. 144 Ky. 652, 139 S. W. 855.

PROPER LAW OF CONTRACT. See LEX LOCI.

PROPERTY. The right and interest which a man has in lands and chattels to the exclusion of others. 6 Binn. 98; 4 Pet. 511; 17 Johns. 283; 11 East 290, 518; 14 id. 370.

The sole and despotic dominion which one man claims and exercises over the external things of the world in total exclusion of the right of any other individual in the universe. 2 Bla. Com. 2. The right to possess, use, enjoy, and dispose of a thing. 56 N. Y. 288; which is in itself valuable; 4 McLean 603. The right or interest which one has in lands or chattels. 6 Binn. 94; 4 Pet. 511. The free use and enjoyment by a person of all his acquisitions, without any control or diminution, save only by the law of the land. 2 Ark. 291; 61 Hun 571. The right of a person over a thing (in rem) indefinite in point of user. Austin's Lectures.

That which is peculiar or proper to any person; that which belongs exclusively to one; the first meaning of the word from which it is derived—proprius—is one's own. Drone, Copyr. 6.

A vested right of action is property in the same sense that tangible things are property; 100 U. S. 132. It is a thing owned, that to which a person has or may have a legal title; 43 N. Y. 389. See 50 Ala. 509; 30 Cal. 387; 59 Ill. 143; 9 Ind. 202; 13 B. Mon. 293; 11 East 290.

In the treaty by which Louisiana was acquired, property comprehends every species of title, inchoate or complete, legal or equitable, and embraces rights which lie in contract, executory as well as executed; 115 U. S. 179.

The term "property" embraces every species of valuable right and interest, including real and personal property, easements, franchises, and hereditaments; 46 N. Y. Super. Ct. 138; it includes money as well as other assets; 12 Colo. 152; a chose in action; 49 Ohio St. 60; a mining claim; 143 U. S. 431; a debt; 55 Ill. App. 563; a ferry franchise; 1 Black 603; 110 Mo. 579; 9 C. C. App. 174; the reciprocal rights of the wife to the society, protection, and support of her husband, and his right to her society and services in his household may be regarded as the property of the respective parties; 39 Hun 40; 89 Mich. 123. A liquor license is not property; 13 S. E. Rep. (Ga.) 197. See LIQUOR LAWS.

Includes bonds, mortgages, and certificates of stock, which are more than mere evidences of the interest which they represent, or of debt. The debt is inseparable from the paper which declares and constitutes it. 250 U. S. 381.

All things are not the subject of property; the sea, the air, and the like cannot be appropriated; every one may enjoy them, but he has no exclusive right in them. When things are fully our own, or when all others are excluded from meddling with them or from interfering about them, it is plain that no person besides the proprietor, who has this exclusive right, can have any claim either to use them, or to hinder him from disposing of them as he pleases; so that property, considered as an exclusive right to things, contains not only a right to use those things, but a right to dispose of them, either by exchanging them for other things, or by giving them away to any other person without any consideration, or even throwing them away. Rutherford, Inst. 20; Domat, liv. prel. tit. 3; Pothier, des Choses; 18 Viner, Abr. 63; Com. Dig. Biens. See, also, 2 B. & C. 281; 9 id. 396; 3 Dowl. & R. 394; 1 C. & M. 39; 4 Call 472; 18 Ves. 193; 6 Bingh. 630.

See 90 N. Y. 122; 130 id. 380, where easements of light and air and ingress and egress to buildings were held to be property.

The ownership of property implies its use in the prosecution of any legitimate business which is not a nuisance in itself; 82 Fed. Rep. 623.

Property is said to be real and personal property. See those titles.

Dacey (Conf. Laws Moore's ed. 72) treats of property as consisting of movables and immovables, but says that this "does not square with the distinction known to English lawyers between things real, or real property, and things personal, or personal property." Movables are equivalent to personal property with the omission of chattels real; immovables are equivalent to realty, with the addition of chattels real or leaseholds. Law is concerned, not with things but with rights over, or in reference to property.

It is also said to be, when it relates to goods and chattels, absolute or qualified. Absolute property is that which is our own without any qualification whatever: as, when a man is the owner of a watch, a book, or other inanimate thing, or of a horse, a sheep, or other animal which never had its natural liberty in a wild state.

Qualified property consists in the right which men have over wild animals which they have reduced to their own possession, and which are kept subject to their power; as, a deer, a buffalo, and the like, which are his own while he has possession of them, but as soon as his possession is lost his property is gone, unless the animals go animus revertendi; 2 Bla. Com. 396; 8 Binn. 546; but a whale, harpooned, but not connected with a boat by line, is vested in the crew that harpooned it, and not in one which afterwards followed and captured it; 8 Fed. Rep. 159; when killed and marked, it belongs to the person who killed it; 1 Sprague 315.

But property in personal goods may be absolute or qualified without any relation to the nature of the subject-matter, but simply because more persons than one have an interest in it, or because the right of property is separated from the possession. A bailee of goods, though not the owner, has a qualified property in them; while the owner has the absolute property. See BAILEE; BAILMENT.

Personal property is further divided into property in possession, and property or choses in action. See CHOSE IN ACTION.

Property is again divided into corporeal and incorporeal. The former comprehends such property as is perceptible to the senses, as lands, houses, goods, merchandise, and the like; the latter consists in legal rights, as choses in action, easements, and the like.

In a strict legal sense, land is not property, but the subject of property. The term property, although in common parlance applied to a tract of land or a chattel, in its legal signification means only the right of the owner in relation to it. It denotes a right over a determinate thing. Property is the right of any person to possess, use, enjoy, and dispose of a thing. 13 N. Y. 378; 1 Bla. Com. 196; 2 Austin, Jurispr. 817. If property in land consists in certain essential rights, and a physical interference with the land substantially subverts one of those rights, such interference takes, pro tanto, the owner's property. The right of using a thing indefinitely is an essential quality of absolute property, without which absolute property can have no legal existence. Use is the real side of property. This right of user necessarily includes the right and power of excluding others from the land; 103 Mass. 14. From the very nature of these rights of user and of exclusion, it is evident that they cannot be materially abridged without, ipso facto, taking the owner's property. If the right of indefinite user is an essential element of absolute property or complete ownership, whatever physical interference annuls this right, takes property, although the owner may still have left to him valuable rights in the article of a more limited and circumscribed nature; 51 N. H. 512.

Property is lost by the act of man by—first, alienation; but in order to do this the owner must have a legal capacity to make a contract; second, by the voluntary abandonment of the thing; but unless the abandonment be purely voluntary the title to the property is not lost: as, if things be thrown into the sea to save the ship, the right is not lost; Pothier, n. 270; 8 Toullier, n. 348. But even a voluntary abandonment does not deprive the former owner from taking possession of the thing abandoned at any time before another takes possession of it.

It is lost by operation of law—first, by the forced sale, under a lawful process, of the property of a debtor to satisfy a judgment, sentence, or decree rendered against him, to compel him to fulfil his obligations; second, by confiscation, or sentence of a criminal court; third, by prescription; fourth, by civil death; fifth, by capture by a public enemy. It is lost by the act of God, as in the case of the death of slaves or animals, or in the total destruction of a thing; for example, if a house be swallowed up by an opening in the earth during an earthquake.

It is proper to observe that, in some cases, the moment that the owner loses his possession he also loses his property or right in the thing; animals feræ naturæ, as mentioned above, belong to the owner only while he retains the possession of them. But, in general, the loss of possession does not impair the right of property, for the owner may recover it within a certain time allowed by law. Bouvier, Inst.

As to the situs of property, it has been said:—"Lands, and generally, though not invariably, goods, must be held situate at the place where they, at a given moment, actually lie; debts, choses in action, and claims of any kind must be held situate where the debtor or other person against whom a claim exists, resides; or, in other words, debts or choses in action are generally to be looked upon as situate where they are properly recoverable or can be enforced." Dicey, Conf. Laws, Moore's ed. 318.

A British ship belonging to a deceased person, and registered at any port of the United Kingdom, is to be held, for some purposes at any rate, to be situate at that port. Goods on the high seas, which are capable of being dealt with in England by means of bills of lading in that country, are held situate in England, and goods which at the death of the deceased owner are in transitu to that country, and arrive there after his death, are apparently to be held situate in England at his death. Money in a bank in Canada belonging to one who dies in England is considered as virtually in transitu. Bonds or other securities forming part of the property of a deceased person, if they are in fact in England and are marketable securities there, saleable and transferable there by delivery only, without its being necessary to do any act out of England to make the transfer valid, are situate in England, though the debts or money are owing from foreigners. Such bonds, differ essentially from foreign loans, which cannot be fully transferred without doing some act in a foreign country. A debt due on a deed situate in England from a debtor resident abroad, and a debt due on a deed situate abroad from a debtor resident in England, are situate in England. A judgment debt is assets where the judgment is recorded; 4 M. & W. 171. A share in a partnership business is situate where the business is carried on, but it has been said to be only a claim, and therefore situate wherever it can be enforced. See 15 App. Cas. 482. Most of the cases arise upon the liability of a decedent's property to the payment of probate duties, but sometimes on the question of jurisdiction; Dicey, Conf. Laws, Moore's ed. 318.

A license to use a patent in New South Wales could not be said to be locally situate anywhere. However, for the purposes of probate duty, property is capable of being localized, yet, for any other purposes, incorporeal rights could not be said to have any local situation. [1896] 2 Q. B. 178. See 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 116.

The locality of a mortgage debt is that of the debt and does not depend on that of the mortgaged property. See Dicey, Conf. Laws 318.

"The general rule of law is well settled that for the purpose of founding administration, all simple contract debts are assets at the domicile of the debtor; and that the locality of such a debt for this purpose is not affected by a bill of exchange or promissory note having been given for it, because . . . the bill or note is merely evidence of it, and therefore the debt is assets where the debtor lives, without regard to the place where the instrument is found or payable." 109 U. S. 654, citing 102 Mass. 186; 10 Ohio St. 136; 4 M. & W. 171. See 143 Ill. 25; 74 Me. 85.

A claim against the United States is not a local asset in the District of Columbia; 27 Ct. Cl. 520. A bond does not come within the rule as to simple contract debts, but is assets for the purpose of administration in the place in which it is found; 78 N. Y. 292. A life insurance policy is assets, for the purpose of founding an administration, in a state into which it is brought after the death of the insured; 111 U. S. 138. An insurance policy, issued and payable in New York, on the life of a person domiciled in Virginia, was held to have passed to his administrator in Virginia, although it was deposited with a person in Mississippi, who, as administrator there, sought to collect it; 71 Miss. 590. See note to Dicey, Conf. Laws 331.

As between the states of the United States, a ship at sea is presumed to be situate in the state in which it is registered; 16 Wall. 610.

See TAXATION, as to the situs of property for the purposes of taxation; and Waples, Debt. & Cred., where the subject of the location of property is treated.

Taking Feloniously. See ROBBERY. See ABUTTING PROPERTY; JOINT PROPERTY.

PROPERTY INSURANCE. See INSURANCE.

PROPERTY RIGHT. To a Dead Body. There is not a "property right to a dead body" in a commercial sense, but there is a right to bury it which the courts of law will recognize and protect. This right embraces the right to select the place of burial and to change it at pleasure. This right, in the absence of testamentary disposition of the body, belongs to the next of kin. 149 Ky. 501, 149 S. W. 871.

PROPERTY RIGHT IN MARKET QUOTATIONS. See MARKET QUOTATIONS, PROPERTY RIGHT IN.

PROPERTY TAX OR PRIVILEGE TAX. A tax on a franchise of a gas company was a "property tax" on the intangible property, and not a "privilege tax" for engaging a business in which natural persons could not engage. 135 Ky. 324, 122 S. W. 164.

PROPINQUITY (Lat.). Kindred; parentage. See AFFINITY; CONSANGUINITY; NEXT OF KIN.

PROPIOR SOBRINA, PROPIOR SOBRINO (Lat.). The son or daughter of a great-uncle or great-aunt on the father's or mother's side. Calvinus, Lex.

PROPIOS, PROPHIOS. In Spanish Law. Certain portions of ground laid off and reserved when a town was founded in Spanish America, as the inalienable property of the town, for the purpose of erecting public buildings, markets, etc., or to be used in any other way, under the direction of the municipality, for the advancement of the revenues or the prosperity of the place. 12 Pet. 442.

PROPONENT. In Ecclesiastical Law. One who propounds a thing; as, "the party proponent doth allege and propound." 6 Eccl. 856, n. Often used of one who offers a will for probate.

PROPORTUM. Intent or meaning. Cowell.

PROPOSAL. An offer. A formal offer to perform some undertaking, stating the time and manner of performance and price demanded, or one or more of these particulars, either directly or by implied or direct reference to some announcement requesting such an offer. See 35 Ala. N. S. 33. A proposal of this character is not to be considered as subject to different rules from any other offer. Pierce, Am. Railw. Law 384; Poll. Contr. 13. See OFFER.

PROPOSITUS (Lat.). The person proposed. In making genealogical tables, the person whose relations it is desired to find out is called the propositus.

PROPOUND. To offer; to propose; as, the onus probandi in every case lies upon the party who propounds a will. 1 Curt. Eccl. 637; 6 Eccl. 417.

PROPRES. In French Law. The term propres or biens propres is used to denote that property which has come to an individual from his relations, either in a direct line, ascending or descending, or from a collateral line, whether the same have come by operation of law or by devise. Proptes is used in opposition to acqutis. Pothier, Des Proptes; 3 Burge, Conf. of Law 61.

PROPRIA PERSONA (Lat. in his own person). It is a rule in pleading that pleas to the jurisdiction of the court must be pleaded in propria persona, because if pleaded by attorney they admit the jurisdiction, as an attorney is an officer of the court, and he is presumed to plead after having obtained leave, which admits the jurisdiction. Lawes, Pl. 91.

An appearance may be in propria persona, and need not be by attorney.

PROPRIETARY. In its strict sense, this word signifies one who is master of his actions, and who has the free disposition of his property. During the colonial government of Pennsylvania, William Penn was called the proprietor.

Belonging to ownership; as proprietary rights. 117 U. S. 487.

PROPRIETATE PROBANDA. See DE PROPRIETATE PROBANDA.

PROPRIETOR. The owner.

One who has the legal right or exclusive title to anything. In many instances it is synonymous with owner. 83 Tex. 218. A receiver is not a proprietor; 32 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 77.

PROPRIO VIGORE (Lat.). By its own force and vigor: an expression frequently used in construction. A phrase is said to have a certain meaning proprio vigore.

PROPTER (Lat.). On account of; for.

PROPTER AFFECTUM (Lat.). For or on account of some affection or prejudice. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER DEFECTUM (Lat.). On account of or for some defect. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER DEFECTUM SAN- GUINIS. On account of failure or deficiency of blood. 2 Bl. Com. 245.

PROPTER DELICTUM (Lat.). For or on account of crime. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER HONORIS RESPECTUM. On account of respect or honor of rank. See CHALLENGE.

PROPTER IMPOTENTIAM. See IMPOTENTIAM PROPTER.

PROPTER MAJOREM SECURITATEM. For greater security.

PROPTER SAEVITIAM AUT ADULTERIUM. On account of cruelty or adultery. 2 Kent's Com. 125.

PROBAGATED JURISDICTION. In Scotch Law. That jurisdiction which, by the consent of the parties, is conferred upon a judge who, without such consent, would be incompetent. Erskine, Inst. 1. 2. 13.

At common law, when a party is entitled to some privilege or exemption from jurisdiction he may waive it, and then the jurisdiction is complete; but the consent cannot give jurisdiction.

PROBATION. Putting off to another time. It is generally applied to the English parliament, and means the continuance of it from one time to another; it differs from adjournment, which is a continuance of it from one day to another in the same session. 1 Bla. Com. 186.

In Civil Law. The giving time to do a thing beyond the term prefixed. Dig. 2. 14. 27. 1. See PROLONGATION.

PROSCRIBED (Lat. proscribo, to write before). In Civil Law. Among the Romans, a man was said to be proscribed when a reward was offered for his head; but the term was more usually applied to those who were sentenced to some punishment which carried with it the consequences of civil death. Code 9. 48.

PROSECUTE. To proceed against a person judicially; to proceed against a person criminally.

PROSECUTION (Lat. prosequor, to follow after). In Criminal Law. The means adopted to bring a supposed offender to justice and punishment by due course of law. See 34 La. Ann. 1198.

Prosecutions are carried on in the name of the government, and have for their principal object the security and happiness of the people in general. Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 2, c. 23, s. 3; Bac. Abr. Indictment (A 3).

In England, the modes most usually employed to carry them on are—by indictment; 1 Chitty, Cr. L. 132; presentment of a grand jury; id. 133; coroner's inquest; id. 134; and by an information. In this country, the modes are—by indictment, by presentment, by information, and by complaint, which see. See POSTULATIO; MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

To Recover a Penalty. A prosecution for contempt of court is a "prosecution to recover a penalty" within the meaning of a statute, and is barred by limitation one year after the right to the penalty accrued. 141 Ky. 461, 133 S. W. 206. See CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

PROSECUTOR. In Practice. He who prosecutes another for a crime in the name of the government.

The public prosecutor is an officer appointed by the government to prosecute all offences: he is the attorney-general or his deputy.

A private prosecutor is one who prefers an accusation against a party whom he suspects to be guilty.

Every man may become a prosecutor; but no man is bound, except in some few of the more enormous offences, as treason, to be one; but if the prosecutor should compound a felony he will be guilty of a crime. The prosecutor has an inducement to prosecute, because he cannot, in many cases, have any civil remedy until he has done his duty to society by an endeavor to bring the offender to justice. If a prosecutor act from proper motives, he will not be responsible to the party in damages though he was mistaken in his suspicions; but if, from a motive of revenge, he institute a criminal prosecution without any reasonable foundation, he may be punished by being mulcted in damages, in an action for a malicious prosecution (q. v.).

In Pennsylvania, a defendant is not bound to plead to an indictment, where there is a private prosecutor, until his name shall have been indorsed on the indictment as such, and on acquittal of the defendant, in all cases except where the charge is for a felony, the jury may direct that he shall pay the costs. See 1 Chitty, Cr. Law 110; 2 Va. Cas. 3, 20; 1 Dall. 5; 2 Bibb 210; 6 Call 245; Bish. Cr. Pro. 691; DISTRICT ATTORNEY OF THE UNITED STATES; INFORMER.

PROSECUTOR OF THE PLEAS. The title of the prosecuting officer in each county in New Jersey and one or two other states.

The term is used in the same sense as district attorney in other states.

PROSOCER (Lat.). A father-in-law's father; grandfather of wife. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PROSOCERUS (Lat.). A wife's grandmother.

PROSPECTIVE (Lat. prospicio, to look forward). That which is applicable to the future: it is used in opposition to retrospective. To be just, a law ought always to be prospective. 1 Bouvier, Inst. n. 116. See RETROSPECTIVE.

PROSPECTUS. A prospectus of an intended company ought not to omit actual and material facts, or to conceal facts material to be known, the misrepresentation or concealment of which may improperly influence the mind of the reader: for if he is thereby deceived into becoming an allottee of shares and suffers loss he may proceed against those who have misled him. The proper purpose of a prospectus of an intended company is held to be only to invite persons to become original shareholders or allottees of shares in the company. When it has performed this office, it is exhausted; Peek v. Gurney, L. R. 6 H. L. 877; but a purchaser of shares from an original allottee may maintain an action for misrepresentations contained in a prospectus, if he can show that it was intended by those issuing it to be, and was, communicated to him prior to his purchase of shares; [1896] 1 Q. B. 872; such an intention may be inferred if the prospectus was circulated after all its shares had been allotted, particularly if they were taken up by the promoters themselves. See [1892] 3 Ch. 566; 17 Ch. D. 467.

The doctrine of Peek v. Gurney is considered by Judge Thompson (Corp. § 1471) as "destitute of any foundation in reason and opposed to the common opinions of justice and business morality." It is not followed in this country, where it is held that it is sufficient if the prospectus was issued to influence the public, and the plaintiff saw it and was induced thereby to purchase shares; id.

A prospectus set forth that a tramway company had the right to use steam power as well as horses; the directors believed the statement to be true, but it was not; it was held that the officers of the company were not liable for deceit; Derry v. Peek, L. R. 14 App. Cas. 337. This decision was followed in England by an act of 1890 which provided that when a prospectus contains any untrue statement the directors of the company issuing it shall be liable in damages to any person taking shares, etc., for any loss he may sustain; see Beach, Priv. Corp. § 271.

If a director of a company knowingly issues or sanctions the circulation of a false prospectus, containing untrue statements of material facts tending to deceive the community, and to induce the public to buy the stock in the market, he is responsible to those who are injured thereby; 62 N. Y. 319.

A letter intended to be used to promote the sale of bonds of a trust company is a representation to all persons to whom it is shown; 159 Mass. 437.

A prospectus is admissible in evidence in an action at law by a company against its promoters for secret profits; 61 Pa. 202. See Thomp. Liab. of Off. 309.

A statement in a prospectus of the purpose for which money is wanted, is a material statement of fact, and if untrue may be ground for an action of deceit; 29 Ch. Div. 459.

A prospectus of a new company, so far as it alleges facts concerning the position and prospects of the undertaking, is a representation to all persons who may apply for shares therein, but not to subsequent transferees of shares; L. R. 6 H. L. 877; but it may be as to the latter, if actively used to induce the purchase of shares; [1896] 1 Q. B. 372; Poll. Torts 284. The material question as to a prospectus is, "Was there or was there not misrepresentation in point of fact?" id.

See 7 Eng. Rul. Cas. 561; Alger, Promoters; DECEIT; MISREPRESENTATION; PROMOTERS.

PROSTITUTION. The common lewdness of a woman for gain. The act of permitting a common and indiscriminate sexual intercourse for gain. 12 Meto. 97.

The act or practice of prostituting or offering the body to an indiscriminate intercourse with men; common lewdness of a woman for gain; the act of permitting a common and indiscriminate sexual intercourse for hire. 106 Mo. 375. See 54 Me. 24; 98 Ala. 61.

By the word in its most general sense is understood the act of setting one's self to sale, or of devoting to infamous purposes what is in one's power: as, the prostitution of talents or abilities; the prostitution of the press, etc. 8 Barb. 610.

In all well-regulated communities this has been considered a heinous offence, for which the woman may be punished; and the keeper of a house of prostitution may be indicted for keeping a common nuisance.

A landlord cannot recover for the use and occupation of a house let for the purpose of prostitution; 1 Esp. Cas. 13; 1 B. & P. 340, n. It is not a crime to let rooms to prostitutes for quiet and decent occupation, nor to permit a house to be visited by disreputable people, if they visit it for innocent and proper purposes; 15 R. L. 24.

In a figurative sense, it signifies the bad use which a corrupt judge makes of the law, by making it subservient to his interest: as, the prostitution of the law, the prostitution of justice.

PROTECTION. In Mercantile Law. The name of a document generally given by notaries public to sailors and other persons going abroad, in which is certified that the bearer therein named is a citizen of the United States.

In Governmental Law. That benefit or safety which the government affords to the citizens.

In English Law. A privilege granted by the king to a party to an action, by which he is protected from a judgment which would otherwise be rendered against him. Of these protections there are several kinds. Fitch. N. B. 65.

PROTECTION OF THE LAWS. The fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, among other provisions respecting the life, liberty, and property of citizens, provides that no state shall "deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws." This provision has been subjected to much judicial construction. The protection extends to "acts of the state whether through its legislative, its executive, or its judicial authorities;" 154 U. S. 45; 100 id. 313, 339; 103 id. 370. In a late case the court said: "But it must be observed that the prohibitions of the amendment refer to all the instrumentalities of the state, to its legislative, executive, and judicial authorities, and, therefore, whoever by virtue of public position under a state government deprives another of any right protected by that amendment against deprivation by the state, 'violates the constitutional inhibition, and, as he acts in the name and for the state, and is clothed with the state's power, his act is that of the state.' This must be so, or, as we have often said, the constitutional prohibition has no meaning, and 'the state has clothed one of its agents with power to annul or evade it.'" Harlan, J., in 166 U. S. 220. See 162 id. 565; 118 id. 336. That amendment conferred no new and additional rights, but only extended the protection of the federal constitution over rights of life, liberty, and property that previously existed under all state constitutions. Prior to the passage of this amendment "the laws of all the states in terms gave equal protection to all white persons. This amendment, however, is general, and forbids the denial to any class of persons the equal protection of the laws by any state; and there is no doubt that class legislation is forbidden;" 14 Utah 71. "What must constitute a denial of the equal protection of the law will depend, in this view, in a large measure, upon what rights of the law have been conferred, or protection extended, under the constitution and laws of the particular state in which the question arises. As the constitution and laws of the states vary, the proposition that each case must, to an extent, depend upon its own facts, is especially applicable to this class of cases. When the state itself undertakes to deal with its citizens by legislation, it does so under certain limitations, and it may not single out a class of citizens, and subject that class to oppressive discrimination, especially in respect to those rights so important as to be protected by constitutional guaranty. That the prohibitions of that amendment are now regarded as protecting the citizen against a denial of the equal protection of the law, and against taking property without due process of law, under the power of taxation, is a proposition clearly deducible from the many causes in which that question has been considered;" 86 Fed. Rep. 168, 185. The state statute providing that in case of a loss under a life insurance policy, the insurer shall be liable to pay, in addition to the amount thereof, 12 per cent. with attorney's fees for the collection of the same, is in violation of the fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States, which secures the equal protection of the laws, inasmuch as it is a discrimination against such companies; 41 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 680.

By equal protection is meant equal security to every one in his private rights—in his rights to life, to liberty, to property, and to the pursuit of happiness. It implies not only that the means which the laws afford for such security shall be equally accessible to him, but that no one shall be subject to any greater burdens or charges than such as are imposed upon all others under like circumstances; 18 Fed. Rep. 898. See PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES; CIVIL RIGHTS; DUE PROCESS OF LAW.

PROTECTION ORDERS. Orders granted by the court upon the application of a wife living apart from her husband to protect her property. Brett, Com. 988.

PROTECTION, WRIT OF. A writ which, from a very early period, issued out of the Chancery to men absent overseas on the king's service. It made them free of all suits except some few such as the Assize of Novel Disseisin, the Assize of Darrein Presentment, Attaints, etc. It could not, as a rule, be pleaded to any suit instituted before it was issued, nor to a charge of felony. The last instance of its issue was about 1690. The writ of protection was also issued to crown debtors in order to prevent private creditors from getting priority of the crown. Byrne.

PROTECTOR OF SETTLEMENT. The protector of a settlement is a person without whose consent a tenant in tail cannot bar the entail except as against his own issue, nor a tenant in base fee enlarge his estate into a fee-simple. R. & L. Dict.

PROTECTORATE. Treaties of protection are treaties in the nature of unequal alliance, from which they are chiefly distinguished by keeping a garrison within the protected state; Twiss, Rights of Nations § 247. The rights of sovereignty must be exercised de facto as well as de jure. See Halleck, Int. L. 69; 1 Kent, Gould's ed. *28.

The term protectorate is one of which the meaning is somewhat divided; or rather, perhaps, it may be said with more correctness to have different meanings under different circumstances. As exercised, however, by a European power over a smaller civilized state, it differs from the relation which links an Eastern protected state with a European country; a German protectorate inclines to the assumption of more full control than a British.

Formerly protected nations were said to retain their independence and internal sovereignty, placing their foreign relations under a stronger country. It is believed that all the states represented at the Berlin Conference in 1885, except Great Britain, maintained that a Protectorate includes the right of administering justice over the subjects of a protected state. See Hall, For. Jur. of the British Crown.

PROTEST. In Contracts. A notarial act, made for want of payment of a promissory note, or for want of acceptance or payment of a bill of exchange by a notary public, in which it is declared that all parties to such instruments will be held responsible to the holder for all damages, exchanges, re-exchange, etc.

A formal notarial certificate attesting the dishonor of a bill of exchange or promissory note. Benj. Chalm. Bills, etc., art. 178.

There are two kinds of protest, namely, protest for non-acceptance, and protest for non-payment. There is also a species of protest common in England, which is called protest for better security. Protest for non-acceptance or non-payment, when duly made and accompanied by notice to all the parties to the bill or note, has the effect of making all of them responsible to the holder for the amount of the bill or note, together with damages, etc.; 3 Kent 63; Byles, Bills 273, 394; Chitty, Bills 278; Com. Dig. Merchant (F 8, 9, 10); Bac. Abr. Merchant, etc. (M 7). Protest for better security may be made when the acceptor of a bill fails, becomes insolvent, or in any other way gives the holder just reason to suppose it will not be paid. It seems to be of doubtful utility, except that it gives the drawer of a bill on a foreign country an opportunity of availing himself of any attachment law there in force; 1 Ld. Raym. 745.

The protest is a formal paper signed and sealed by a notary wherein he certifies that on the day of its date he presented the original bill attached thereunto, or a copy (a description of the bill is enough; 17 How. 600), to the acceptor, or the original note to the maker thereof, and demanded payment, or acceptance, which was refused, for reasons given in the protest, and that thereupon he protests against the drawer and indorsers thereof for exchange, re-exchange, damages, costs, and interest. See Benj. Chalm. Bills, art. 176; 2 Ames, Bills & N. 863. It is usual, also, for the notary to serve notices of the protest on all the parties to the bill. The notice contains a description of the bill, including its date and amount, the fact of demand and refusal, and that the holder looks to the person notified for payment. Protest of foreign bills is proof of demand and refusal to pay or accept; 2 H. & J. 399; 8 Wheat. 333; 2 Pet. 179, 688. Protest is said to be part of the constitution of a foreign bill; and the form is governed by the lex loci contractus; 2 Hill N. Y. 227; 11 La. 14; 2 Pet. 179, 180; Story, Bills 176 (by the place where the protest is made; Benj. Chalm. Bills, art. 180). A protest must be made by a notary public or other person authorized to act as such; Benj. Chalm. Bills, art. 177; but it has been held that the duties of a notary cannot be performed by a clerk or deputy; 103 Mass. 141. Inland bills and promissory notes need not be protested; 6 How. 23; see 1 App. D. C. 171; but the term protest, as applied to inland bills of exchange, includes only the steps necessary to charge the drawer and indorser; 36 Neb. 744. See 8 Misc. Rep. 616. Protest is unnecessary to fix the liability of an indorser on a non-negotiable instrument; 70 Tex. 568. See ACCEPTANCE; BILLS OF EXCHANGE; NOTICE OF DISHONOR.

In Legislation. A declaration made by one or more members of a legislative body that they do not agree with some act or resolution of the body: it is usual to add the reasons which the protestants have for such a dissent.

In Maritime Law. A writing, attested by a justice of the peace, a notary public, or a consul, made and verified by the master of a vessel, stating the severity of a voyage by which a ship has suffered, and showing that it was not owing to the neglect or misconduct of the master. See Beach, Ins. § 1831; 1 Wash. C. C. 145, 238, 403, n.; 1 Pet. C. C. 119; 1 Dall. 6, 10, 817; 2 id. 193; 3 W. & S. 144.

The protest is not, in general, evidence for the master of the vessel or his owners in the English or American courts; yet it is often proper evidence against them; Abb. Sh., 18th ed. 457.

In Public Land Affairs. Any complaint or objection, whether by a public agent or a private citizen, which is intended to be and is made the basis of some action or proceeding in the public right against an existing entry. 244 U. S. 178. Cf. CONTEST.

PROTEST, PAYMENT UNDER.

A person who without the compulsion of legal process, or duress of goods or of the person, yields to the assertion of an invalid or unjust claim by paying it, cannot by mere protest, either in writing or oral, change its character from a voluntary to an involuntary payment. The payment overcomes and nullifies the protest; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 493. Where an illegal tax is paid under protest to one having authority to enforce its collection, it is an involuntary payment and may be recovered back; 29 Ia. 310; 21 Mich. 483; but see 34 Ill. 170; S. C. 23 Am. Rep. 512.

A mere apprehension of legal proceedings to collect a tax is not sufficient to make the payment compulsory; there must be an immediate power or authority to institute them; 46 Md. 532.

An action will not lie to recover money voluntarily paid to redeem land sold upon a void tax judgment when the party making the payment has at the time full knowledge of the character of the sale and all the facts affecting its validity; 28 Minn. 543.

The payment of illegal fees cannot generally be considered as voluntary, so as to preclude the plaintiff from recovering them back; 2 B. & C. 729; 2 B. & A. 562. Where money is paid under an illegal demand, colore officii, the payment can never be voluntary; 8 Exch. 625.

Where a railway company exacted from a carrier more than they charged to other carriers in breach of the acts of parliament, it was held that sums thus exacted could be recovered back; 7 M. & G. 253. Where a man pays more than he is bound to do by law for the performance of a duty which the law says is owed to him for nothing, or for less than he has paid, he is entitled to recover back the excess; L. R. 4 H. L. C. 249.

The object of the protest is to take from the payment its voluntary character; it serves as evidence that the payment was not voluntary, and in order to be efficacious there must be actual coercion, duress, or fraud, presently existing, or the payment will be voluntary in spite of the protest; 59 N. Y. 603; 115 Mass. 387. Whether actual protest, in case of the payment of money illegally demanded by a public officer is a condition precedent to a recovery by the party paying the money is not clearly settled; 4 Wait, Act. & Def. 495. Where the person demanding the money has notice of the illegality of the demand, a protest is not necessary, but otherwise it is necessary; 49 Cal. 624.

On certiorari the supreme court held that when duties are paid in order to get possession of the goods, a protest made within ten days after the ascertainment and liquidation of the duties is sufficient; 164 U. S. 51, where the statutes on the subject are collated and examined and the decision of the circuit court of appeals was affirmed; Fuller, C. J., and Field, Harlan, and Brewer, JJ., dissenting.

PROTESTANDO. See PROTESTATION.

PROTESTANT. It includes all those who believe in the Christian religion and do not acknowledge the supremacy of the pope. 52 Conn. 418; 53 Id. 493. See 53 N. H. 57.

PROTESTATION. In Pleading. The indirect affirmation or denial, by means of the word protesting (in the Latin form of pleadings, protestando), of the truth of some matter which cannot with propriety or safety be positively affirmed, denied, or entirely passed over. See 3 Bla. Com. 311. The exclusion of a conclusion. Co. Litt. 124.

Its object was to secure to the party making it the benefit of a positive affirmation or denial in case of success in the action, so far as to prevent the conclusion that the fact was admitted to be true as stated by the opposite party, and at the same time to avoid the objection of duplicity to which a direct affirmation or denial would expose the pleading; 19 Johns. 96; 2 Saund. 103; Com. Dig. Pleader (N). Matter which is the ground of the suit upon which issue could be taken could not be protested; Plowd. 276; 2 Johns. 227. But see 2 Wms. Saund. 103. n. Protests are no longer allowed; 3 Bla. Com. 812; and were generally an unnecessary form; 3 Lev. 125.

The common form of making protestations was as follows: "because protesting that," etc., excluding such matters of the adversary's pleading as are intended to be excluded in the protestando, if it be matter of fact; or, if it be against the legal sufficiency of his pleading, "because protesting that the plea by him above pleaded in bar" (or by way of reply, or rejoinder, etc., as the case might be) "is wholly insufficient in law." See, generally, 1 Chitty, Pl. 534; Com. Dig. Pleader (N); Steph. Pl. 235.

In Practice. An asseveration made by taking God to witness. A protestation is a form of asseveration which approaches very nearly to an oath. Wolfius, Inst. § 375.

PROTHONOTARY. The title given to an officer who officiates as principal clerk of some courts. Viner, Abr.

In ecclesiastical law, the name of prothonotary is given to an officer of the court of Rome. He is so called because he is the first notary.—The Greek word πρωτος signifying primus, or first. These notaries have pre-eminence over the other notaries, and are put in the rank of prelates. There are twelve of them. Dalloz, Dict. de Jur.

PROTOCOL. A record or register. Among the Romans, protocollum was a writing at the head of the first page of the paper used by the notaries or tabellions. Nov. 44.

In France the minutes of notarial acts were formerly transcribed on registers, which were called protocols. Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. liv. 3, t. 3, c. 6, s. 1, n. 413.

By the German law it signifies the minutes of any transaction. Encyc. Amer. In the latter sense the word has of late been received into international law. Id.

In International Law it is a diplomatic expression which signifies the register on which the deliberations of a conference, etc., are inscribed, whence the word comes to signify the deliberations themselves. 1 Halleck, Int. L. 298, note.

It is used to indicate a preliminary treaty, as the instrument of August 12, 1898, entered into between the United States and Spain.

PROTOCOLO. In Spanish Law. The original draft of an instrument which remains in the possession of the notary. White, New Recop. 1, 3, t. 7, c. 5, § 2.

PROTUTOR (Lat). In Civil Law. He who, not being the tutor of a pupil or minor, has administered his property or affairs as if he had been, whether he thought himself legally invested with the authority of a tutor or not.

He who marries a woman who is tutrix becomes, by the marriage, a protutor. The protutor is equally responsible with the tutor.

PROUT PATET PER RECORDUM (Lat.). As appears by the record. This phrase is frequently used in pleading; as, for example, in debt on a judgment or other matter of record, unless when it is stated as an inducement, it is requisite, after showing the matter of record, to refer to it by the prout patet per recordum. 1 Chitty, Pl. *356; 10 Me. 127.

PROVE. To establish by evidence; to make out a case or claim by evidence.

PROVER. In Old English Law. One who undertakes to prove a crime against another. 28 Edw. I.; 5 Hen. IV. One who, being indicted and arraigned for treason or felony, confesses before plea pleaded, and accuses his accomplices to obtain pardon; state's evidence. 4 Bla. Com. 330<sup>7</sup>. To prove. Law Fr. & Lat. Dict.; Britton, c. 22.

PROVIDED. The word always expresses a condition, unless it appears from the context to be the intent of the parties that it shall constitute a covenant; 16 Conn. 419; but it has been held that though it is apt to create a condition, it does not necessarily do so; it is often used by way of limitation or qualification only, especially when it does not introduce a new clause, but only serves to qualify or restrain the generality of a former clause; 8 Allen 596. The word is often used as a conjunction to an independent paragraph; 128 U. S. 174.

Provided always may constitute a condition, limitation, or covenant, according to circumstances; 20 Ind. 403.

See PROVISIO, AS PROVIDED

PROVIDED ALWAYS. See PROVIDED.

PROVIDENT SOCIETIES. See INDUSTRIAL AND PROVIDENT SOCIETIES.

PROVINCE. Sometimes this signifies the district into which a country has been divided: as, the province of Canterbury, in England; the province of Languedoc, in France. Sometimes it means a dependency or colony: as, the province of New Brunswick. It is sometimes used figuratively to signify power or authority: as, it is the province of the court to judge of the law, that of the jury to decide on the facts.

PROVINCIAL CONSTITUTIONS. The decrees of provincial synods held under divers archbishops of Canterbury.

PROVINCIALE OF LYNDDWOOD. A treatise on Church law by William Lynndwood who lived during reign of Edward IV. English.

PROVING THE TENOR. In Scotch Law. An action for reviving a writing which has been destroyed or is missing. Ersk. Prin. 490.

PROVISION. In Common Law. The property which a drawer of a bill of exchange places in the hands of a drawee; as, for example, by remittances, or when the drawee is indebted to the drawer when the bill becomes due, provision is said to have been made. Acceptance always presumes a provision. See Code de Comm. art. 115-117.

In French Law. An allowance granted by a judge to a party for his support,—which is to be paid before there is a definite judgment. In a civil case, for example, it is an allowance made to a wife who is separated from her husband, Dalloz, Dict.

In the law of præmunire a provision was a nomination by the pope to an English benefice before it became void, though the term was afterwards indiscriminately applied to any right of patronage exerted or claimed by the pope. The statute 35 Edw. I. was the first statute against provisions. Persons who attempted to take the benefit of provisions were called provisioners. Byrne.

PROVISIONAL INJUNCTION. Sometimes, though not correctly, used for interlocutory injunction.

PROVISIONAL REMEDY. One provided for present need, or for the occasion, that is, one adapted to meet a particular exigency. 54 How. Pr. 100.

PROVISIONAL SEIZURE. In Louisiana. A term which signifies nearly the same as attachment of property.

It is regulated by the Code of Practice as follows, namely:—

The plaintiff may, in certain cases, hereafter provided, obtain the provisional seizure of the property which he holds in pledge, or on which he has a privilege (q. v.), in order to secure a payment of his claim. La. Code, art. 284.

Provisional seizure may be ordered in the following cases: first, in executory proceedings, when the plaintiff sues on a title importing confession of judgment; second, when a lessor prays for the seizure of furniture or property used in the house, or attached to the real estate which he has leased; third, when a seaman, or other person, employed on board of a ship or water craft, navigating within the state, or person having furnished materials for or made repairs to such ship or water craft, prays that the same may be seized, and prevented from departing, until he has been paid the amount of his claim; fourth, when the proceedings are in rem, that is to say, against the thing itself which stands pledged for the debt, when the property is abandoned, or in cases where the owner of the thing is unknown or absent. La. Code, art. 285. See 6 Mart. La. N. s. 168; 7 id. 153; 8 id. 320; 1 Mart. La. 168; 12 id. 32.

PROVISIONS. Food for man; victuals.

Corn on the ear in the shuck is provisions within the meaning of a constitutional provision with reference to exemptions; 88 Ga. 352; 23 Ark. 103; but the word does not include a milch cow; 80 Ga. 731; nor cotton; 79 Ga. 172. It has been held to mean only articles of food; 20 Wend. 177. The sale of unwholesome provisions is a misdemeanor; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 632; 3 Maule & S. 10; 4 id. 214; 4 Camp. 10. And the rule is that the seller impliedly warrants that they are wholesome; 3 Bla. Com. 166. See ADULTERATION; FOOD; GROCERIES; SALE; WARRANTY.

PROVISO. The name of a clause inserted in an act of the legislature, a deed, a written agreement, or other instrument, which generally contains a condition that a certain thing shall or shall not be done, in order that an agreement contained in another clause shall take effect.

A limitation or exception to a grant made, or authority conferred, the effect of which is to declare that the one shall not operate, or the other be exercised, unless in the case provided. 10 Pet. 471; 98 Cal. 433.

The general purpose of a proviso is to except the clause covered by it from the provisions of a statute or to qualify the operation of the statute; 128 U. S. 174. See 93 id. 88. It always implies a condition, unless subsequent words change it to a covenant; 12 Conn. 419; but when a proviso contains the mutual words of the parties to a deed, it amounts to a covenant; 2 Co. 72; Cro. Eliz. 242; Moore 707.

A proviso differs from an exception; 1 B. & Ald. 99. An exception exempts, absolutely, from the operation of an engagement or an enactment; a proviso defeats their operation, conditionally. An exception takes out of an engagement or enactment something that would otherwise be part of the subject-matter of it; a proviso avoids them by way of defeasance or excuse; 8 Am. Jur. 242; Plowd. 361; 1 Saund. 234a, note; Lilly, Reg., and the cases there cited. The natural presumption from a proviso is, that, but for the proviso, the enacting part of the section would have included the subject-matter of the proviso; 5 Q. B. D. 173. See, generally, Am. Jur. no. 16, art. 1: Bac. Abr. Conditions (A); Com. Dig. Conditions (A), (A 2); Dwarrit, Stat. 660; PROVIDED.

The proper use of provisos in drafting acts is explained by Coode on Legislative Construction, printed as an appendix to Purdon's Pennsylvania Digest. He considers that the abuse of the proviso is universal, and doubts if it need ever be employed in drafting acts. The early, and, as he thinks, the correct use, is by way of taking special cases out of general enactments and providing for them. The courts have generally assumed that such was the proper mode of using a proviso. It is incorrectly used to introduce mere exceptions to the operation of the enactment where no special provision is made for the exception; these are better expressed as exceptions. If a general provision is merely to be negated in some particular, the negative should be expressed in immediate contact with the general words. Sometimes a proviso introduces several stages of consecutive operation, which would be better expressed by "and." It is impossible to deduce any general rule from the doctrines laid down by the courts in the multitude of adjudicated cases.

Trial by proviso. A trial at the instance of a defendant in a case in which the plaintiff, after issue joined, does not proceed to trial when by the practice of the court he ought to have done so.

While the primary purpose of a proviso is to qualify only the provision of the statute to which it is appended, a presumption of such purpose will not prevail against a demonstrative test that the legislative intent was that the proviso was of general application. 204 U. S. 143.

PROVISOR. He that hath the care of providing things necessary; but more especially one who sued to the court of Rome for a provision. Jacob; 25 Edw. III. One nominated by the pope to a benefice before it became void, in prejudice of the right of the true patron. 4 Bla. Com. 111*.

PROVISORS. See PROVISION.

PROVISORS, STATUTE OF. The statute 25 Edw. 3, st. 4, was more particularly known as the Statute of Provisors, but it was only one of a series directed against provision. Byrne. See PROVISION ¶ 2.

PROVOCATION (Lat. provoco, to call out). The act of inciting another to do something.

Provocation simply, unaccompanied by a crime or misdemeanor, does not justify the person provoked to commit an assault and battery. In cases of homicide it may reduce the offence from murder to manslaughter; but not if the provocation is by mere words, however exasperating; 164 U. S. 492. But when the provocation is given for the purpose of justifying or excusing an intended murder, and the party provoked is killed, it is no justification; Whart. Cr. L. 457; 2 Gilb. Ev. by Loft 753. See 81 Va. 298.

The unjust provocation by a wife of her husband, in consequence of which she suffers from his ill usage, will bar her divorce on the ground of the husband's cruelty; her remedy in such cases is to change her manners; 2 Lee 172; 1 Hagg. Cons. 153. See CRUELTY; 1 Russ. Cr. 434, 486; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 232-241. ADEQUATE PROVOCATION; CONSIDERABLE PROVOCATION.

PROVOKE. To excite; to stimulate; to arouse. 34 Conn. 279. See PROVOCATION.

PROVOST. A title given to the chief of some corporations or societies.

The chief officer of certain colleges, e. g. the University of Pennsylvania.

The chief dignitary of a cathedral or collegiate church. In France, this title was formerly given to some presiding judges. The word is derived from the Latin præpositus.

PROVOST MARSHAL. An officer appointed by some general officer commanding a body or force of troops, for police duty, or for the general maintenance of order and the repression of all offences in connection with military occupation. He or his assistants may, at any time, arrest and detain for trial, persons subject to military law committing offences, and may carry into execution any punishments to be inflicted in pursuance of a court martial.

PROXENETÆ (Lat.). In Civil Law. Among the Romans these were persons whose functions somewhat resembled those of the brokers of modern commercial nations. Dig. 50. 14. 3; Domat, l. 1, t. 17, § 1, art. 1.

PROXIMATE. In its legal sense, closeness of causal connection. 55 N. J. L. 205.

Proximate—Approximate—Distinction. The word "proximate" when used in speaking of the results of an injury means direct or immediate, but the word "approximate" conveys a very different meaning. 161 Ky. 47, 170 S. W. 499.

PROXIMATE CAUSE. That which, in a natural and continuous sequence, unbroken by any new cause, produces an event, and without which the event would not have occurred. The proximate cause is that which is most proximate in the order of responsible causation; 87 W. Va. 190; 90 Pac. Rep. (N. M.) 916. That which stands next in causation to the effect, not necessarily in time or space but in causal relation; 143 Ill. 242. See 93 U. S. 180; CAUSA PROXIMA NON REMOTA SPECTATUR; NEGLIGENCE.

PROXIMITY (Lat.). Kindred between two persons. Dig. 38. 16. 8. See VICINITY.

PROXY (contracted from procuracy, procurator). A person appointed in the place of another, to represent him.

The instrument by which a person is appointed so to act.

The right of voting at an election of an incorporated company by proxy is not a general right, and the party claiming it must show a special authority for that purpose; Ang. & A. Corp. § 128; 76 Pa. 42; and although not defined on the face of the proxy, it will be held to be for the election then in contemplation, and for no other; 5 R. R. & Corp. L. J. 255. At common law it was allowable only by the peers of England, and that is said to be in virtue of a special permission of the king; 1 Paige 590; but that practice has been discontinued; Bagehot, Eng. Const. 176.

Where there was no clause in the act of incorporation empowering the members to vote by proxy, but a by-law provided that the shareholders may so vote, it was held, in view of this by-law, that a vote given by proxy should have been received; 5 Day 329. The court did not say how they would have decided had there been no such by-law, but drew a clear distinction between public and moneyed corporations. A by-law prohibiting voting by proxy has been held unreasonable and invalid; 88 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 452. In 2 Green N. J. 222, it was held that it required legislative sanction before any corporation could make a by-law authorizing members to vote by proxy. So, also, in 3 Grant, Cas. 209. See 2 Kent 294; Beach, Pub. Corp. 391; 6 Wend. 609. Stockholders of national banks may vote by proxy, but no officer, clerk, teller, or bookkeeper of a bank may act as proxy; R. S. § 6144; many of the states have passed statutes regulating the right to vote by proxy. Where it is provided in the charter of a corporation that votes may be given by proxy, and an appointment is made without limitation, a vote by the proxy binds the stockholder, whether exercised in his interest or not, to the same extent as if the vote had been cast in person; 98 Ala. 92.

A power of attorney, irrevocable for ten years, executed by joint owners of stock, is not against public policy, nor within an act providing that every proxy shall be revocable at the pleasure of the person issuing it; 36 N. Y. S. 627; and a by-law providing that no proxy should be voted by any one not a stockholder of the corporation is invalid under an act providing generally that stockholders may be represented by proxies; 104 Cal. 649.

A stockholder who holds a proxy from another stockholder, and votes at a corporate meeting by a show of hands, counts as one person, without regard to the number of proxies he has; [1897] 1 Ch. 1; 52 L. T. N. s. 846; 101 L. T. J. 327; contra, per Kekewich, J., 22 Law Mag. & Rev. 46; but if proxies are held by non-members, every such has one vote (semble); [1897] 1 Ch. 1. In England it is said that proxy-holders cannot demand a poll; 3 Q. B. D. 442. See VOTING TRUST; MEETING.

In Ecclesiastical Law. A judicial proctor, or one who is appointed to manage another man's law concerns is called a proxy. Ayliffe, Parerg.

An annual payment made by the parochial clergy to the bishop, etc., on visitations. Tomlins, Law Dict.

In Rhode Island and Connecticut the name of an election or day of voting for officers of government. Webst. Dict.

PRUDENCE. That degree of care required by the exigencies or circumstances under which it is to be exercised. 8 S. Dak. 93. See NEGLIGENCE.

PRUDHOMMES, PRODES HOMMES. Discreet men. A term applied to jurors. Burrill; Britt. c. 58. Prud omes; great men. Id.; Kelham. Prudum; an honest man. Id. The two last forms are obvious corruptions.

PRUDOMES. See PRUDHOMMES.

PRUDUM. See PRUDHOMMES.

PRYK. A kind of service of tenure. It signified an old-fashioned spur with one point only, which the tenant, holding land by this tenure, was to find for the king. Blount.

PSEUDOGRAPH. False writing.

PSYCHIATRY. The science of mental diseases (q. v.). It includes symptomatology, etiology, pathological anatomy, and therapy of mental diseases, and care of the insane. Bridges, Outline Abn. Psych. 127. See PSYCHOSIS; DEMENTIA; AMENTIA; INSANITY.

PSYCHOLOGICAL FACT. In the law of evidence. A fact which can only be perceived mentally; such as the motive by which a person is actuated.

PSYCHOSIS. An active pathological process with pronounced mental symptoms. Bridges, Outline Ab. Psych. 127. See MENTAL DISEASE.

PUBERTY. In Civil Law. The age in boys of fourteen, and in girls of twelve years. Ayliffe, Pand. 63; Toulhier, Dr. Civ. Fr. tom. 5, p. 100; Inst. l. 22; Dig. l. 7. 40. 1; Code 5. 60. 3; 1 Bla. Com. 436.

PUBLIC. The whole body politic, or all the citizens of the state. The inhabitants of a particular place.

This term is sometimes joined to other terms, to designate those things which have a relation to the public: as, a public officer, a public road, a public passage, a public house.

A distinction has been made between the terms public and general: they are sometimes used as synonymous. The former term is applied strictly to that which concerns all the citizens and every member of the state; while the latter includes houses, though still a large portion of the community. Greenl. Ev. § 128.

When the public interest and its rights conflict with those of an individual, the latter must yield. Co. Litt. 181. See EMMENT DOMAIN, TRUE, PUBLIC, AND NOTORIOUS.

PUBLIC ACT. An act which concerns the whole community and of which courts of law are bound to take judicial notice. A land patent granted by a sister state is a public act. 4 Hen. & M. 146.

See JUDICIAL NOTICE. As to giving full faith and credit to the public acts of a state, see FOREIGN JUDGMENTS.

PUBLIC ADMINISTRATOR. A public officer who administers property, usually when there are no relatives. English.

PUBLIC AMUSEMENT. See PLACE OF AMUSEMENT; THEATRE.

PUBLIC BID. See BIDDER.

PUBLIC BRIDGE. See BRIDGE.

PUBLIC BUILDING. One of which the possession and use, as well as the property in it, are in the public. 34 N. J. L. 383.

PUBLIC CARRIER. See COMMON CARRIER.

PUBLIC CHAPELS. Chapels of ease. See CHAPEL.

PUBLIC CHARACTER. An individual who asks for and desires public recognition. A statesman, author, artist, or inventor who does so may be said to have surrendered his right of protection against the publication of his portrait; 64 Fed. Rep. 280. See INJUNCTION; PRIVACY; LIBEL.

PUBLIC CHARITY. A charity which is so general and indefinite in its objects as to be of common and public benefit. 11 Allen 456. It would be almost impossible to say what charities are public and what private in their nature; 2 Atk. 87. A devise to the poor of a parish is a public charity; id. An incorporated library association, the object of which is the diffusion of public knowledge and the acquirement of the arts and sciences, and the revenues and income of which are devoted exclusively to such objects and purposes, is an institution of purely public charity under a statute exempting such institutions from taxation; 38 Ohio St. 53; as is an orphan asylum which restricts its inmates to children of a specified religion; 90 Pa. 21. See CHARITABLE USE.

Charity, in its broadest sense, should abound in every institution; tempering even the rigor of the law, and meliorating the harsh conditions of life. It is announced by Divine authority and regarded by the common consent of all enlightened people as being the chief of human virtues.

"Public charities" are public blessings, and the Commonwealth is interested in giving force and effect to them. When property is employed in its unselfish exercise on behalf of the public, where it eases the burdens of society, and in a measure thereby discharges a duty which the public, on its conscience, owes to unfortunate humanity, and is unrestricted save by the limitation of ability, the charity may be said to be a purely public one. 116 Ky. 711, 76 S. W. 523.

A testamentary trust to establish a Masonic Orphans' Asylum to support and educate orphan children under seventeen years of age is a "public charity" within a statute. 134 Ky. 311, 120 S. W. 283.

PUBLIC CORPORATION. See CORPORATION; QUASI-PUBLIC CORPORATIONS.

PUBLIC CROSSING. A way that has been established as a public road in the manner provided by law, or that has been dedicated to the public use. 96 Ky. 197, 27 S. W. 999; 104 Ky. 35, 46 S. W. 207.

PUBLIC DEBT. That which is due or owing by the government.

The constitution of the United States provides, art. 6, s. 1, that "all debts contracted and engagements entered into, before the adoption of this constitution, shall be as valid against the United States under this constitution as under the confederation." The fourteenth amendment provides that "the validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for the payment of pensions and bounties for the services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned." See FUNDING SYSTEM.

PUBLIC DOCUMENTS. The publications printed by order of congress or either house thereof. 1 Dak. Ter. 328. In an action involving a title to swamp lands the official correspondence and reports of public officers of the United States relating to swamp lands and published by the authority of the legislature are public documents which the court may consult even if not made formal proof in the case; 38 Fed. Rep. 66.

PUBLIC DOMAIN. See STATE LANDS.

PUBLIC DUES. Taxes levied by a county court to pay a subscription of the county in aid of a railroad are "public dues" of the county. 10 Bush (Ky.) 132.

PUBLIC ENEMY. This word, used in the singular number, designates a nation at war with the United States, and includes every member of such nation. Vattel 8, c. 5, § 70.

To make a public enemy, the government of the foreign country must be at war with the United States; for a mob, how numerous soever it may be, or robbers, whoever they may be, are never considered as a public enemy; 2 Marsh. Ins. 506; 3 Esp. 181, 183; 74 Me. 418.

A common carrier is exempt from responsibility whenever a loss has been occasioned to the goods in his charge by the act of a public enemy; but the burden of proof lies on him to show that the loss was so occasioned; 3 Munt. 239; 4 Binn. 127; Edw. Bailm. 547-548; 2 Bail. 157. See COMMON CARRIER.

In the late rebellion, the federal troops were a public enemy, against whose acts a common carrier within the confederate lines did not insure. 1 Heisk. 256.

PUBLIC FUND. See FUNDING SYSTEM.

PUBLIC GRANT. See FRANCHISE; CORPORATION; LANDS, PUBLIC.

PUBLIC HEALTH. See ADULTERATION; POLICE POWER; HEALTH; QUARANTINE.

PUBLIC HIGHWAY. One under the control of and kept by the public, established by regular proceedings for the purpose, or generally used by the public for twenty years, or dedicated by the owner of the soil and accepted by the proper authorities and for the maintenance of which they are responsible. 119 N. C. 968. It includes roads, streets, alleys, and lanes, laid out or erected as such by the public, or dedicated or abandoned to the public by the owner; 93 Cal. 128. A railroad is a public highway; 112 Mo. 103; but not a road on paper; 182 Pa. 681, reversing 2 Super. Ct. Pa. 265; nor, it is said, is a turnpike; 10 Ired. 222. See HIGHWAY.

PUBLIC HOSPITAL. To constitute a public hospital, four elements or conditions must be present: the purpose must be charitable; the benefits gratuitously furnished; the beneficiaries unrestricted and indefinite within the extent of the charity, and the institution itself must be of governmental foundation and under governmental control. 15 A. & E. Encyc. 758; 160 Pa. St. 578; 107 U. S. 167; 4 Wheat. (U. S.) 673.

PUBLIC HOUSE. A house kept for the entertainment of all who come lawfully and pay regularly. 8 Brewst. 844. It does not include a boarding-house; id.; but under a statute, a store-house in the country is included in this term; 29 Ala. 40; and a barber shop; 30 id. 350; and a broker's office; 81 id. 371. A room to which persons generally are permitted to resort, to play cards, though not every one has access to it, is a public gambling-house. See many cases collected in 22 Alb. L. J. 24, and Abb. Dic.

In England it applied to a licensed place where liquor is sold. The keeper of a public house is bound to serve any person who presents ready money; 2 Q. B. Div. 136.

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENT. See PUBLIC UTILITY.

PUBLIC INTEREST. If by public permission one is making use of public property and he chances to be the only one with whom the public can deal with respect to the use of that property, his business is affected with a public interest which requires him to deal with the public on reasonable terms; Cooley, Const. Lim. 746.

Business affected with a public interest. 1. Where the business is one, the following of which is not of right but is permitted by the state as a privilege or franchise. 2. Where the state on public grounds renders to the business a special assistance by taxation or otherwise. 3. Where for the accommodation of a business special use is allowed to be made of public property or of a public easement. 4. Where special privileges are granted in consideration of some special return to be made to the public; id.

As to the publication of matter of public interest, see LIBEL; PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION.

PUBLIC INTERNATIONAL LAW. See INTERNATIONAL PRIVATE LAW.

PUBLIC LANDS. Such lands as are subject to sale or other disposition by the United States, under general laws; 92 U. S. 761; 145 id. 535. See LANDS, PUBLIC; 10 Nev. 260. STATE LANDS.

Term does not include lands to which rights have attached and become vested through full compliance with an applicable land law. 255 U. S. 237, 238, citing 92 U. S. 763; 185 U. S. 391, et al.

While the phrase "public lands" is a term ordinarily used to designate lands subject to sale under general laws, it is sometimes used in a larger sense, and as used in § 2 of the act of July, 1862, it includes lands within Indian reservations. Congress so intended and such has been the construction placed on the words by the Interior Department. 225 U. S. 583.

PUBLIC LAWS. See PUBLIC ACTS.

PUBLIC MEETING. See ASSEMBLY; UNLAWFUL ASSEMBLY.

PUBLIC MONEY. As used in the U. S. statutes, the money of the federal government received from the public revenues, or intrusted to its fiscal officers, wherever it may be. It does not include money in the hands of the marshals and other officers of the courts, held to await the judgment of the court. 12 Ct. Cl. 281.

PUBLIC OFFICE. Where, by virtue of law, a person is clothed, not as an incidental or transient authority, but for such time as denotes duration and continuance, with independent power to control the property of the public, or with public functions to be exercised in the supposed interest of the people, the service to be compensated by a stated yearly salary, and the occupant having a designation or title, the position so created is a public office. 29 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 598. See OFFICER.

PUBLIC OFFICER. One who renders a public service; a service in which the general public is interested. A municipal fireman is a "public officer" within the meaning of the term of its broader sense. 145 Ky. 242, 140 S. W. 197.

Persons employed in a city hall in managing and conducting the affairs of the municipality are "public officers." 135 Ky. 571, 122 S. W. 860.

PUBLIC PARK. As Public Property. A "public park," maintained at public expense, is not for profit, but for the public good. It is open to the rich and poor alike, whether they live in or outside the city. The municipal authorities are charged with the duty of maintaining the public health, and in the judgment of scientific men, it is essential to the public health that cities have and maintain parks, where the people can breathe wholesome air. People of this enlightened age justify the levying of taxes to maintain them. They are just as much "public property," used for public purposes, as are the streets, and trees planted therein, and it would be just as proper and reasonable to tax the one as the other. The public have access to and enjoy both. In our opinion, the public park is public property, used for public purposes, and necessary to the proper government of a city. 105 Ky. 344, 49 S. W. 320.

PUBLIC PASSAGE. A right to pass over a body of water. This term is synonymous with public highway, with this difference: by the latter is understood a right to pass over the land of another; by the former is meant the right of going over the water which is on another's land. Carth. 198; Hamm. N. F. 195. See PASSAGE.

PUBLIC PEACE. "That invisible sense of security which every man feels so necessary to his comfort, and for which all governments are instituted." Redfield, J., in 11 Vt. 238. See 6 Daly 280. See PEACE.

PUBLIC PLACE. Any place so situated that what passes there can be seen by any considerable number of persons, if they happen to look. Steph. Cr. L. 115. Under a statute against gaming, a steamboat carrying passengers and freight is a public place; 13 Ala. 602; so is an infirmary; 19 id. 551; so is a shoemaker's shop into which many went, but a few were excluded during the gaming; 17 id. 369; but a secluded place on a mountain, some distance from a roadway and in a dense thicket, is not; 26 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 304. Under statutes against indecent exposure, a public omnibus is a public place; 3 C. & K. 380; so is a urinal in a public park; L. R. 1 C. C. 282; and a part of the sea beach, visible from inhabited houses; 2 Campb. 89. See many cases cited in 22 Alb. L. J. 24, and Abb. Dict. See PUBLIC HOUSE; PLACE.

PUBLIC POLICY. That principle of the law which holds that no subject can lawfully do that which has a tendency to be injurious to the public or against the public good. 4 H. L. Cas. 1; Greenh. Pub. Pol. 2. It has been designated by Burroughs, J., as "an unruly horse pursuing us, and when once you get astride of it you never know where it will carry you." 2 Bingh. 229.

"Public policy is a variable quantity; it must and does vary with the habits, capacities, and opportunities of the public." 86 Ch. Div. 359.

Public policy is manifested by public acts, legislative and judicial, and not by private opinion, however eminent; 42 Fed. Rep. 470. See POLICE POWER; STATUTE; CONSTITUTIONAL.

As to public policy in the law of contracts, see VOID CONTRACTS.

The "public policy" of a State is necessarily confined to the regulation of its own affairs and transactions occurring within its sovereignty. No State can be said to have a "public policy" as to the administration of justice, or as to the service of quasi public agencies, or as to contracts made with respect thereto, transpiring wholly abroad. The "public policy" of a State can no more have extra territorial effect than can a statute of the State. 118 Ky. 247, 80 S. W. 778.

PUBLIC PURPOSE. As employed to denote the objects for which taxes may be levied, it has no relation to the urgency of the public need or to the extent of the public benefit which is to follow. It is on the other hand merely a term of classification to distinguish the objects for which, according to settled usage, the government is to provide, from those which by the like usage are left to private inclination, interest, or liberality. 20 Mich. 452. The power of a municipal corporation to borrow money for a public purpose gives it authority to borrow money and issue bonds to aid a railroad company in making its road as a way of public travel and transportation; 3 Wall. 654, affirmed in 4 id. 270.

The words "for public purposes" means the same as the words "for governmental purposes;" and property so used by a city for public governmental purposes was held to be exempt, while that adapted and used for profit or convenience of the citizens, individually, or collectively, was held to be subject to taxation. 107 Ky. 684, 39 S. W. 838.

The sprinkling of city streets, being necessary to preserve the public health and comfort, is a "public purpose." 116 Ky. 885, 76 S. W. 1091.

The words "used for public purposes" mean the same as the words "used for governmental purposes." 82 S. W. 1009.

The wharf property of the city of Louisville is public property used for "public purposes." 133 Ky. 845, 119 S. W. 163.

PUBLIC RECORD OFFICE. See

RECORD OFFICE.

PUBLIC RECORDS. Under a statute "public records" include official papers, proceedings and records of the officers and general councils of the city, which the law requires them to keep. An ordinance of the city enacted pursuant to the statute governing it is a "public record." 155 Ky. 710, 160 S. W. 267.

PUBLIC SALE. See SALE; AUCTION.

PUBLIC SCHOOLS. Common schools. 103 Mass. 97. See SCHOOLS.

PUBLIC SEMINARY. The testator, by designating a general object of charity, a "public seminary," must be understood as intending either a seminary or the seminary of his county, or any which his executors, or court of equity, in the exercise of a sound judicial discretion, should select. 8 Dana (Ky.) 38.

PUBLIC SERVICE. The "public service" that may entitle certain individuals, including private corporations, to privileges and immunities not enjoyed by the public generally, is a public service that carries with it some measure of public control and authority, must precede or accompany the grant of the privilege and be so much a part of it that the privilege cannot be exercised without incurring the responsibility and liability that attaches to the performance of public duties. 151 Ky. 644, 132 S. W. 799.

PUBLIC SERVICE CORPORATIONS. Another name for quasi-public corporations (q. v.). See QUASI-PUBLIC CORPORATIONS.

PUBLIC SHIP. See SHIPS OF WAR.

PUBLIC SQUARE. In its popular import, the phrase refers almost exclusively to ground occupied by a courthouse and owned by a county. 8 Ind. 378; but it may be used as synonymous with park; 33 N. J. L. 13. See PARK.

As to the right of a municipality to prohibit lecturing, preaching, etc., in public squares, see LIBERTY OF SPEECH; POLICE POWER; PROCESSION.

PUBLIC STATUTES. See PUBLIC ACTS; STATUTE.

PUBLIC TRIAL. The constitutional right to a "public trial" does not mean that all of the public who desire to be present shall have opportunity to do so. The court may limit the admissions to the court room to persons holding tickets of admission. 113 Ky. 588, 137 S. W. 205.

PUBLIC, TRUE, AND NOTORIOUS. The old form by which charges in the allegations in the ecclesiastical courts were described at the end of each particular.

PUBLIC TRUST. See TRUST.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE. This English official, who has practically replaced the Judicial Trustee, is appointed by the lord chancellor under the Public Trustee Act, 1906. The public trustee, under that act and the rules made pursuant thereto, may act as trustee of English wills or settlements (with certain exceptions) precisely as a private trustee may do; but he makes a small charge for acting, whereas a private trustee makes none. The great advantage of the public trustee is that there can be no defalcations and that, as he is a corporation sole, the trouble of replacing trustees who have died never occurs. The main disadvantages would appear to be that he can scarcely administer a discretionary trust as advantageously as a private trustee, and that, when a cestui que trust comes of age and becomes absolutely entitled to large trust funds, he can scarcely advise a self-protective settlement with the same authority as a family solicitor of good standing. These disadvantages can, however, be got over by appointing another trustee to act jointly with the public trustee. Byrne.

PUBLIC USE. Under Eminent Domain. Implies the use of many, or by the public. It may be limited to the inhabitants of a small or restricted locality, but must be in common, and not for a particular individual. Lewis, Em. Dom. c. 7; 130 N. Y. 249; 63 Cal. 169; 66 Hun. 619. It arises when the sovereign power is essential to an enterprise, and is for that reason therein exercised: 50 Fed. Rep. 812. See Eminent Domain, Public Utility.

PUBLIC UTILITY. A distinction is made between a public improvement and a public utility, and by some a public utility is distinguished from a public use, and it is said: "Utility is somewhat more abstract and philosophical than usefulness or use, and it is often employed to denote adaptation to produce a valuable result, while usefulness denotes the actual production of such result." 29 Am. & Eng. Encyc. 560; 161 Mo. 371, quoting Stand. Dict. Public utility held to be synonymous with public use in 7 W. Va. 195. Id.

PUBLIC WAYS. Held to mean all public streets, alleys, side-walks, roads, lanes, avenues, highways and thoroughfares. 51 S. W. 157.

PUBLIC WORSHIP. The term may mean the worship of God conducted and observed under public authority; or it may mean worship in an open or public place, without privacy or concealment; or it may mean the performance of religious exercises, under a provision for an equal right in the whole public to participate in its benefits; or it may be used in contradistinction to worship in the family or the closet. In this country, what is commonly called "public worship" is commonly conducted by voluntary societies, constituted according to their own notions of ecclesiastical authority and ritual propriety, opening their places of worship, and admitting to their religious services such persons, and upon such terms and subject to such regulations, as they may choose to designate and establish. A church absolutely belonging to the public, and in which all persons without restriction have equal rights, such as the public enjoy in highways or public landings, is certainly a very rare institution. Abbott; 14 Gray 586.

PUBLIC WRONGS. Violation of public rights and duties which affect the whole community, considered as a community; crimes and misdemeanors. 3 Bl. Com. 2.

PUBLICAN. In Civil Law. A farmer of the public revenue; one who held a lease of some property from the public treasury. Dig. 39. 4. 1. 1; 39. 4. 12. 3; 39. 4. 13.

PUBLICATION. The act by which a thing is made public.

It differs from promulgation, which see; and see, also, Toullier, Dr. Civ. Fr. titre Préliminaire, n. 59, for the difference in the meaning of these two words.

Publication has different meanings. When applied to a law it signifies the rendering public the existence of the law; when it relates to the opening of the depositions taken in a case in chancery, it means that liberty is given to the officer in whose custody the depositions of witnesses in a cause are lodged, either by consent of parties, or by the rules or orders of the court, to show the depositions openly, and to give out copies of them; Pract. Reg. 297; Blake, Ch. Pr. 143. And when spoken of a will it signifies that the testator has done some act from which it can be concluded that he intended the instrument to operate as his will; 3 Atk. 161; 4 Me. 220; 3 Rawle 15; Com. Dig. Estates by Devise (E 2). See Com. Dig. Chancery (Q). As to the publication of an award, see 6 N. H. 38.

Some of the state constitutions provide that general laws shall not take effect till published. The mode of publication is for the legislature to determine. A general law printed in a volume of private laws was held to have been published; 9 Wisc. 264;

but an unauthorized publication is no publication; 10 Wisc. 186. In Pennsylvania, where the constitution did not require publication, it was held to be necessary before an act could be operative; but nevertheless that publication in the legislative journals was sufficient, and that neglect to publish an act in the pamphlet laws did not invalidate the act; 81 Pa. 432. An inaccuracy in the publication of a statute which does not change its substance or legal effect, will not invalidate the publication; 14 Wisc. 212; a joint resolution of a general nature must be published; 4 Kan. 261. See Cooley, Const. Lim., 2d. ed. 189-191.

See LIBEL, as to the publication of a libel. PERIODICAL PUBLICATION.

PUBLICI JURIS. Of public right.

PUBLICIANA (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name of an action introduced by the praetor Publicius, the object of which was to recover a thing which had been lost. Inst. 4. 6. 4; Dig. 8. 2. 1. 16 et 17. Its effects were similar to those of our action of trover.

PUBLICITY. The doing of a thing in the view of all persons who chose to be present.

The law requires that courts should be open to the public; there can therefore be no secret tribunal, except the grand jury (q. v.); and all judgments are required to be given in public. See OPEN COURT.

Publicity must be given to the acts of the legislature before they can be in force; but in general their being recorded in a certain public office is evidence of their publicity.

PUBLISH. Primarily it means to make known. 54 N. J. L. 111.

PUBLISHER. One who by himself or his agent makes a thing publicly known; one engaged in the circulation of books, pamphlets, and other papers.

The publisher of a libel is responsible as if he were the author of it, and it is immaterial whether he has any knowledge of its contents or not; 9 Co. 59; Odger, L. & St. 125, 166, 432; Hawk. Pl. Cr. c. 73, § 10; 4 Mas. 115; and it is no justification to him that the name of the author accompanies the libel; 10 Johns. 447; 2 Mood. & R. 312.

When the publication is made by writing or printing, if the matter be libellous, the publisher may be indicted for a misdemeanor, provided it was made by his direction or consent; but if he was the owner of a newspaper merely, and the publication was made by his servants or agents, without any consent or knowledge on his part, he will not be liable to a criminal prosecution. But see 107 Mass. 199. In either case he will be liable to an action for damages sustained by the party aggrieved; 7 Johns. 260; 60 Ill. 51; 38 Mich. 10.

In order to render the publisher amenable to the law, the publication must be maliciously made; but malice will be presumed if the matter be libellous. This presumption, however, will be rebutted if the publication be made for some lawful purpose, as, drawing up a bill of indictment, in which the libellous words are embodied for the purpose of prosecuting the libeller; or if it evidently appear that the publisher did not, at the time of publication, know that the matter was libellous; as, when a person reads a libel aloud in the presence of others, without beforehand knowing it to be such; 9 Co. 59. See LIBEL; LIBELLER; PUBLICATION; Ogd. Lib. & S.

PUDICITY. Chastity; the abstaining from all unlawful carnal commerce or connection. A married woman or a widow may defend her pudicity as a maid may her virginity. See CHASTITY; RAPE.

PUDZELD. In Old English Law. To be free from the payment of money for taking of wood in any forest. Co. Litt. 233 a. The same as Woodgeld.

PUEBLO. In its original signification, it means people or population, but is used in the sense of the English word "town." It has the indefiniteness of that term, and, like it, is sometimes applied to a mere collection of individuals residing at a particular place, a settlement, or village, as well as to a regularly organized municipality. 100 U. S. 251.

PUER (Lat. a boy; a child). In its enlarged sense this word signifies a child of either sex; though in its restrained meaning it is applied to a boy only.

A case once arose which turned upon this question, whether a daughter could take lands under the description of puer; and it was decided by two judges against one that she was entitled; Dy. 337 b. In another case, it was ruled the other way; Hob. 33.

PUERILITY. In Civil Law. A condition which commenced at the age of seven years, the end of the age of infancy, and lasted till the age of puberty,—that is, in females till the accomplishment of twelve years, and in males till the age of fourteen years fully accomplished. Ayliffe, Pand. 63.

The ancient Roman lawyers divided puerility into proximus infantie, as it approached infancy, and proximus puertati, as it became nearer to puberty. 6 Toullier, n. 100.

PUERTIA (Lat.). In Civil Law. Age from seven to fourteen. 4 Blas. Com. 22; Wharton, Dict. The age from birth to fourteen years in the male, or twelve in the female. Calvinus, Lex. The age from birth to seventeen. Vicat, Voc. Jur.

PUFFER. A person employed by the owner of property which is sold at auction to bid it up, who does so accordingly, for the purpose of raising the price upon bona fide bidders.

This is a fraud, which, at the option of the purchaser, invalidates the sale. 3 Madd. 112; 2 Kent 423; 3 Ves. 628; 2 Bro. C. C. 326; 11 S. & R. 89; 2 Hayw. 828; 4 H. & McH. 282; 2 Dev. 120. See AUCTION; BIDDER; BY BIDDER.

PUISDARREIN CONTINUANCE (L. Fr. since last continuance). In Pleading. A plea which is put in after issue joined, for the purpose of introducing new matter, or matter which has come to the knowledge of the party pleading it subsequently to such joinder. See CONTINUANCE; PLEA.

PUISNE (L. Fr.). Younger; junior. Associate. Puisme judge, an associate judge; not the chief justice.

PULLMAN CAR. See SLEEPING CAR.

PUNCTUALITY. As a general rule, a railroad company is liable to damage accruing to a passenger for a negligent failure on its part to run its trains according to the company's time tables; but there must be proof of negligence. Neither time table nor advertisement is a warrant of punctuality. Whart. Negl. § 662.

The publication of the time table cannot amount to less than this, viz.: a representation that it is ordinarily practicable for the company, by the use of due care and skill, to run according to the table, and an engagement on their part that they will do all that can be done, by the use of due care and skill, to accomplish that result; 52 N. H. 596. See also 5 E. & B. 860. The company is undoubtedly liable for any want of punctuality which they could have avoided by the use of due care and skill; nor can they excuse a want of conformity to the time table for any cause, the existence of which was known to them, or ought to have been known to them, at the time of publishing the table; 52 N. H. 596. See 8 E. L. & Eq. 362; 14 Allen 433; 26 Miss. 600; L. R. 3 C. P. 339. In Ang. Carriers 537 a, it is said that time tables are in the nature of a special contract, so that any deviation from them renders the company liable. But it does not appear that the cases go so far.

PUNCTUATION. The division of a written or printed instrument by means of points, such as the comma, semicolon, and the like.

Courts of law in construing statutes and deeds must read them with such punctuation as will give effect to the whole; 4 Term 65.

In construing deeds, it is said that no regard is to be had to punctuation, and although stops are sometimes used, they are not to be regarded in the construction of the instrument; 3 Washb. R. P. 397. See 21 W. Va. 707. Punctuation is not allowed to throw light on printed statutes in England; 24 Beav. 380.

In an act of parliament there are no such things as brackets, any more than there are such things as stops; 24 Q. B. D. 478.

Punctuation may be considered in determining the meaning of a contract, when it is doubtful; 138 U. S. 1.

Where a comma after a word in a statute, if any force were attached to it, would give the section containing it broader scope than it would otherwise have, it was held that that circumstance should not have a controlling influence. Punctuation is no part of the statute; 105 U. S. 77; in construing statutes, courts will disregard punctuation; or, if need be, repunctuate, to render the true meaning of the statute; 18 Ohio St. 432, approved in 105 U. S. 77; also 65 Pa. 311; 9 Gray 355.

Punctuation is a most fallible standard by which to interpret a writing; it may be resorted to when all other means fail, but the court will first ascertain the meaning from the four corners of the instrument; 11 Pet. 64.

Lord St. Leonards said: "In wills and deeds you do not ordinarily find any stops; but the court reads them as if they were properly punctuated;" 2 Dr. & War. 98.

Judges in the later cases have been influenced in construing wills by the punctuation of the original document; 2 M. & G. 679; 26 Beav. 81; 1 Phila. 328; 17 Beav. 589; 24 L. J. Ch. 523; but see 1 Mer. 651, where Sir William Grant refused to resort to punctuation as an aid to construction. See, also, 25 Barb. 405; 16 Can. L. J. 183.

PUNCTURED WOUND. In medical jurisprudence. A wound made with an object having a sharp cutting point; a stab.

PUNISHABLE. Liable to punishment. 118 Mass. 36. See 107 Id. 226; 49 Conn. 232; 135 U. S. 204.

PUNISHMENT. In Criminal Law. Some pain or penalty warranted by law, inflicted on a person for the commission of a crime or misdemeanor, or for the omission of the performance of an act required by law, by the judgment and command of some lawful court.

The penalty for the transgression of the law. Whart.; 8 N. Y. Crim. R. 355.

"The infliction of pain in vengeance of crime." Dr. Johnson.

The right of society to punish is derived, by Beccaria, Mably, and some others, from a supposed agreement which the persons who composed the primitive societies entered into, in order to keep order, and, indeed, the very existence of the state. According to others, it is the interest and duty of man to live in society; to defend his right, society may exert this principle, in order to support itself; and this it may do whenever the acts punishable would endanger the safety of the whole. And Bentham is of opinion that the foundation of this right is laid in public utility or necessity. Delinquents are public enemies, and they must be disarmed and prevented from doing evil, or society would be destroyed. But, if the social compact has ever existed, says Livingston, its end must have been the preservation of the natural rights of the members; and therefore the effects of this fiction are the same with those of the theory which takes abstract justice as the foundation of the right to punish; for this justice, if well considered, is that which assures to each member of the state the free exercise of his rights. And if it should be found that utility, the last source from which the right to punish is derived, is so intimately united to justice that it is inseparable from it in the practice of law, it will follow that every system founded on one of these principles must be supported by the other.

The proper end of human punishment is not the satisfaction of justice, but the prevention of crime; Paley.

The end of punishment, therefore, is neither to torment sensible beings nor undo a crime already committed, nor yet recall the past, nor reverse the crime. It is to punish the criminal for doing some injury to society; to repair the wrong done to society or to a private individual, and to amend his life for the future, and by his example to prevent others from committing like offences. The chief end of punishment is by punishing the crime and preventing the doing of it again; and that by means of fines, imprisonment, hard labor, moral and physical treatment, and new habits formed. The infliction of pain for its own sake is now condemned by all enlightened governments, statesmen, and philanthropists; 16 L. Mag. & Rev. 99.

The main objects of penal justice is laid down by Bentham: example, reformation, incapacitation, satisfaction for the person injured, economy to the public. He further says that all our forms of punishment should be put to these five tests and should be subjected most especially to all except the last.

To attain their social end, punishments should be exemplary, or capable of intimidating those who might be tempted to imitate the guilty; reformatory, or such as should improve the condition of the convicts; personal, or such as are at least calculated to wound the feelings or affect the rights of the relations of the guilty; divisible, or capable of being graduated and proportioned to the offence and the circumstances of each case; reparable, on account of the fallibility of human justice.

Punishments are either corporal or not corporal. The former are—death, which is usually denominated capital punishment; imprisonment, which is either with or without labor, see PENITENTIARY; whipping, in some states; and banishment.

The punishments which are not corporal are—fines, forfeitures; suspension or deprivation of some political or civil right; deprivation of office, and being rendered incapable to hold office; compulsion to remove nuisances.

The object of punishment is to reform the offender, to deter him and others from committing like offences, and to protect society. See 4 Bla. Comm. 7; Whart. Cr. L. 3, 4, 7; Rutherford, Inst. b. 1, c. 18. A state may provide for a severer punishment for a second than for a first offence, provided it is dealt out to all alike; 159 U. S. 673.

The constitution of the United States, Amendments, art. 8, forbids the infliction of cruel and unusual punishments. This is intended only for congress and the federal courts; 12 S. & R. 220; 3 Cow. 686; and does not apply to the states; 144 U. S. 323 (Field, Harlan, and Brewer, J.J., dissenting). Punishments are cruel when they involve torture or a lingering death; but the punishment of death is not cruel, within the meaning of that word as used in the federal constitution; 136 U. S. 438.

A state statute which provides for the punishment of death by electricity, and which is held by the state courts not to inflict a cruel and unusual punishment, does not abridge the privileges or immunities of a convict under the federal constitution; 142 U. S. 155.

What punishment is suited to a specified offence must in general be determined by the legislature, and the case must be very extraordinary in which its judgment could be brought in question. A punishment may possibly be unlawful because it is so manifestly out of all proportion to the offence as to shock the moral sense with its barbarity, or because it is a punishment long disused for its cruelty until it has become unusual; Cooley, Const., 2d ed. 401-408. So, for example, is the punishment of depriving a native of China of his hair; 18 Am. L. Reg. 876. Whipping, as a punishment for stealing mules, is not contrary to this provision; 1 New Mex. 415. In New York, where a general law created a crime and fixed the maximum of its punishment, a special statute operating only in localities, or upon particular individuals, whereby, for no perceptible reason, the same identical crime, which consists in the violation of a statute applicable to the whole state, can therein or in those persons be punished with double the severity that it can be elsewhere in the same state, is within the prohibition of section five of article one of the constitution of the state as to "cruel and unusual punishments"; 61 How. Pr. 294; 35-L. R. A. 562. See INFAMY; INFAMOUS CRIME; JEOPARDY; CAPITAL PUNISHMENT; PRISONER; SENTENCE; PARDON; ELECTROCUTION; HANGING; CRUEL AND UNUSUAL PUNISHMENT; ACCUMULATIVE SENTENCES; INFAMOUS PUNISHMENT.

PUNITIVE. "Punitive, vindictive and exemplary damages" are, in legal contemplation, synonymous terms. 2 Met. (Ky.) 147.

PUNITIVE DAMAGES. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

PUPIL. In Civil Law. One who is in his or her minority. See Dig. 1, 7, 26, 7, 1, 2; 50, 16, 239; Code 6, 80, 18. One who is in ward or guardianship. See SCHOOLS; ASSAULT; BATTERY; CORRECTION.

PUPILLARIS SUBSTITUTIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. The nomination of another besides his son as pupil to succeed, if the son should not be able or inclined to accept the inheritance, or should die before he came of age to make a testament.

If the child survived the age of puberty, though he made no testament, the substitute had no right of succession. See Bell, Dict. Substitution; Dig. 28, 6.

PUPILLARITY. In Civil Law. That age of a person's life which included infancy and puerility.

PUR. A corruption of the French word par, by or for. It is frequently used in old French law phrases; as pur autre vie. It is also used in the composition of words; as, puparty, purlieu, purview.

PUR AUTRE VIE (old French, for another's life). See ESTATE PUR AUTRE VIE.

PURCHASE. A term including every mode of acquisition of estate known to the law, except that by which an heir on the death of his ancestor becomes substituted in his place as owner by operation of law. 2 Washb. R. Prop. 5th ed. *401; 15 Barb. 568; 9 Cow. 437. A title by purchase is one that is vested in a person by his own act or agreement; 2 Bla. Comm. 241. A title by devise is a title by purchase; 134 Ind. 78.

There are six ways of acquiring a title by purchase, namely, by deed; by devise; by execution; by prescription; by possession or occupancy; by escheat. In its more limited sense, purchase is applied only to such acquisitions of lands as are obtained by way of bargain and sale for money or some other valuable consideration; Cruise, Dig. tit. 80, §§ 1-4; 1 Dall. 20. See 98 Ill. 535. In common parlance, purchase signifies the buying of real estate and of goods and chattels.

The word 'purchase' implies purchase in fee. 1 Dallas (U. S.) 21.

PURCHASE-MONEY. The consideration which is agreed to be paid by the purchaser of a thing in money. See 15 Barb. 568. As to vendor's lien, see LIEN. See APPLICATION OF PURCHASE-MONEY.

PURCHASER. A buyer; a vendee. A mortgagee or a conditional vendee is not a purchaser; 46 Neb. 830.

Ex Vi Termini. A purchaser ex vi termini, is one who has acquired the title, and the term cannot in legal propriety be applied to one who claims under an unexecuted contract to convey. 2 Bibb. (Kv) 418.

See SALE; PARTIES; BONA FIDE PURCHASER; PURCHASER FOR VALUE AND WITHOUT NOTICE; CONTRACTS.

PURCHASER FOR VALUE AND WITHOUT NOTICE. A bona fide purchaser. A purchaser of land who takes a conveyance purporting to pass the entire title, legal and equitable, gives therefor a valuable consideration, and has neither actual nor constructive notice of any equitable rights of other persons in conflict with the title that his deed purports to convey. 23 Am. & Eng. Encyc. 2d ed., 476; 49 Ark. 214 et al. See BONA FIDE PURCHASER.

PURE DEBT. In Scotch Law. A debt actually due, in contradistinction to one which is to become due at a future day certain, which is called a future debt, and one due provisionally, in a certain event, which is called a contingent debt. 1 Bell, Comm. 315.

PURE OBLIGATION. One which is not suspended by any condition, whether it has been contracted without any condition, or, when thus contracted, the condition has been performed. Pothier, Obl. n. 176.

PURE PLEA. In Equity Pleading. One which relies wholly on some matter dehors the bill, as, for example, a plea of a release on a settled account.

Pleas not pure are so called in contradistinction to pure pleas; they are sometimes also denominated negative pleas. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 4275.

PURGATION (Lat. purgo, from purum and ago, to make clean). The clearing one's self of an offence charged, by denying the guilt on oath or affirmation.

Canonical purgation was the act of justifying one's self, when accused of some offence, in the presence of a number of persons worthy of credit, generally twelve, who would swear they believe the accused. See COMPURGATOR; WAGER OF LAW.

Vulgar purgations consisted in superstitious trials by hot and cold water, by fire, by hot irons, by battel, by corsned, etc.

See OATH PURGATORY.

PURGED OF PARTIAL COUNSEL. In Scotland every witness, before making oath or affirmation, is purged of partial counsel, i. e. cleared by examination on oath of having instigated the plea of having been present with the party for whom he testifies at consultations of lawyers, where it might be shown what was necessary to be proved, or of having acted as his agent in any of the proceedings. So, in a criminal case, he who is agent of prosecutor or who tampers with the panel cannot be heard to testify, because of partial counsel. Stair, Inst. p. 768, § 9; Bell, Dict. Partial Counsel.

PURGING A TORT. Is like the ratification of a wrongful act by a person who has power of himself to lawfully do the act. But, unlike ratification, the purging of the tort may take place even after commencement of the action. 1 Brod. & B. 262.

PURLIEU. In English Law. A space of land near a forest, known by certain boundaries, which was formerly part of a forest, but which has been separated from it.

The history of purlieu is this. Henry II., on taking possession of the throne, manifested so great a taste for forests that he enlarged the old ones wherever he could, and by this means enclosed many estates which had no outlet to the public roads; forests increased in this way until the reign of King John, when the public reclamations were so great that much of this land was disforested, — that is, no longer had the privileges of the forests — and the land thus separated bore the name of purlieu. See FOREST LAWS.

PURPART. A share of an estate allotted by partition to a coparcener. Anderson. See PURPARTY.

PURPARTY. That part of an estate which, having been held in common by parceners, is by partition allotted to any of them. To make purparty is to divide and sever the lands which fall to parceners. Old, N. B. 11.

PURPORT. In Pleading. The substance of a writing as it appears on the face of it to the eye that reads it. It differs from tenor. 3 Russ. Cr. 865; 1 East 179.

PURPOSE. See PUBLIC PURPOSE.

PURPOSELY. Intentionally; designedly. 23 Ind. 231.

PURPRESTURE. An enclosure by a private individual of a part of a common or public domain.

An inclosure by a private person of a part of that which belongs to, and ought to be open and free to the enjoyment of the public at large. 84 Mich. 472; 89 id. 64. See 76 Cal. 156.

According to Lord Coke, purpresture is a close or enclosure, that is, when one encroaches or makes several to himself that which ought to be in common to many; as, if an individual were to build between high and low water mark on the side of a public river. In England this is a nuisance, and in cases of this kind an injunction will be granted, on ex parte affidavits, to restrain such purpresture and nuisance. 2 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2382; 4 id. n. 3798; Co. 2d Inst. 28. And see Skene, Purpresture; Glanville, lib. 9, ch. 11, p. 239, note; Spelman, Gloss. Purpresture; Hale, de Fort. Mar.; Hargrave, Law Tracts 84; 2 Anstr. 606; Bishp. Eq. 443; Callis, Sew. 174.

PURSER. The person appointed by the master of a ship or vessel, whose duty it is to take care of the ship's books, in which everything on board is inserted, as well the names of mariners as the articles of merchandise shipped. Roccus, Ins. note.

By statute pursers in the navy are now called paymasters. R. S. § 1383.

PURSUE. To execute or carry out. Co. Litt. 52 a.

PURSUEE. The name by which the complainant or plaintiff is known in the ecclesiastical courts. 3 Eccl. 350.

PURVIEW. That part of an act of the legislature which begins with the words, "Be it enacted," etc., and ends before the repealing clause. Cooke 330; 3 Bibb 181. According to Cowell, this word also signifies a conditional gift or grant. It is said to be derived from the French pourvu, provided. It always implies a condition.

PUT. In Pleading. To select; to demand; as, "the said C D puts himself upon the country;" that is, he selects the trial by jury as the mode of settling the matter in dispute, and does not rely upon an issue in law. Gould, Fl. c. 6, part 1, § 19.

PUTOFF. To postpone. In a bargain for the sale of goods, it may mean to postpone its completion or to procure a resale of the goods to a third person. 11 Ex. 302.

PUTATIVE. Reputed to be that which is not. The word is frequently used: as, putative father, putative marriage, putative wife, and the like. And Toullier, tome 7, n. 29, uses the words putative owner, proprietaire putatif. Lord Kames uses the same expression. Princ. of Eq. 391.

PUTATIVE FATHER. The reputed father. This term is usually applied to the father of a bastard child.

The putative father is bound to support his children; and is entitled to the guardianship and care of them in preference to all persons but the mother. 1 Ashm. 55.

And see 5 Esp. 181; 1 B. & Ald. 491; Bott, Poor Law 499; 1 C. & P. 268; 3 id. 86; 1 Ball & B. 1.

PUTATIVE MARRIAGE. A marriage which is forbidden but which has been contracted in good faith and ignorance of the impediment, on the part of at least one of the contracting parties.

Three circumstances must concur to constitute this species of marriage. There must be bona fides. One of the parties at least must have been ignorant of the impediment, not only at the time of the marriage, but must also have continued ignorant of it during his or her life, because if he became aware of it he was bound to separate himself from his wife. The marriage must be duly solemnized. The marriage must have been considered lawful in the estimation of the parties or of that party who alleges the bona fides.

A marriage in which these three circumstances concur, although null and void, will have the effect of entitling the wife, if she be in good faith, to enforce the rights of property which would have been competent to her if the marriage had been valid, and of rendering the children of such marriage legitimate.

This species of marriage was not recognized by the civil law: it was introduced by the canon law. It is unknown to the law of the United States, and in England and Ireland. In France it has been adopted by the Code Civil, art. 201, 202. In Scotland the question has not been settled. Burge, Conf. Laws 151, 152.

PUTS AND CALLS. As used in a board of brokers. A "put" is defined in the evidence to be a privilege of delivering or not delivering the grain, and a "call" is a privilege of calling or not calling for the grain. 79 Ill. 333. See OPTION.

PUTTING IN FEAR. These words are used in the definition of a robbery from the person: the offence must have been committed by putting in fear the person robbed. Co. 3d Inst. 66; 4 Bla. Com. 243.

This is the circumstance which distinguishes robbery from all other larcenies. But what force must be used or what kind of fears excited are questions very proper for discussion. The goods must be taken against the will of the possessor.

There must either be a putting in fear or actual violence, though both need not be positively shown, for the former will be inferred from the latter, and the latter is sufficiently implied in the former. For example, when a man is suddenly knocked down, and robbed while he is senseless, there is no fear, yet in consequence of the violence, it is presumed; 2 East, Pl. Cr. 711; 4 Binn. 379; 3 Wash. C. C. 209.

In an indictment for robbery, at common law, it is not necessary to allege a putting in fear in addition to the allegation of force and violence; 7 Mass. 242; 8 Cush. 217.

PYROMANIA. An irresistible propensity to burn.

Pyromania always occurs in young subjects, and is supposed to be connected with disordered menstruation, or that physiological evolution which attends the transition from youth to manhood. See MANIA.

PYX, TRIAL OF THE. A trial in England which is held every year for the purpose of ascertaining whether the coins have been made in accordance with the Coinage Act 1870. The trial takes place before the King's Remembrancer and a jury of six members of the Goldsmiths' Company, summoned by the officials of that company, who are known as the Prime Warden and the Wardens; there is a weighing, melting and assaying of the coins in order to ascertain whether they are of proper weight and fineness, and the verdict of the jury, which must be signed by each of them, contains various averments as to these matters. Byrne.

Q. C. An abbreviation of "queen's counsel" (q. v.). Anderson.

QUACK. One who, without sufficient knowledge, study, or previous preparation, undertakes to practise medicine or surgery, under the pretence that he possesses secrets in those arts.

QUADRIPARTITE (Lat.). Having four parts, or divided into four parts: as, this indenture quadripartite, made between A B, of the one part, C D, of the second part, E F, of the third part, and G H, of the fourth part.

QUADRIPARTITUS. A translation of the old dooms into Latin made about the year 1118. The first part contains the old English laws, the second some important state papers. The third and fourth parts, dealing respectively with legal procedure and theft, are not extant. Byrne; Liebermann, Quadrupartitus; Halle, 1892.

QUADRUPLICATION. In Pleading. A pleading in admiralty, third in order after a replication; now obsolete. Formerly this word was used instead of surrebuter. 1 Brown, Civ. Law. 469, n.

QUÆ EST EADEM (Lat. which is the same). In Pleading. A clause containing a statement that the trespass, or other fact mentioned in the plea, is the same as that laid in the declaration, where from the circumstances there is an apparent difference between the two. 1 Chitty, Pl. *582; Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 79, 80; 29 Vt. 455.

The form is as follows: "which are the same assaulting, beating, and ill-treating, the said John, in the said declaration mentioned, and whereof the said John hath above thereof complained against the said James." See 1 Baund. 14, 208, n. 2; 2 id. 5 a, n. 3; Arch. Civ. Pl. 217; Com. Dig. Pleader (E 31); Cro. Jac. 372.

QUÆ PLURA. A writ which lay where an inquisition had been taken by an escheator of lands, etc. of which a man, died seized, and all the land was supposed not to be found by the office or inquisition; it was to inquire of "what more" lands or tenements the party dies seized. Reg. Orig. 293.

QUÆRE (Lat.). Query: noun and verb. A word frequently used to denote that an inquiry ought to be made of a doubtful thing. 2 Lilly, Abr. 406. Commonly used in the syllabi of the reports, to mark points of law considered doubtful.

QUAERENS NIHIL CAPIAT PER BILLAM (L. Lat.). The plaintiff shall take nothing by his bill.

QUÆRENS NON INVENT PLEGIUM (Lat.). In Practice. The plaintiff has not found pledge. The return made by the sheriff to a writ directed to him with this clause, namely, si A fecerit B securum de clamore suo prosequendo, when the plaintiff has neglected to find sufficient security. Fitz. N. B. 88.

QUÆSTIO (Lat.). In Roman Law. A sort of commission (ad quærendum) to inquire into some criminal matter given to a magistrate or citizen, who was called quæstor or quæstor, who made report thereon to the senate or the people, as the one or the other appointed him. In progress of time he was empowered (with the assistance of a counsel) to adjudge the case; and the tribunal thus constituted was called quæstio.

This special tribunal continued in use until the end of the Roman republic, although it was resorted to, during the last times of the republic, only in extraordinary cases.

The manner in which they were constituted was this. If the matter to be inquired of was within the jurisdiction of the comitia, the sebate, on the demand of the consul, or of a tribune, or of one of its members, declared by a decree that there was cause to prosecute a citizen. Then the consul ex auctoritate senatus appointed the people in comitia (rogabat rogatio) to enact this decree into a law. The comitia adopted it, either simply or with amendment, or they rejected it.

The increase of population and of crimes rendered this method, which was tardy at best, onerous, and even impracticable. In the year A. D. C. 604, or 149 a. c., under the consulship of Consorsius and Manlius, the tribune Calpurnius Piso procured the passage of a law establishing a quæstio perpetua, to take cognizance of the crime of extortion committed by Roman magistrates against private citizens, de pecuniis repetundis. Cicero, Brut. 27; de Off. ii. 21; in Verr. iv. 25.

Many such tribunals were afterwards established, such as Quæstiones de maiestate, de ambitu, de peculatu, de vi, de sodalitate, etc. Each was composed of a certain number of judges taken from the senators, and presided over by a prætor, although he might delegate his authority to a public officer, who was called juxta quæstionis. These tribunals continued a year only: for the meaning of the word perpetuus is non interruptus, not interrupted during the term of its appointed duration.

The establishment of these quæstiones deprived the comitia of their criminal jurisdiction, except for the crime of treason; they were, in fact, the depositories of the judicial power during the sixth and seventh centuries of the Roman republic, the last of which was remarkable for civil dissensions and replete with great public transactions. Without some knowledge of the constitution of the Quæstio perpetua, it is impossible to understand the forensic speeches of Cicero, or even the political history of that age. But when Julius Cæsar, as dictator, set for the trial of Ligarius, the ancient constitution of the republic was, in fact, destroyed, and the criminal tribunals, which had existed in more or less vigor and purity until then, existed no longer but in name. Under Augustus, the concentration of the triple power of the consuls, præconsuls, and tribunes in his person transferred to him, as of course, all judicial powers and authorities.

QUALIFIED OWNER. See OWNER; PROPERTY; QUALIFIED PROPERTY.

QUALIFIED PROPERTY. Property not in its nature permanent, but which may sometimes subsist and at other times not subsist. A defeasible and precarious ownership, which lasts as long as the thing is in actual use and occupation: e. g. first, property in animals feræ nature, or in light, or air, where the qualified property arises from the nature of the thing; second, property in a thing held by any one as a bailee, where the qualified property arises not from the nature of the thing, but from the peculiar circumstances under which it is held; 2 Bla. QUALITY. Of Persons. The state of condition of a person.

Two contrary qualities cannot be in the same person at the same time. Dig. 41. 10. 4. Every one is presumed to know the quality of the person with whom he is contracting. In the United States the people are all upon an equality in their civil rights.

In Pleading. That which distinguishes one thing from another of the same kind.

It is, in general, necessary, when the declaration alleges an injury to the goods and chattels, or any contract relating to them, that the quality should be stated; and it is also essential, in an action for the recovery of real estate, that its quality should be shown; as, whether it consists of houses, lands, or other hereditaments, whether the lands are meadow, pasture, or arable, etc. The same rule requires that in an action for an injury to real property, the quality should be shown; Steph. Pl. 214, 215. See, as to the various qualities, Ayliffe, Pand. [60].

It is often allowable to omit from the indictment, and it is seldom necessary to prove with precision, allegations of quality, or, in other words, those allegations which describe the mode in which certain acts have been done. Thus, if the charge is of a felonious assault with a staff, and the proof is of such an assault with a stone, or if a wound, alleged to have been given with a sword, is proved to have been inflicted by an axe, or if a pistol is stated to have been loaded with a bullet, and it turns out to have been loaded with some other destructive material, the charge is substantially proved, and no variance occurs: 1 East, Pl. C. 341; 5 C. & P. 128; 9 id. 525, 548.

QUAMDIU SE BENE GESSERIT (Lat. as long as he shall behave himself well). A clause inserted in commissions, when such instruments were written in Latin, to signify the tenure by which the officer held his office.

QUANDO ACCIDERINT (Lat. when they fall in).

In Practice. When a defendant, executor, or administrator pleads plene administravit, the plaintiff may pray to have judgment of assets quando acciderint; Bull. N. P. 169; Bac. Abr. Executor (M). A similar judgment may be taken at the plaintiff's election, in an action against an heir, on a plea of riens perdescent, instead of taking issue on the plea. In either of these cases if assets afterwards come to the hands of the executor or heir a scire facias must be sued out before execution can issue, or there may be an action of debt, suggesting a devastavit; 2 Bouv. Inst. 3708. It is also sometimes termed a judgment of assets in futuro.

By taking a judgment in this form the plaintiff admits that the defendant has fully administered to that time; 1 Pet. C. C. 442, n.; and therefore the plaintiff will not be allowed to give evidence of effects come to defendant's hands before the judgment. For this reason the scire facias on a judgment of assets quando acciderint must only pray execution of such assets as have come to the defendant's hands since the former judgment, and if it pray judgment of assets generally, it cannot be supported. See 2 Bouv. Inst. 3704; 1 Vin. Abr. 379; Com. Dig. Pleader (2 D 9).

QUANTI MINORIS (Lat.). The name of a particular action in Louisiana. An action quanti minoris is one brought for the reduction of the price of a thing sold, in consequence of defects in the thing which is the object of the sale.

Such action must be commenced within twelve months from the date of the sale, or from the time within which the defect became known to the purchaser; 3 Mart. La. n. s. 287; 11 Mart. La. 11.

QUANTITY. In Pleading. That which is susceptible of measure.

It is a general rule that, when the declaration alleges an injury to goods and chattels, or any contract relating to them, their quantity should be stated; Gould, Pl. § 35. And in actions for the recovery of real estate the quantity of the land should be specified; Bracton 431 a; 11 Co. 25 b, 55 a; Doctr. Plac. 85, 86; 1 East 441; 13 id. 102; Steph. Pl., Andr. ed. § 163.

QUANTITY OF ESTATE. Its time of continuance, or degree of interest, as in fee, during life, or for years. See ESTATE.

QUANTUM DAMNIFICATUS (Lat.). In Equity Practice. An issue directed by a court of equity to be tried in a court of law, to ascertain by a trial before a jury the amount of damages suffered by the non-performance of some collateral undertaking which a penalty has been given to secure. When such damages have thus been ascertained, the court will grant relief upon their payment. 4 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3913.

QUANTUM MERUIT (Lat.). In Pleading. As much as he has deserved.

When a person employs another to do work for him, without any agreement as to his compensation, the law implies a promise from the employer to the workman that he will pay him for his services as much as he may deserve or merit. In such case the plaintiff may suggest in his declaration that the defendant promised to pay him as much as he reasonably deserved, and then aver that his trouble was worth such a sum of money, which the defendant has omitted to pay. This is called an assumption on a quantum meruit. 2 Bla. Com. 162, 163; 1 Vin. Abr. 346. See 43 Mo. App. 653.

When there is an express contract for a stipulated amount and mode of compensation for services, the plaintiff cannot abandon the contract and resort to an action for a quantum meruit on an implied assumption; 14 Johns. 326; 18 id. 169; 10 S. & R. 236; Ans. Contr. 278-279; 51 Fed. Rep. 725. But see 7 Cra. 299; Stark. 277; Holt, N. P. 236; 10 Johns. 36; 12 id. 374; 13 id. 58, 94, 359; 14 id. 326; 5 M. & W. 114; 4 C. & P. 93; 4 Scott N. S. 374; 4 Taunt. 475; 1 Ad. & E. 333; 126 Ind. 461. See COMMON COUNTS.

QUANTUM VALEBAT. (Lat. as much as it was worth). In Pleading. When goods are sold without specifying any price, the law implies a promise from the buyer to the seller that he will pay him for them as much as they were worth.

The plaintiff may, in such case, suggest in his declaration that the defendant promised to pay him as much as the said goods were worth, and then aver that they were worth so much, which the defendant has refused to pay. See the authorities cited under the article QUANTUM MERUIT.

QUARANTINE. In Maritime Law. The space of forty days, or less, during which the crew of a ship or vessel coming from a port or place infected or supposed to be infected with disease are required to remain on board after their arrival, before they can be permitted to land. It was probably established by the Venetians in 1484. Baker, Quar. 3. In England it is governed by 6 George IV. c. 78, and the Public Health Act of 1875. Ships of war are bound, equally with merchant ships, to respect municipal quarantine regulations.

By act of congress of April 29, 1878, ch. 66, vessels from foreign ports where contagious and other diseases exist, are forbidden to enter the United States, excepting subject to certain regulations prescribed.

The object of the quarantine is to ascertain whether the crew are infected or not. To break the quarantine without legal authority is a misdemeanor; 1 Russ. Cr. 138.

Quarantine regulations made by the states are sustainable as the exercise of the police power; Cooley, Const. Lim. 729; 95 U. S. 465; 118 id. 455; 57 Fed. Rep. 276. See 25 Am. L. Rev. 45, where the subject is discussed at large. The detention and disinfection of immigrants by order of a state board of health, with the purpose of preventing infectious disease, is not a regulation of foreign commerce by a state, within the meaning of the constitution; 57 Fed. Rep. 276; 13 Wheat. 419.

In cases of insurance of ships, the insurer is responsible when the insurance extends to her being moored in port twenty-four hours in safety, if before the twenty-four hours are expired she is ordered to perform quarantine, and any accident contemplated by the policy occur; 1 Marsh. Ins. 264. Where a ship was prevented from complying with her charter party by quarantine regulations, it was held that this was "restraint of princes or rulers and people";

3 U. S. App. 147. See CHARTER PARTY.

See Baker, Quarantine; 47 Am. St. Rep. 540; POLICE POWER.

In Real Property. The space of forty days during which a widow has a right to remain in her late husband's principal mansion immediately after his death. The right of the widow is also called her quarantine.

In some of the states provision has been made by statute securing to the widow this right for a greater or less space of time. See 4 Kent 62; Digb. Hist. R. P. 110; Walk. Am. Law, 9th ed. § 100, 231; 3 Wash. R. P., 5th ed. *272. Quarantine is a personal right, forfeited, by implication of a law, by second marriage; Co. Litt. 32. See Bacon, Abr. Dower (B); Co. Litt. 32 b, 34 b; Co. 2d Inst. 16, 17.

QUARANTINE LAWS. Laws the object and the end of which is to provide for the safety of its citizens by preventing, as far as human means can prevent it, the introduction among them of contagious and infectious diseases. 7 How. (U. S.) 301.

QUARE (Lat.). In Pleading. Wherefore.

This word is used sometimes in the writ in certain actions, but is inadmissible in a material averment in the pleadings, for it is merely interrogatory; and, therefore, when a declaration began with complaining of the defendant, "wherefore with force, etc., he broke and entered" the plaintiff's close, it was considered ill; Bacon, Abr. Pleas (B. 5, 4); Gould, Pl. c. 3, § 34.

QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT. See TRESPASS; TRESPASS QUARE CLAUSUM FREGIT.

QUARE EJECIT INFRA TERMINUM. See EJECTMENT.

QUARE IMPEDIT (Lat. why he hinders). In English Law. A real possessory action which can be brought only in the court of common pleas, and lies to recover a presentation when the patron's right is disturbed, or to try a disputed title to an advowson. See DISTURBANCE; Mireh. Advow. 265; 2 Saund. 336 a.

In 1335 the king brought a Quare impedit against the bishop of Norwich for the deanery of Lynn. The king stated in his count that John, late bishop of Norwich, had conferred the deanery on one Master Roger of Snittisham, who was already parson of the church of Cressingham, and who continued to hold both benefices for more than a month after his installation in the deanery, per quod per constitutionem de pluralitate decanatus vacavit ipso iure and remained vacant till the temporalities of the bishoprics of Norwich came into the hand of Edw. II upon the death of bishop John. Maitl. Canon Law 67.

QUARE INCUMBRAVIT. Why he incumbered. A writ which lay against a bishop, who, within six months after the vacation of a benefice, conferred it on his clerk, whilst two others were contending at law for the right of presentation, calling upon him to show cause why he had incumbered the church. Reg. Orig. 32.

QUARE OBSTRUXIT (Lat. why he obstructs). The name of a writ formerly used in favor of one who, having a right to pass through his neighbor's grounds, was prevented enjoying such right, because the owner of the grounds had obstructed the way.

QUARREL. A dispute; a difference. In law, particularly in releases, which are taken most strongly against the releasor, when a man releases all quarrel he is said to release all actions, real and personal. 8 Co. 153.

QUARRY. A place whence stones are dug for the purpose of being employed in building, making roads, and the like. In mining law it is said to be an open excavation where the works are visible at the surface. It is said to be derived from quadrarius, a stone-cutter or squarer. Bainbr.

Mines 2.

When a farm is let with an open quarry, the tenant may, when not restrained by his contract, take out the stone; but he has no right to open new quarries. See MINES; WASTE.

QUART. A liquid measure, containing one-fourth part of a gallon.

QUARTER. A measure of length, equal to four inches. See MEASURE.

In the Law of War. By the end of the seventeenth century quarter became a recognized usage of war. It is forfeited only under exceptional circumstances. 1. In case of absolute and overwhelming necessity, as where a small force is incumbered with a large number of prisoners in a savage and hostile country, and may be justified in killing them for their own self-preservation. 2. Where belligerents violate the laws of war they may be refused quarter. 3. By way of retaliation against an enemy who has denied quarter without a cause. Risley, The Law of War.

QUARTER DAYS. The four days of the year on which rent payable quarterly becomes due.

QUARTER DOLLAR. A silver coin of the United States, of the value of twenty-five cents.

Previous to the act of Feb. 21, 1853, c. 79, 10 U. S. Stat. at Large 160, the weight of the quarter-dollar was one hundred and three and one-eighth grains; but coins struck after the passage of that act were of the weight of ninety-six grains. The fineness was not altered by the act cited: of one thousand parts, nine hundred are pure silver and one hundred alloy. By the act of 12th of Feb. 1873, the weight of the quarter-dollar is fixed at one-half that of the half-dollar (twelve and one-half grams); R. S. § 3573; and by act of July 22, 1876, it is made legal tender in all sums public and private not exceeding ten dollars; 1 Supplement R. S. p. 488.

See HALF-DOLLAR; ANNUAL ASSAY; LEGAL TENDER.

QUARTER-EAGLE. A gold coin of the United States, of the value of two and a half dollars. See MONEY; COIN.

QUARTER-SALES. In New York a certain fraction of the purchase-money is often conditioned to be paid back on alienation of the estate; and this fine on alienation is expressed as a tenth-sales, a quarter-sales, etc. 7 Cow. 285; 7 Hill 253; 7 N. Y. 490.

QUARTER SEAL. In Scotch Law. The seal kept by the director of the chancery in Scotland is so called. It is in the shape and impression of the fourth part of the great seal. Bell, Dict.

QUARTER SESSIONS. A court bearing this name, mostly invested with the trial of criminals. It takes its name from sitting quarterly, or once in three months. See COURT OF QUARTER SESSIONS.

The English courts of quarter sessions were erected during the reign of Edward III. See stat. 36 Edw. III.; Crabb, Eng. Law 278.

QUARTER-YEAR. In the computation of time, a quarter-year consists of ninety-one days. Co. Litt. 135 b; 2 Rolle, Abr. 521, l. 40.

QUARTERING. A barbarous punishment formerly inflicted on criminals by tearing them to pieces by means of four horses, one attached to each limb.

QUARTERING OF SOLDIERS. Furnishing soldiers with board or lodging or both. The constitution of the United States, Amendm. art. 3, provides that "no soldier shall, in time of peace, be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law." See Cooley, Const. Lim., 6th ed. 373; Rawle, Const. 126.

QUARTEROON. One who has had one of his grandparents of the black or African race.

QUARTO DIE POST (Lat. fourth day after). Appearance-day, which is the fourth day inclusive from the return of the writ; and if the person summoned appears on that day, it is sufficient. On this day, also, the court begins to sit for despatch of business. These three days were originally given as an indulgence. 8 Sharsw. Bla. Com. 278; Tidd, New Pr. 134. But this practice is now altered. 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76. It still obtains in Pennsylvania.

QUASH. In Practice. To overthrow or annul.

When proceedings are clearly irregular and void, the courts will quash them, both in civil and criminal cases: for example, when the array is clearly irregular, as, if the jurors have been selected by persons not authorized by law, it will be quashed. 3 Bouvier, Inst. n. 3342.

In criminal cases, when an indictment is so defective that no judgment can be given upon it, should the defendant be convicted, the court, upon application, will, in general, quash it: as, if it have no jurisdiction of the offence charged, or when the matter charged is not indictable; 1 Burr. 516, 543; Andr. 226; 49 Fed. Rep. 914. It is in the discretion of the court to quash an indictment or to leave the defendant to a motion in arrest of judgment; 1 Cush. 189; 97 N. C. 401; 100 id. 543. When the application to quash is made on the part of the defendant, in English practice, the court generally refuses to quash the indictment when it appears some enormous crime has been committed; Comyns, Dig. Indictment (H); Wils. 325; 3 Term 621; 5 Mod. 13; 6 id. 42; 8 Burr. 1841; Bacon, Abr. Indictment (K).

When the application is made on the part of the prosecution, the indictment will be quashed whenever it is defective so that the defendant cannot be convicted, and the prosecution appears to be bona fide. If the prosecution be instituted by the attorney-general, he may, in some states, enter a nolle prosequi, which has the same effect; 1 Doug. 239, 240. The application should be made before plea pleaded; Leach 11; 4 How. State Tr. 232; 1 Hale 35; Fost. 231; 35 Pac. Rep. (Idaho) 710; and before the defendant's recognizance has been forfeited; 1 Salk. 380. See CASSETT BREVE.

QUASI (Lat. as if, almost). A term used to mark a resemblance, and which supposes a difference between two objects. Dig. 11. 7. 1. 8. 1. See 60 Ill. 402. It is exclusively a term of classification. Prefixed to a term of Roman law, it implies that the conception to which it serves as an index is connected with the conception with which the comparison is instituted by a strong superficial analogy or resemblance. It negates the idea of identity, but points out that the conceptions are sufficiently similar for one to be classed as the equal of the other; Maine, Anc. Law 332. Civilians use the expressions quasi-contractus, quasi-delicium, quasi-possessio, quasi-traditio, etc.

QUASI-AFFINITY. In Civil Law. The affinity which exists between two persons, one of whom has been betrothed to the kindred of the other, but who have never been married. See AFFINITY.

QUASI-CONTRACTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. An obligation similar in character to that of a contract, but which arises not from an agreement of parties but from some relation between them, or from a voluntary act of one of them.

An obligation springing from voluntary and lawful acts of parties in the absence of any agreement. Howe, Stud. Civ. L. 171.

An obligation which grows out of certain relations between persons whereby they become bound to each other by duties similar to those arising from a contract. Morey, Rom. L. 371.

Quasi-contracts were a well-defined class under the civil law. By the civil code of Louisiana they are defined to be "the lawful and purely voluntary acts of a man, from which there results any obligation whatever to a third person and sometimes a reciprocal obligation between parties. In quasi-contract the obligation arises not from consent, as in the case of contracts, but from the law or natural equity. The term was not found in the common law, but it has been taken by writers of the common law from the Roman law and may be considered now as quite domesticated even to the extent of being used as the title of a very valuable common-law text book; Keener, Quasi-Contract. The subject will be found treated in a sub-title of CONTRACT, supra. See also CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION.

It need only be added here that quasi-contracts were in the Roman law of almost infinite variety but were divided into five classes:—1. Negotiorum gestio, the management of the affairs of another, without authority. 2. Tutela administratio, the administration of a tutorship. 3. Rei communis administratio, or communio bonorum, the management of common property. 4. Hereditatis aditio, the entering upon an inheritance. 5. Indebitum Solutio, payment by mistake of money not due. They all have certain general features, as that from their nature each has an affinity with some contract; and persons under disabilities may be affected by them though incapable of contracting. A common error which needs to be avoided is the confusion of quasi-contracts with implied contracts. The latter are real contracts, differing from express contracts in the nature of the proof by which they are established, but in quasi-contracts the essential part of the contract, the agreement or convention, is wanting; Maine, Anc. L. 332. See, generally, Inst. 3. 28; Dig. 3. 5; Ayl. Pand. b. 4, tit. 31; 1 Bro. Civ. L. 386; Ersk. Inst. 3. 3. 16; Pard. n. 192; Poth. Obl. n. 118; Morl. Rép. h. t.; Keener, Quasi-Contract; Howe, Stud. Civ. L. Lect. x.; Morey, Rom. Law 371; Sohm, Inst. Rom. Law 315-21.

QUASI-CONTRACTS. See UNJUST ENRICHMENT.

QUASI-CONTRACTUAL OBLIGATION. See OBLIGATION.

QUASI-CORPORATIONS. A term applied to those bodies or municipal societies which, though not vested with the general powers of corporations, are yet recognized, by statutes or immemorial usage, as persons or aggregate corporations, with precise duties which may be enforced, and privileges which may be maintained by suits at law. They may be considered quasi-corporations, with limited powers, co-extensive with the duties imposed upon them by statute or usage, but restrained from a general use of the authority which belongs to those metaphysical persons by the common law. See 13 Mass. 192; L. R. 1 H. L. 298; Boone, Corp. § 10.

Among quasi-corporations may be ranked counties, and also towns, townships, parishes, hundreds, and other political divisions of counties, which are established without an express charter of incorporation; commissioners of a county, most of the commissions instituted for public use, supervisors of highways, overseers, or guardians of the poor, loan officers of a county, trustees of a school fund, trustees of the poor, school districts, trustees of schools, judges of a court authorized to take bonds to themselves in their official capacity, and the like, who are invested with corporate powers sub modo and for a few specified purposes only. The governor of a state has been held a quasi-corporation sole; 8 Humph. 176; so has a trustee of a friendly society in whom, by statute, property is vested, and by and against whom suits may be brought; see 1 B. & Ald. 157: so of a levee district organized by statute to reclaim land from overflow; 51 Cal. 406; and fire departments having by statute certain powers and duties which necessarily invest them with a limited capacity to sue and be sued; 1 Sweeney 224. It may be laid down as a general rule that where a body is created by statute possessing powers and duties which involve incidentally a qualified capacity to sue and be sued, such body is to be considered a quasi-corporation; id.; 51 Cal. 406. See, generally, Ang. & A. Corp. § 94; 13 Am. Dec. 524; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 71, n. 1003; but not such a body as the general assembly of the Presbyterian church, which has not the capacity to sue and be sued; 4 Whart. 531; Ang. & A. Corp. § 24. See CORPORATION; MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

QUASI-CRIMES. Offences for which some person other than the actual perpetrator is responsible, the perpetrator being presumed to act by command of the responsible party.

Injuries which have been unintentionally caused. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

All offences not crimes or misdemeanors, but which are in the nature of crimes; a class of offences against the public which have not been declared crimes, but wrongs against the general or local public which it is proper should be repressed or punished by forfeitures and penalties. 68 Ill. 375. See 29 Minn. 132.

QUASI-DELICT. In Civil Law. An act whereby a person, without malice, but by fault, negligence, or imprudence not legally excusable, causes injury to another.

A quasi-delict may be public or private; the neglect of the affairs of a community, when it is our duty to attend to them, may be a crime; the neglect of a private matter, under similar circumstances, may be the ground of a civil action. Bowyer, Mod. Civ. Law, c. 43, p. 265.

QUASI-DEPOSIT. A kind of involuntary bailment, which takes place where a person acquires possession of property lawfully, by finding. Story, Bailm. § 86. See DEPOSIT.

QUASI-DERELICT. The condition of a vessel which is not abandoned, but those on board of which are physically incapable of doing anything for their safety. 1 Newb. Adm. 452.

QUASI-ENTAIL. An estate pur autre vie, to a man and the heirs of his body.

The interest so granted is not properly an estate tail, but so far in the nature of one that it will go to the heir of the body as special occupant during the life of the cestui que vie in the same manner as an estate of inheritance would descend, if limited to the grantee and the heirs of his body.

QUASI-FEE. An estate gained by wrong.

QUASI-OFFENCES. See QUASI-CRIMES.

QUASI-PARTNERS. Partners of lands, goods, or chattels, who are not actual partners, are sometimes so called. Potliuer, de Société App. n. 184. See PART-OWNERS.

QUASI-PERSONALTY. Things immovable in point of law; though fixed to things real either actually or fictionally.

QUASI-POSTHUMOUS CHILD. In Civil Law. One who, born during the life of his grandfather or other male ascendant, was not his heir at the time he made his testament, but who by the death of his father became his heir in his lifetime. Inst. 2. 13. 2; Dig. 28. 3. 13.

QUASI-PUBLIC CORPORATION.

Quasi-public corporations are also styled public-service corporations. It is legally and technically a private corporation. The qualification of public is given because of its character or because its purpose is the accomplishment of some public enterprise in which the public interests are directly involved or public use and convenience are contemplated. "A quasi-public corporation is one constituted of private persons to engage in a business, public in its nature, and where it must serve all who apply. It is therefore granted the power to acquire, under the exercise of the power of eminent domain, lands, rights of way, and other property essential to the performance of its public duties." 3 Purdy's Beach Priv.

Corp., § 1032. Another law writer has given this definition: "Some private corporations are organized for a purpose which is of a public nature, or rather for a purpose which renders them particularly beneficial, if not necessary, to the public; they are for this reason called quasi-public corporations; and, because of their quasi-public nature, they are sometimes given rights and privileges that are not accorded to other corporations—as the right of eminent domain. 63 Me. 269, et al. 1 Thomp. Corp. 2nd ed., 32.

See CORPORATION.

QUASI-PURCHASE. This term is used in the civil law to denote that a thing is to be considered as purchased from the presumed consent of the owner of a thing; as, if a man should consume a cheese, which is in his possession and belonging to another, with an intent to pay the price of it to the owner, the consent of the latter will be presumed, as the cheese would have been spoiled by keeping it longer. Wolff, Dr. de la Nat. § 691.

QUASI-REALTY. Things which are fixed in contemplation of law to realty, but movable in themselves, as heirlooms (or limbs of the inheritance), title deeds, court rolls, etc. Whart. Law Lex.

QUASI-TRADITIO (Lat.). In Civil Law. A term used to designate that a person is in the use of the property of another, which the latter suffers and does not oppose. Lec. Elem. § 396. It also signifies the act by which the right of property is ceded in a thing to a person who is in possession of it; as, if I loan a boat to Paul, and deliver it to him, and afterwards I sell him the boat, it is not requisite that he should deliver the boat to me to be again delivered to him: there is a quasi-tradition or delivery.

QUATUORVIRI (Lat. four men). In Roman Law. Magistrates who had the care and inspection of roads. Dig. 1. 2. 3. 30.

QUAY. A wharf at which to load or land goods. (Sometimes spelled key.)

In its enlarged sense the word quay means the whole space between the first row of houses of a city, and the sea or river; 5 La. 153, 215. So much of the quay as is requisite for the public use of loading and unloading vessels is public property, and cannot be appropriated to private use, but the rest may be private property.

A public quay in a city, dedicated to public use, does not cease to be locus publicus and become private property because it is leased by the public authorities for a purpose subservient to the public use; 140 U. S. 654. See KEY OR QUAY.

QUE DONERA? (L. Fr.). To whom will he give? To whom is the gift to be made?

QUE EST MESME (L. Fr.). Which is the same. See QUE EST EADEM.

QUE ESTATE (quem statum, or which estate). A plea by which a man prescribes in himself those whose estate he holds. 2 Bla. Com. 270; 18 Vin. Abr. 133-140; Co. Litt. 121 a.

QUEAN. A worthless woman; a strumpet. The meaning of this word, which is now seldom used, is said not to be well ascertained. 2 Rolle, Abr. 296; Bacon, Abr. Slander (U 3).

QUEEN. A woman who is sovereign of a kingdom. The wife of a king.

This may be either:—a Queen Regnant (as in the case of Queen Victoria), who is for every purpose the same as the King; a Queen Consort (or wife of a reigning King), who has no political power whatever; and a Queen Dowager (or widow of a deceased King), who likewise has no political position.

A Queen Consort was anciently entitled to Queen Gold. Her person and her chastity are specially protected by the Treason Act 1351. She is not subject to, in the words of Coke, "any toll fine or americiament."

She is entitled to appoint her own attorney-general and solicitor-general; but this privilege has not been exercised since the death of Queen Victoria resulted in there being again a Queen Consort.

A Queen Dowager retains her rank in the event of her re-marriage. It is said that she retains most of the privileges of a Queen Consort. Byrne.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY. By stat. 2 Anne, c. 11, all the revenue of first-fruits and tenths was vested in trustees forever, to form a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings. 1 Bla. Com. 286; 2 Burn, Eccl. Law 260-268.

QUEEN CONSORT. The wife of a reigning king. 1 Bla. Com. 218. She is looked upon by the law as a feme sole, as to her power of contracting, suing, etc. Id.

QUEEN DOWAGER. The widow of a king. She has most of the privileges belonging to a queen consort. 1 Bla. Com. 229.

QUEEN-GOLD. A royal revenue belonging to every queen consort during her marriage with the king, and due from every person who has made a voluntary fine or offer to the king of ten marks or upwards, in consideration of any grant or privilege conferred by the crown. It is due of record on the recording of the fine. It was last exacted in the reign of Charles I. It is now quite obsolete. 1 Bla. Com. 220-222; Fortescue, de Laud. 398.

QUEEN REGNANT. She who holds the crown in her own right. She has the same duties and prerogatives, etc., as a king. Stat. 1 Car. I. st. 3, c. 1; 1 Bla. Com. 218; 1 Woodd. Lect. 94.

QUEEN'S ADVOCATE. See ADVOCATE.

QUEEN'S BENCH. See BANCUS REGINAE.

QUEEN'S COUNSEL. Barristers appointed as counsel to the crown on the nomination of the lord chancellor, taking precedence over ordinary barristers, and having the privilege of wearing a silk gown as their professional robe. See [1898] App. Cas. 253.

The two principal of these counsel are called the attorney and solicitor general; and none of these counsel can plead publicly in court for a prisoner or a defendant in a criminal prosecution, without a license obtained for that purpose from the crown. Abbott; Brown.

Queen's counsel is a name given to barristers and sergeants appointed by letters-patent to be her majesty's counsel learned in the law. Their selection and removal rests in practice with the lord chancellor. Id.; 3 Steph. Com. 273. A queen's counsel has various privileges. He is generally made a bencher of his inn. He may not, except by license from the crown, take a brief against the crown in any civil or criminal case; but such license will generally be given on payment of the usual fee. A queen's counsel, in taking that rank renounces the preparation of written pleadings, and other chamber practice. Id.; M. & W.

QUEEN'S ENEMIES. A phrase used in bills of lading importing a limitation upon the liability of the ship owner under the contract therein contained.

It includes the enemies of the sovereign of the carrier; 34 L. J. C. P. 14. It does not include the acts of an armed band of depredators; 1 Term 27; or a seizure of goods by a foreign revenue official for a breach of revenue laws; 10 Q. B. 517. It is less extensive in its scope than Restraint of Rulers and Princes (q. v.). See PUBLIC ENEMY.

QUEEN'S PROCTOR. A proctor or solicitor representing the crown in the former practice of the courts of probate and divorce. Moz. & W. Law Dict.

His function, in a proper case, is to intervene in order to prevent a decree nisi from being made absolute; and he may do this either quid Queen's (or King's) Proctor on the ground of collusion or quid member of the public if the decree was obtained as the result of the suppression of material facts. Byrne.

QUERELA (Lat.). An action preferred in any court of justice. The plaintiff was called querens, or complainant, and his brief, complaint, or declaration was called querela. Jacob, Law Diet.

QUERELA CORAM REGE ET CONCILIO DISCUTIENDA ET TERMINANDA. A writ by which one was called to justify a complaint of a trespass made to the king himself, before the king and his council. Reg. Orig. 124.

QUERELA INOFFICIOSI TESTAMENTI (Lat. complaint of an undutiful or unkind will). In Civil Law. A species of action allowed to a child who had been unjustly disinherited, to set aside the will, founded on the presumption of law, in such cases, that the parent was not in his right mind. Calvinus, Lex.; 2 Kent 327; Bell, Dict.

QUERENS (Lat.). A plaintiff; the plaintiff or complaining party.

QUESTION. Something in controversy or which may be the subject of controversy. 39 Mich. 45.

A means sometimes employed, in some countries, by torture, to compel supposed great criminals to disclose their accomplices or to acknowledge their crimes.

This torture is called question because, as the unfortunate person accused is made to suffer pain, he is asked questions as to his supposed crime or accomplices. This is unknown in the United States. See Pothier, Procédure Criminelle, sect. 5, art. 2, § 3.

In Evidence. An interrogation put to a witness, requesting him to declare the truth of certain facts as far as he knows them.

Questions are either general or leading. By a general question is meant such a one as requires the witness to state all he knows, without any suggestion being made to him: as, Who gave the blow?

A leading question is one which leads the mind of the witness to the answer, or suggests it to him: as, Did A B give the blow?

The Romans called a question by which the fact or supposed fact which the interrogator expected or wished to find asserted in and by the answer was made known to the proposed respondent, a suggestive interrogation: as, Is not your name A B? See LEADING QUESTION.

In Practice. A point on which the parties are not agreed, and which is submitted to the decision of a judge and jury.

When the doubt or difference arises as to what the law is on a certain state of facts, this is said to be a legal question; and when the party demurs, this is to be decided by the court; when it arises as to the truth or falsehood of facts, this is a question of fact, and is to be decided by the jury. See JURY.

Proof beyond reasonable question is held synonymous with proof beyond reasonable doubt; 103 N. C. 1.

See HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION; CERTIFIED QUESTION.

QUESTORES CLASSICI (Lat.). In Roman Law. Officers entrusted with the care of the public money.

Their duties consisted in making the necessary payments from the æarium, and receiving the public revenues. Of both they had to keep correct accounts in their tabulæ publicæ. Demands which any one might have on the æarium, and outstanding debts were likewise registered by them. Fines to be paid to the public treasury were registered and exacted by them. They were likewise to provide proper accommodations for foreign ambassadors and such person as were connected with the republic by ties of public hospitality. Lastly, they were charged with the care of the burials and monuments of distinguished men, the expenses for which had been decreed by the senate to be paid by the treasury. Their number at first was confined to two; but this was afterwards increased as the empire became extended. There were questors of cities and of provinces, and questors of the army; the latter were in fact paymasters.

QUESTORES PARRICIDII (Lat.). In Roman Law. Public accusers, two in number, who conducted the accusation of persons guilty of murder or any other capital offence, and carried the sentence into execution. They ceased to be appointed at an early period. Smith, Dict. Gr. & Rom. Antiq.

QUESTUS EST NOBIS. A writ of nuisance, which, by 15 Edw. I., lay against him to whom a house or other thing that caused a nuisance descended or was alienated; whereas, before that statute the action lay only against him who first levied or caused the nuisance to the damage of his neighbor. Cowel.

QUI IMPROVIDE. A supersedeas granted where a writ was erroneously sued out or miswaded.

QUI SUNT EJUSDEM POTES-TATIS. One having the same power with another. Burrill. See COLLEGA.

QUI TAM (Lat. who as well). An action under a statute which imposes a penalty for the doing or not doing an act, and gives that penalty in part to whomsoever will sue for the same, and the other part to the commonwealth, or some charitable, literary, or other institution, and makes it recoverable by action. The plaintiff describes himself as suing as well for the commonwealth, for example, as for himself. Espinasse, Pen. Act 5, 6; 1 Viner, Abr. 197; 1 Salk. 129, n.; Bac. Abr.

QUIA (Lat.). In Pleading. Because. This word is considered a term of affirmation. It is sufficiently direct and positive for introducing a material averment. 1 Saund. 117, n. 4; Com. Dig. Pleader (C77).

QUIA DATUM EST NOBIS INTELLIGI (L. Lat.). Because it is given to us to understand.

QUIA DOMINUS REMISIT CURIAM (L. Lat.). In old practice. Because the lord hath remised or remitted his court.

QUIA EMPTORES (Lat.). A name sometimes given to the English Statute of Westminster 3, 18 Edw. I. c. 1, which prohibited sub-infeudation; so called from its initial words. 2 Bla. Com. 91. See MANOR; SUB-INFEUDATION; TENURE.

QUIA ERRONICE EMANAVIT (L. Lat.). Because it issued erroneously, or through mistake.

QUIA TIMET (Lat. because he fears). A term applied to preventive or anticipatory remedies. According to Lord Coke, "there be six writs of law that may be maintained quia timet, before any molestation, distress, or impleading: as, First, a man may have his writ or mesne before he be distrained. Second, a warrantia chartæ, before he be impleaded. Third, a monstraverunt, before any distress or vexation. Fourth, an audita querela, before any execution sued. Fifth, a curia claudenda, before any default of enclosure. Sixth, a ne injuste vexes, before any distress or molestation. And these are called brevia anticipantia, writs of prevention." Co. Litt. 100. And see 7 Bro. P. C. 125.

These writs are generally obsolete. In chancery, when it is contemplated to prevent an expected injury, a bill quia timet is filed. See BILL QUIA TIMET.

QUIBBLE. A slight difficulty raised without necessity or propriety; a cavil. No justly eminent member of the bar will resort to a quibble in his argument. It is contrary to his oath, which is to be true to the court as well as to the client; and bad policy, because by resorting to it he will lose his character as a man of probity.

QUICK ASSETS. "Quick Assets" are defined as: (1) Cash and cash items; (2) Unpledged good accounts receivable, and short time bills and notes and acceptances having not more than six months to run, received in the ordinary course of business for goods sold; (3) Merchandise or products manufactured or in process of manufacture, production or preparation, and raw materials, and (4) Such other items as are generally regarded as working capital or quick assets, by corporations or associations conducting a business similar to that of the Trustees or Controlled Companies, including therein stocks or securities which have a determined, available and realizable market value. Sears' Trust Estates as Business Companies, 672.

QUICK DESPATCH. A steamer chartered to be discharged with customary "quick despatch" arrived in port, March 8th, was ordered to berth March 10th, and began to discharge March 11th at one o'clock, and completed March 20th at noon; discharged by "sticks" instead of platform scales, and from but one hatch, while there were four to be discharged from. It was held that this was not "customary quick despatch"; 28 U. S. App. 383. See DEMURRAGE; LAY DAYS.

QUICK WITH CHILD. See QUICKENING.

QUICKENING. In Medical Jurisprudence. The sensation a mother has of the motion of the child she has conceived.

The period when quickening is first experienced varies from the tenth to the twenty-fifth, but is usually about the sixteenth week from conception; Denman, Midw. 129.

It was formerly supposed that either the child was not alive until the time of quickening, or that it had acquired some new kind of existence that it did not possess before; hence the presumption of law that dates the life of the child from that time.

The child is, in truth, alive from the first moment of conception, and, according to its age and state of development, has different modes of manifesting its life, and, during a portion of the period of gestation, by its motion. By the growth of the embryo, the womb is enlarged until it becomes of too great a size to be contained in the pelvis, it then rises to the abdomen, when the motion of the fetus is for the first time felt.

Quickening as indicating a distinct point in the existence of the fetus has no foundation in physiology; for it arises merely from the relation which the organs of gestation bear to the parts that surround them; it may take place early or late, according to the condition of these different parts, but not from any inherent vitality for the first time manifested by the fetus.

As life, by law, is said to commence when a woman first becomes quick with child, so procuring an abortion after that period is a misdemeanor. Before this time, formerly the law did not interfere to prevent a pregnant woman convicted of a capital offence from being executed; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 413. If, however, the humanity of the law of the present day would not allow a woman to be executed who is, as Blackstone terms it, præsent eniente, Com. 129, i. e. pregnant, although not quick, it would be but carrying out the same desire to interfere with long-established rules, to hold that the penalty for procuring abortion should also extend to the whole period of pregnancy.

"Quick with child is having conceived; 49 N. Y. 86; with quick child is where the child has quickened." 8 C. & P. 265; approved in 1 Leg. Gaz. Rep. (Pa.) 183; 2 Whar. & St. Med. Jur., 4th ed. III. § 7. See 26 Am. Dec. 60, n.; 2 Zab. 52.

QUID JURIS CLIMAT. A judicial writ issued out of the record of a fine which lay for the grantee of a reversion or remainder, when the particular tenant would not attain. Cowel.

QUID PRO QUO (Lat. what for what). A term denoting the consideration of a contract. See Co. Litt. 47 b; 7 M. & G. 908.

QUIDAM (Lat. some one; somebody). In French Law. A term used to express an unknown person, or one who cannot be named.

A quidam is usually described by the features of his face, the color of his hair, his height, his clothing, and the like, in any process which may be issued against him. Merlin. Repet.

QUIET ENJOYMENT. The name of a covenant in a lease, by which the lessor agrees that the lessee shall peaceably enjoy the premises leased. This covenant goes to the possession, and not to the title; 3 Johns. 471; 5 id. 120; 3 Dev. 398; 3 id. 200. A covenant for quiet enjoyment does not extend as far as a covenant of warranty; 1 Aik. 333.

The covenant for quiet enjoyment is broken only by an entry, or lawful expulsion from, or some actual disturbance in, the possession; 3 Johns. 471; 8 id. 198; 15 id. 483; 7 Wend. 281; 2 Hill N. Y. 105; Ham. Cov. 37; 9 Metc. 63; 4 Whart. 86; 4 Cow. 340. But the tortious entry of the covenantor, without title, is a breach of the covenant for quiet enjoyment; 7 Johns. 376. The covenant for quiet possession in a deed merges all previous representatives as to the possession, and limits the liability growing out of them; 130 U. S. 643.

See COVENANT FOR QUIET ENJOYMENT.

QUIET TITLE. See BILL TO QUIET POSSESSION AND TITLE.

QUIETUS (Lat. freed or acquitted). In English Law. A discharge; an acquittance.

An instrument by the clerk of the pipe and auditors in the exchequer, as proof of their acquittance or discharge of accounts. Cowel.

Discharge of a judge or attorney-general. 3 Mod. *99.

In American Law. The discharge of an executor by the probate court. 4 Mas. 131.

QUINTO EXACTUS (Lat.). In Old English Law. The fifth call or last requisition of a defendant sued to outlawry.

QUIRITARIAN OWNERSHIP. In old Roman law, strict legal or technical ownership as distinguished from mere equitable or bonitarian ownership (q. v.); known as dominium ex jure quiritium. Hunter's Rom. L. (2nd ed.) 118, 262-5.

QUIT-CLAIM. In Conveyancing. A form of deed of the nature of a release containing words of grant as well as release. 3 Washb. R. P., 5th ed. 606.

The term is in constant and general use in American law to denote a deed substantially the same as a release in English law. It presupposes a previous or precedent conveyance or a subsisting estate and possession; Thornt. Conv. 44. It is a conveyance at common law, but differs from a release in that it is regarded as an original conveyance in American law, at least in some states; 6 Pick. 499; 3 Conn. 398; 9 Ohio 96; 5 Ill. 117; Me. Rev. Stat. c. 73, § 14; Miss. Code 1857, p. 309, art. 17. The operative words are remise, release, and forever quit-claim; Thornt. Conv. 44. Covenants of warranty against incumbrances by the grantor are usually added. See a full article in 12 Cent. L. J. 127; 34 id. 174.

The rule that a purchaser by a quit-claim deed is not to be regarded as a bona fide purchaser without notice of a prior incumbrance; 85 Ala. 80; 89 Tex. 214; has no application where the registry laws require the recording of such an incumbrance in order to make it a lien on lands in the hands of a subsequent purchaser; 47 Fed. Rep. 420. One accepting a quit-claim deed from his grantor is bound, at his peril, to ascertain what equities, if any, exist against his title; 85 Neb. 261; but the receipt of the quit-claim deed does not of itself prevent the grantee from showing that he is a bona fide purchaser; 148 U. S. 21, 31, 49; and the grantee under such deed may be a bona fide purchaser under the recording acts; 140 Ind. 77.

A quit-claim deed conveys only the interest of the grantor at the time of the conveyance; 39 Neb. 741; but such a deed is as effectual to divest and transfer a complete title as any other form of conveyance; 148 U. S. 21. Such a deed from a judgment debtor of land, sold under execution, passes merely the right of redemption and does not relieve the land of dower of the debtor's wife, though she did not reside in the state when the deed was executed; 19 Mont. 23. A title acquired subsequently to the execution of a quit-claim, with special warranty simply, does not enure to the grantee, and a subsequent purchaser from the grantor is not affected by the recording of the deed executed before the grantor acquired the title; 90 Me. 457.

Under a Massachusetts statute, a quit-claim deed takes precedence over a prior deed, recorded subsequently to the quit-claim, where the grantee in the latter is without notice of the other; 167 Mass. 443. A quit-claim deed, duly recorded, is held to be within the protection of a statute providing that deeds shall take effect only on delivery for record; 49 Neb. 187, where will be found much learning on the subject of these deeds.

QUIT-RENT. A rent paid by the tenant of the freehold, by which he goes quit and free,—that is, discharged from any other rent. 2 Bla. Com. 42.

In England, quit-rents were rents reserved to the king or a proprietor, on an absolute grant of waste land, for which a price in gross was at first paid, and a mere nominal rent reserved as a feudal acknowledgment of tenure. Inasmuch as no rent of this description can exist in the United States, when a quit-rent is spoken of some other interest must be intended. 5 Call 864. A perpetual rent reserved on a conveyance in fee-simple is sometimes known by the name of quit-rent in Massachusetts. See GROUND-RENT; RENT.

QUO ANIMO (Lat. with what intention). The intent; the mind with which a thing has been done: as, the quo animo with which the words were spoken may be shown by the proof of conversations of the defendant relating to the original defamation. 19 Wend. 296.

QUO JURE, WRIT OF. In English Law. The name of writ commanding the defendant to show by what right he demands common of pasture in the land of the complainant who claims to have a fee in the same. Fitzh. N. B. 299.

QUO MINUS (Lat.). The name of a writ. In England, when the king's debtor is sued in the court of the exchequer, he may sue out a writ of quo minus, in which he suggests that he is the king's debtor, and that the defendant has done him the injury or damage complained of, quo minus sufficiens existit, by which he is less able to pay the king's debt. This was originally requisite in order to give jurisdiction to the court of exchequer; but now this suggestion is a mere form. 3 Bla. Com. 46.

QUO WARRANTO (Lat. by what authority). In Practice. The name of a writ (and also of the whole pleading) by which the government commences an action to recover an office or franchise from the person or corporation in possession of it.

The writ commands the sheriff to summon the defendant to appear before the court to which it is returnable, to show (quo warranto) by what authority he claims the office or franchise. It is a writ of right, a civil remedy to try the mere right to the franchise or office, where the person in possession never had a right to it or has forfeited it by neglect or abuse; 8 Bla. Com. 262, 263.

The action of quo warranto was prescribed by the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I., and is a limitation upon the royal prerogative. Before this statute, the king, by virtue of his prerogative, sent commissions over the kingdom to inquire into the right to all franchises, quo jure quove nomine illi retinent, etc.; and, as they were grants from the crown, if those in possession of them could not show a charter, the franchises were seized into the king's hands without any judicial proceeding. Like all other original civil writs, the writ of quo warranto issued out of chancery, and was returnable alternatively before the king's bench or justices in eyre; Co. 2d Inst. 277, 494; 2 Term 549.

The writ of quo warranto has given place to an information in the nature of quo warranto. This, though in form a criminal; see 14 Fla. 256; is in substance a civil proceeding, to try the mere right to the franchise or office; 3 Bla. Com. 263; 1 S. & R. 382; Ang. & A. Corp. 469; 2 Kent 312; 3 Term 199; 23 Wend. 537, 591; but see 13 Ill. 60. Leave to file an information in the nature of quo warranto rests in the sound discretion of the court, and, without strong grounds for questioning defendant's title to the office, the court will refuse to grant it; 6 Houst. 487. A constitutional provision that the right of trial by jury shall remain inviolate, does not guarantee the right of trial by jury in quo warranto proceedings; 16 Wash. St. 382.

If the proceedings refer to the usurpation of the franchises of a municipal corporation, the right to file the information is in the state, at the discretion of the attorney-general; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 1613; 14 Fla. 256; see 59 Miss. 453; 126 Mass. 300; 81 N. C. 298; 49 N. J. L. 515; not of citizens; 42; see 20 Pa. 518; 51 N. J. L. 180. Individuals cannot take proceedings to dissolve a corporation; 16 S. & R. 144; but in regard to the election of a corporate officer the writ may issue at the suit of the attorney-general or of any person interested—1 Zab. 9; 20 Pa. 415; but a private citizen must have some interest; 50 Mo. 97. See 80 Ill. 496; 46 Conn. 479. In Pennsylvania it was held that a stockholder, whose votes were wrongly rejected at a corporate election, was the proper party to institute proceedings of quo warranto against the officers who claimed to have been elected, though the petitioner was at the same time elected to an office and his title was in dispute; 168 Pa. 582. The attorney-general may act without leave of court; 83 Pa. 105; 38 N. J. L. 282; 12 Fla. 190; but a private relator may not; 15 S. & R. 127; s. c. 16 Am. Dec. 531; and the court will use its discretion in granting the writ; 70 Ill. 25; 2 Johns. 184. Leave is granted on a petition or motion with affidavits, upon which a rule to show cause is granted; 70 Ill. 25. The writ lies against the corporate body, if it is to restrain a usurpation; 50 Mo. 56; or enforce a forfeiture; 57 N. H. 498; but if it is to inquire whether a corporation has been legally organized, the writ lies against the individuals; 15 Wend. 113; s. c. 30 Am. Dec. 34. Whether a corporation de facto is also one de jure can be determined only in quo warranto; 125 Ill. 664.

In New York a statutory action in the nature of a quo warranto has been substituted. Code Civ. Proc. § 1983. This is a civil writ of legal, not equitable, cognizance; 52 N. Y. 576. So in other states it is subject to the rules strictly applicable to civil proceedings; 50 Ala. 568; 44 Mo. 154; Boone, Corp. § 161. The terms "quo warranto" and "information in the nature of a quo warranto" are synonymous; 34 Wisc. 197; contra, 25 Mo. 555; 26 Ark. 281.

Although quo warranto proceedings will lie against a municipal corporation in this country, yet they are seldom employed. See a case in 32 Vt. 50; and see 66 Mo. 329; 30 Ala. 66. They will lie against members of a city council; 70 Pa. 465; 80 N. Y. 117; 23 Neb. 885; contra, 47 Cal. 624; 20 Kans. 692; a county treasurer; 15 Ill. 517; district school trustees; 84 Ill. 162; a sheriff; 5 Mich. 146; 83 Pa. 105; a lieutenant-governor; 12 Fla. 265; a governor; 4 Wisc.

567; a judge of probate; 77 N. C. 18; a mayor; 55 N. Y. 525; an elector of president of the United States, proceedings being taken in the name of the United States; 68 C. 400; a major-general of militia; 5 R. L. 1; so of other militia officers; 26 Pa. 81; 2 Green, Law 84; but see 1 Rich. 42; superintendent of the poor; 73 Mich. 234; but not against a policeman; 84 Mich. 223. There must first be a user of the office; 83 Ill. 128; 5 T. R. 85; but taking the oath; id.; or exercising its functions without taking the oath; 62 Miss. 663; is enough.

Quo warranto lies against a corporation to determine whether there has been a misuser or a nonuser of corporate franchises, or whether the corporation has usurped franchises never granted to it; but does not lie to test the legality of any act of the corporation; 87 Mo. App. 496.

Quo warranto is the only direct and adequate remedy for trying title to public office; 58 N. J. L. 340. The review of an election to public office by certiorari may determine collateral questions respecting validity of laws or ordinances, but can have no effect as a bar in a subsequent information in the nature of a quo warranto; id. 325.

The validity of proceedings for the election of a minor officer such as janitor of a court-house, may be reviewed on certiorari; id. 819.

An incumbent cannot proceed in quo warranto against one not in possession of the office, he must await the attack of his adversary; id. 325.

Pleadings in quo warranto are anomalous. In ordinary legal proceedings, the plaintiff, whether he be the state or a person, is bound to show a case against the defendant. But in an information of quo warranto, as well as in the writ for which it is substituted, the order is reversed. The state is not bound to show anything, but the defendant is bound to show that he has a right to the franchise or office in question; and if he fail to show authority, judgment must be given against him; 4 Burr. 2146, 2127; Ang. & A. Corp. 636. To the writ of quo warranto the defendant simply pleaded his charter, which was a full answer to the writ; just as before the statute of Edward I. the production of the charter to the king's commissioners was full authority for the possession of the franchise or office. But to an information of quo warranto the plea of the defendant consists of his charter, with an abque hoc denying that he usurped the franchise, and concludes with a verification. The plea is in form a special traverse, but in substance it is not such. The information was originally a criminal proceeding, to punish the usurpation of the franchise by a fine, as well as to seize the franchise; therefore the information charged usurpation, and the defendant was compelled to deny the usurpation, as well as to show his charter, which he did in the form of an abque hoc to his plea. But when the proceeding ceased to be criminal, and like the writ of quo warranto, was applied to the mere purpose of trying the civil right to the franchise, the abque hoc denying the usurpation became immaterial, though it is still retained in the forms; 2 Jacob, Law Dict. 374; 4 Cow. 106, note. In Coke's Entries 351, there is a plea to an information of quo warranto without the abque hoc. The abque hoc, being immaterial, should not be answered by the replication, as it must always be in a special traverse; but the charter, in the first part of the plea, though occupying the place of an inducement, must be denied by the replication, its existence and character being the sole question in controversy upon which the legality of the acts of the corporation turns; Gilb. Ev. 6, 145; 10 Mod. 111, 296.

Until the statute 32 Geo. III. c. 58, the defendant could not plead double in an information of quo warranto to forfeit an office or franchise; 1 P. Wms. 220; 4 Burr. 2146, n.; 1 Chitty, Pl. 479; 5 Bac. Abr. 449; 4 Cow. 118; 2 Dutch. 215.

In information of quo warranto there are two forms of judgment. When it is against an officer or against individuals, the judgment is oustur; but when it is against a corporation by its corporate name, the judgment was oustur and seizure. In the first case, there being no franchise forfeited, there is none to seize; in the last case, there is; consequently the franchise is seized; 3 Kent 812, and note; 2 Term 321, 350. Now judgment is oustur and dissolution; 15 Wend. 113; s. c. 30 Am. Dec. 34; but there may be a judgment of oustur of a particular franchise; and not of the whole charter; 15 Wend. 118. See, as to the judgment, 82 Vt. 50; 4 Cow. 120. By such judgment of oustur and seizure the franchises are not destroyed, but exist in the hands of the state; but the corporation was destroyed, and ceased to be the owner or possessor of lands or goods, or rights or credits. The lands reverted to the grantor and his heirs, and the goods escheated to the state. But, later, it has been held that the judgment must be confined to seizure of the franchises; if it be extended to seizure of the property, so far it is erroneous; 1 Blackf. 287.

Quo warranto lies against a corporation to determine its right to exercise its franchises, but not to divest it of the ownership of property, unless acquired by a usurpation of the proprietary rights of the state; 33 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 1051. See SCIRE FACIAS; 30 Barb. 588.

The principle of forfeiture is that the franchise is a trust; and all the terms of the charter are conditions of the trust; and if any one of the conditions of the trust be violated, it will work a forfeiture of the charter. And the corporate powers must be construed strictly, and must be exercised in the manner and in the forms and by the agents prescribed in the charter; 2 Kent 298, 299; 1 Bla. Com. 485; 13 Viner, Abr. 511; 13 Pet. 587; 5 Wend. 211; 2 Term 546; 4 Gill & J. 121.

Cases of forfeiture may be divided into two great classes. Cases of perversion: as, where a corporation does an act inconsistent with the nature, and destructive of the ends and purposes, of the grant. In such cases, unless the perversion is such as to amount to an injury to the public who are interested in the franchise; 34 Pa. 283; it will not work a forfeiture. Cases of usurpation: as, where a corporation exercises a power which it has no right to exercise. In such cases the cause of forfeiture is not determined by any question of injury to the public, but the abuse which will work a forfeiture need not be of any particular measure or extent; 3 Term 216, 246; 23 Wend. 242; 34 Miss. 688; 21 Ill. 65. See 30 Ala. N. S. 68. In case of usurpation of an office or franchise by an individual, it must be of a public nature to be reached by this writ; 21 Ill. 65; 28 Vt. 504, 714; 9 Cush. 596.

In England corporations are the creatures of the crown, and on dissolution their franchises revert to the crown; and they may be re-granted by the crown either to the old, or to the new, or to the old and new, corporators; and such grant restores the old rights, even to sue on a bond given to the old corporation, and the corporation is restored to the full enjoyment of its ancient liberties; and if it were a corporation by prescription it would still be so; 2 Term 524, 543; 3 id. 241. In the United States, corporations are the creatures of the legislature, and on dissolution their franchises revert to the state; and the legislature can exercise the same powers by legislation over the franchises, and with the same effects, as the crown can in England; Ang. & A. Corp. 652 (subject, however, at the present time, to constitutional provision that corporations must be created by general acts; see GENERAL LAWS; STATUTES).

By the statute of Anne, c. 20, an information in the nature of quo warranto may by leave of court be applied to disputes between party and party about the right to a corporate office or franchise; 4 Zab. 529; 1 Dutch. 354; 82 Pa. 478; 83

Miss. 508; 7 Cal. 393, 432. See 75 Mich. 508. And the person at whose instance the proceeding is instituted is called the relator; 3 Bla. Com. 264. The court will not give leave to private informers to use the king's name and suit to call in question the validity of a franchise, when such persons apply under very unfavorable circumstances; 4 Burr. 2123. As to where the burden falls of showing the lawful or unlawful character of a franchise or right, see 28 Pa. 383; 5 Mich. 146; 100 Cal. 67. Where a proceeding to oust the incumbent of an office is prosecuted in the name of the party asserting title to such office, the burden of proof is on plaintiff; 93 Ky. 600; 58 N. W. Rep. (Mich.) 383. The information, it is said, may be filed after the expiration of the term of office; 2 Jones No. C. 124; but see High, Extr. Leg. Rem. § 633; Beach, Pub. Corp. § 35, n.

See High, Extr. Leg. Rem.; 30 Am. Dec. 33 and full note; Boone, Corp.; Ang. & A. Corp.

QUOAD (Lat.). As to; as far as concerns.

QUOAD HOC (Lat. as to this; with respect to this). A term frequently used to signify, as to the thing named, the law is so and so.

QUOAD SACRA (Lat.). As to sacred things; for religious purposes.

QUOD BILLA CASSETUR. See BILLA CASSETUR; CASSETUR BREVE.

QUOD CLERICI BENEFICIATI DE CANCELLARIA. A writ to exempt a clerk of the chancery from the contribution towards the proctors of the clergy in parliament, etc. Reg. Orig. 261.

QUOD COMPUTET (Lat. that he account). The name of an interlocutory judgment in an action of account-render; also the name of a decree in the case of creditors' bills against executors or administrators. Such a decree directs the master to take the accounts between the deceased and all his creditors, to cause the creditors, upon due and public notice, to come before him to prove their debts, at a certain place and within a limited period, and also directs the master to take an account of all personal estate of the deceased in the hands of the executor or administrator; Story, Eq. Jur., 13th ed. § 548. See JUDGMENT; ACCOUNT; CAPIAS AD COMPUTANDUM.

QUOD CUM (Lat.). In Pleading. For that whereas. A form of introducing matter of inducement in those actions in which introductory matter is allowed to explain the nature of the claim; as, assumption and case. Hardr. 1; 2 Show. 150.

This form is not allowable to introduce the matter which constitutes the gravamen of the charge, as such matter must be stated by positive averment, while quod cum introduces the matter which depends upon it by way of recital merely. Hence in those actions, as trespass vi et armis, in which the complaint is stated without matter of inducement, quod cum cannot be properly used; 2 Bulstr. 214. But its improper use is cured by verdict; 1 P. A. Browne 68; Comyns, Dig. Pleader (C 86).

QUOD CURIA CONCESSIT (L. Lat.). Which the court granted.

QUOD EI DEFORCEAT (Lat.). In English Law. The name of a writ given by stat. Westm. 1, 13 Edw. I. c. 4, to the owners of a particular estate, as for life, in dower, by the curtesy, or in fee-tail, who are barred of the right of possession by a recovery had against them through their default or non-appearance in a possessory action; by which the right was restored to him who had been thus unwarily de-forded by his own default. 3 Bla. Com. 193.

QUOD PERMITTAT (Lat.). In English Law. That he permit. The name of a writ which lies for the heir of him who is disseised of his common of pasture against the heir of the disseisor, he being dead. Termes de la Ley.

QUOD PERMITTAT PROSTER-NERE (Lat. that he give leave to demolish). In English Law. The name of a writ which commands the defendant to permit the plaintiff to abate the nuisance of which complaint is made, or otherwise to appear in court and to show cause why he will not. On proof of the facts, the plaintiff is entitled to have judgment to abate the nuisance and to recover damages. This proceeding, on account of its tediousness and expense, has given way to a special action on the case.

QUOD PERSONA NEC PREBENDARI. A writ which lay for spiritual persons, distrained in their spiritual possessions, for payment of a fifteenth with the rest of the parish. Fitz. Nat. Brev. 175.

QUOD PROSTRAVIT (Lat.). The name of a judgment upon an indictment for a nuisance, that the defendant abate such nuisance.

QUOD RECUPERET. See JUDGMENT QUOD RECUPERET.

QUOD SI CONTINGAT (L. Lat.). That if it happen. Words by which a condition might formerly be created in a deed.

QUORUM. Used substantively, quorum signifies the number of persons belonging to a legislative assembly, a corporation, society, or other body, required to transact business. A quorum is such a number of the officers or members of any body as is competent by law or constitution to transact business. 18 Col. 18. There is a difference between an act done by a definite number of persons, and one performed by an indefinite number; in the first case a majority is required to constitute a quorum, unless the law expressly directs that another number may make one; in the latter case any number who may be present may act, the majority of those present having, as in other cases, the right to act: 7 Cow. 402; 9 B. & C. 856; 34 Vt. 316; Beach, Pub. Corp. 485; 27 Miss. 517.

It has been said that there are two rules as to quorum in legislative bodies: one, where the quorum is fixed by the power creating the body, in which case a majority of the specified quorum may transact business; the other, where the quorum is not fixed by such power, in which case the general rule is that a quorum is a majority of all the members; 108 N. C. 678; Cush. Elect. § 247.

In England where the articles of a company provide that the business of a corporation shall be conducted by not less than a specified number of directors, the words are mandatory, and at least the specified number must join in the performance of any act; 16 Ch. D. 681.

In a private corporation a majority of the directors must be present to constitute a quorum, unless the charter, a valid by-law, or a usage provides a different number; 8 Thomps. Corp. § 3913; 23 N. H. 555; but when a quorum is present a majority may act; 92 Mo. 79. It is settled that those stockholders who attend a duly called stockholders' meeting may transact the business of that meeting although a majority in interest or number are not present; 1 Cook, St. & Stockh. § 607. Where a meeting is composed of an indefinite number of persons like stockholders, that is the rule; but where a definite number is involved, as directors, a majority must be present; 87 Pa. 42; 10 W. N. C. 85; 5 Blatch. 585.

Where articles of association did not prescribe the number of directors necessary for a quorum, it was held that the number who usually transacted the business constituted a quorum; L. R. 4 Eq. 233. A single shareholder was held not to constitute a meeting; 2 Q. B. Div. 26; at least two persons are necessary to make a corporate meeting; 46 L. J. 104. Where one stockholder, holding also proxies of the three remaining stockholders, held a meeting and voted and elected officers, the meeting was held invalid; W. N. [1877] 223. When an authority is confided to several persons for a private purpose, all must join in the act, unless otherwise authorized; 6 Johns. 38; 17 Abb. Pr. 201; otherwise if the trust is a continuous public duty; 17 Abb. Pr. 201. See AUTHORITY; MAJORITY; PLURALITY; MEETINGS; Cook, Stockholders. A majority of a board of directors is a quorum, and a majority of such quorum can act; 19 N. J. Eq. 402; so of a board of selectmen of a town; Maine Laws (1880) 225.

The rule of the lower house of congress, that the names of the members present who do not vote shall be noted and counted in determining the presence of a quorum to transact business, is a constitutional mode of ascertaining the presence of a quorum; 144 U. S. 1. In such case no quorum is present until such a number convene.

QUORUM, JUSTICES OF THE. Some justices were so-called because in certain cases it was necessary for one to have authority with him before he could act. English.

QUOT. In Scotch Law. The twentieth part of the movables, computed without computation of debts, was so called. Formerly the bishop was entitled, in all confirmations, to the quot of the testament. Erskine, Inst. 8. 9. 11.

QUOTA. That part which each one is to bear of some expense: as, his quota of this debt; that is, his proportion of such debt.

QUOTATION. In Practice. The allegation of some authority or case, or passage of some law, in support of a position which it is desired to establish.

The transcript of a part of a book or writing from a book or paper into another.

If the quotation is fair, and not so extensive as to extract the whole value or the most valuable part of an author, it will not be a violation of the copyright. It is mostly difficult to define what is a fair quotation. When the quotation is unfair, an injunction will lie to restrain the publication. See 17 Ves. 424; 1 Bell, Com. 121.

"That part of a work of one author found in another," observed Lord Ellenborough, "is not of itself piracy, or sufficient to support an action; a man may adopt part of the work of another; he may so make use of another's labors for the promotion of science and the benefit of the public." 1 Camp. 94. See Curtis, Copyr. 242; 3 Myl. & C. 737; 17 Ves. 422; 2 Stor. 100; 2 Beav. 6; ABRIDGMENT; COPYRIGHT; PIRACY.

QUOTATIONS OF PRICES ON AN EXCHANGE. Quotations of prices on an exchange, collected by the exchange, are property and entitled to the protection of the law, and the exchange has the right to keep them to itself or have them distributed under conditions established by it. 205 U. S. 322.

QUOTUPLEX (Lat.). Of how many kinds: of how many fold.

QUOUSQUE. A Latin adverb, which signifies how long, how far, until.

In old conveyances it is used as a word of limitation; 10 Co. 41.

In practice, it is the name of an execution which is to have force until the defendant shall do a certain thing. Of this kind is the capias ad satisfaciendum, by virtue of which the body of the defendant is taken into execution, and he is imprisoned until he shall satisfy the execution; 8 Bouvier, Inst. n. 8371.

QUOVIS MODO (Lat.). In whatever manner.

R. An abbreviation of Rex or Regina.

RACE. A main division of the human species, the members of which have several characteristics in common, and containing a number of groups variously composed by different ethnologists, such groups being again variously divided and subdivided; as, the Caucasian race; the Mongol race. Stand. Dict.

RACHATER (L. Fr.). To redeem; to repurchase (or buy back).

RACHETUM (Fr. racheter, to redeem). In Scotch Law. Ransom: corresponding to Saxon weregild, a pecuniary composition for an offence. Skene; Jacob, Law Dict.

RACING. The offering of prizes or purses of a definite sum by a racing association, to be awarded to the successful horses in a race, and to be paid out of the general funds of the association, made up in part of entrance fees paid by the owners of the competing horses, is not a violation of the constitutional provision against gambling. 6 Park. Cr. Rep. 256. See HORSE RACE.

RACK. An engine with which to torture a supposed criminal, in order to extort a confession of his supposed crime and the names of his supposed accomplices.

RACK RENT. In English Law. The full extended value of land left by lease, payable by a tenant for life or years. Wood, Inst. 192.

RADIUS. A straight line drawn from the centre of a circle to any point of the circumference. Its length is half the diameter of that circle, or is the space between the centre and the circumference. 40 La. Ann. 174.

An act prohibiting private markets within a radius of six squares of any public market was held to meet six squares measured on city streets; 41 La. Ann. 46.

A contract not to practise dentistry within a radius of ten miles was held a valid contract not to practise within ten miles of the centre point of the village; 47 Conn. 175.

RADOUR. In French Law. A term including the repairs made to a ship, and a fresh supply of furniture and victuals, munitions, and other provisions required for the voyage. Pardessus, n. 602.

RAFFLE. A kind of lottery. A raffle may be described as a species of "adventure or hazard," but has been held not to be a lottery. 2 Mills (S. C.) 128. See LOTTERY.

RAFT. See LOGS.

RAGMAN'S ROLL, or RAGIMUND'S ROLL. A roll, called from one Ragimund, or Ragimont, a legate in Scotland, who, summoning all the benefited clergymen in that kingdom, caused them on oath to give in the true value of their benefices, according to which they were afterwards taxed by the court of Rome. Whart. Law Lex.

RAILROAD. A road graded and having rails of iron or other material for the wheels of railroad cars to run upon.

In their modern form, railroads are usually owned by corporations; 2 Col. 673; 18 Pa. 187. But a private individual may construct and work a railroad if he can obtain a right of way by purchase; 70 Pa.

210; L. R. 4 H. L. 171; 30 Vt. 182.

Railroads were once regarded as public highways upon which private individuals might place their cars, to be drawn by the company; 12 Gray 180; 63 Pa. 18. A land grant conditioned that the road should be a public highway for the government, free of toll, applied only to the tracks; 93 U. S. 442.

Railroad and railway are ordinarily interchangeable terms; 138 Pa. 96; 30 Minn. 523; 88 Fed. Rep. 588; where a summons was against a railroad company and a judgment was entered against a railway, it was held immaterial; 89 Ind. 88; so in 83 Ala. 518. But in 60 Mo. 334, railway was held to mean the rails when laid, and railroad the highway in which the railway is laid.

A railroad and a street railway are distinct and different things; 2 Duv. 175. Whether "railroad" in a statute includes street railways depends upon the general intent of the act and the circumstances. Thus an act forbidding the obstruction of a railroad track applies to both; 74 Ga. 78; so does an act giving powers to railroad companies to enter into operating contracts; 24 Ill. 52; and an act authorizing the lease of one railroad to another; 89 Pa. 210; and an act giving a right of action against any railroad for death by negligence; 10 Bush 231; and an act relating to crossing the tracks of a railroad; 22 So. Rep. (Ala.) 279; but a constitutional clause forbidding the merger of competing railroads was held not to apply to street railways; 136 Pa. 96; and so of an act giving a mechanic's lien upon a "railroad or other structure;" 2 Wash. St. 115 (contra, 3 Mo. App. 559); and an early act (1857) giving a penal action against railroad companies for demanding fares in excess of the amount allowed by law; 4 Abb. Pr. N. S. 357; and an act giving a laborer's lien upon a railroad or other structure and the land upon which it is erected; 25 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 1084. A passenger railway in Fairmount Park, Philadelphia, where there are no streets, but only country roads, is not a street passenger railway within the constitution of the state which requires local consent for building such; 175 Pa. 33.

A railroad company is a quasi-public corporation and owes certain duties to the public; 27 U. S. App. 1. In 128 U. S. 182, it was said that a railroad company is a private corporation though its uses are public. In 169 U. S. 466, it was said that a railroad is a public highway and is created for public purposes.

The charter of a public railroad requires the grant of the supreme legislative authority of the state; 3 Engl. Railw. Cas. 85; 2 Railw. Cas. 177; 3 N. Y. 430. It is usually conferred upon a private corporation, but sometimes upon a public one, where the stock is owned and the company controlled by the state; Redf. Railw. 17; 1 Ohio St. 637; 21 Conn. 304; 10 Leigh 454; 4 Wheat. 668; 8 Watts 316. It is sometimes by special act, but now, more commonly, under general laws. A railroad may be chartered by act of congress; 1 Dill. 314. If created by two states, it is a corporation of each state; 31 Ohio St. 317. See MERGER. Such charter, when conferred upon a private company or a natural person, as may be, is, in the absence of constitutional or statutory provisions to the contrary, irrevocable, and only subject to general legislative control, the same as other persons natural or artificial; 4 Wheat. 668; 3 Kent 276; 27 Vt. 140. See IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

But a company must be held to have accepted its rights, etc., subject to the condition that the legislature may protect the people against the exaction of unreasonable charges for the services rendered by it, subject to the constitutional guarantee for the protection of its property; 169 U. S. 466.

An act requiring that all regular passenger trains shall stop at all railroad stations and county seats is unconstitutional when its effect is to compel a fast interstate mail train to turn aside from its direct route to a county seat three and a half miles away, the company having provided ample accommodations for travel from such county seat; 163 U. S. 143; otherwise, if applicable only to trains running within a state; 108 U. S. 427. An act requiring railroad companies where there is a telegraph office to note on a blackboard in each station whether trains are late, etc., and if so, how late, is constitutional; 41 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 937. See PUNCTUALITY.

A state statute which requires railroad companies to provide separate accommodations for white and colored persons and makes a passenger who insists upon occupying a coach other than the one set apart for his race, liable to a penalty, does not violate either the thirteenth or the fourteenth amendment; 163 U. S. 537, Harlan, J., dissenting.

Their charters are now usually subject to legislative control, either by virtue of a right reserved in the charter or in general laws subject to which they are organized. In either case legislation is binding upon the company. But where there is a right to repeal the charter for cause, it cannot be done without inquiry; 1 Abb. (U. S.) 9. A corporation maintaining a public highway, although it owns the property it employs for accomplishing public objects, must be held to have accepted its rights, etc., subject to the condition that the legislature may protect the people against the exaction of unreasonable charges for the services rendered by it, subject to the constitutional guarantee for the protection of its property; 169 U. S. 466.

But a municipal ordinance which requires a street railway to sell six tickets for twenty-five cents is invalid; 57 Alb. L. J. 390; U. S. C. C. (Wisc.). The power of a municipality to reduce street railway fares is subject to limitations: (1) that there is reasonable need on the part of the public of lower rates; (2) that the rates fixed by the ordinance are not unreasonable in view of all the conditions; 87 Fed. Rep. 577. See an important case in 83 Fed. Rep. 539, as to the constitutionality of an act regulating fares, and a case contra, on the same act, in 51 N. W. Rep. (Ind.) 80.

The right of way is generally obtained by the exercise of the right of eminent domain. This can only be done in strict conformity to the charter or grant; 4 Engl. Railw. Cas. 235, 513, 524; 8 Gill 983. In this country, in many cases, the provisions of the charter enable companies to obtain land by purchase; 25 Vt. 49. The company may enter upon lands for the purpose of making preliminary surveys, by legislative permission, without becoming trespassers, and without compensation; 34 Me. 247; 9 Barb. 449; Wright Ohio 132; but compensation must be made or secured before the permanent occupation of the lands. See 6 Biss. 168; 27 Ind. 260. A company may not take land for speculation, or to prevent competition; 43 N. Y. 137. It may make any use of the land acquired for the right of way, which contributes to the safe and efficient operation of the road, and which does not interfere with the rights of property pertaining to the adjacent lands; 95 Ala. 631. See EMINENT DOMAIN. Railroad corporations possess the powers conferred upon them by charter and such as are fairly incidental thereto; and they cannot, except with the consent of the state, disengage themselves from the discharge of their functions, duties, and obligations. The general rule is that a contract by which a railroad company renders itself incapable of performing its duties to the public, or contracts beyond the scope of its powers, cannot be rendered enforceable by the doctrine of estoppel; but where the subject-matter is not foreign to the purposes of its creation, a contract embracing whatever may be fairly regarded as incidental to the things authorized, ought not, unless expressly prohibited, to be held to be ultra vires; 163 U. S. 364.

The construction and operation by a railroad of a part of its road proves an acceptance of its charter where no particular mode of acceptance is designated; 106 Mo. 557. See 83 Me. 440.

The company may lay their road across a highway, but not without making compensation to the owner of the fee for the additional servitude thus imposed upon the land; 26 N. Y. 530; 75 Ill. 74; 41 Cal. 256; 1 Exch. 723; 21 Mo. 580; 27 Pa. 359; 9 Cush. 1.

Steam railroads on highways impose an additional burden thereby and cannot be built without compensation to abutting land-owners; 48 Ind. 178; 19 N. J. Eq. 386; 124 Pa. 544; contra, 16 R. I. 668; 35 Minn. 112; 85 Ky. 640. In the absence of constitutional provisions, the legislature may authorize the use of streets by a steam or street railroad without municipal consent; 66 Mo. 228; 6 Whart. 25; 45 Ga. 602.

If it is required by statute to be raised out of a cut in a street and placed on a viaduct, the company is liable for additional damages; N. Y. L. J., Nov. 19, 1897 (S. C. of N. Y.).

The legislature may authorize a railroad to be constructed under, as well as upon, highways; and when so constructed, the rights of the land-owners are determined upon the same principles as if they were built upon the surface; Peirce, Railr. 248; 42 Md. 117. It may also authorize elevated railroads, or railroads built upon structures raised above the highway; Peirce, Railr. 249. See 70 N. Y. 327, 361; 6 Blatch. 487; 82 N. Y. 95. But a company incorporated as a street passenger railroad cannot build an elevated railroad over and along the streets of Philadelphia; 161 Pa. 409.

The construction of the road must be within the prescribed limits of the charter. The right of deviation secured by the charter or general laws is lost when the road is once located; 1 Myl. & K. 154; 2 Ohio St. 235; 31 N. J. L. 205. The location can then be changed only by act of legislature; 35 Barb. 373; 42 Miss. 555; 31 N. J. L. 205. Distance, having reference either to the length of the line or to deviation, is to be measured in a straight line through a horizontal plane; 9 Q. B. 76; 27 Vt. 766. But charters must be taken to allow such discretion in the location of the route as is incident to an ordinary practical survey thereof, with reference to the nature of the country; 6 Minn. 150. A right to build to a city named imports a right to extend within the city limits; 45 Tex. 88. Where a location of a terminus was fixed at or near P. it was held that a point a mile and a half from P. was a compliance with the charter; 64 Pa. 137. A deviation from the line specified in the charter will not be permitted; 27 Pa. 339; but slight deviations may be allowed; Wood, Ry. 1104. A charter power to change the location of the line in case of any obstacle to the one first selected, will authorize a relocation before, but not after, the line has been constructed; 15 Ohio St. 21. Ordinarily the courts will not interfere with the selection of a route; 13 Barb. 646.

A railroad company constructing its line is bound to do so in a careful manner; and if it is so constructed it is not liable to adjacent property owners; but if it appears that it exceeded its authority, or exercised it negligently, it will become liable; 65 Ill. 370; 149 Mass. 335; 29 Ia. 153. So if the injury amounts to taking property, as by the destruction of an easement.

A company cannot build only part of its charter line; 126 N. Y. 29. It cannot abandon a part; 63 Tex. 529.

Liability for the acts of contractors, sub-contractors, and agents. The company are not in any case liable for the act of a contractor or sub-contractor, or their agents, if it be not in doing precisely what is contemplated in the contract; 6 M. & W. 499; 12 Ad. & E. 737; 24 Barb. 355; 3 Gray 349; Redf. Railw. § 168.

Railroad companies are liable for the acts of their agents within the range of their employment; and for all acts of their agents within the most extensive range of their charter-powers; 14 How. 433; 27 Vt. 110; 7 Cush. 385; but not for the wilful acts of their agents, out of the range of their employment, unless directed by the company or subsequently adopted by them; 3 Harr. N. J. 514; 1 Fla. 130.

Railroad companies are liable for any injury accruing to the person or property of another through any want of reasonable care and prudence on the part of their employees. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

A railroad company operating its road through the streets of a populous city is bound to observe extraordinary precautions for the safety of the public, particularly at street crossings; 40 La. Ann. 810; 70 Tex. 120; 84 Va. 63; 85 Ky. 224.

It is the duty of the company to use on its cars, etc., all the modern improvements in machinery commonly used; 65 Barb. 92; 76 N. C. 454; 83 Ala. 513; 76 Ia. 387.

Express business. Railroad companies are not required to transport the traffic of independent express companies over their lines in the manner in which such traffic is usually carried; or to do more as express carriers than to provide the public at large with reasonable express accommodation. They need not furnish all express companies equal facilities on their passenger trains; 117 U. S. 1; Miller and Field, J.J., dissenting; 70 Cal. 169; 57 Fed. Rep. 673; 43 N. J. Eq. 77. But it has been held that they may be compelled to admit the agents of express companies on their trains, with their safes; 6 L. R. A. (N. C.) 271. And an early case held that a contract giving exclusive privileges to one express company is void; 2 Phila. 107; and in Maine a statute provides for equal facilities to all; 81 Me. 92. It has been held that a railroad company cannot assume the exclusive right of carrying on the express business over its own lines; 4 Fed. Rep. 491; but this was decided prior to the case in 117 U. S. 1, supra. See EXPRESS COMPANIES; FACILITIES.

The exclusive grants to railroad companies are to be strictly construed in favor of the corporation, and liberally expounded in favor of public rights and interests; 11 Pet. 420; 13 How. 71; 1 La. Ann. 253.

The power to build a railroad includes the power to build switches; 56 Pa. 325; but all customers have not an equal right to have switches built for them. 31 U. S. App. 252.

An act providing that a carrier accepting goods for transportation over connecting lines assumes an obligation for their safe carriage to the point of destination, etc., is not a regulation of interstate commerce, but establishes a rule of evidence and does not conflict with the United States constitution touching interstate commerce; 169 U. S. 311. But a carrier is not liable beyond its own lines, unless its liability be established by clear evidence; 155 U. S. 333. See COMMON CARRIERS.

A railroad corporation is a person within the fourteenth amendment declaring that no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; 169 U. S. 400. See PERSON.

Railroad grants of lands by congress are granted in presenti, and take effect upon the section of the land when the road is definitely located, by relation, as of the date of the grant; 137 U. S. 528. See 133 id. 496. When different grants cover the same premises, the earlier takes the title; 130 U. S. 1; 148 id. 570; 152 id. 284. Title does not pass until the act is complied with. 15 U. S. App. 339. See LAND GRANTS.

A company is not liable for injuries to a person who goes into its yard, merely because such yard is a dangerous place, but it must be shown to be unnecessarily dangerous and that the injury resulted from the negligence of the company; 43 Pac. Rep. (Kan.) 10.

A hotel-keeper who sends his servant to the station to accompany guests, etc., has no right to use the station except with the leave of the railway company; 56 Alb. L. J. 130.

Where a number of passengers who have right to take a certain train is in excess of its capacity, the company must exercise the same care and forethought in providing additional cars as it is bound to exercise in relation to its other passengers; 43 N. W. Rep. (Ill.) 698.

It is the duty of a railroad company to heat its cars in cold weather; 31 S. W. Rep. (Tex.) 677.

When a person (in this case a physician) is, while driving along a public highway, detained for twenty minutes at a grade crossing by the negligent delay of the employees of the railroad company in opening the gates, the company is liable in damages for delay; [1895] 2 Ir. R. 355.

When no legislative prohibition is shown, a railroad company may lease and maintain a summer hotel at its seaside terminus; 160 U. S. 514.

Mandamus will lie to compel a railroad company to operate its road; 28 Hun 453; 91 U. S. 343 (though the business be unprofitable; 7 Neb. 357; but not where it carries traffic on another line owned by it; 103 N. Y. 95); also to build a bridge; 70 N. Y. 560. The remedy for abandonment of a railroad may also be by indictment or by proceedings to forfeit the charter; 24 N. Y. 261.

An agreement whereby a railroad company has the right to run its trains into the depot of another railroad company is not a lease; 143 U. S. 500. See a contract for trackage in 45 Fed. Rep. 304.

Neither a railroad, nor any part of its property, is subject to levy under execution, unless by statute. See 114 U. S. 340; 65 Pa. 278; 117 Ind. 501. See LEASE.

STREET RAILWAYS. As to the difference between street and steam railways, see supra.

When a railway is laid in a street, to facilitate its use by the public, it is a street railway; 87 Mich. 371; so, if confined within the limits of a city and to be used exclusively under the streets; 107 N. Y. 53. A distinctive feature is that it is entirely for the carriage of passengers; Booth, Rys. § 1. It makes no difference whether it be on, above, or below the surface; id.; see supra; or what kind of motor power it uses; 41 Fed. Rep. 556. The difference between street railroads and steam railroads lies in their use and not in their motive power; 88 Fed. Rep. 588.

Street railroads belong to the surface of an open highway. They must conform to the grade of the highway. They must carry passengers only, under Pennsylvania acts; 161 Pa. 390. A street railway has been said to be one which is used expressly for the transportation of passengers, and which stops its cars at frequent intervals to take on passengers. 47 N. J. Eq. 380; 24 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 179.

The general (steam) railroad act of Pennsylvania does not authorize the incorporation of elevated street passenger railroads in the streets of a city, and they cannot be incorporated under the general act providing for the incorporation of street passenger railways; 161 Pa. 806.

The right to permit their construction or refuse consent, is often vested in the local authorities. See Booth, Rys. § 28, as to the legislation of various states. Whether they have implied, in the absence of express authority, is said not to be settled; id. § 15. A city cannot, without legislative authority, grant the right to build a street railway; 73 La. 513; 3 Duer 119; 24 Ill. 52; 66 Mo. 228; 9 Bush 127. See 10 Wall. 38. But the power to open and improve streets has been held to confer such authority; 85 Mo. 263; so of a power to regulate and improve streets and regulate vehicles thereon; 14 La. Ann. 842. It is also held that it cannot grant an exclusive right without legislative authority; 24 Fed. Rep. 309; 11 So. Rep. (La.) 77; which must be express; Booth, Rys. § 17. The power to grant easements in city streets, in perpetuity and in monopoly, can only be conferred by express words, or, if inferred from other powers, must be indispensable to their exercise; 171 U. S. (not reported).

Where the authority is express, it cannot be delegated; 34 Ohio St. 194.

A city cannot grant to individuals the exclusive right to lay tracks; 61 La. 11; 38 N. J. L. 79; 38 N. Y. 201; contra, 26 Pac. Rep. (Utah) 236. See Booth, Rys. § 2.

Ordinarily, and apart from constitutional or statutory provisions, a second company may be authorized to lay additional tracks; 45 Cal. 385; 23 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 463.

It is held that the local authorities, when their consent to building a street railway is required by law, may impose any conditions they choose; 37 Mich. 553; 169 Pa. 181; but it has been also held that if the conditions imposed by the local authorities relate to matters over which the legislature has entire control, the acts of the legislature cannot be affected by the local authorities; 105 N. Y. 97. The legislature may impose conditions other than, and in addition to, those prescribed by the constitution, and the local authorities may prescribe conditions additional to both the constitutional and statutory provisions on the subject; 102 N. Y. 343. See 118 id. 113. Where a municipality has the right to control the use of its streets, its action is not subject to judicial control; 17 N. J. Eq. 83; 40 La. Ann. 446; Booth, Rys. § 40.

Where local authorities have granted a right to construct a street railway, they cannot, without the consent of the company and in the absence of a reserved right so to do, impose additional obligations; 84 Mich. 257; as, the use of iron poles instead of wooden poles; id.; or requiring the railway company to pave and keep in repair a portion of the street outside of the tracks; 26 N. E. Rep. (W. Va.) 188.

The consent of the local authorities once given and accepted and acted upon, cannot be revoked; 109 N. C. 688; 45 Tex. 88; see 23 Chi. L. News 147; but where a right to revoke has been reserved, it may be exercised by the local authorities; 111 Mass. 232.

The use of its tracks by a railway company may be temporarily interrupted by municipal authorities, when necessary for the purpose of repairs on the streets; 48 Md. 168; 11 Phila. 358; 103 Mass. 262.

Where a route has been established under the direction of the local authorities, the company cannot change the location so fixed without a new consent for that purpose; 53 Hun 131. The local authorities may permit the tracks to be relaid on another part of the street; 23 La. Ann. 535; and may compel a change where it has reserved the right so to do; 10 Phila. 70. A railway company may adopt any gauge for its track which it sees fit and afterwards change the same, in the absence of anything to the contrary; 131 Pa. 1; and it may ordinarily adopt any kind of rails and change the same from time to time; 10 Atl. Rep. (N. J.) 263; but the rails used must be such as not to interfere with the use of the street by the public; 133 Pa. 505.

A city cannot grant the use of its streets to so many companies as to impair its public use; 48 Mich. 433. It cannot, ordinarily, grant the right to build in a city park; 26 La. Ann. 478; 67 Ill. 540; but see 76 Cal. 156; 175 Pa. 33; PARK. See 20 Hun 201.

The legislature, unless forbidden by the constitution, may grant a right to lay a street railway in a street; 10 Wall. 38; 24 N. J. Eq. 158.

Many cases hold that a street railway is not a new servitude on the street, for which the owners of abutting lands are entitled to compensation; 24 N. J. Eq. 158; 58 Md. 603; 94 U. S. 324; 88 Mich. 66; 78 Md. 261; 55 N. J. L. 605; 27 Wis. 104; 83 Conn. 579; 125 Mass. 515; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. 725; and their consent to the construction of such railways is not necessary; but see an able dissenting opinion, 85 Mich. 634. It has been held that the abutting owner may recover where the tracks were laid next the curb; 14 Ohio St. 523.

It is held that this is so even if steam motors are used in propelling the cars; 79 Me. 363; 85 Minn. 112; 47 N. J. Eq. 880; or electricity; 85 Mich. 634; 75 Md. 222; 47 N. J. Eq. 880; 16 R. I. 668. But as to whether the use of steam on street railways imposes an additional servitude, the weight of judicial opinion is said to be very nearly evenly balanced; Booth, Rys. § 66.

The substitution of cable propulsion for horse power imposes no new servitude on the street; 19 N. E. Rep. (Ga.) 831; 121 N. Y. 536; 32 Fed. Rep. 270.

In New York it is held that street railways impose an additional burden on the streets; 39 N. Y. 404; 121 id. 505; unless the fee of the soil of the street is vested in the city; 27 N. Y. 108; but even then the abutting owner has a right of action if access to his property is cut off; 128 id. 157.

An elevated railroad is an additional burden on the highway; 23 Atl. Rep. (Md.) 463; 90 N. Y. 123; 129 N. Y. 252. Their structures are incompatible with the free and unobstructed use of the street and abutting property owners are entitled to an injunction unless their rights have been properly acquired by the company and they have received compensation therefor. See 90 N. Y. 123; 128 id. 157; 125 id. 164; 130 id. 14; 121 id. 503; 128 id. 157. Though not owning the soil of the street, they have easements of light, air, and access therein; 130 N. Y. 14; 90 id. 122.

Non-abutting property owners are not entitled to damages by reason of the use of a street by an elevated railway; 16 Daly 145; 18 N. Y. Supp. 238.

An elevated railway in New York which has not acquired the right from abutting proprietors is a continuous trespass upon their property which gives rise to a separate cause of action at law for damages. See 123 N. Y. 426; 130 id. 119. Equity will prevent the continuance of trespass by including as damages injuries permanently resulting from the interference of easement with light, air, and access. An abutting owner has a right of action for the pollution of air by smoke.

Constructing an elevated railroad on pillars in a public street is held, in 36 L. R. A. (Ill.) 97, not to constitute a new servitude or an unlawful use of the street. In Pennsylvania a street railway on a country road in a township is an additional burden on the highway and cannot be constructed without the consent of abutting property owners, though it is otherwise as to the streets of a city or borough; 167 Pa. 162.

An electric street railway between cities and villages for the transportation of passengers, merchandise, and baggage imposes an additional servitude on the highway; 70 N. W. Rep. (Wis.) 678.

It is said that equity will not relieve an abutting property owner but will leave him to his remedy at law; 147 U. S. 248. But the rule appears to be otherwise in Pennsylvania. See 167 Pa. 162.

Ordinarily street railways have no right of eminent domain.

In 152 Pa. 163, the court seemed to consider that the right to build a passenger railway carries with it, at least in the absence of specific denial, the right from time to time, to operate it by new methods, but the point was not decided. An ordinance permitting the building of a horse-car railway covers an electric railway; 185 N. Y. 898.

The erection of trolley poles in the middle of the street does not entitle the abutting owners to compensation; 47 N. J. Eq. 390. Where electric railways are authorized the authority extends to the necessary and proper apparatus for operating them; 139 Pa. 419; including poles and wires; 47 N. J. Eq. 880. But where this right encroaches on property rights of an abutting owner it should be so exercised by the company as to minimize the inconveniences and danger to such rights; 51 N. J. Eq. 218.

Poles must be so placed as not to interfere with the rights of ingress and egress to abutting property; 85 Mich. 634; stringing a wire along the street twenty feet above the surface is no interference with the right to light and air; 61 N. J. Eq. 213. See POLES; WIRES.

If a street railway is constructed and operated without lawful authority, it is a nuisance; 137 Pa. 533; 133 id. 505; 2 Colo. 678; 87 Mich. 881; and a railroad company cannot grant to an individual a right to operate a railroad for his private purposes over a part of its line which it does not use; 102 N. Y. 441.

Where the use of a street is unlawful, an injunction will lie at the suit of an abutting owner; 19 Ohio St. 78; contra, 16 R. I. 533; 100 Mo. 508; 112 Ill. 611; or at the suit of a duly authorized public officer; 50 Ga. 451; 27 N. Y. 611; 103 id. 441; a company so operating a steam road may be indicted for a nuisance; 14 Gray 93; 101 Pa. 92; and, by analogy, a street railway; Booth, Rys. § 4.

A municipality can maintain proceedings in the nature of quo warranto to oust a street railway company of its franchises for non-user; 140 Mo. 539.

Ordinarily, a franchise to build a street railway is not exclusive; 48 Mich. 433; 41 La. Ann. 561; 73 La. 513.

A right or permit from a municipality to construct a street railway on a given street, is not a part of the company's franchise, but is property, and is an incorporeal right; 87 Ill. 317.

Street railway companies are subject to regulation by statutes and by ordinances under the police power; Booth, Rys. § 221; such as ordinances regulating the speed of cars; 84 Mo. 119; 129 Mass. 310; requiring cars to stop at designated places; 42 Ark. 821; requiring the watering of tracks; 77 Ga. 731; forbidding the use of sand upon tracks; 47 Hun 221.

Where a railway company has not built all the line specified in its charter and has abandoned a part of what it had built its charter is subject to forfeiture; 128 N. Y. 29; 63 Tex. 529.

A street railway company owns the structure laid by it in the highway, and has a superior right to the space covered by its track; Peirce, Rair. 252. See 14 Gray 69; 76 N. Y. 530; 34 La. 527. The public, on foot or in carriages, may cross the tracks, and travel on the spaces covered by it, and even incidentally drive ordinary carriages on the rails. But a person driving a carriage on the track should leave it without retarding the cars; 76 N. Y. 530; 69 Ill. 388. See 9 Misc. Rep. 270. It is also held that an electric street railway company has a common right in the highway with other travellers, not a superior right, and they must be so managed as not unnecessarily to interfere with the like rights of others; 37 Atl. Rep. (Conn.) 379. But its rails cannot be used by other competing common carriers driving railway or other carriages, without special legislative authority; 72 N. Y. 330; 4 Stew. N. J. 533; 81 Ill. 523.

A company may remove snow from its track to another part of the street, but in so doing, it must avoid unnecessary injury to the owners of property; 50 Md. 73. See Peirce, Rair. 253.

When an electric street railway car is stopping at a crossing, it should not run its car in an opposite direction on the other track without warning pedestrians; 84 Atl. Rep. N. J. 1094; 97 Cal. 553; contra, 16 N. Y. Supp. 350; but one who crosses a street behind a moving car at a place which is not a regular crossing, is bound to look for cars on the other track; 145 N. Y. 190; though it is held that a passenger alighting from a car has a right to presume that the other track will be kept clear; 137 Ill. 1; 36 N. Y. Supp. 103; but it is also held that it is a question of ordinary care; 128 Pa. 539. See 39 N. Y. Supp. 440. Where a passenger alights from a car on a double track trolley line, it is the duty of the company to regulate the speed of its cars and to give such warning of their approach as will reasonably protect the passenger from injury; 43 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 207.

A street car has recently been held by the house of lords to be a coach within the meaning of an act relating to tolls on a particular bridge.

See various related titles treating subjects connected with railroads; LATERAL RAILROADS; STATION; FIRST-CLASS; ROADBED.

Invitation to Alight from Train. The announcement of a station and the opening of the vestibule doors is not an "invitation" to passengers "to alight" until after the train stops. 163 Ky. 459, 173 S. W. 1113.

RAILROAD-AID BONDS. See BOND.

RAILROAD BRIDGE. The qualified phrase, "railroad bridge," means a viaduct constructed for the exclusive use of railroad transportation. 2 Duv. (Ky.) 178.

RAILROAD COMMISSIONERS. officers appointed in various states for the supervision of the construction and operation of railroads.

A suit against railroad commissioners to restrain the enforcement of rates, as unjust, is not a suit against the state; 154 U. S. 362, 418, 420.

RAILROAD COMPANY. As used in a state police statute is inclusive of natural persons operating a railroad. 234 U. S. 280.

RAILROAD PROPERTY. The property which is essential to a railroad company to enable it to discharge its functions and duties as a common carrier by rail. It includes the road bed, right of way, tracks, bridges, stations, rolling stock, and such like property. Lands owned and held for sale, or other disposition for profit, and in no way connected with the use or operation of the railroad, are not railroad property in the sense mentioned, but are property of the company independently of its functions and duties as a common carrier. 47 Fed. Rep. 681.

"Railroad property" held to include a bridge owned by the railroad company. 139 Ky. 386, 109 S. W. 303.

RAILROAD RELIEF FUNDS. A term applied to funds raised by periodical contributions of corporations' employees, or by them jointly with the corporation, and usually managed jointly, for the purpose of providing relief to the employees in case of injury, and the payment of money to their families in case of death, in the service. They are usually managed jointly by the corporation and representatives of the members, the business facilities being furnished by the corporation, which usually guarantees the funds and undertakes to make good deficiencies. Their management usually constitutes a department of the corporation business. They have been instituted in England and in some of the largest railroad systems in the United States. Compulsory contribution to funds for charitable, financial, etc., purposes, is forbidden in some states. In Massachusetts, acts provide for such societies for employees of railroad, street railroad, and steamboat companies.

Members are usually required to contract that the acceptance of relief benefits from the fund in case of injury or death shall operate as a release to the company of all rights of action for damages for injury or death made by, or on behalf of, the member or his legal representatives.

Such contracts are sustained as defenses to actions for personal injuries: 160 Ill. 313; 64 Ill. App. 444; 44 Neb. 44; 70 N. W. Rep. (Ia.) 630; 61 id. 971; 71 Fed. Rep. 136, 139, 931; 10 Ind. App. 47; 37 N. E. Rep. (Ind.) 423; 73 Md. 102; 81 id. 412; 93 Mich. 600; 41 Fed. Rep. 125; 30 id. 655; 9 Q. B. Div. 357; L. R. 3 Q. B. 535.

A contract by which, if the member or his representatives accept benefits, he or they thereby release all rights of action against the company, for damages for injury, etc., is valid; and when the injured party after the right of action has arisen accepts the benefits, he is merely settling for the past; 163 Pa. 133. See 164 id. 329.

But it was held that where, under such a contract, the widow of a member accepted a benefit upon her husband's death, and personally released the fund and the company, the contract of the husband did not waive a right of action, and that neither the contract nor the widow's receipt of the benefit discharged her right of action; 58 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 1120. In 65 Fed. Rep. 308, the court, on a demurrer to such a defense, upheld the demurrer and held the contract and release void, and expressed its surprise at finding that several courts of unquestionable dignity and authority had sustained such defenses. This case was affirmed on appeal, though not quite on such broad ground as was taken below; 76 Fed. Rep. 439.

A rule of a railway relief department which provides that all claims of beneficiaries shall be submitted to the superintendent, with the right of appeal to an advisory committee whose decision shall be final, does not bar the holder of a claim which has been rejected by such committee from the right of action in the courts; 46 N. E. Rep. (Ohio) 577.

An Ohio act which provides that no railroad company shall require any stipulation with any person in or about to enter its employ, whereby such person agrees to waive any right of action against the company for personal injuries, and that all such agreements shall be void, is in violation of the fourteenth amendment to the federal constitution as taking away liberty of contract; 71 Fed. Rep. 931.

RAILROAD STATION. See STATION.

RAILWAY. Held that the term "railroad," as used in a statute under condemnation proceedings, has same meaning as "railway." 128 Ky. 768, 109 S. W. 361.

RAILWAY AND CANAL COMMISSION. See COURT OF RAILWAY AND CANAL COMMISSION.

RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS. A body of three commissioners appointed under the English regulation of railways act, 1873, principally to enforce the provisions of the railway and canal traffic act, 1854, by compelling railway and canal companies to give reasonable facilities for traffic, to abstain from giving unreasonable preference to any company or person, and to forward through traffic at through rates.

They also had the supervision of working agreements between companies. The statutory authority for the existence of the commission expired on 31st December, 1882, as from which date the Railway and Canal Commission was in operation and replaced it. Byrne.

RAIN-WATER. The water which naturally falls from the clouds.

No one has a right to build his house so as to cause the rain-water to fall over his neighbor's land; 1 Rolle, Abr. 107; 1 Stra. 643; Fortesc. 212; Bacon, Abr. Action on the Case (F); 5 Co. 101; unless he has acquired a right by a grant or prescription.

When the land remains in a state of nature, said a learned writer, and by the natural descent the rain-water would descend from the superior estate over the lower, the latter is necessarily subject to receive such water; 1 Lois des Batiments 15, 10. See 2 Rolle 140.

RAINY DAY. The phrase rainy day has no definite and certain meaning. It may be used and understood in many senses. In common parlance, it varies in signification from the day with light, passing April showers to the steady and strong down-pour of an Oregon December. Worcester defines rainy as follows: 'Abounding in rain; showery; wet;' and Webster's definition is the same. But the definition, while it fixes some limit to the signification of the term, as that a rainy day is a wet one, and therefore not a dry one, does not free the matter from the uncertainty which is inherent in the expression. 23 Am. & Eng. Encyc. 2nd ed., 842, n. 7; 5 Sawy. (U. S.) 434.

RAISE. To create. A use may be raised; i. e. a use may be created. 1 Spence, Eq. Jur. 449.

When a child has reached the age of twenty-one years, he is raised; 59 Ind. 598.

RAISE REVENUE. Is to collect revenue, not necessarily to increase the amount; 58 Ala. 546. Authority to raise money for prosecuting and defending suits only authorizes raising money by taxation and not by borrowing; 119 N. Y. 280 a.

RAM ALLEY. See PRIVILEGED PLACES.

RANDOM. See AT RANDOM.

RANGE. A word used in the land-laws of the United States to designate the order of the location of public lands. In patents from the United States to individuals for public lands, they are described as being within a certain range.

RANGER. A sworn officer of the forest to inquire of trespasses, and to drive the beasts of the forest out of the deforested ground into the forest. Jacob, Law Dict.

RANK. The order or place in which certain officers are placed in the army and navy, in relation to others.

It is a maxim that officers of an inferior rank are bound to obey all the lawful commands of their superiors, and are justified for such obedience.

Army and Navy. In 1868, a retiring board found a colonel incapacitated from the result of wounds received in battle while commanding a division with the brevet rank of major-general. He was thereupon retired by the president, under the act of July 18, 1866, with the full rank of major-general. Subsequently his retired rank was changed by the provisions of the act of March 8, 1875, to that of brigadier-general. It was held that he was not appointed to the office of major-general; that he still retained on the retired list the office of colonel; that the rank conferred upon him by act of congress was in no sense a constitutional appointment to a new office; and that the same power that gave him his rank could take it away. Rank is often used to express something different from office. It then becomes a designation or title of honor, dignity, or distinction conferred upon an officer in order to fix his relative position in reference to other officers in matters of privilege, precedence, and sometimes of command, or by which to determine his pay and emoluments. This is the case with the staff officers of the army. 15 Ct. Cl. 159. See R. S. §§ 1122, 1128, 1181, 1168, for instances.

The distinction between rank and office is more clearly apparent with reference to staff officers than to officers of the line, because in the latter case the words used to designate the rank and the office are usually the same, while in the former case they are always different.

In some cases, officers of the line have a rank assigned to them different from the title of their office. See R. S. §§ 1096, 1097. Selections under these sections are usually made from among officers whose rank is raised to a higher degree by the service assigned to them, but the new rank does not confer a new office.

In the army, all officers, except chaplains, are paid according to their rank; in the navy, the pay of staff officers does not depend upon their rank; and there rank only determines matter of precedence, etc., among officers.

Grade is a step or degree in either office or rank. See 15 Ct. Cl. 151, per Richardson, J.

Officers in the regular army, active or retired, who served in the volunteer forces in the civil war may receive a brevet equal to their highest rank held in the said forces; act of Feb. 16, 1897.

Relative Rank of Army and Navy Officers. Rear admirals rank with major generals; commodores with brigadier generals; captains with colonels; commanders with lieutenant colonels; lieutenant commanders with majors; lieutenants with captains, etc. Such relative rank of army and navy officers was fixed by the act of July 16, 1862, Rev. Stat. § 1466. 195 U. S. 420.

RANKING. In Scotch Law. Determining the order in which the debts of a bankrupt ought to be paid.

RANSOM. A redemption for money or other consideration of that which is taken in war. 8 Term 277.

The custom of ransom of prisoners of war, which superseded slavery, has given place to the exchange of prisoners; Risley, Law of War 127. See PRISONERS OF WAR; RANSOM BILL.

In Old English Law. A sum of money paid for the pardoning of some great offence, or to redeem the person from captivity or imprisonment, or property from seizure; a fine, particularly an excessive or severe one. The distinction made between ransom and amercement is said to be that a ransom is the redemption of a corporal punishment; while an amercement is a fine by way of penalty for an offence committed. Abbott; Cowell.

In International Law. The redemption, also the sum or other consideration, agreed to be paid for the redemption of captured property, or the liberty of a captive. A ransom, strictly speaking, is not a recapture of the captured property; it is rather a purchase of the right of the captors at the time, be it what it may; or, more properly, it is a relinquishment of all the interest and benefit which the captors might acquire or consummate in the property, by a regular adjudication of a prize tribunal, whether it be an interest in rem, a lien, or a mere title to expenses. In this respect, there seems to be no difference between the case of a ransom of an enemy or a neutral. Id.; 2 Gall. 325.

RANSOM BILL. A contract for payment of ransom of a captured vessel, with stipulations of safe conduct if she pursue a certain course and arrive at a certain time. If found out of time or course, the safe conduct is void; Wheaton, Int. Law 107. The payment cannot be enforced in England, during the war, by an action on the contract, but can in this country; 1 Kent 104, 105; 4 Wash. C. C. 141; 2 Gall. 325.

By the general maritime law ransoms are allowed and the master of a ship may bind the whole cargo as well as the ship, by his contract for ransom; 8 C. Rob. 240. They were formerly prohibited in England, but now the queen in council may make rules for prohibiting or allowing them, under the act of 1864.

Ransoms have never been prohibited by the United States; 15 Johns. 8; nor by the other nations, except England; 1 Kent 112.

A belligerent may deliver up neutral property on ransoms as well as enemy's property; per Story, J., in 2 Gall. 387, where the subject of ransom is discussed.

A ransom strictly speaking is not a re-purchase of the captured property, it is rather a repurchase of the actual right of the captors at the time, be it what it may, or, more properly, it is a relinquishment of all the interest or benefit which the captors might acquire or consummate in the property by the regular adjudications of a prize tribunal. There seems to be no legal difference between the case of a ransom of the property of an enemy and of a neutral, for if the property be neutral and yet there be probable cause of capture, or if the delinquency be such that the penalty of confiscation might be justly applied, there can be no intrinsic difficulty in supporting a contract by which the captors agree to waive their rights in consideration of a sum of money voluntarily paid or agreed to be paid by the capture; 3 Phil. Int. L. 645.

In the absence of stipulation, if the ransom vessel be lost, the contract is still binding; but usually there is a clause excepting loss on the high seas, but not by stranding; 2 Halleck, Int. L., Baker's ed. 331.

RAPE (Lat. rapere, to snatch, to seize with violence). In Criminal Law. The carnal knowledge of a woman by a man forcibly and unlawfully against her will. Russ. Cr. L. 904.

The statute of Westminster 2, c. 34, defines the crime to be where "a man do ravish a woman, married, maid, or other, where she did not consent neither before nor after." And this statute definition has been adopted in several very recent cases. Addenda to 1 Den. Cr. Cas.; 1 Bell, Cr. Cas. 63, 71.

Much difficulty has arisen in defining the meaning of carnal knowledge, and different opinions have been entertained.—some judges having supposed that penetration alone is sufficient, while others deemed emission an essential ingredient in the crime; Hawk. Pl. Cr. b. 1, c. 41, s. 3; 12 Co. 37; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 638; 2 Chitty, Cr. Law 810. Penetration is the act of inserting the penis into the female organs of generation. 9 C. & P. 118. See 5 C. & P. 321; 9 id. 31. It was once held that in order to commit the crime of rape it is requisite that the penetration should be such as to rupture the hymen; 5 C. & P. 321. But this case has since been expressly overruled; 2 Mood. Cr. Cas. 90; 9 C. & P. 752; Whart. Cr. L. 554. In the United States in modern times the better opinion seems to be that both penetration and emission are not necessary; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 439; Add. Pa. 143; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 410; 2 Bish. N. Cr. Law § 1131; 111 Ind. 279; 14 Neb. 205; 1 Houst. Cr. Cas. 363; 25 Fla. 702; contra, 14 Ohio 222; but later cases in that state intimated that if the question were new, the decision would be the other way; 22 Ohio St. 102, 541. See 65 N. C. 466. Slight penetration has been held to be sufficient; 76 Ga. 623. By statute in England carnal knowledge is completely proved by proof of penetration; 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, § 18. Statutes to the same effect have been passed in some of the United States; but these statutes have been thought to be merely declaratory of the common law; 3 Greenl. Ev. § 210. See, on this subject, 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 628; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 437; 1 Chitty, Med. Jur. 886; 1 Russ. Cr. Law 860. It is to be remarked, also, that very slight evidence may be sufficient to induce a jury to believe there was emission; Add. Pa. 143; 2 Const. 351; 1 Beck, Med. Jur. 140; 4 Chitty, Bl. Com. 213, note 8. See [1891] 2 Q. B. 149. In Scotland, emission is not requisite; 1 Swint. 93. See EMISSION.

By the term man in this definition is meant a male of the human species, of the age of fourteen years and upwards; for an infant under fourteen years is supposed by law incapable of committing this offence; Whart. Cr. L. 551; 1 Hale, Pl. Cr. 631; 8 C. & P. 738; Tayl. Ev. 127; 29 Fla. 565. But this presumption has been held by some authorities not to be conclusive, but capable of removal by proof; 5 Lea 352. But not only can an infant under fourteen years, if of sufficient mischievous discretion, but even a woman may be guilty as principal in the second degree; 83 N. C. 605.

And the husband of a woman may be a principal in the second degree of a rape committed upon his wife; as, where he held her while his servant committed the rape; 1 Harrg. St. Tr. 388. See 62 Mich. 280; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 1135.

Drunkenness is no excuse for rape; nor can it excuse or mitigate an assault with intent to commit a rape; 93 Mo. 431.

The knowledge of the woman's person must be forcibly and against her will; and if her consent has not been voluntarily and freely given (when she has the power to consent), the offence will be complete, nor will any subsequent acquiescence on her part do away the guilt of the ravisher. A consent obtained from a woman by actual violence, by duress or threats of murder, or by the administration of stupefying drugs, is not such a consent as will shield the offender or turn his crime into adultery or fornication; and if the connection took place when she was in a state of insensibility from liquor, having been made drunk by the prisoner, though the liquor was given only for the purpose of exciting her, it is a rape; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 89; 1 C. & K. 740; 12 Cox. C. C. 311. Having carnal knowledge of a woman by a fraud which induces her to suppose it is her husband, does not amount to a rape; 8 C. & P. 267, 286. But it is otherwise by act of 1885. No doubt the party would be liable in such a case for an assault.

The injured party cannot condone the crime of rape by excusing or forgiving the guilty party; 147 Mass. 423.

It has been decided that if a physician offering to take steps to cure a woman of disease, induces her to submit to sexual intercourse with him, under the impression that it is a necessary portion of her medical treatment, this does not amount to rape. To constitute rape there must be an actual resistance of the will on the part of the woman; 19 L. J. M. C. 174; 1 Den. Cr. C. 530; 12 Am. Rep. 293, n.; s. c. 25 Mich. 350; and it has been held that this must be shown beyond a reasonable doubt; 123 Ind. 185. If it appear that the intercourse was effected without her consent, the crime of rape is proved, although no positive resistance by her is shown; 85 Va. 638. Some authorities have held that the woman's resistance is not sufficient to render the crime rape, if finally she consent through fear, duress, or fraud. It must appear that she showed the utmost reluctance and resistance; 50 Wisc. 418; s. c. 36 Am. Rep. 856; 59 N. Y. 374. But this is not the general rule, the better opinion being that a consent obtained by fear of personal violence is no consent—and though a man puts no hand on a woman, yet, if by the array of physical force, he so overpowers her mind that she dares not resist, he is guilty of rape; 2 Bish. Cr. L. § 1123; 36 Am. Rep. 860, n.; s. c. 50 Wisc. 518.

The offence of rape is complete where prosecutrix is rendered unconscious in consequence of the assault and violence; 39 Minn. 277. It has been said that consent during any part of the act will prevent its being rape; 73 Ia. 532; 36 Mich. 203; 50 Wis. 518; but Mr. Bishop takes the very sensible view that after the offence has been completed by penetration no subsequent consent is of any avail to relieve the man from the charge of rape; 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. § 1122. A written statement by the prosecutrix on a trial for rape cannot be used to contradict her where she admits making it, but testifies that she did so under compulsion and that it is false; 136 Mo. 74.

The matrimonial consent of the wife cannot be retracted; and, therefore, her husband cannot be guilty of a rape on her, as his act is not unlawful. But, as already observed, he may be guilty as principal in the second degree.

As a child under ten years of age is incapable in law to give her consent, it follows that the offence may be committed on such a child whether she consent or not. See stat. 18 Eliz. c. 7, s. 4.

There is a recent trend in legislation in this country in the direction of raising the age of consent. This has resulted from a very active agitation on the subject largely promoted by the societies for the prevention of cruelty to children and persons who devote themselves especially to the promotion of social purity. In most of the states there are statutes, some of which are extremely drastic. By recent legislation the age of consent is made in Virginia, Wisconsin, and Indiana, fourteen years; in Iowa, Texas, and Delaware, fifteen years; Connecticut, Louisiana, Massachusetts, Michigan, Oregon, and South Dakota, sixteen years; and in Arizona, Colorado, Idaho, Missouri, Nebraska, New York, Utah, and Wyoming, it is eighteen years. In England, thirteen years, but it is a misdemeanor if between thirteen and sixteen. Ignorance of the woman's age is no defence; 117 Cal. 583; nor is the fact that she was large for her age and physically strong; 73 N. W. Rep. (la.) 344.

It has been questioned whether rape was a felony at common law, or was made one by a statute in the reign of Edward I. The benefit of clergy was first taken away by a statute of Elizabeth. By a statute of Victoria, the offence is no longer punishable with death, but, at most, with transportation for life; previously to that statute, the capital punishment was almost invariably enforced.

See, as to the possibility of committing a rape, and as to the signs which indicate it, 1 Beck. Med. Jur. c. 12; Merlin, Répert. Méd.; Biessy, Manuel Médico-Légal, etc., 149; Parent-Duchatlet, De la Prostitution, etc., c. 3, § 5; 9 C. & P. 752; 2 Pick. 380; 12 S. & R. 69; 7 Conn. 54. See, generally, 2 Bish. N. Cr. L. ch. xxxvi; McClain, Cr. L. 2 Witth. & Beck. 415-477; 32 Cent. Law J. 103; 80 Am. Dec. 361.

In English Law. A division of a county similar to a hundred, but oftentimes containing in it more hundreds than one.

RAPE OF THE FOREST. Trespass committed in a forest by violence. Cowell.

RAPINE. In Criminal Law. The felonious taking of another man's personal property, openly and by violence, against his will. The civilians define rapine to be the taking with violence the movable property of another, with the fraudulent intent to appropriate it to one's own use. Leg. Et. Dr. Rom. § 1071.

RAPPORT A SUCCESSION (Fr.; similar to hotchpot). In Louisiana. The reunion to the mass of the succession of the things given by the deceased ancestor to his heir; in order that the whole may be divided among the co-heirs.

The obligation to make the rapport has a triple foundation. First, it is to be presumed that the deceased intended, in making an advancement, to give only a portion of the inheritance. Second, it establishes the equality of a division, at least, with regard to the children of the same parent, who all have an equal right to the succession. Third, it preserves in families that harmony which is always disturbed by unjust favors to one who has only an equal right. Dalloz, Dict. See ADVANCEMENT; COLLATION; HOTCHPOT.

RASCAL. An opprobrious term, applied to persons of bad character. The law does not presume that a damage has arisen because the defendant has been called a rascal, and therefore no general damages can be recovered for it; if the party has received special damages in consequence of being so called, he can recover a recompense to indemnify him for his loss.

RASURE. The scratching or scraping a writing, so as to prevent some part of it from being read. The word writing here is intended to include printing.

RATABLE ESTATE. Within the meaning of a tax law, taxable estate. 53 Vt. 545.

RATABLE PROPERTY. Property in its quality and nature capable of being rated, i. e. appraised, assessed. 10 B. & S. 223; 16 R. 1. 240.

RATAM REM HABERE (Lat.). In the civil law. To hold a thing ratified; to ratify or confirm it.

RATE. A public valuation or assessment of every man's estate; or the ascertaining how much tax every one shall pay. See Pow. Mortg.; 1 Hopk. Ch. 87. See THROUGH ROUTE.

RATE-BREAKING POINTS. See THROUGH ROUTE.

RATE OF EXCHANGE. In Commercial Law. The price at which a bill drawn in one country upon another may be sold in the former.

RATES. The power of the legislature to regulate rates or charges of corporation is treated under IMPAIRING THE OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS. The case of Smyth v. Ames, 169 U. S. 400, has since decided: While rates for the transportation of persons and property within a state are primarily for the determination of the state, the question whether they are made so unreasonably low as to deprive the carrier of its property without just compensation cannot be so determined by the legislature of the state that the matter cannot become the subject of judicial inquiry. The reasonableness of rates prescribed by a state must be determined without reference to the interstate business done by the company. A railroad is a public highway and is therefore subject to governmental control. It may not fix its rates with a view solely to its own interests, but the rights of the public will be ignored if rates are imposed without reference to the fair value of the property, and, in order simply that the company may meet operating expenses, pay its interest and declare a dividend; but where a company has bonded its property in excess of its fair value or if its capitalization is largely fictitious, it may not impose on the public the burden of such increased rates as may be required to realize profits thereon, and the apparent value of the property as represented by its securities is not alone to be considered on the question of reasonable rates. It must be held to have accepted its rights and franchises subject to the condition that the government may protect the people against unreasonable charges.

The basis of all calculations as to the reasonableness of rates must be the fair value of the property used by it, and this includes the original cost of construction, probable earning capacity of the property under particular rights prescribed by the statute, and the sum required to meet operating expenses. All these items are to be given such weight as may be just and right in each case. The company is entitled to ask a fair return upon the value of its property and the public is entitled to demand that no more be exacted than the services rendered are reasonably worth. Neither market nor par value of stock is a criterion of value, but the owner is entitled to any appreciation above the original cost; 83 Fed. Rep. 850.

Stockholders are not the only persons to be considered; if the establishment of new lines of transportation should cause a diminution in the tolls collected, that, in itself, is not a sufficient reason why the corporation maintaining the road should be allowed to maintain rates that would be unjust to those who use its property. It is not necessary that all corporations exacting tolls should be placed upon the same footing as regards rates; 164 U. S. 578.

The doctrine of state control over rates has been applied as follows:—To Bridges; 8 Fed. Rep. 190. See 154 U. S. 204. Ferries; 24 N. J. L. 718, where the charter subjected the ferry company to such regulations as might be fixed by law. Boom Companies; 150 Pa. 475; 50 Fed. Rep. 902. See 44 Mich. 408. Gas Companies; 5 Ohio C. C. 559 (natural gas); 84 Ohio St. 572. See 27 Am. L. Reg. 286. Mills for Grinding; 86 Me. 102; 40 W. Va. 460. Railroads; 94 U. S. 153, 180; 143 U. S. 399; 82 Ia. 812;

32 Neb. 218; 15 Colo. 601; 64 Fed. Rep. 165 (where the company was incorporated by an act of congress). Railways, Street; 96 Neb. 307 (by ordinance); 111 N. Y. 132. Stock Yards. See 82 Fed. Rep. 850. Telegraphs; 116 N. C. 211. Telephones; 103 Ind. 250; 118 Ind. 194, 599. See 96 Mo. 623. Water; 110 U. S. 847 (a California case under the constitution). Warehouses; for grain, etc., requiring them to keep insured for the benefit of its owner of grain stores; 153 U. S. 391. This power cannot be delegated to private persons or corporations; 160 Mass. 63; 100 Mich. 350. An act fixing minimum rates for railroad freight and passenger fares does not apply to the transportation of messengers and freight of express companies; 6 Fed. Rep. 426. An act requiring a railroad company to sell one thousand mile books for twenty dollars and to accept for fare such books issued by other companies, was held unconstitutional, because it attempted to compel one company to carry passengers on the credit of another company; 100 Mass. 62.

An act of Illinois making it a penal offence for a railroad company within that state to charge or receive for transporting passengers or freight of the same class the same or a greater sum for any distance than it does for a longer distance, is unconstitutional. A state statute intended to regulate or to tax or to impose any other restriction upon the transmission of persons or property or telegraph messages from one state to another is not within that class of legislation which the states may enact in the absence of legislation by congress, and such statutes are void even as to that part of such transmission as may be within the state; 118 U. S. 557.

The authority of a city under a street railway charter to fix the rates of fare thereon is exhausted by fixing such rates in an ordinance granting it the use of the streets; 83 Fed. Rep. 89. See RAILROAD.

A statute fixing the rate of compensation to be paid for labor or service performed on public works is not unconstitutional; 142 N. Y. 101; nor is an act of congress making it a misdemeanor for a pension agent to charge more than ten dollars on a pension claim; 157 U. S. 160.

The interstate commerce commission (q. v.) cannot fix rates; 168 U. S. 144.

As to discrimination in rates, see DISCRIMINATION; INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION; FACILITIES; INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

See 33 L. R. A. 177, a full note on rates; 79 Fed. Rep. 665; Butterworth, Max. Rates, as to the English practices; RAILROADS.

RATIFICATION. An agreement to adopt an act performed by another for us.

Express ratifications are those made in express and direct terms of assent. Implied ratifications are such as the law presumes from the acts of the principal; as, if Peter buy goods for James, and the latter, knowing the fact, receive them and apply them to his own use.

Ratification of a contract implies an existing person on whose behalf the contract might have been made at the time. There cannot, in law, be a ratification of a contract which could not have been made binding on the ratifier at the time it was made, because the ratifier was not then in existence. 48 Minn. 819.

By ratifying a contract a man adopts the agency altogether, as well what is detrimental as what is for his benefit; 2 Stra. 839; 6 East 164; 16 Mart. La. 105; 1 Ves. 509; Story, Ag. § 250; 9 B. & C. 59; 24 Neb. 653; 34 Id. 110; 81 U. S. App. 340. See 150 U. S. 128.

A ratification, to be efficacious, must be made by a party who had power to do the act in the first place, and it must be made with knowledge of the material facts; 152 U. S. 346.

Where there has been actual and positive fraud, or the adverse party has acted malafide, there can be no such thing as a confirmation; 8 W. & B. 38. The ratification of the signing of a bond by an obligor whose signature has been forged, does not render him liable thereon, there being no new consideration; 67 Pa. 391; s. c. 5 Am. Rep. 445, n.: 33 Ohio St. 405; s. c. 31 Am. Rep. 546, n. But if a contract be merely against conscience, then if a party, being fully informed of all the circumstances of it and objections to it, voluntarily confirms it, his ratification will stand; 67 Pa. 217; 62 Ill. 489; s. c. 14 Am. Rep. 106. When a claim is founded upon an act done without the claimant's knowledge and authority, by a person claiming to act as his agent, the bringing of an action by him based upon that act is a ratification of it; 155 U. S. 18. A forged note cannot be ratified; L. R. 6 Ex. 49; 92 Pa. 447; but see 4 Allen 447.

A party from whom a contract has been wrong by duress must disclaim it on the recovery of freedom, subsequent recognition is the equivalent of ratification; 23 Misc. Rep. 173.

Ratification will, in general, relieve the agent from all responsibility on the contract, when he would otherwise have been liable; 2 Br. & B. 452. See 16 Mass. 461; 8 Wend. 494. See ASSENT; Ayliffe, Pand. *386; 18 Viner, Abr. 156; Story, Ag. 239. See, generally, 25 Am. Law Rev. 14; AGENCY.

A principal having the right to disaffirm acts of an agent must do it promptly, and if not done within a reasonable time ratification will be presumed; 120 U. S. 256. The principle of ratification by laches or delay is applicable to a municipal corporation, such as a county; 139 U. S. 684.

An infant is not, in general, liable on his contracts; but if, after coming of age, he ratify the contract by an actual or express declaration, he will be bound to perform it, as if it had been made after he attained full age. The ratification must be voluntary, deliberate, and intelligent, and the party must know that without it he would not be bound; 8 Pa. 428; see 12 Conn. 551; 10 Mass. 137; 4 Wend. 403; and now in England must be in writing. But a confirmation or ratification of a contract may be implied from acts of the infant after he becomes of age, as, by enjoying or claiming a benefit under a contract he might have wholly rescinded; 1 Pick. 221; and an infant partner will be liable for the contracts of the firm, or at least such as were known to him, if he, after becoming of age, confirm the contract of partnership by transacting business of the firm, receiving profits, and the like; 3 Hill S. C. 479; 1 J. B. Moore 289; 83 S. C. 285.

Where an infant, during his minority, has made a deed or mortgage, his mere failure to disaffirm the conveyance on coming of age, without some positive and clear act of affirmation, will not amount to a ratification; 86 Ala. 442; 86 Ky. 572. See INFANT.

A board of directors may ratify and authorize the execution of a promissory note by the secretary of the corporation for money borrowed; 12 U. S. App. 699.

When a contract is not ultra vires a corporation may ratify it though made without proper authority by its agents; 6 U. S. App. 26.

RATIONABILIBUS DIVISIS, WRIT DE. See DE RATIONABILIBUS DIVISIS.

RATIONAL DOUBT. The "rational doubt" which should result in acquittal, is a doubt as to all or any one of the constituent elements essential to legal responsibility or punishable guilt; and, unless they all concur, acquittal is the legal consequence. 1 Duval (Ky.) 228.

RATIONE TENURE. By reason of tenure.

RATTENING. The offence on the part of members of a trades union, of causing the tools, clothes, or other property of a workman to be taken away or hidden, in order to compel him to join the union or cease working. 88 & 89 Vict. c. 86.

RAVINE. A long, deep, and narrow hollow, worn by a stream or torrent of water; a long, deep, and narrow hollow or pass through the mountains. 36 La. 60.

RAVISHED. In Pleading. A technical word necessary in an indictment for rape.

No other word or circumlocution will answer. The defendant should be charged with having "feloniously ravished" the prosecutrix, or woman, mentioned in the indictment; Bac. Abr. Indictment (G 1); Com. Dig. Indictment (G 6); Hawk. Pl. Cr. 2, c. 25, s. 20; Cro. Car. 37; Co. Litt. 184, n. p; Co. 2d Inst. 180; 1 East, Pl. Cr. 447. The words "feloniously did ravish and carnally know" imply that the act was done forcibly and against the will of the woman; 12 S. & R. 70. See 3 Chitty, Cr. L. 812.

RAVISHMENT. In Criminal Law. An unlawful taking of a woman, or of an heir in ward. Rape, which see.

RAVISHMENT OF WARD. In English Law. The marriage of an infant ward without the consent of the guardian. It is punishable by statute Westminster 2, c. 35.

READING. The act of pronouncing aloud, or of acquiring by actual inspection, a knowledge of the contents of a writing or of a printed document.

In order to enable a party to a contract, or a deviser, to know what a paper contains, it must be read, either by the party himself or by some other persons to him. When a person signs or executes a paper, it will be presumed that it has been read to him; 14 Pa. 496; 82 id. 203; see 82 Ala. 496; 117 U. S. 532; but this presumption may be rebutted.

In the case of a blind testator, if it can be proved that the will was not read to him, it cannot be sustained; 3 Wash. C. C. 580. But when the testator was blind and there are any circumstances giving reasonable ground for suspicion of fraud or imposition, the burden is on those who support the will to show that it was read to him; 1 Houst. 44.

Where one who cannot read or write is disqualified for jury service, the words mean that he must be able to do so in the English language, and that he is able to read and write in German will not remove the objection; 12 Tex. App. 167.

READY. Prepared. The words, "I will be ready to," are held to imply a covenant. 1 Rolfe, Abr. 519, pl. 8.

READY MONEY. A bequest of ready money includes cash at the banker's, whether balance on current account, or a deposit, or withdrawable after notice; 12 L. J. Ch. 385; 27 id. 797; but not unrecieved dividends on stock; 18 L. J. Ch. 401; nor money in the hands of a sales-master; 9 Ir. Eq. Rep. 398; but it has been held that a debt would pass under a bequest of ready money. 23 L. J. Ch. 496.

READY AND WILLING. Implies capacity to act as well as disposition. 11 L. J. Eq. 322. See 5 Bing. N. C. 399.

REAL. At Common Law. A term which is applied to land in its most enlarged signification. Real security, therefore, means the security of mortgages or other incumbrances affecting lands. 2 Atk. 806; s. c. 2 Ves. Sen. 547.

In Civil Law. That which relates to a thing, whether it be movable or immovable, lands or goods: thus, a real injury is one which is done to a thing, as a trespass to property, whether it be real or personal in the common-law sense. A real statute is one which relates to a thing, in contradistinction to such as relate to a person.

REAL ACTION. In Practice. In THE CIVIL LAW. One by which a person seeks to recover his property which is in the possession of another. Dig. 50. 16. 16. It is to be brought against the person who has possession.

AT THE COMMON LAW. One brought for the specific recovery of lands, tenements, or hereditaments. Stephen, Pl. 3.

They are droitural when they are based upon the right of property, and possessory when based upon the right of possession. They are either writs of right; writs of entry upon disseisin (which lie in the per, the per et cui, or the post), intrusion, or alienation; writs ancestral possessory, as mort d'ancestor, aiel, beaiael, coissance, or nuper obit. Comyns, Dig. Actions (D 2).

These actions were always local, and were to be brought in the country where the land lay; Bracton 189, 414. They are now pretty generally laid aside in practice, upon account of the great nicety required in their management, and the inconvenient length of their process,—a much more expeditious method of trying titles being since introduced by other actions, personal and mixed. See Stearns; Booth, Real Act.; Bac. Abr. Actions; Com. Dig. Actions; 3 Bla. Com. 118; ACTION.

REAL ASSETS. See ASSETS.

REAL BURDEN. In Scotch Law. Where a right to land is expressly granted under the burden of a specific sum, which is declared a burden on the lands themselves, or where the right is declared null if the sum be not paid, and where the amount of the sum and the name of the creditor in it can be discovered from the records, the burden is said to be real. Bell, Dict.

REAL CHATTELS. See CHATTEL.

REAL CONTRACT. At Common Law. A contract respecting real property. 3 Rep. 22 a.

In Civil Law. Those contracts which require the interposition of a thing (res) as the subject of them. See CONTRACT.

REAL COVENANT. A covenant whereby a man binds himself to pass a real thing, as lands or tenements; as, a covenant to levy a fine, etc. Shepp. Touchst. 161; Fitzh. N. B. 145; Co. Litt. 384 b.

A covenant, the obligation of which is so connected with the realty that he who has the latter is either entitled to the benefit of or liable to perform the other. 2 Bla. Com. 304, Coleridge's note; Stearns, Real Act. 134; 4 Kent 472.

A covenant by which the covenantor binds his heirs. 2 Bla. Com. 304.

Those by which a single covenantor undertakes the performance of the covenant. It frequently happens that each one of several covenantors binds himself to perform singly the whole undertaking. The words commonly used for this purpose are "severally," "each of us." Still more commonly the undertaking is both joint and several.

It is the nature of the interest, and not the form of the covenant, which determines its character in this respect; 16 How. 580; 1 Gray 376.

Very considerable confusion exists among the authorities in the use of the term real covenants. The definition of Blackstone which determines the character of covenants from the insertion or non-insertion of the word "heir" by the covenantor, is pretty generally rejected. Of the other definitions, that which makes a real covenant an obligation to pass realty is the most ancient. The second definition is that now ordinarily understood when the term "real covenant" is employed.

The benefit of such covenants will always run with the land and can be enforced by any vendee, no matter how remote. The burden, however, will not run with the land so as to be capable of enforcement unless there be privity either of contract or estate between the plaintiff and the defendant; Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. C. 115. These covenants are of various kinds. Some are used in lieu of the ancient warranty. Of these the most common are covenants of warranty, both general and special, covenants of seisin, that the vendor has a good right to convey, for quiet enjoyment, for freedom from incumbrances, and for further assurance. Wms. R. P. 447. In regard to all these, it may be said that in England the right of action passes to and vests in the party in whose time the substantial breach occurs, and who ultimately sustains injury; Rawle, Cov. 324. In the United States, however, the covenants for seisin, for right to convey, and against incumbrances are usually construed to be broken as soon as made and cannot enure to the advantage of subsequent grantees. Covenants of warranty and for quiet enjoyment are, however, prospective, and no breach occurs until eviction, actual or constructive; id. 313. See COVENANT, and the various titles thereunder.

Other real covenants now in use are as follows: either to preserve the inheritance, as to keep in repair; 9 B. & C. 505; 17 Wend. 148; 1 Dall. 210; 6 Yerg. 512; 6 Vt. 276; 88 E. L. & E. 462; to keep buildings insured, and reinstate them if burned; 5 B. & Ald. 1; 6 Gill & J. 372; to continue the relation of landlord and tenant, as to pay rent; 1 Dougl. 183; 2 Rawle 159; 1 Wash. C. C. 375; to do suit to the lessor's mill; 5 Co. 18; 1 B. & C. 410; to grind the tenant's corn; 2 Yeates 74; for the renewal of leases; Moore 159; or to protect the tenant in his enjoyment of the premises, as to warrant and defend, never to claim or assert title; 7 Me. 97; 3 Metc. 121; to release suit and service; Co. Litt. 384 b; to produce title-deeds in defence of the grantee's title; Dig. tit. xxiii. c. 27; § 99; 1 S. & S. 449; to supply water to the premises; 4 B. & Ald. 266; to draw water off from a mill-pond; 19 Pick. 440; not to establish another mill on the same stream; 17 Wend. 138; not to erect buildings on adjacent land; 4 Paige, Ch. 510; to use the land in a specified manner; 13 Sim. 228; generally to create or preserve easements for the benefit of the land granted; 4 E. D. Sm. 122; 1 Bradf. 40. See 2 Greenl. Ev. § 240; 2 Washb. R. P. 648; Spencer's Case, 1 Sm. L. C. 115.

REAL EFFECTS. Real property. 1 Corp. 307. See EFFECTS; REAL PROPERTY.

REAL ESTATE. Landed property. See LAND; REAL PROPERTY.

Under a statute requiring the court ordering a sale of trust lands, and retaining control of the fund realized by the sale, until the same is invested in "real estate" includes "real estate" outside the State. 134 Ky. 146, 119 S. W. 756.

"Real estate" means interest in land other than a chattel interest. 116 S. W. 244.

The words "real estate and land" in a statute mean lands, tenements, and hereditaments, and all right thereto and interests therein other than a chattel interest. 14 Bush (Ky.), 1, 79 Ky. 252.

The words "real estate" or "land" shall be construed to mean lands, tenements and hereditaments and all rights thereto and interests therein, other than a chattel interest; and the words "personal estate" shall include chattels, real and other estate, such as, upon the death of the owner intestate, would devolve upon his personal representative. Section 458, Kentucky Statutes.

REAL ESTATE BROKER. One who engages in the purchase and sale of real estate as a business, and holds himself out to the public in that character and capacity. 26 Pa. 128.

REAL EVIDENCE. Evidence of which any object belonging to the class of things is the source, persons also being included in respect of such properties as belong to them in common with things. This sort of evidence may be either immediate, where the thing comes under the cognizance of our senses; or reported, where its existence is related to us by others. Chamb. Best, Ev. 16.

It is sometimes direct, e.g. when the offense is committed in forti conspectu; but it is most usually circumstantial or indirect. A coroner's inquest must be held super visum corporis, and in all charges of murder, the corpus delicti is proved by production of the dead body—two illustrations of direct real evidence of the fact of a crime having been committed. But who the criminal was, is dependent upon (in general) circumstantial evidence, the inferences from which are usually not necessary, but probable only, and the degree of probability may vary in ever so many degrees, one physical coincidence being sometimes sufficient in itself. But more often circumstantial real evidence is open to innumerable infirmative hypotheses, that may either weaken it or explain it altogether away. R. & L. Dict.; Best Ev., 5th ed., 277-295.

REAL INJURY. An injury arising from an unlawful act, as distinguished from a verbal injury which was done by words.

REAL LAW. At Common Law. A popular term used to denote such parts of the system of common law as concern or relate to real property.

In Civil Law. A law which relates to specific property, whether movable or immovable.

If real law in any given case relate to immovable property, it is limited in its operation to the territory within which that property is situate, real estate being, both by the common and continental laws, subject exclusively to the laws of the government within whose territory it is situate; Story, Conf. L. 426. See LEX REI SITÆ.

REAL PARTY IN INTEREST. A shipper, having assigned his rights to another, is not the "real party in interest," and cannot prosecute an appeal in his name alone from a judgment dismissing the petition, where he sued for the benefit of the assignee, alleging that the assignee was entitled to any judgment that was rendered in the action, and the assignee did not appeal. Civil Code of Kentucky § 18, 19, 21; 146 Ky. 514, 142 S. W. 1037.

REAL PROPERTY. Land, and generally whatever is erected or growing upon or affixed to land. 9 Day 374; 37 Minn. 4; also rights issuing out of, annexed to, and exercisable within or about the same. Annexations made by a stranger to the soil of another without his consent become the property of the owner of the soil; Britton, bk. 2, ch. 2, sec. 6, p. 856; 2 Kent 834; 15 Ill. 397; 16 Mass. 449; 105 id. 414; 82 Fed. Rep. 857. When annexations are made by the owner of the soil with the materials of another, so long as the identity of the original materials can be proved, the right of the original owner is not lost; 23 Vt. 620; 57 N. H. 514. Such property has the quality of passing on the death of the owner to the heir and not the executor. It may either be corporeal or incorporeal. See WILL, Real P. 12.

In respect to property, real and personal correspond very nearly with immovables and movables of the civil law. By the latter "biens" is a general term for property; and these are classified into movable and immovable, and the latter are subdivided into corporeal and incorporeal. Guyot, Répert. Biens.

By immovables the civil law intended property which could not be removed at all, or not without destroying the same, together with such movables as are fixed to the freehold, or have been so fixed and are intended to be again united with it, although at the time severed therefrom. Taylor, Civ. L. 475.

Real property includes also some things not strictly land or rights exercised or engaged in reference thereto—such are offices and dignities, which are so classed because in ancient times such titles were annexed to the ownership of various lands; Wms. R. P. 8. Corodies and annuities are also sometimes classed as real property. Shares of stock in railway and canal companies are in England real property unless made personally by act of parliament. In the United States the better opinion is that they are personally independent of statutory enactment; Ang. & A. Corp. § 537; 2 Kent 340, n. Some interests in lands are regarded as personal property, and are governed by the rules relating thereto—such are terms of years of lands. Such interests are known as chattels real; 2 Bla. Com. 386.

Though the term real, as applied to property, in distinction from personal, is now so familiar, it is one of a somewhat recent introduction. While the feudal law prevailed, the terms in use in its stead were lands, tenements, or hereditaments. These acquired the epithet of real from the nature of the remedy applied by law for the recovery of them, as distinguished from that provided in case of injuries, contracts broken, and the like. In the one case the claimant or demandant recovered the real thing sued for,—the land itself,—while, ordinarily, in the other he could only recover recompense in the form of pecuniary damages.

The term, it is said, as a means of designation, did not come into general use until after the feudal system had lost its hold, nor till even as late as the commencement of the seventeenth century. One of the earliest cases in which the courts applied the distinctive terms of real and personal to estates, without any words of explanation, is said to have been that of Wind v. Jekyl, 1 P. Wms. 575; Wms. R. P. 66.

Corporeal hereditaments comprise land and whatever is erected or growing upon or affixed thereto, including whatever is beneath or above the surface, "usque ad celum;" 2 Bla. Com. 17-19; Co. Litt. 4 a. Houses, trees, growing crops, and other articles fixed to the soil, though usually classed as realty, may under certain circumstances and for certain purposes acquire the character of personality. Thus if one erect a building on the land of another with the latter's consent, it is the personal estate of the builder and may be levied on by his creditors as such; 6 N. H. 555; 6 Me. 452; 8 Pick. 402; 55 Minn. 211; 39 id. 479; see 159 U. S. 463; but if he fail to remove it within a reasonable time after being ejected from the land, it becomes a part of the realty; 37 Minn. 104. If it is sold to the owner of the soil, it becomes real property; 80 Me. 542. So if a nurseryman plant trees upon land leased for the purpose of growing them for the market, the trees are deemed personality; 1 Met. 27; 4 Taunt. 316. So where the owner of land sells growing trees (not in a nursery to be cut by the vendee), they will be deemed to pass as personality where the contract gives no right to the vendee to allow them to remain upon the land; 4 Metc. Mass. 580; 9 B. & C. 581. But where there is an understanding, express or implied, that the trees may remain upon the land and be cut at the pleasure of the vendee, then the property in the trees is deemed real; 4 Mass. 268; 7 N. H. 523. So crops, while growing, planted by the owner of the land, are a part of the real estate; but if sold by him when fit for harvesting, they become personality; 5 B. & C. 829; and a sale of such crops, though not fit for harvest, has been held good as personality; 4 M. & W. 343; 2 Dana 203; 2 Rawle 161. See 39 Ill. App. 404. A rose-bush in a yard will pass by a deed of the realty; 19 N. Y. S. 381. See EMBLEMENTS; MINES AND MINING.

There are a large number of articles known as fixtures, which, though originally wholly movable and personal in their nature, have acquired, by having been affixed to real estate or applied to use in connection with it, the character of realty. Such articles pass from the vendor to the vendee of the land as realty; 2 Kent 845; 2 Sm. L. C. 228; 20 Wend. 636; even though they may be at the time temporarily disconnected. See FIXTURES.

The intention of the parties immediately concerned, who have agreed that property annexed to the soil shall retain its character as personality, will prevail except as against innocent purchasers without notice, unless the property be of such a nature that it necessarily becomes incorporated into and a part of the realty by the act and manner of annexation; 117 Ind. 176.

Manure made upon a farm in the usual manner for consumption of its products would be a part of the real estate; while if made from products purchased and brought on to the land by the tenant, as in case of a livery-stable, it would be personal; 21 Pick. 367; 3 N. H. 503; 6 Me. 222; 2 N. Chipm. 115; 11 Conn. 525; 15 Wend. 169; 80 N. H. 558. See MANURE; FIXTURES.

Equity will, in many instances, for the sake of enforcing and preserving the rights of parties interested, regard realty as converted into personality and personality as converted into realty, although no such change may actually have taken place. So where realty is devised by a testator to his executors with imperative directions to sell, the devolution of the property, even before actual conversion, will be controlled by the rules relating to personality; 1 Bro. C. C. 497; 3 Wheat. 563; 72 Pa. 417. So where money is directed to be laid out in lands, it will be deemed realty for purposes of descent even before the purchase; 1 Bro. C. C. 503. But such direction must be imperative, otherwise no such result ensues; 3 Atk. 255; L. R. 7 Eq. 226; 10 Pa. 131. So realty owned by a partnership will be deemed personality for the purposes of the partnership; 3 Kent 39; 81 Pa. 377; 1 Black 346; 7 Conn. 11. And the moment a corporation has exercised its right to condemn land, conversion takes place, in Pennsylvania. See PARTNERSHIP; CONVERSION; INCORPORAL HEREDITAMENTS; LAND TRANSFER; REGISTRATION.

REAL REPRESENTATIVE. The words "real representative" mean the heir or devisee of real property of a deceased person. Section 732, Subsection 18, Civil Code of Kentucky.

REAL RIGHT. In Scotch Law. That which entitles him who is vested with it to possess the subject as his own, and, if in the possession of another, to demand from him its actual possession.

It is distinguished from a personal right, which is that of action against a debtor, but without any right in the subject which the debtor is obliged to transfer to him. Real rights affect the subject itself; personal are founded in obligation. Erskine, Prin. 478.

By analogy, the right which a claimant in an action of replevin seeks to enforce at common law would be a real one, while the compensation which the plaintiff seeks in an action of assumpsit or trover, being a pecuniary one, would be personal.

REAL SERVITUDE. In Scotch Law. A burden imposed upon one tenement in favor of another tenement. Ersk. Prin. 206.

REAL STATUTES. Statutes which have property for their principal object, and do not speak of persons, except in relation to property. Sto. Conf. L. § 13.

REAL THINGS. Things substantial and immovable, and the rights and profits annexed to or issuing out of them. 1 Steph. Com. 167.

REALM. A kingdom; a country. 1 Taunt. 270; 4 Camp. 289; Rose 387.

REALTY. A term sometimes used as a collective noun for real property or estate—more generally to imply that that of which it is spoken is of the nature or character of real property or estate. See REAL PROPERTY THINGS REAL.

REAR. The word has been held not necessarily to mean directly behind. 109 Mass. 82.

REASON. That power by which we distinguish truth from falsehood and right from wrong, and by which we are enabled to combine means for the attainment of particular ends. Encyclopædie; Shelf. Lun. Intro. xxvi. Ratio in jure æquitas integra.

A man deprived of reason is not, in many cases, criminally responsible for his acts, nor can he enter into any contract.

Reason is called the soul of the law; for when the reason ceases the law itself ceases. Co. Litt. 97, 183; 1 Bla. Com. 70; 7 Toul. n. 566; MAXIMS, Cessante ratione, etc.

REASONABLE. Conformable or agreeable to reason; just; rational.

An award must be reasonable; for if it be of things nugatory in themselves, and offering no advantage to either of the parties, it cannot be enforced; 8 Bouvier, Inst. n. 2096. See AWARD.

REASONABLE ACT. This term signifies such an act as the law requires. When an act is unnecessary, a party will not be required to perform it as a reasonable act; 9 Price 43; Yelv. 44; Platt, Cov. 342, 157.

REASONABLE CARE. That care and foresight which men of ordinary prudence are accustomed to employ. 6 Duer 646. It is synonymous with ordinary care; 3 S. Dak. 93; see 42 Mo. 95; or due care; 10 Allen 532. See CARE; DUE CARE; NEG-LIGENCE; ORDINARY CARE.

Care exercised in proportion to the danger of doing harm to others. Anderson; 54 Conn. 172. A relative term, with no fixed meaning. The caution which persons of ordinary prudence would exercise in any given case is "reasonable care" in law. That care which under some circumstances would be reasonable care might under other circumstances be gross negligence. Id.; 34 Wis. 318.

REASONABLE DOUBT. See DOUBT.

A doubt based on reason, and which is reasonable in view of all the evidence. If, after an impartial comparison and consideration of all the evidence a juror can candidly say that he is not satisfied of the defendant's guilt, he has a reasonable doubt. But if, after impartial comparison and consideration of all the evidence the juror can truthfully say he has an "abiding conviction" (q. v.) of the defendant's guilt, such as he would be willing to act upon in the more weighty and important matters relating to his own affairs, he has no reasonable doubt. 120 U. S. 439.

REASONABLE EXPECTATION. Within the meaning of the English bankruptcy act of 1883, one who begins business without capital and with a mortgage on all his assets, is held to have contracted his debts without reasonable or probable ground of expectation of being able to pay. 14 Q. B. D. 600.

REASONABLE FACILITIES. See FACILITIES.

REASONABLE FEE. A "reasonable attorney's fee" is such attorney's fee as the law allows to be charged. 93 Ky. 626, 20 S. W. 1041.

REASONABLE GROUNDS. The words "reasonable grounds," when used with reference to belief of a thing, are such grounds as would induce a person of ordinary prudence under the circumstances to believe it. 107 S. W. 214.

REASONABLE PART. The shares to which the wife and children of a deceased person were entitled, were called their "reasonable parts"; and the writ de rationabili parte bonorum was given to recover them. R. & L. Dict.; Brown.

REASONABLE PORTION. A power to charge an estate with reasonable portions or fortunes for younger children and for their maintenance and education is sufficiently certain to be capable of execution, and the word reasonable there is applicable not only to the amount of the portion, but also to the time and occasion on which the child would want it. Beatty 318.

REASONABLE AND PROBABLE CAUSE. In Malicious Prosecution. A reasonable amount of suspicion, supported by circumstances sufficiently strong in themselves to warrant a cautious man in believing that the accused is guilty; but mere suspicion alone is not sufficient. 32 Neb. 444. See MALICIOUS PROSECUTION.

REASONABLE QUESTION. See QUESTION.

REASONABLE RATES. See INTER-STATE COMMERCE COMMISSION; RATES; IN-TERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

REASONABLE REWARD. Under a contract to pass boats through a canal for a "reasonable reward," a "reasonable reward" is prima facie, the legal tolls. It could not be a greater or less sum than the tolls which they had a right to charge. 8 Dana (Ky.) 161-162.

REASONABLE SKILL. Such skill as is ordinarily possessed and exercised by persons of common capacity, engaged in the same business or employment. 6 Metc. 26.

REASONABLE TIME. The English law, which in this respect has been adopted by us, frequently requires things to be done within a reasonable time; but what a reasonable time is, it does not define: quam longum debet esse rationabile tempus non definitur in lege, sed pendet ex discretione justiciariorum; Co. Litt. 50.

The question of reasonable time is left to be fixed by circumstances and the usages of business. A bill of exchange must be presented within a reasonable time; Chitty, Bills 197-202. An abandonment must be made within a reasonable time after advice received of the loss; Marsh. Ins. 589.

The commercial code of France fixes a time in both these cases, which varies in proportion to the distance. See Code de Com. l. 1, t. 8, s. 1, § 10, art. 160; id. l. 5, t. 10, s. 3, art. 373. See NOTICE OF DIS-HONOR; PROTEST.

Where the facts are admitted or clearly proved, what is a reasonable time is a question of law for the court depending upon all the circumstances of the case; 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1023.

It has been held that where the question of reasonable time is one affected by many different circumstances with respect to which no definite rule of law has been laid down, it is a question for the jury. It is a question for the court when by a series of decisions on the same data it has been rendered certain; 22 U. S. App. 104. See ARGUMENT.

REASONABLY. The adverb "reasonably" is a qualifying word. It is defined as meaning moderately or tolerably, and that is its commonly understood meaning 117 Ky. 144, 77 S. W. 712.

REASONABLY REGARDED. The words "reasonably regarded" held equivalent to "considered." 154 Ky. 408, 157 S. W. 1133.

REASONABLY SAFE. A car stall in which a horse is transported by a carrier is "reasonably safe" when it is such as a person of ordinary care would provide. 131 Ky. 257, 117 S. W. 270.

REASSURANCE. When an insurer is desirous of lessening his liability, he may procure some other insurer to insure him from loss for the insurance he has made: this is called reinsurance.

RE-ATTACHMENT. A second attachment of him who has formerly attached and dismissed the court without day, by the not coming of the justices, or some such casualty. Reg. Orig. 35.

REBATE. In Mercantile Law. Discount; the abatement of interest in consequence of prompt payment. An allowance by way of discount or drawback.

The allowance of rebates is a common method by which common carriers discriminate between shippers; the practice is unlawful; and a contract to procure rebates from railroad companies for a shipper is void as being in violation of the provisions of the interstate commerce law; 6 Misc. Rep. 570.

There is nothing in the interstate commerce law which, by reason of the allowance of rebates, if actually made, would invalidate a contract of affreightment, or exempt a railroad company from liability on its bills of lading; 151 U. S. 368; in cases where the facts are controverted or doubtful, it is for the jury to determine the facts, and the court to apply the law in determining the question; Wells, Law & Fact 135.

REBEL. A citizen or subject who unjustly and unlawfully takes up arms against the constituted authorities of the nation, to deprive them of the supreme power, either by resisting their lawful and constitutional orders in some particular matter or to impose on them conditions. Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 3, § 328. In another sense, it signifies a refusal to obey a superior or the commands of a court.

REBELLION. In Criminal Law. The taking up arms traitorously against the government. The forcible opposition and resistance to the laws and process lawfully issued.

Insurrection, sedition, rebellion, revolt, and mutiny express action directed against government or authority, while riot has this implication only incidentally, if at all. They express actual and open resistance to authority. Except sedition, which may be secret or open, and often is only of a nature to lead to overt acts. An insurrection goes beyond sedition, in that it is an actual arising against the government. Rebellion goes beyond insurrection in aim, being an attempt actually to overthrow the government, while an insurrection seeks only some change of minor importance. A rebellion is generally on a larger scale than an insurrection. A revolt has generally the same aim as a rebellion, but it is on a smaller scale. A revolt may be against military government, but is generally like insurrection, sedition, and rebellion against civil government. A mutiny is organized resistance to law in an army or navy, and sometimes a similar act by an individual. The success of a rebellion often dignifies it with the name of a revolution. Cent. Dict.

If the rebellion amount to treason, it is punished by the laws of the United States with death. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5332. If it be a mere resistance of process, it is generally punished by fines and imprisonment. Id. § 5336. See Daloz, Dict.; Code Penal 201.

When a rebellion has broken out in any state, the rebel cruisers may be treated as pirates by the established government, if the rebel government has not been recognized as belligerent by the parent state or by foreign nations; but the right ceases to exist on the recognition of the rebels as belligerents; 2 Black 273; 11 Wall. 209; Boyd's Wheat. Int. Law 169.

REBELLION, COMMISSION OF. In Old English Practice. A writ issuing out of chancery to compel the defendant to appear.

REBOUTER. To repel or bar. The action of the heir by the warranty of his ancestor is called to rebut or repel.

REBUS SIC STANTIBUS. At this point of affairs. R. & L. Diet.

REBUT. To contradict; to do away.

REBUTTABLE PRESUMPTION. See PRESUMPTION.

REBUTTAL. See REBUTTING EVIDENCE.

REBUTTER. In Pleading. The name of the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's surrejoinder. It is governed by the same rules as the rejoinder. Comyns, Dig. Pleading (K). See PLEADINGS; Andr. Steph. 51.

REBUTTING EVIDENCE. That evidence which is given by a party in the cause to explain, repel, counteract, or disprove facts given in evidence on the other side. The term rebutting evidence is more particularly applied to that evidence given by the plaintiff to explain or repel the evidence given by the defendant.

It is a general rule that anything may be given as rebutting evidence which is a direct reply to that produced on the other side; 2 McCord 181; and the proof of circumstances may be offered to rebut the most positive testimony; 1 Pet. C. C. 235. It is within the discretion of the court to allow evidence in rebuttal which should have been offered in chief; 36 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1010.

But there are several rules which exclude all rebutting evidence. A party cannot impeach his own witness, though he may disprove, by other witnesses, matters to which he has testified; 3 Litt. 405; nor can he rebut or contradict what a witness has sworn to which is immaterial to the issue; 16 Pick. 153; 2 Bail. 118.

Parties and privies are estopped from contradicting a written instrument by parol proof; but this rule does not apply to strangers; 10 Johns. 229. But the parties may prove that before breach the agreement was abandoned, or annulled by a subsequent agreement not in writing; 4 N. H. 196. And when the writing was made by another, as where the log-book stated a desertion, the party affected by it may prove that the entry was false or made by mistake; 4 Mas. 541. It is within the discretion of a trial court to permit witnesses to be called in rebuttal whose testimony is in support of that given in chief; 4 U. S. App. 563.

RECALL. In International Law. To deprive a minister of his functions; to supersede him.

Where a mission to a foreign country is terminated by a formal letter of recall, the minister usually delivers a copy thereof to the minister or secretary of foreign affairs, obtains an audience of the sovereign or chief executive, and delivers or exhibits the original of his recall. If he is recalled at the request of the government to which he is accredited, he would neither ask nor receive an audience of leave. If recalled on account of a misunderstanding between the two governments, it must depend upon circumstances whether a formal letter of recall is to be sent to him or whether he may quit the residence without waiting for it; also as to whether he shall demand or the sovereign shall grant him an audience of leave; 1 Hall. Int. L. 365. See LETTER OF RECALL; MINISTER.

RECALL A JUDGMENT. To reverse a judgment on a matter of fact.

RECAPTION. The act of a person who has been deprived of the custody of another, to which he is legally entitled, by which he regains the peaceable custody of such person; or of the owner of personal or real property who has been deprived of his possession, by which he retakes possession peaceably.

In each of these cases the law allows the recapture of the person or of the property, provided he can do so without occasioning a breach of the peace or an injury to a third person who has not been a party to the wrong. Co. 8d Inst. 184; 2 Rolle, Abr. 565; 3 Bla. Com. 5.

The right of recapture of a person is confined to a husband, in retaking his wife; a parent, his child, of whom he has the custody; a master, his apprentice; and, according to Blackstone, a master, his servant,—but this must be limited to a servant who assents to the recapture; in these cases, the party injured may peaceably enter the house of the wrong-doer, without a demand being first made, the outer door being open, and take and carry away the person wrongfully detained. He may also enter peaceably into the house of a person harboring, who was not concerned in the original abduction; 8 Bingham. 186.

The same principles extend to the right of recapture of personal property. The true owner of goods wrongfully taken may retake them if he can, even from a third party, using (it is said) whatever force is reasonably necessary; Poll. Torts 361; and may enter, for that purpose, on the first taker's land, but not on a third person's land, unless, it is said, the original taking was felonious, or, perhaps, after the goods have been claimed and the occupier of the land has refused to deliver them up; Poll. Torts 361.

In the recapture of real estate, the owner may, in the absence of the occupier, break open the outer door of a house and take possession; but if in regaining his possession the party be guilty of a forcible entry and breach of the peace, he may be indicted; but the wrong-doer, or person who had no right to the possession, cannot sustain any action for such forcible regaining possession merely; 1 Chitty, Pr. 646. See Cooley; Pollock, Torts.

RECAPTURE. The recovery from the enemy, by a force friendly to the former owner, of a prize by him captured.

It seems incumbent on fellow-citizens, and it is of course equally the duty of allies, to rescue each other from the enemy when there is a reasonable prospect of success; 3 C. Rob. 224.

By the act of March 3, 1800, in case of recapture of vessels or goods belonging to persons resident within, or under the protection of, the United States, the same, not having been condemned as prize by competent authority before the recapture, shall be restored to the owner upon payment of salvage of one-eighth of the value, if recaptured by a public ship, and one-sixth if recaptured by a private ship; and if the recaptured vessel shall appear to have been set forth and armed as a vessel of war before its capture, or afterwards and before recapture, then the salvage shall be one moiety of the value. If the recaptured vessel belong to the government and be unarmed, the salvage is one-sixth, if recaptured by a private ship, and one-twelfth if recaptured by a public ship; if armed, the salvage is one moiety, if recaptured by a public ship. In respect to public armed ships, the cargo pays the same rate of salvage as the vessel; as to private ships, the rate of salvage is the same on the cargo whether the vessel be armed or unarmed. See 9 Cra. 244. The valuation of the property is to be made at the place of restitution, not of recapture; Edw. Adm. 210.

Salvage is not generally allowed on the recapture of neutral property, unless there be danger of condemnation, or such injurious conduct on the part of the government of the captors as to bring the property into jeopardy; 6 C. Rob. 410; 1 Cra. 102. To entitle a party to salvage there must have been actual or constructive capture; but it is sufficient if the property was completely under the dominion of the enemy; 3 C. Rob. 305; it is a recapture if the prize was actually rescued from the grasp of the hostile captor; id.; 3 Phill. Int. L. 638. Where the enemy has captured a ship and then abandoned her and she is recaptured, she is to be restored on payment of salvage, but the rate of salvage is discretionary; 6 C. Rob. 273; but if the abandonment be caused by terror of a hostile fleet, it is a recapture; id.

Where a prize is abandoned and brought into court by neutral salvors, a neutral court has jurisdiction to decree salvage, but cannot restore the property to the original owner; neutral nations ought not to inquire into the validity of a capture as between belligerents; 3 Dall. 188.

Recapture can be made by a non-commissioned vessel; 3 C. Rob. 229.

In Great Britain prize statutes were formerly passed at the beginning of every war. The Naval Prize Act, 1864, provides that, as between subjects, the right to recover possession is preserved forever, except where the vessel, after capture, has been fitted out by the enemy for war. The right is subject, when the recapture is by a public ship, to the payment of one-eighth salvage or when the recapture is made under circumstances of special difficulty or danger, more than one-eighth, but not exceeding one-fourth. The French rule is to restore a vessel recaptured by a public vessel on the payment of one-thirtieth of the value, if recaptured within twenty-four hours; if after that time, the salvage is one-tenth.

If a belligerent captures neutral property, and it is recaptured by the other belligerent, the latter usually restores it without the payment of salvage.

If the prize has been duly condemned and sold to a neutral purchaser by the captors, that title prevails against the original owners and the recaptors, both under the English and American rule. But such condemnation must be in a competent prize court of the belligerents and not one held in neutral territory. 1 C. Rob. 135.

A recaptured vessel may be permitted, under the English act of 1864, to continue her voyage, or be brought in at once for adjudication; in the former case the recaptor does not lose his right to salvage. If she does not return to a port of the kingdom within six months, the recaptor may proceed in the admiralty, for his salvage.

See INFRA PRÆSIDIA; NEUTRALITY; POST-LIMINIUM; PRIZE.

RECEIPT (Lat. receptum, received; through Fr. receit). A written acknowledgment of payment of money or delivery of chattels.

It is executed by the person to whom the delivery or payment is made, and may be used as evidence against him, on the general principle which allows the admission or declaration of a party to be given in evidence against himself. As an instrument of evidence, the receipt of one person is, in general, inoperative against another, although often useful as a voucher in the private settlement of accounts; and the statutes of some states make receipts for small payments made by executors, etc., evidence of the payment on a settlement of their accounts. And receipts of public officers are sometimes admissible per se; 1 Ill. 45. It is essential to a receipt that it acknowledge the payment or delivery referred to; Russ. & R. 227; 7 C. & P. 549. And under the stamp laws a delivery or payment must be stated; 1 Camp. 499. Also the receipt must, from the nature of the case, be in writing, and must be delivered to the debtor; for a memorandum of payment made by the creditor in his own books is no receipt; 2 B. & Ald. 501, n.; 1 Spear 53. See 37 Mo. 432.

Receipts, effect of. The mere acknowledgment of payment made is not treated in law as binding or conclusive in any high degree. So far as a simple acknowledgment of payment or delivery is concerned, it is presumptive evidence only; Whart. Ev. 1064, 1130, 1365; 1 Pet. C. C. 182; 1 Rich. 32; 1 Harr. 5; 16 Wend. 460; 16 Me. 475; 5 Ark. 61; 11 Mass. 27, 363; 3 McLean 265; 6 B. Monr. 199; 1 Perr. & D. 437; 8 Gill 179; 3 Jones N. C. 501; 18 Colo. 598; 43 Ill. App. 615; 115 U. S. 183; 46 Hun 270; 111 Pa. 562; and is, in general, open to explanation; Tay. Ev. 654, 736, 965; 2 Johns. 378; Add. Contr. 142; 8 Ala. N. S. 59; 4 Vt. 309; 3 McLean 387; 4 Barb. 265; 5 J. J. Marsh. 79; 5 Mich. 171; 32 S. C. 595; 35 Kan. 464; 125 U. S. 90; 68 La. 537; being an exception to the general rule that parol evidence cannot be admitted to contradict or vary a written instrument; 5 Johns. 68; 2 Metc. Mass. 283. Thus, a party may always show, in explanation of a receipt limited to such acknowledgment, the actual circumstances under which it was made; 8 Johns. 389; e. g. that it was obtained by fraud; Wright Ohio 764; 4 H.

& M'H. 219; or given under a mistake; 6 Barb. 58; 8 Dana 427; or that, in point of fact, no money was actually paid as stated in it; 2 Strobh. 890; 8 N. Y. 168; 10 Vt. 96; 34 Mo. App. 189; 83 Ill. 134. But see 1 J. J. Marsh. 538; or that the medium of remittance on which the receipt was based has failed; 51 Neb. 5; or where it is given by a contractor under an assurance that it is only a receipt for moneys then paid, and would not preclude him from making a claim for extra work; 18 App. Div. N. Y. 514. A receipt in full for part of an undisputed claim does not prevent recovery of the balance, though given with knowledge and there was no error or fraud; 19 Misc. Rep. 357. A receipt is an admission only; Greenl. Ev. 1, 212; 3 B. & Ad. 318; 112 Mo. 661; it is but prima facie evidence against the creditor; 13 U. S. App. 597; and may be explained, unless executed with the formalities of a deed; Leake, Contr. 901; in law as well as equity; L. R. 6 Ch. 534. As against a stranger thereto, it is incompetent evidence of the payment thereby acknowledged; 50 N. W. Rep. (Neb.) 703. Mere negligence in signing a receipt without reading it will not conclude the signer or preclude explanation of its contents, particularly if the signing were induced by fraud or misrepresentation; 57 Kan. 105.

Receipts "in full." When, however, we find a receipt acknowledging payment "in full" of a specified debt, or "in full of all accounts" or of "all demands," the instrument is of a much higher and more conclusive character. It does not, indeed, like a release, operate upon the demand itself, extinguishing it by any force or virtue in the receipt, but it is evidence of a compromise and mutual settlement of the rights of the parties. The law infers from such acknowledgment an adjustment of the amount due, after consideration of the claims of each party, and a payment of the specified sum as a final satisfaction; 10 Vt. 491; 2 Dev. 247; Wright Ohio 764; 21 N. H. 85; 120 N. Y. 190. This compromise thus shown by the receipt will often operate to extinguish a demand, although the creditor may be able to show he did not receive all that he justly ought. Papers showing a receipt of money in full satisfaction of a decree appealed from, cannot be varied or contradicted by parol evidence; 120 U. S. 198. See ACCORD.

If the rights of a party are doubtful, are honestly contested, and time is given to allow him to satisfy himself, a receipt in full, though given for less than his just rights, will not be set aside. Thus, in general, a receipt in full is conclusive when given with a knowledge of the circumstances, and when the party giving it cannot complain of any misapprehension as to the compromise he was making, or of any fraud; 5 Vt. 520; 1 Camp. 302; 2 Strobh. 208; and unless given in ignorance of its purport, or under circumstances constituting duress, it is an acquittance in bar of any further demand; 151 U. S. 488.

But receipts of this character are not wholly exempt from explanation; fraud or misrepresentation may be proved, and so may such mistake as enters into and vitiates the compromise of the demand admitted; Brayt. 75; 1 Camp. 394; Cox N. J. 48; 2 Brev. 223; 4 H. & M'H. 219; 4 Barb. 265; 2 Harring. 392; 2 C. & P. 44. See 73 Mich. 138; 141 U. S. 564. The evidence in explanation must be clear and full, and addressed to the point that there was not in fact an intended and valid compromise of the demand. For if the compromise was not binding, the receipt in full will not aid it. The receipt only operates as evidence of a compromise which extinguished the claim; 26 Me. 88; 4 Denio 166; 2 McCord 320; 4 Wash. C. C. 562.

A receipt for a specified amount of money and designated notes executed by a defendant to the plaintiff's intestate may be used as evidence that it was a deposit with the latter and not a payment to him where there is other evidence to the same effect; 114 Cal. 612.

Though a receipt in full is presumed to be in full settlement the presumption is not conclusive; 32 S. W. Rep. (Ky.) 623; and where it is given for work and labor, a receipt in full for the bill rendered is not conclusive evidence of a final settlement unless it purports to be so; 91 Hun 639. Where the question is raised whether the purchase price of an article has been paid notwithstanding a receipt, and there is evidence to the contrary, the question is for the jury; 2 App. Div. N. Y. 93; and a jury is not precluded from finding that a receipt in full was not intended to be such by the fact that he who signed it gave no explanation for doing so; 87 Me. 429.

Receipts in deeds. The effect to be given to a receipt for the consideration-money, so frequently inserted in a deed of real property, has been the subject of numerous and conflicting adjudications. The general principle settled by weight of authority is that for the purpose of sustaining the conveyance as against the vendor and his privies the receipt is conclusive: they are estopped to deny that a consideration was paid sufficient to sustain the conveyance; 1 Binn. 502; 20 Mo. 50; 4 Hill N. Y. 643. But in a subsequent action for the purchase-money or upon any collateral demand, e. g. in an action to recover a debt which was in fact paid by the conveyance, or in an action for damages for breach of a covenant in the deed, and the like, the grantor may show that the consideration was not in fact paid—that an additional consideration to that mentioned was agreed for, etc.; 16 Wend. 460; 10 Vt. 96; 4 N. H. 229, 397; 1 McCord 514; 7 Pick. 533; 1 Rand. 219; 4 Dev. 355; 6 Me. 364; 5 B. & Ald. 603; 5 Ala. 234; 2 Harring. Del. 334; 13 Miss. 238; 5 Conn. 113; 1 Harr. & G. 139; 2 Humphr. 534; 1 J. J. Marsh. 387; 3 Ind. 212; 15 Ill. 200; 1 Stockt. Ch. 492. See 30 Mo. App. 253. But there are many contrary cases. See 1 Me. 2; 7 Johns. 341; 3 McCord 532; 1 Harr. & J. 232; 1 Hawks 64; 4 Hen. & M. 113; 2 Ohio 182; 1 B. & C. 704. And when the deed is attacked for fraud, or is impeached by creditors as voluntary and therefore void, or when the object is to show the conveyance illegal, the receipt may be explained or contradicted; 3 Zaher 463; 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 461; 21 Pa. 480; 20 Pick. 247; 12 N. H. 248. See ASSUMPSIT; DEED; RECITAL.

With this exception of receipts inserted in a sealed instrument having some other purpose to which the receipt is collateral, a receipt under seal works an absolute estoppel, on the same principles and to the same general extent as other specialties; Ware 490; 4 Hawks 22. Thus, where an assignment of seamen's wages bore a sealed receipt for the consideration money, even though the attesting witness testified that no money was paid at the execution of the papers, and defendant offered no evidence of any payment ever having been made, and refused to produce his account with the plaintiff (the assignor), on the trial, it was held that the receipt was conclusive; 3 Taunt. 141. See SEAL; SPECIALTY.

Receipt embodying contract. A receipt may embody a contract; and in this case it is not open to the explanation or contradiction permitted in the case of a simple receipt; 4 Gray 180; 44 Minn. 471. An agreement in a receipt is as conclusive as any other paper executed between the parties; 125 U. S. 90. The fact that it embodies an agreement brings it within the rule that all matters resting in parol are merged in the writing. See EVIDENCE. Thus, a receipt which contains a clause amounting to an agreement as to the application to be made of the money paid—as when it is advanced on account of future transactions—is not open to parol evidence inconsistent with it; 5 Ind. 109; 14 Wend. 116; 12 Pick. 40, 562. A bill of parcels with prices affixed, rendered by a seller of goods to a purchaser, with a receipt of payment executed at the foot, was held in one case to amount to a contract of sale of the goods, and therefore not open to parol explanation; while in another case a similar bill was held merely a receipt, the bill at the head being deemed only a memorandum to show to what the receipt applied; 3 Cra. 311; 1 Bibb 371. A bill of lading, which usually contains words of receipt stating the character, quantity, and condition of the goods as delivered to the carrier, is the subject of a somewhat peculiar rule. It is held that so far as the receipt is concerned it may be explained by parol; 6 Mass. 422; 7 Id. 297; 3 N. Y. 321; 10 Id. 559; 1 Abb. Adm. 200, 397; 39 Ill. App. 17. But see 1 Bull. 174.

A receipt for rent given to a tenant after notice to quit where the person signing it is not shown to have been authorized by the landlord to receive the rent, is not admissible in an action by the latter to recover possession; 19 Misc. Rep. 56; and in such action receipts given by the same landlord to another tenant are not admissible to show the character of the tenancy by a difference in the form of receipts, the receipt being in the one case for one month only and in the other not specifying the time, and the effort being to establish a monthly tenancy; id.

But as respects the agreement to carry and deliver, the bill is a contract, to be construed, like all other contracts, according to the legal import of its terms, and cannot be varied by parol; 3 Sandf. 7. In this connection may also be mentioned the receipt customarily given in the New England states, more particularly for goods on which an attachment has been levied. The officer taking the goods often, instead of retaining them in his own manual control, delivers them to some third person, termed the "receiver," who gives his receipt for them, undertaking to redeliver upon demand. This receipt has in some respects a peculiar force. The receiver having acknowledged that the goods have been attached cannot afterwards object that no attachment was actually made, or that it was insufficient or illegal; 11 Mass. 219, 317; 24 Pick. 196. Nor can he deny that the property was that of the debtor, except in mitigation of damages or after redelivery; 12 Pick. 502; 15 Id. 40. And in the absence of fraud, the value of the chattels stated in the receipt is conclusive upon the receiver; 12 Pick. 362.

Where the payment is made in some particular currency or medium, as doubtful bank bills, a promissory note of another person, etc., clauses are often inserted in the receipts specifying the condition in which such mode of payment is accepted. In most states negotiable paper given in payment is presumed to have been accepted on the condition that it shall not work a discharge of the demand unless the papers shall ultimately produce satisfaction; and if an intent to accept it absolutely does not affirmatively appear, the creditor is entitled, in case the paper turned out to him is dishonored, to return it and claim to be paid anew. See PAYMENT. If the receipt is silent on that subject, it is open to explanation, and the creditor may rebut it by proof that the payment admitted was in fact made by a note, bill, check, bank-notes afterwards ascertained to be counterfeited, or notes of a bank in fact insolvent though not known to be so to the parties, etc.; 1 Wash. C. C. 338; 1 W. & S. 521; 2 Johns. Cas. 438; 13 Wend. 101; 3 McLean 265; 5 J. J. Marsh. 78. But see 3 Caines, Cas. 14; 1 Munf. 460; 1 Metc. Mass. 156. But if the agreement of the parties is specified in the receipt, the clause which contains it will bind the parties, as being in the nature of a contract; 5 Vt. 553; 1 Rich. 111; 16 Johns. 277; 23 Wend. 345; 2 Gill & J. 493; 3 B. Monr. 353. A receipt for a note taken in payment of an account will not, in general, constitute a defence to an action on the account, unless it appears by proof that the creditor agreed to receive the note as payment and take the risk of its being paid; 10 Md. 27.

Receipts, uses of. A receipt is often useful as evidence of facts collateral to those stated in it. It proves the payment; and whatever inference may be legally drawn from the fact of the payment described will be supported by the receipt. Thus, receipts for rent for a given term have been held prima facie evidence of the payment of all rent previously accrued; 15 Johns. 479; 1 Pick. 332. And they have been admitted on trial of a writ of right, as showing acts of ownership on the part of him who gave them; 7 C. B. 21. A receipt given by A to B for the price of a horse, afterwards levied on as property of A, but claimed by B, has been admitted as evidence of ownership against the attaching creditor; 2 Harr. N. J. 78. A receipt "in full of all accounts," the amount being less than that called for by the accounts of the party giving it, was held in his favor evidence of a mutual settlement of accounts on both sides, and of payment of the balance ascertained to be due after setting off one account against the other; 9 Wend. 332. A receipt given by an attorney for securities he was to collect and account for has been held presumptive evidence of the genuineness and justness of the securities; 14 Ala. 500. And a general receipt by an attorney for an evidence of debt then due, is presumed to have been received by him as attorney, for collection; and he must show the contrary to avoid an action for neglect in not collecting; 3 Johns. 185.

A receipt signed in the name of a certain person by another person, constitutes no evidence of the receipt of the money by the latter; 74 Mich. 220.

Receipts, larceny and forgery of. A receipt may be the subject of larceny; 2 Abb. Pr. 211; or of forgery; Russ. & R. 227; 7 C. & P. 459. Punched railroad tickets shown to be receipts to the conductor and vouchers to him for the amount of fare between stations, are receipts within a statute making it larceny to steal any receipt; 95 Ia. 341.

And it is a sufficient "uttering" of a forged receipt to place it in the hands of a person for inspection with intent fraudulently to induce him to make an advance on the faith that the payment mentioned in the spurious receipt has been made; 14 E. L. & Eq. 530. See FORGERY: IN FULL.

RECEIPTOR. In Practice. A name given to the person who, on a trustee process being issued and goods attached, becomes surety to the sheriff to have them forthcoming on demand, or in time to respond to the judgment, when the execution shall be issued; upon which the goods are bailed to him. Story, Bailm. § 124. The term is used in New York and New Hampshire; 11 N. H. 557; and Maine; 14 Me. 414. See ATTACHMENT; RECEIPT.

As to whether a receiptor is estopped to show property in himself, see 31 Am. Dec. 62; s. c. 14 Me. 414; 25 Am. Dec. 426, u.; 116 Mass. 454; 28 Am. Dec. 695; 24 Am. Dec. 108. He may defend by showing that the property has been taken from him; 11 N. H. 570.

RECEIVABLE. In a legacy, payable; vested. 29 L. J. Ch. 832; L. R. 6 Eq. 59.

RECEIVER. One who receives money to the use of another to render an account. Story, Eq. Jur. § 446. Receivers were at common law liable to the action of account-render for failure in the latter portion of their duties.

In Equity. A person appointed by a court possessing chancery jurisdiction, to receive the rents and profits of land, or the profits or produce of other property in dispute.

A receiver is an indifferent person between the parties appointed by the court to collect and receive the rents, issues, and profits of land, or the produce of personal estate, or other things, which it does not seem reasonable to the court that either party should do; or where a party is incompetent to do so, as in the case of an infant. The remedy of the appointment of a receiver is one of the very oldest in the court of chancery, and is founded on the inadequacy of the remedy to be obtained in the courts of ordinary jurisdiction; Bisph. Eq. 606.

He is a ministerial officer of the court. 2 S. & S. 99; 1 Cox, Ch. 422; 9 Ves. 335;

11 Ga. 413; 2 Tex. Civ. App. 88; with no powers but those conferred by his order of appointment and the practice of the court; 6 Barb. 539; 2 Paige, Ch. 453; which do not extend beyond the jurisdiction of the court which appoints him; 17 How. 823 (but see infra); appointed on behalf of all parties who may establish rights in the cause; 8 U. S. App. 597, 610; he stands in the shoes of the company; 59 Fed. Rep. 523; 3 Atk. 564; 2 Md. Ch. Dec. 378; 4 Madd. 80; 4 Sandf. Ch. 417; and after his appointment neither the owner nor any other party can exercise any acts of ownership over the property; 2 S. & S. 96. Neither party is responsible for his acts; 2 Wall. 519. His custody is that of the court, and leaves the right of the parties concerned to be controlled by the ultimate decree of the court; 10 Bank. Reg. 517.

The appointment of a receiver does not change the title or right of possession of the property, but puts it into his custody for the benefit of the party ultimately entitled; 136 U. S. 223; nor does it work a dissolution of the corporation, but only suspends the function of its officers as far as provided in the decree; 11 Colo. 464; 115 Ind. 466.

A court will protect its receiver in the possession and use of franchises and property committed to him; 53 Fed. Rep. 687.

The rule that property in the hands of a receiver is in custodia legis, and that interference with such possession without leave of the court is a contempt, is as applicable in the seizure thereof to enforce payment of taxes due the state as in any other case; 149 U. S. 164; id. 191.

A receiver is an officer of the court which appointed him, and a judgment in another court in a suit affecting the receiver's right of possession, begun without the permission of the court appointing him, is void; 23 U. S. App. 813. A receiver is not the agent of the corporation nor a substitute for the board of directors. He is but the hand of the court appointing him. His acts are not the acts of the corporation, and his servants are not the servants of the corporation; 31 U. S. App. 644. A decree appointing a receiver is an act of such notoriety that all persons have constructive notice thereof; 31 U. S. App. 644. A receivership is not personal, but continuous, and claims arising against different successive receivers stand on the same footing; 84 Fed. Rep. 67; 62 Id. 771; he is analogous to a corporation sole; id.

A receiver is appointed only in those cases where in the exercise of a sound discretion it appears necessary that some indifferent person should have charge of the property; 1 Johns. Ch. 56; 25 Ala. N. S. 81; only during the pendency of a suit; 1 Atk. 578; 2 Du. 632; except in extreme cases; 2 Atk. 315; 2 Dick. Ch. 580; as when a fund in litigation is in peril; 2 Blatch. 78; and ex parte; 14 Beav. 428; 8 Paige, Ch. 873; or before answer; 13 Ves. 260; 4 Price 346; 4 Paige, Ch. 574; 2 Swanst. 146; in special cases only; and, generally, not till all the parties are before the court; 2 Russ. Ch. 145; 1 Hog. Ir. 93. Ordinarily a receiver will not be appointed on an ex parte application; 59 Ia. 307. The action of the court in the appointment of a receiver is not reviewable on appeal; 1 Bond. 422; 1 Biss. 198. But by act of Feb. 9, 1893, an appeal from such an order in the supreme court of the District of Columbia may be taken to the court of appeals; R. S. 2 Supp. 79.

The appointment of a receiver is authorized when the party seeking the appointment shows prima facie a title reasonably free from doubt, or a lien upon the subject-matter of controversy to which he has a right to resort for the satisfaction of his claim, and that it is in danger of loss from waste, misconduct, or insolvency if the defendant is permitted to retain the possession; 96 Ala. 870; 41 Kan. 475; 97 N. C. 307.

One will not be appointed, except under special circumstances making a strong case, where a party is already in possession of the property under a legal title; 19 Ves.

59; 1 Ambl. 311; 2 Y. & C. 351; as a trustee; 2 Bro. C. C. 158; 1 V. & B. 183; 1 My. & C. 163; 16 Ga. 406; 2 J. & W. 294; an executor; 13 Ves. 266; tenant in common; 3 Dick. Ch. 600; 4 Bro. C. C. 414; 2 S. & S. 142; a mortgagee; 4 Abb. Pr. 235; 13 Ves. 377; 1 J. & W. 176, 627; 1 Hog. Ir. 179; or a mortgagor when the debt is not wholly due; 5 Paige, Ch. 38; a director of a corporation in a suit by a stockholder; 2 Halst. Ch. 374; where the property is or should be already in the possession of some court, as during the contestation of a will in the proper court; 2 Atk. 378; 6 Ves. 172; 2 V. & B. 85, 95; 7 Sim. 512; 1 My. & C. 97; but see 3 Md. Ch. Dec. 278; when admiralty is the proper forum; 5 Barb. 209; or where there is already a receiver; 1 Hog. Ir. 199; 10 Paige, Ch. 43; 1 Fred. Eq. 210; 11 id. 607; nor, on somewhat similar grounds, where salaries of public officers are in question; 2 Sim. 560; 10 Beav. 602; 2 Paige, Ch. 333; or where a public office is in litigation; 9 Paige, Ch. 507; where the equitable title of the party asking a receiver is incomplete as made out, as where he has delayed asking for one; 1 Hog. Ir. 118; 1 Donn. Min. Cas. 71; or where the necessity is not very apparent, as on account merely of the poverty of an executor; 12 Ves. 4; 1 Madd. 142; 18 Beav. 161; see 4 Price 346; pending the removal of a trustee; 16 Ga. 406; where a trustee mixes trust-money with his own; 1 Hopk. Ch. 429.

A person holding an unliquidated claim against a corporation is not entitled to the appointment of a receiver, which would be a denial of trial by jury; 148 U.S. 604; 150 id. 385; mere insolvency of a corporation does not authorize the appointment of a receiver at the suit of general creditors, but one will be appointed where it is no longer able to proceed with its business; 64 Fed. Rep. 328.

A receiver will not be appointed without the consent of the corporation on the application of a mere contract creditor, and especially where he cannot claim a definite sum as due; 82 Fed. Rep. 775.

Where the only indebtedness of an insolvent corporation is to the party bringing the creditor's bill, a receiver is unnecessary; 8 U.S. App. 340.

Where the business of a corporation is being mismanaged, a receiver will be appointed at the suit of a stockholder; 103 Ill. 472.

Where a partnership has been dissolved, a receiver will usually be appointed if the property is unsafe in the hands of the partners; 125 N. Y. 688; 104 Ind. 53. On a bill for dissolution on account of improper conduct of partners, a receiver is almost a matter of course; but where a partnership has expired by limitation and there is no special ground for a receiver one will not ordinarily be appointed; 104 Ind. 53. A receiver will not be appointed to continue the business, except temporarily; 6 Fla. 164.

A receiver will be appointed if there is fraud or mismanagement on the part of one partner; or a disagreement between them; or an appropriation of firm property to individual use; or one partner is excluded from the management; or where a liquidating partner is insolvent; Smith, Rec. § 191.

Receivers will be appointed to take charge of trust property when it is in danger, and such appointment is necessary for its preservation; 66 Ga. 66; as where the trustee is not responsible; 92 N. C. 519; or neglects his duties; 4 D. & W. 117; or uses the trust funds on his own account; 91 N. C. 220; or refuses to collect a debt belonging to the estate; L. R. 8 Ch. App. 597; or has failed to obey an order to pay over money of the trust; 54 L. J. Ch. 1180; but ordinarily the remedy will be by the removal of the trustee. The jurisdiction to appoint a receiver exists, but will usually be exercised only in very special cases.

Where a sole trustee is insolvent, a receiver will be appointed; L. R. 1 Ch. App. 825; or where the trustee is poor and of bad habits; 12 Sim. 363.

Equity will appoint a receiver as between co-tenants of real estate in cases of necessity; 17 N. J. Eq. 151; though the cases are rare; as in case of partition suits; 56 Cal. 32; and where one tenant excludes the other from possession; or is insolvent and refuses to account; or refuses to execute the necessary leases or interferes with the collection of rent; Smith, Rec. § 317.

It is said that equity will more willingly appoint a receiver of a mining property, than of ordinary property; 22 Cow. 194.

A receiver will be appointed for good cause in a suit for specific performance; 142 Ind. 324; 91 Hun 304; but see 4 Lea 597. Under special and urgent circumstances, a receiver may be appointed as between lessor and lessee; 57 Pa. 83.

In 2 Daly 425, the income of property of the defendant in divorce proceedings was placed in the hands of a receiver to provide for the wants of his family during the divorce litigation and after its termination; so in case of a decree for alimony; 28 Wis. 307.

A receiver will be appointed to take charge of the estate of a decedent, but "a strong case must be made out to induce the court to dispossess a trustee or executor who is willing to act"; 1 Woods 262, affirmed in 91 U.S. 254. Pending probate proceedings the property will in some cases be protected by the appointment of a receiver; 3 Md. Ch. 279. In 60 Pa. 172, where a will had been admitted to probate and an appeal was pending on an issue to try the validity of the will, a bill for the appointment of a receiver was refused.

A receiver may be appointed in lieu of an executor or administrator, where there has been waste or misappropriation; or such a result is probable; or the executor is insolvent and this is coupled with misapplication; 37 N. C. 390; but not for poverty alone; id.; or where an executor is dead or refuses to act; or where the executor is a non-resident; Smith, Rec. § 301.

A receiver will be appointed as between the vendee and vendor of realty where there is a contract of sale under which possession has been delivered and there is a default in payments, the vendee not being responsible; Smith, Rec. § 315.

The comptroller of the currency has power to appoint a receiver of a national bank, to take possession of its assets, collect its debts, and enforce the personal liability of the stockholders. In cases not within the national bank act, equity has jurisdiction to appoint receivers as in case of other corporations.

A receiver of a national bank is an officer and agent of the United States within R. S. § 360, requiring the district attorney to conduct all suits relating to national banks in which the United States or any of its officers or agents are parties; 150 U. S. 342. The closing of a national bank and the appointment of a receiver transfers the assets of the bank to him; 146 U. S. 499; he has a reasonable time to elect whether he will take property leased with an option to purchase or return it; 142 U. S. 313.

Generally any stranger to the suit may be appointed receiver. The court will not appoint attorneys and solicitors in the cause; 1 Hog. Ir. 322; masters in chancery; 6 Ves. 437; an officer of the corporation; 28 N. J. Eq. 168; 1 Paige, Ch. 517; though it is sometimes done especially in the case of large railroad systems. There is no general rule about appointing officers of the company as receivers; generally the courts refuse to do so; 63 Fed. Rep. 537. Counsel for an adverse party cannot act as receiver's counsel, and if he do he will not be paid out of the funds; 44 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 871; a public officer charged with the duty of winding up an insolvent corporation may be appointed; 8 Fed. Rep. 465; so also a mortgagee; 2 Term 238; 9 Ves. 271; a trustee; 3 Ves. 516; 8 id. 73; but not ordinarily a party in the cause; 63 Ill. 408.

A receiver may be appointed without notice to the adverse party, though generally this should not be done; 41 Kan. 475. It will be done only where the defendant cannot be found or where there is danger of loss or irreparable injury; Smith, Rec. § 5. The appointment and retention of a receiver cannot be collaterally attacked; 52 Kan. 109.

A receiver has no power without the previous direction of the court to incur any expenses, except those absolutely necessary for the preservation and use of the property; 93 U. S. 332.

He is responsible for good faith and reasonable diligence. When the property is lost or injured by any negligence or dishonest execution of the trust, he is liable in damages; but he is not as of course responsible because there has been an embezzlement or theft. He is bound to such ordinary diligence as belongs to a prudent and honest discharge of his duties, and such as is required of all persons who receive compensation for their services; Story, Bailin. §§ 620, 621; see 80 N. Y. 458; but he is not the agent of an insolvent railroad company, and hence the company is not liable for damages occasioned by his negligence in operating the road; 53 N. Y. 61; nor is he personally liable; 63 N. Y. 281; but he is liable as receiver for loss as a carrier of goods; 99 Mass. 395. It is held that where an injury results from the fault or misconduct of a receiver appointed by a court of equity, the court may in its discretion either take cognizance of the question of the receiver's liability, and determine it, or permit the aggrieved party to sue at law; 11 C. E. Green 474; 4 Hun 378; 12 Am. Law Rev. 660.

In a railroad receivership the court will not order the receiver to pay the rental of a leased portion of the road, when he has not received therefrom sufficient to pay such rental, over and above operating expenses, and when the trustee of the leased property has asked the court for its surrender, but has permitted it to remain in the receiver's hands and has not taken possession of it under an order granted by the court; 145 U. S. 82.

Receivers are not assignees and are not bound to adopt a lease, but have an option to do so or not; 58 Fed. Rep. 280; 60 id. 966. A receiver is not compelled to adopt the contracts or leases of the railroad company, but is entitled to a reasonable time to elect, and a court will not order him to pay rental when the income is not sufficient to pay running expenses; 150 U. S. 237, 310. A receiver of an insolvent corporation, who takes possession of a leasehold estate held by the corporation, does not thereby become an assignee of the term, nor liable on the covenants of the lease, but is liable only for a reasonable rent while in possession; 40 N. E. Rep. (Mass.) 857; and in some cases for the rental specified in the lease; 163 Ill. 120. See LEASE.

A receiver is entitled to a reasonable time in which to elect whether or not to retain rolling stock formerly obtained by the company on periodical payments. If he retains it, he must pay the contract price; if he retains it for a time and then releases it, he must pay a fair price for its use, which is usually based on the mileage of the cars and is not the stipulated "rental" under the contract; 42 Fed. Rep. 6. The receiver of a railroad is not liable for his refusal to carry the plaintiff on a ticket issued by the company before his appointment. The plaintiff has only the right to come in as a general creditor for the price of the ticket; 48 Pac. Rep. (Wash.) 53.

Freight money paid to a company before the appointment of a receiver does not entitle the company to sue the receiver for refusal to carry the goods; 51 Fed. Rep. 15. Damages accruing during the time a railroad is in the hands of a receiver are part of the operating expenses, payable out of the income, if there is any; if not, out of the corpus of the property; 86 Fed. Rep. 1; 31 U. S. App. 644.

An act in South Carolina by which a judgment for personal injuries recovered in an action commenced twelve months from the time the injury was sustained, takes precedence of any mortgage deed or trust given to secure the payment of bonds, is an amendment of the charters of all railroad corporations theretofore created in that state, and any existing mortgagees must be taken to have given his assent to this provision.

Equity may order a receiver to buy rolling stock when necessary for the continued operation of the road and charge the price as a first lien on the property; 117 U. S. 484; 97 id. 146.

Separate receivers will not be appointed in two suits against the same railroad company. The existing receivership should be extended; 65 Fed. Rep. 351.

A receiver appointed in a federal court is required to manage the property in accordance with the laws of the state where it is situated; 2 Supp. R. S. 813.

Where a receiver has been discharged and a railroad turned over to the company, it was held that the company was liable to an action by one who had suffered personal injury by the negligence of the employees while the road was in the hands of the receiver; 23 U. S. App. 143.

A mortgagee plaintiff at whose instance a receiver has been appointed for a railway cannot be compelled, if expenses of operation and management exceed the value of the property, to make good a deficit, unless the order of appointment was made on that condition, and he is not liable to the employees of the receiver for their wages; 47 Pac. Rep. (Ore.) 706.

Equity in appointing a receiver for a corporate property may, in its discretion, require mortgage bondholders to do equity by providing for the payment of claims for labor and supplies as a condition of the appointment; 99 U. S. 235. Orders appointing a receiver usually direct the payment of such preferred claims of this class as the master shall find to be equitably entitled; 22 Fed. Rep. 471; and it is the better practice to make the order then; 41 Fed. Rep. 551; they will be paid even if not provided for in the original decree; 103 U. S. 286; the order can be made afterwards; 41 Fed. Rep. 551. It has been held that there can be no preference as to the corpus of the property where payment was not provided for in the original record; 61 Fed. Rep. 150; nor any preference whatever; 69 Fed. Rep. 295; but it is also held that where the earnings have been diverted to the payment of interest or permanent improvements, preferred debts will be charged on the corpus if the current income is not sufficient to pay them; 107 U. S. 59; 111 id. 776; 125 id. 268; and sometimes even without showing a diversion of earnings; 100 U. S. 286.

Where a receiver is in under foreclosure proceedings of a general mortgage on a system of railroads, preferred debts will be charged on the earnings of the entire system; 30 Fed. Rep. 332.

As to the classes of preferred debts, they are said to be those "which, when incurred, operated in a direct way to the advantage of the bondholder;" 35 Fed. Rep. 12; or which were "made to preserve the estate;" 89 Tenn. 138; or were payments "necessary in the ordinary administration of the affairs of the corporation;" 23 Fed. Rep. 521; or were reasonably "necessary to incur in order to keep the road in operation;" Short, Ry. Bonds § 624.

They include: Debts for freight and ticket balances; 106 U. S. 290; wages; 99 id. 235; 106 id. 286; wages and salaries of employees of every grade; 33 Fed. Rep. 778; counsel; 8 Fed. Rep. 579; 23 id. 521 (but not one employed for a special purpose; 138 U. S. 501; nor an attorney's fee for services rendered a year and a half before the receivership; 51 Fed. Rep. 68; but the annual salary of a regular counsel for a short time before receivership will be preferred; 23 Fed. Rep. 521; not a secretary of the company; 60 Fed. Rep. 295; nor a claim for legal services in advising parties who lent money to keep the road in operation; 138 U. S. 501); supplies and material for equipping, operating, and repairing the road; 90 U. S. 252; 60 Fed. Rep. 23; but not when furnished on credit payable at some definite period, in the future; 58 Fed. Rep. 473; 46 id. 101. The vendor of rolling stock under a car trust is not preferred as to the balance of payments due him; 99 U. S. 258. The rental of cars used by the receiver is held to be chargeable to the proceeds of the sale of the property as one of the expenses of the administration; 96 Ga. 630; as is also the unpaid rental during their use by the company before the receiver was appointed, and compensation for the ordinary wear and tear and the expense of returning the cars to the owner; id.; contra, as to rentals accruing before the receivership; 136 U. S. 89; 117 id. 476.

Rentals on a leased line will not be preferred; 58 Fed. Rep. 288; debts contracted for original construction will not be preferred; 134 U. S. 296; nor the price of a locomotive bought six months before the receivership; 44 Minn. 115; nor will claims for damages for breach of contract; 82 Fed. Rep. 566; nor those caused by the operation of the road before the appointment of the receiver; 14 id. 141; 28 id. 871; but see 20 id. 260, a case said to be of doubtful authority; Short, Ry. Bonds § 626.

A bondholder who pays taxes will be subrogated to the lien of the state; 100 Ill. 511.

The ordinary period within which such claims are allowed is six months; 6 Biss. 535; but claims have been awarded a preference after eight months; 8 Hughes 320; eleven months; 111 U. S. 776; nearly two years; 41 Fed. Rep. 551; two years; 83 id. 605; three years; 99 U. S. 880. There is no fixed time within which a loan priority can be given; it is a question of reasonable time; 70 Fed. Rep. 741.

Preferred debts do not come in before mortgage debts because they have a lien; 75 Va. 701.

The doctrine of Fosdick v. Schall, 90 U. S. 252 (first suggested by Judge Dillon), is that the income of a railroad company, out of which a mortgage is to be paid, is the net income obtained by deducting from gross earnings what is required for operating expenses, proper equipment, and useful improvements. Every mortgagee impliedly agrees that the current debts made in the ordinary course of business shall be paid from the current receipts before he has any claim on the income. Also, that when there is a diversion of income from the payment of current debts to pay fixed charges, thus increasing the security of the latter, this must be returned to the current debt fund before the mortgagee is paid. This was followed in 111 U. S. 781, where it was held that a supply claim incurred prior to the receivership was a charge on the income coming into the receiver's hands, as well as that received before his appointment. Such a claim is payable out of the receiver's surplus earnings, whether or not, during the company's operation of the road, there was a diversion of income, either in paying interest or in betterments; and even where the company has misappropriated such income to purposes not beneficial to the mortgagee; 170 U. S. 355. See 106 id. 286.

The dominant feature of the doctrine, as applied in 111 U. S. 770, is said to be that where expenditures were made which were essentially necessary to enable the road to be operated as a continuing business, and it was the expectation of the creditors that the indebtedness would be paid out of current earnings, a superior equity arises in favor of the materialman as against the mortgage bonds in the income arising both before and after the appointment of a receiver; 170 U. S. 355. This equity arises upon the tacit or express understanding that the current earnings would be appropriated for the payment of the debt. Even though the mortgage provides for a sequestration of income for the benefit of the bondholders, that income, until strict foreclosure or a sale of the road, is charged with the prior equity of unpaid supply claims; id. Equity will confine itself within very restricted limits in the application of this doctrine; 136 U. S. 89; 140 U. S. 95; in both of which cases it was not, under special circumstances, applied to car trust rentals prior to the suit for foreclosure. To the same effect, 48 Am. & E. R. Cas. (Tex.) 656.

A receiver of a railroad on coming into possession of earnings should pay out of the same all debts for supplies contracted within a reasonable time before the receivership, before making any expenditure for betterments or interest on mortgages; 76 Fed. Rep. 502.

The court may authorize receivers, in their discretion, to pay the current pay-rolls and supply accounts incurred in the operation of the road within four months before their appointment; 75 Fed. Rep. 54. Current operating expenses for a limited time before the appointment of a receiver under a foreclosure bill may be charged on the income earned during the receivership or upon the corpus of the property, in preference to the liens of the mortgage; 74 Fed. Rep. 335. A receiver of a railroad is properly authorized to pay all balances due to other carriers and connecting lines, and should be allowed to pay, from the proceeds of the sale of receiver's certificates, charges for freight on cars, coal, oil, etc., consigned to the insolvent company and due before the appointment of a temporary receiver; 8 U. S. App. 547.

Mileage due under a contract for the use of Pullman cars is not distinguishable from car rentals, and cannot be made a preferred claim on the appointment of a receiver; 84 Fed. Rep. 18; 149 U. S. 95.

A cable for a cable railway, if necessary, is entitled to a preference, though no diversion of income is shown; and the lapse of two years will not bar the claim; 83 Fed. Rep. 365.

The payment of unpaid debts for operating expenses accrued within ninety days, and of ticket and freight balances due, are necessary for the preservation of the mortgaged property, in order to keep it a going concern; 117 U. S. 436.

The doctrine has in some courts been extended with great freedom, and the granting of preferences and the issue of receiver's certificates carried to such an extent as to give rise in the public mind to an erroneous view of the powers of courts of equity in this regard. In 80 Fed. Rep. 624, the circuit court of appeals remarks that "the liberality with which this equity was extended by some of the circuit courts in favor of general creditors, induced the supreme court in Kneeland v. Trust Co., 136 U. S. 80, to call attention to the necessity of preserving the general priority of contract liens over all but a limited class of claims. Through Mr. Justice Brewer, the court said: 'The appointment of a receiver vests in the court no absolute control over the property, and no general authority to displace vested contract liens. Because, in a few specified and limited cases, this court has declared that unsecured claims were entitled to priority over mortgage debts, an idea seems to have obtained that a court appointing a receiver acquire power to give such preference to any general and unsecured claims. It has been assumed that a court appointing a receiver could rightfully burden the mortgaged property for the payment of any unsecured indebtedness. . . . It is the exception, and not the rule, that such priority of liens can be displaced. We emphasize this fact of the sacredness of contract liens, for the reason that there seems to be growing an idea that the chancellor, in the exercise of his equitable power, has unlimited discretion in this matter of the displacement of vested liens.'" While the court appointing an ancillary receiver will protect local creditors having prior rights or liens, it will recognize no distinction between foreign and domestic creditors whose claims stand on equal footing, and it rests in the court's discretion whether it will distribute the assets or transmit them to a primary receiver; 88 Fed. Rep. 180.

The rule has been held to apply only to railroads; 128 U. S. 416; not to manufacturing corporations; 35 Fed. Rep. 436; 42 id. 372; nor to street railways; 84 Fed. Rep. 237; nor to steamship lines; 50 Fed. Rep. 312; nor to a hotel company; 106 N. Y. 423; it is held applicable to street railways; 8 Utah 15; 87 Fed. Rep. 269. In a recent Alabama case it has been held applicable to all public corporations; 39 L. R. A. 623.

See MORTGAGE.

Suits. A receiver must ordinarily obtain leave of the appointing court before instituting a suit; but not where he sues for debt due him in his official capacity; L. R. 12 Eq. 614; or sues in the appointing court with its sanction; Smith, Rec. § 60; 86 Mo. 505.

It was formerly held that a receiver had no standing in a foreign court; Smith, Rec. § 73; but it is said to be now "well established that a receiver may invoke the aid of a foreign court in obtaining possession of property or funds within its jurisdiction to which he is entitled," but not against the creditors of a non-resident debtor who are seeking to subject property to the payment of their debts; 133 Ind. 477; and this is a matter of comity; 33 N. J. Eq. 155.

Late cases hold that a receiver appointed in one state can sue in another by comity, in respect of property rights in the latter state, provided the domestic creditors are protected; 133 N. Y. 37; 55 How. Pr. 52; 18 N. Y. L. J. 1059 (App. Div.).

It is held that an Illinois receiver appointed at the suit of a non-resident creditor may hold the assets against an Illinois creditor; 39 N. E. Rep. (Ill.) 1091. It is the safer course in important cases to secure an ancillary receivership in the foreign state, and such is a common practice.

In 181 Mass. 224, it was held that the ancillary receiver should remit the fund to the home receiver for distribution, if it should appear that Massachusetts claimants would there be placed on an equality with home claimants. This case is said to have gone to the limits of comity; Smith, Rec. § 73. Where a receiver takes property to a foreign state his possession will be protected; 73 Pa. 112; 108 Mo. 317; contra, 81 Cal. 551.

One who has a legal cause of action sounding merely in tort against a receiver appointed by a court of chancery has a right to pursue his redress by an action at law. Such action cannot be brought without the chancellor's permission, but this cannot be refused, unless the claim preferred be manifestly unfounded; 16 Wall. 218. See 25 Alb. L. J. 48.

A receiver cannot be sued without the consent of the appointing court; 2 Idaho 590; 149 U. S. 473; 134 Ind. 672; but there are exceptions to this rule: By act of congress, March 3d, 1899, every receiver appointed by a federal court may be sued without leave of court, but subject to the general equity jurisdiction of the court which appointed him. This act extends to any court of competent jurisdiction, state or federal, and not merely to the appointing court; 141 U. S. 327; 73 Tex. 47. It applies to actions for personal injuries to passengers; 121 Mo. 1; suits on patents may be brought without leave; 66 Fed. Rep. 788. Receivers operating a railroad in another state are liable to action there; 99 Mass. 896; property in another state, in the hands of a receiver, may be garnished there; 5 Colo. 14; where a receiver has taken possession of property not specified in the decree appointing him; 111 Mass. 508.

It is held that suing without leave is mere contempt of court and does not affect the jurisdiction of the court in which the suit is brought; 5 Colo. 14; and that the proceedings are regular till the appointing court interferes; 60 N. Y. 89; other cases hold that there is no jurisdiction till leave is granted; 104 U. S. 126; 96 Ind. 69; 14

How. 52. Leave to sue rests in the discretion of the appointing court; 68 Wis. 44; ordinarily leave will be granted to sue only in the appointing court; 21 Fed. Rep. 354.

Under the strict common law, a receiver must sue in the name of the corporation or firm of which he is receiver; 115 U. S. 499; but in states having codes of procedure he may sue in his own name, as having the beneficial interest; 5 Thomps. Corp. § 6979.

Suit should be brought against the company, but service made on the receiver; 141 U. S. 327. The receiver brings suit in the company's name but for his own use; 44 Pa. 294; but he sues in his own name on his own contracts; 75 Pa. 112; an attachment execution should be served on him; 167 Pa. 589.

The receiver of a corporation appointed by a court of equity cannot sue in his own name to recover property of the corporation which has never been in his possession nor been assigned to him, where authority to bring such suit has not been conferred on him by statute or by decree of court; 157 Mass. 77. Actions against the receiver are, in law, actions against the receivership, or the funds in the hands of the receiver, and his contracts, misfeasances, negligences, and liabilities are official and not personal; and judgments against him as receiver are payable only out of the funds in his hands; 141 U. S. 327. The corporation is not liable for the receiver's contracts; 58 Ill. 61.

The court can, by summary proceedings, compel payment by a purchaser from a receiver of the price of goods sold and delivered; 36 Atl. Rep. (N. J. Ch.) 937.

Where a circuit court has appointed a receiver of a steamer and all other property of a railroad company, and the steamer came into collision with another vessel and was libelled in admiralty, it was held that the circuit court did not err in declining to issue an injunction against the admiralty proceedings; 21 U. S. App. 466.

Where property is in the hands of a receiver, an independent suit cannot be brought to foreclose a mortgage on it, even in the same court; 86 Fed. Rep. 390.

Judgment against a corporation obtained between the entry of an order appointing a receiver therefor and the approval of his bond creates no lien on the property; 80 Fed. Rep. 441.

Where a receiver has been guilty of a public nuisance, the court will enjoin him therefrom; 22 U. S. App. 154.

A purchaser of a claim against a railroad company which is in the hands of a receiver is not estopped to attack the validity of an order appointing the receiver made before he became a party to the action; 47 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 872.

It is not inconsistent with the relations between a receiver and the court appointing him that he should appeal from an order of such court granting an injunction against him; 23 U. S. App. 154.

The appointment of a receiver of a corporation fixes the status and priorities of its creditors; 184 Pa. 1.

A circuit court of the United States has no power to appoint a receiver of property already in the possession of a receiver duly and previously appointed by a state court; 157 U. S. 169.

A receiver appointed for one corporation cannot act for another; 24 U. S. App. 341.

An order fixing the compensation of a receiver, and taxed as such in the costs, is a final judgment upon a collateral matter arising out of the action and appealable by any party interested in the fund; 47 Pac. Rep. (Cal.) 872. As to a receiver's compensation, see 33 A. & E. Corp. Cas. 532.

The appointment of a receiver does not abate personal actions against the debtor, and the receiver has no status in court thereunder until he is made a party thereto on his own application. The plaintiff may proceed to final judgment without him; 87 Fed. Rep. 843.

RECEIVER GENERAL OF THE DUCHY OF LANCASTER. An officer of the Duchy court, who collects all the revenues, fines, forfeitures, and assessments within the duchy.

RECEIVER GENERAL OF THE PUBLIC REVENUE. An officer appointed in every county in England to receive the taxes granted by parliament, and remit the money to the treasury.

RECEIVER OF STOLEN GOODS. In Criminal Law. By statutory provision, the receiver of stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, may be punished as the principal, in perhaps all the United States.

To make this offence complete, the goods received must have been stolen, they must have been received by the defendant, and the receiver must know that they had been stolen.

A boy stole a chattel from his master, and after it had been taken from him in his master's presence, it was, with the master's consent, restored to him again, in order that he might sell it to the defendant, to whom he had been in the habit of selling similar stolen articles. He accordingly sold it to the defendant, who, being indicted for feloniously receiving it of an evil-disposed person, knowing it to be stolen, was convicted, and, notwithstanding objection made, sentenced; Car. & M. 217. But this case has since been held not to be law, and a defendant not to be liable to conviction under such circumstances, inasmuch as at the time of the receipt the goods were not stolen goods; Dears. 468.

The goods stolen must have been received by the defendant. Prima facie, if stolen goods are found in a man's house, he, not being the thief, is a receiver; 1 Den. Cr. Cas. 801. And though there is proof of a criminal intent to receive, and a knowledge that the goods were stolen, if the exclusive possession still remains in the thief, a conviction for receiving cannot be sustained; 2 id. 37. So a principal in the first degree, particeps criminis, cannot at the same time be treated as a receiver; 2 id. 459. Where a prisoner is charged in two counts with stealing and receiving, the jury may return a verdict of guilty on the latter count, if warranted by the evidence, although the evidence is also consistent with the prisoner having been a principal in the second degree in the stealing; Bell, Cr. Cas. 20. See 48 Ohio St. 220. But a person having a joint possession with the thief may be convicted as a receiver; Dears. 494. The actual manual possession or touch of the goods by the defendant, however, is not necessary to the completion of the offence of receiving; it is sufficient if they are in the actual possession of a person over whom the defendant has a control, so that they would be forthcoming if he ordered it; id. 494. Husband and wife were indicted jointly for receiving. The jury found both guilty, and found, also, that the wife received the goods without the control or knowledge of the husband, and apart from him, and that "he afterwards adopted his wife's receipt." It was held that this finding did not warrant the conviction of the husband; Dears. & B. 329.

The offence of receiving stolen property involves a criminal intent as a material element, such as an intent to aid the thief, of obtaining a reward for restoring it to the owner, or in some way to derive profit from the act; 37 Tex. App. 193. See 58 Ark. 518.

It is almost always difficult to prove guilty knowledge; and that must, in general, be collected from circumstances. If such circumstances are proved which to a person of common understanding and prudence, and situated as the prisoner was, must have satisfied him that they were stolen, this is sufficient. For example, the receipt of watches, jewelry, large quantities of money, bundles of clothes of various kinds, or personal property of any sort, to a considerable value, from boys or persons destitute of property and without any lawful means of acquiring them, and specially if bought at untimely hours, the mind can arrive at no other conclusion than that they were stolen. This is further confirmed if they have been bought at an under-value, concealed, the marks defaced, and falsehood resorted to in accounting for the possession of them; Alison, Cr. Law 330; 3 Russ. Cr. 253; 1 Fost. & F. 51; Whart. Cr. L. 983, 986. See 135 Ill. 243.

Evidence that other stolen goods were found in defendant's possession is admissible to show guilty knowledge; 38 S. C. 330.

In order to sustain a prosecution for receiving stolen property, it is necessary to prove that defendant knew it was stolen, but such knowledge need not be personal or actual; 50 Mo. App. 186.

At common law, receiving stolen goods, knowing them to have been stolen, is a misdemeanor; 2 Russ. Cr. 253. But in Massachusetts it has been held to partake so far of the nature of felony that if a constable has reasonable grounds to suspect one of the crime of receiving or aiding in the concealment of stolen goods, knowing them to be stolen, he may without warrant arrest the supposed offender; 5 Cush. 281. See [1892] 3 Q. B. 597; RECENT POSSESSION, etc.

RECEIVERS' CERTIFICATES.

Acknowledgments of indebtedness issued by a receiver under the order of the court by which he was appointed, either directly in discharge of obligations incurred in the management of the property, or for borrowing money for the maintenance and operation of the property, and redeemable out of its proceeds. They may be made a lien on the property when that is necessary for its proper management and operation in the interest of all who may be concerned in it, as directed in the order under which they are issued, and are usually made a first charge on the fund in the receiver's hands, after payment of the operating expenses.

In the case of property such as a railroad, which is of a character to give the public a right to its continued operation and use, the court in a proper case may impose the expenses and obligations of operation upon the property regardless of the question of who may be the ultimate owner of the property; 115 Cal. 285. A court of equity has power to appoint a receiver for a railroad and to authorize the issue of certificates for raising money necessary for the management and preservation of the road, and make the debt thereby created a first lien; 97 U. S. 146; 117 id. 434. But a court of equity cannot order the issue of certificates, to be a paramount lien, by the receiver of an insolvent private corporation, where the business is affected with no public interest, unless such issue is essential to preserve the property or franchises; 68 Fed. Rep. 623; as against lienors who have not assented to their issue; 78 id. 82.

In the case of a mining company the court cannot, against the objection of even a small minority of the mortgage bondholders, authorize the issue of certificates to be a first lien, to enable a continuance of the operation of the mines; 50 Fed. Rep. 481; nor can such certificates be issued for payment of taxes in the case of the foreclosure of the second mortgage of a private corporation, to be a paramount lien, against the consent of the first mortgagee; 70 Fed. Rep. 2; or in the like case for carrying out contracts for improvements made with purchasers of the company's land; id.; S. C. 38 U. S. App. 61. In the case of a railroad such certificates cannot be issued and given a first lien, on an application ex parte without notice to lienholders, the proceeds to be used for the maintenance of the road; 45 B. C. 464.

Where a mine and railroad were operated in connection with each other by the same company, certificates were issued as a charge upon both properties; 86 Va. 754.

If the order authorizing certificates for borrowing money to carry on the business does not limit their payment to any particular fund, the right of bona fide holders for value to resort to the general assets as against general creditors will not be qualified by a quasi-limitation apparent on the face of the certificates; 22 W. N. C. Pa. 31; S. C. 12 Atl. Rep. (Pa.) 271.

When the receiver is appointed on petition of a stockholder, and earnings have been used to pay interest on the bonds, there is no equity which requires payment of past due claims for labor and materials by the issue of receivers' certificates therefor, payable out of the corpus of the property; there is an equity to pay out of net earnings for labor necessary to keep the property in actual operation, but such earnings cannot be anticipated by the issue of receivers' certificates unless by agreement of parties; 59 Fed. Rep. 25; nor can such certificates be issued against the opposition of first mortgage bondholders for new equipment and construction of a narrow gauge road of which new owners would manifestly change the gauge to the standard, so that the proposed improvements would be useless; id. Except under extraordinary circumstances, a court ought not to order the issue of receivers' certificates, with a prior lien, to complete an unfinished railroad; 100 U. S. 605. Such an order was made in 2 Dill. 448, where it was necessary to complete the road in order to secure a land grant; and in 2 Woods 506, to preserve a railroad and complete some inconsiderable portion of it.

Certificates issued, under an order made without notice to creditors, for debts prior to the receivership, give the holders no preference over other creditors; 84 Fed. Rep. 25. They cannot be issued, with priority over existing mortgages, for wages accrued before the appointment of the receiver or for deficiency of supplies; 1 Wall. 254; 94 id. 734; 97 id. 146; 107 id. 592; 96 N. Y. 49; 93 Ill. 134. Certificates issued, not to preserve the property, but to pay unsecured claims, cannot be given priority over an antecedent mortgage; 81 Mo. 539; when in excess of the amount authorized by the court they cannot be enforced against the property unless the proceeds were used for its benefit; 77 Hun 144. They cannot be issued to pay interest on bonds; 70 Fed. Rep. 418.

Allowances to receivers and their counsel as compensation for services are taxable as costs, and have priority over receivers' certificates; 70 Fed. Rep. 643; and certificates issued under an order not giving them priority over other claims, are not entitled to preference over debts of the receiver contracted in carrying on the business; 27 Pittsb. L. J. Pa. N. S. 396; and persons taking such certificates in exchange for certificates before issued under an order giving them a preference, are not entitled to priority even under the first order; id.

The holder of certificates is put upon inquiry as to the whole course of the proceedings of a litigation in which they were issued, and is charged with notice thereof; 53 Fed. Rep. 6; and when the order for the issue was ex parte, and the proceeds were improperly applied, a holder who made no demand for three years and until the foreclosure sale was confirmed and a decree of distribution entered, was guilty of gross laches and estopped by the decree from asserting his claim; id. Where defendants held receivers' certificates for a right of way and agreed that they should be postponed to other certificates to be issued to plaintiffs, but on a sale defendants were paid for the right of way and plaintiffs' certificates were not paid in full, the latter were entitled to recover from the defendants the amount so paid them; 137 Ind. 159.

Holders of certificates cannot enjoin a sale under a decree in favor of an intervening mechanics' lien creditor whose claim was prosecuted before the certificates were authorized; 63 Fed. Rep. 686.

It has been held that a chancellor cannot authorize a receiver to borrow money by selling interest-bearing receivers' certificates of indebtedness at less than their face value; 53 Ala. 237; but see 2 Woods 506.

They are not negotiable, and in fact lack almost every characteristic of negotiable paper; Gluck & Beck. Rec. § 95.

Purchasers of certificates are not bound to see to the application of the purchase money; id.; 117 U. S. 434. See RECEIVERS; ROLLING STOCK; MORTGAGE.

RECEIVING. Taking or having. 23 Atl. Rep. (Neb.) 735.

RECENT POSSESSION OF STOLEN PROPERTY. In Criminal Law. Possession of the fruits of crime recently after its commission is prima facie evidence of guilty possession; and if unexplained, either by direct evidence, or by the attending circumstances, or by the character and habits of life of the possessor, or otherwise, it is usually regarded by the jury as conclusive. 1 Tayl. Ev. § 122. See 1 Greenl. Ev. § 34; 102 U. S. 615.

It is manifest that the force of this rule of presumption depends upon the recency of the possession as related to the crime, and upon the exclusiveness of such possession.

If the interval of time between the loss and the finding be considerable, the presumption, as it affects the party in possession of the stolen property, is much weakened, and the more especially so if the goods are of such a nature as, in the ordinary course of things, frequently to change hands. From the nature of the case, it is not possible to fix any precise period within which the effect of this rule of presumption can be limited; it must depend not only upon the mere lapse of time, but upon the nature of the property and the concomitant circumstances of each particular case. Thus, where two ends of woollen cloth in an unfinished state, consisting of about twenty yards each, were found in the possession of the prisoner two months after they had been stolen, it was held that the prisoner should explain how he came by the property; 7 C. & P. 551. But where the only evidence against a prisoner was that certain tools had been traced to his possession three months after their loss, an acquittal was decided; 3 C. & P. 600. And so, on an indictment for horse-stealing, where it appeared that the horse was not discovered in the custody of the accused until after six months from the date of the robbery; 3 C. & K. 318; and where goods lost sixteen months before were found in the prisoner's house, and no other evidence was adduced against him, he was not called upon for his defence; 2 C. & P. 459.

It is obviously essential to the just application of this rule of presumption that the house or other place in which the stolen property is found, be in the exclusive possession of the prisoner. Where they are found in the apartments of a lodger, for instance, the presumption may be stronger or weaker according as the evidence does or does not show an exclusive possession. Indeed, the finding of stolen property in the house of the accused, provided there were other inmates capable of committing the larceny, will of itself be insufficient to prove his possession, however recently the theft may have been effected, though, if coupled with proof of other suspicious circumstances, it may warrant the prisoner's conviction even though the property is not found in his house until after his apprehension; 8 Dowl. & R. 572; 2 Stark. 139. The force of this presumption is greatly increased if the fruits of a series of thefts be found in the prisoner's possession, or if the property stolen consist of a multiplicity of miscellaneous articles, or be of an uncommon kind, or, from its value or other circumstances, be unsuited to the station of the party.

Such possession of stolen goods may be indicative of any more aggravated crime which has been connected with theft. Upon an indictment for arson, proof that property which was in the house at the time it was burnt was soon afterwards found in the possession of the prisoner was held to raise a probable presumption that he was present and concerned in the offence; 3 East, Pl. Cr. 1035. A like inference has been raised in the case of murder accompanied by robbery; Wills, Circ. Ev. 72, 241; in the cases of burglary and shopbreaking; 4 B. & Ald. 122; 9 C. & P. 364; 1 Mass. 100; and in the case of the possession of a quantity of counterfeit money; Russ. & R. 308; Dearl. 552; but the recent possession of stolen property by one charged with receiving it, knowing it to be stolen, raises no presumption that he knew that it had been stolen; 89 Mo. 595.

Upon the principle of this presumption, a sudden and otherwise inexplicable transition from a state of indigence, and a consequent change of habits, is sometimes a circumstance extremely unfavorable to the supposition of innocence; 11 Metc. 534. See 1 Gray 101.

But this rule of presumption must be applied with caution and discrimination; for the bare possession of stolen property, though recently stolen, uncorroborated by other evidence, is sometimes fallacious and dangerous as a criterion of guilt; 2 Hale, Pl. Cr. 289, where it is said: "If a horse be stolen from A, and the same day B be found upon him, it is a strong presumption that B stole him; yet," adds that excellent lawyer, "I do remember before a learned and very wary judge, in such an instance, B was condemned and executed at Oxford assizes, and yet, within two assizes after, C being apprehended for another robbery, and convicted, upon his judgment and execution confessed he was the man that stole the horse, and, being closely pursued, desired B a stranger, to walk his horse for him while he turned aside upon a necessary occasion, and escaped; and B was apprehended with the horse, and died innocently."

The rule is occasionally attended with uncertainty in its application, from the difficulty attendant upon the positive identification of articles of property alleged to have been stolen; and it clearly ought never to be applied where there is reasonable ground to conclude that the witnesses may be mistaken, or where, from any other cause, identity is not satisfactorily established. But the rule is nevertheless properly applied in peculiar circumstances, where, though positive identification is impossible, the possession of the property cannot but be considered of a guilty character: as in the case of persons employed in carrying sugar and other articles from ships and wharves. Cases have frequently occurred of convictions of larceny, in such circumstances, upon evidence that the parties were detected with property of the same kind upon them recently after coming from such places, although the identity of the property as belonging to any particular person could not otherwise be proved.

It is seldom, however, that juries are required to determine upon the effect of evidence of the mere recent possession of stolen property: from the very nature of the case, the fact is generally accompanied by other corroborative or explanatory circumstances of presumption. If the party have secreted the property; if he deny it is in his possession, and such denial is discovered to be false; if he cannot show how he became possessed of it; if he give false, incredible, or inconsistent accounts of the manner, in which he acquired it, as that he had found it, or that it had been given or sold to him by a stranger or left at his house; if he has disposed of or attempted to dispose of it at an unreasonably low price; if he has absconded or endeavored to escape from justice; if other stolen property, or picklock keys, or other instruments of crime, be found in his possession; if he were seen near the spot at or about the time when the act was committed, or if any article belonging to him be found at the place or in the locality where the theft was committed, at or about the time of the commission of the offence; if the impression of his shoes or other articles of apparel correspond with marks left by the thieves; if he has attempted to obliterate from the articles in question marks of identity, or to tamper with the parties or the officers of justice: these and all like circumstances are justly considered as throwing light upon and explaining the fact of possession; and render it morally certain that such possession can be referable only to a criminal origin, and cannot otherwise be rationally accounted for; 1 Benn. & H. Lead. Cr. Cas. 371, where this subject is fully considered.

RECEPTUS (Lat.). In Civil Law. The name sometimes given to an arbitrator, because he had been received or chosen to settle the differences between the parties. Dig. 4, 8; Code 2, 58.

RECESSES. The time in which the court is not actually engaged in business. 69 Cal. 55.

RECESSION. A re-grant; the act of returning the title of a country to a government which formerly held it, by one which has it at the time; as, the recession of Louisiana, which took place by the treaty between France and Spain, of October 1, 1800. See 2 White, N. Rec. 516.

RECIDIVE. In French Law. The state of an individual who commits a crime or misdemeanor, after having once been condemned for a crime or misdemeanor; a relapse.

Many statutes provide that for a second offence punishment shall be increased; in those cases the indictment should set forth the crime or misdemeanor as a second offence.

The second offence must have been committed after the conviction for the first; a defendant could not be convicted of a second offence, as such, until after he had suffered a punishment for the first; Dalloz, Dict.

RECIDIVIST. A habitual criminal. One who makes a trade of crime. Reformation in such cases is rare. Such criminals generally either succumb to tuberculosis or heart disease in prison or end in an asylum. Sometimes attacks of acute mania or melancholia have a good influence upon such persons, but generally after an attack of acute insanity they are found to be still subject to their criminal tendencies. McDonald, Criminology, ch. viii. As to cases of innate tendency to particular crimes or special propensities, see id. pt. ii. ch. i.-ii.

RECIPROCAL CONTRACT. In Civil Law. One by which the parties enter into mutual engagements.

They are divided into perfect and imperfect. When they are perfectly reciprocal, the obligation of each of the parties is equally a principal part of the contract, such as sale, partnership, etc. Contracts imperfectly reciprocal are those in which the obligation of one of the parties only is a principal obligation of the contract: as, mandate, deposit, loan for use, and the like. In all reciprocal contracts the consent of the parties must be expressed. Fothier, Obl. n. 9; La. Civ. Code, art. 1758, 1759. See CONTRACT; MUTUAL CONSENT.

RECIPROCITY. Mutuality; state, quality, or character of that which is reciprocal.

The states of the Union are bound to many acts of reciprocity. The constitution requires that they shall deliver to each other fugitives from justice; that the records of one state, properly authenticated, shall have full credit in the other states; that the citizens of one state shall be citizens of any state into which they may remove. In some of the states, as in Pennsylvania, the rules with regard to the effect of a discharge under the insolvent laws of another state are reciprocated; the discharges of those courts which respect the discharges of the courts of Pennsylvania are respected in that state.

Between nations. Mutual concessions made by nations in favor of the importation of the products and manufactures of each other.

The president of the United States has been authorized by various tariff acts to enter into reciprocal agreements with foreign countries, concerning the mutual importation of manufactures and products, and to suspend certain provisions of the tariff laws, accordingly. By act of July 24, 1897, he may enter into such agreements with the governments of countries exporting certain specified products, and by proclamation reduce the tariff rates thereon during such agreement, to a lower schedule than specified in the act. He may, also, within two years of the passage of the act, with the consent of the senate, enter into treaties with foreign governments for a specified period of not exceeding five years, which will provide for a reduction of not over twenty per cent. on the tariff rates imposed by the act upon certain articles and for the addition of any such articles to the free list.

RECITAL. The repetition of some former writing, or the statement of something which has been done. It is useful to explain matters of fact which are necessary to make the transaction intelligible. 2 Bla. Com. 298; Big. Estop. 365.

In CONTRACTS. The party who executes a deed is bound by the recitals of essential facts contained therein; Com. Dig. Estoppel (A 2); 2 Co. 33; 8 Mod. 311. The amount of consideration received is held an essential fact under this rule, in England; 2 Taunt. 141; 5 B. & Ald. 606; 1 B. & C. 704; 2 B. & Ad. 544; otherwise in the United States; 5 Cush. 431; 6 Me. 304; 10 Vt. 90; 4 N.
